Looks upon daylight. And with her
I stooped to drink the spring-water,
Athirst where other waters sprang,
And where the echo is, she sang —
My soul another echo there 45

But when that hour my soul won strength
 For words whose silence wastes and kills,
 Dull raindrops smote us, and at length
 Thundered the heat within the hills.
 That eve I spoke those words again 50
 Beside the pelted window-pane;
 And there she harkened what I said,
 With under-glances that surveyed
 The empty pastures blind with rain.

Next day the memories of these things, 55
 Like leaves through which a bird has flown,
 Still vibrated with Love's warm wings;
 Till I must make them all my own
 And paint this picture. So, 'twixt ease
 Of talk and sweet, long silences, 60
 She stood among the plants in bloom
 At windows of a summer room,
 To feign the shadow of the trees.

And as I wrought, while all above
 And all around was fragrant air, 65
 In the sick burthen of my love
 It seemed each sun-thrilled blossom there
 Beat like a heart among the leaves.
 O heart that never beats nor heaves,
 In that one darkness lying still, 70
 What now to thee my love's great will,
 Or the fine web the sunshine weaves?

For now doth daylight disavow
 Those days — naught left to see or hear.
 Only in solemn whispers now 75
 At night-time these things reach mine ear,
 When the leaf-shadows at a breath
 Shrink in the road, and all the heath,
 Forest and water, far and wide,
 In limpid starlight glorified, 80
 Lie like the mystery of death.

Last night at last I could have slept,
 And yet delayed my sleep till dawn,
 Still wandering Then it was I wept,
 For unawares I came upon 85
 Those glades where once she walked with me,
 And as I stood there suddenly,
 All wan with traversing the night,
 Upon the desolate verge of light
 Yearned loud the iron-bosomed sea 90

Even so, where Heaven holds breath and hears
 The beating heart of Love's own breast —
 Where round the secret of all spheres
 All angels lay their wings to rest —
 How shall my soul stand rapt and awed, 95
 When, by the new birth borne abroad
 Throughout the music of the suns,
 It enters in her soul at once
 And knows the silence there for God!

Here with her face doth memory sit 100
 Meanwhile, and wait the day's decline,
 Till other eyes shall look from it,
 Eyes of the spirit's Palestine,
 Even than the old gaze tenderer;
 While hopes and aims long lost with her 105
 Stand round her image side by side,
 Like tombs of pilgrims that have died
 About the Holy Sepulcher. (1847; 1870)

AT THE SUNRISE IN 1848

God said, Let there be light! and there was
 light.
 Then heard we sounds as though the Earth did sing
 And the Earth's angel cried upon the wing,
 We saw priests fall together and turn white,
 And covered in the dust from the sun's sight,
 A king was spied, and yet another king 6
 We said: "The round world keeps its balancing;
 On this globe, they and we are opposite —
 It is day with us, with them 'tis night
 Still, Man, in thy just pride, remember this:
 Thou hadst not made that thy sons' sons shall ask 11
 What the word king may mean in their day's task,
 But for the light that led; and if light is,
 It is because God said, Let there be light" 12
 (1848; 1886)

ON REFUSAL OF AID BETWEEN NATIONS

Not that the earth is changing, O my God!
 Nor that the seasons totter in their walk —
 Not that the virulent ill of act and talk
 Seethes ever as a winepress ever trod —
 Not therefore are we certain that the rod 5
 Weighs in thine hand to smite thy world, though now
 Beneath thine hand so many nations bow,
 So many kings — not therefore, O my God! —
 But because Man is parceled out in men
 Today; because, for any wrongful blow, 10
 No man not stricken asks, "I would be told Why thou dost thus"; but his heart whispers then,
 "He is he, I am I" By this we know
 That the earth falls asunder, being old (1848, 1870)

At the Sunrise in 1848. The poem refers to the European revolutions of 1848. Cf. Mrs. Browning's Casa Guidi Windows, page 373.

MARY'S GIRLHOOD

I

This is that blessed Mary, pre-elect God's Virgin. Gone is a great while, and she Dwelt young in Nazareth of Galilee.
 Unto God's will she brought devout respect,
 Profound simplicity of intellect, 5
 And supreme patience. From her mother's knee

Faithful and hopeful; wise in charity;
 Strong in grave peace; in pity circumspect.
 So held she through her girlhood, as it were
 An angel-watered lily, that near God 10
 Grows and is quiet Till, one dawn at home
 She woke in her white bed, and had no fear
 At all — yet wept till sunshine, and felt awed,
 Because the fullness of the time was come.

These are the symbols. On that cloth of red
 I' the center is the Tripoint; perfect each,
 Except the second of its points, to teach That Christ is not yet born. The books — whose head

Is golden Charity, as Paul hath said — 5
 Those virtues are wherein the soul is rich;
 Therefore on them the lily standeth, which Is Innocence, being interpreted.
 The seven-thorned briar and the palm sevenleaved

Are her great sorrow and her great reward 10
 Until the end be full, the Holy One Abides without. She soon shall have achieved
 Her perfect purity; yea, God the Lord
 Shall soon vouchsafe His Son to be her Son (1848; 1849)

FOR A VENETIAN PASTORAL

BY GIORGIONE

(In the Louvre)

Water, for anguish of the solstice — nay,
 But dip the vessel, slowly — nay, but lean
 And hark how at its verge the wave sighs in,

Mary's Girlhood These two sonnets were written for Rossetti's first exhibited picture, painted in 1848.

Sonnet 2 1 symbols. The symbols mentioned are in the picture 2 the Tripoint, a triangle symbolizing God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost 5 Paul hath said, in 1 Corinthians, 13 13 — "And now abideth faith, hope, and charity, these three, but the greatest of these is charity" 10 sorrow . . . reward. For the Seven Sorrows of Mary, see note on Browning's Up at a Villa—Down in the City, 52, page 223. The Seven Joys are as follows: the annunciation of the angel Gabriel (Luke, 1 26-38); the visitation (Luke, 1 39-56); the nativity (Luke, 2 6-7); the adoration of the Magi (Matthew, 2 1-12); the presentation in the temple (Luke, 2 22-33); the finding of the lost child (Luke, 2 41-51); and the assumption (Luke, 24 50-53).

For a Venetian Pastoral This sonnet was written for a picture in which two cavaliers and a nude woman are seated

Reluctant Hush! Beyond all depth away
 The heat lies silent at the brink of day; 5
 Now the hand trails upon the viol-string
 That sobs, and the brown faces cease to sing,
 Sad with the whole of pleasure. Whither stray
 Her eyes now, from whose mouth the slim pipes creep
 And leave it pouting, while the shadowed grass 10
 Is cool against her naked side? Let be —
 Say nothing now unto her lest she weep, Nor name this ever. Be it as it was —
 Life touching lips with Immortality. (1850)

THE CARD-DEALER

Could you not drink her gaze like wine?
 Yet though its splendor swoon
 Into the silence languidly
 As a tune into a tune,
 Those eyes unravel the coiled night 5
 And know the stars at noon.

The gold that's heaped beside her hand,
 In truth rich prize it were,
 And rich the dreams that wreath her brows
 With magic stillness there; 10
 And he were rich who should unwind
 That woven golden hair.

Around her, where she sits, the dance
 Now breathes its eager heat,
 And not more lightly or more true 15
 Fall there the dancers' feet
 Than fall her cards on the bright board
 As 'twere an heart that beat

Her fingers let them softly through,
 Smooth polished silent things; 20
 And each one as it falls reflects
 In swift light-shadowings,
 Blood-red and purple, green and blue,
 The great eyes of her rings.

Whom plays she with? With thee, who lov'st
 Those gems upon her hand; 26
 With me, who search her secret brows;
 With all men, blessed or banned.
 We play together, she and we,
 Within a vain strange land: 30

A land without any order —
 Day even as night (one saith) —
 Where who lieth down ariseth not on the grass, with musical instruments, while another woman dips a vase into a well for water. The picture was painted by Giorgione da Castelfranco (1478?-1511), a Venetian artist, and now hangs in the Louvre, Paris.

1 anguish of the solstice, suffering from the heat of the summer solstice

Nor the sleeper awakeneth;
A land of darkness as darkness itself 35
And of the shadow of death

What be her cards, you ask? Even these:
The heart, that doth but crave
More, having fed; the diamond,
Skilled to make base seem brave, 40
The club, for smiting in the dark,
The spade, to dig a grave.

And do you ask what game she plays?
With me 'tis lost or won,
With thee it is playing still, with him 45
It is not well begun,
But 'tis a game she plays with all
Beneath the sway o' the sun

Thou seest the card that falls, she knows
The card that followeth; 50
Her game in thy tongue is called Life,
As ebbs thy daily breath
When she shall speak, thou'lt learn her tongue
And know she calls it Death (1849; 1870)

ON THE "VITA NUOVA" OF DANTE

As he that loves oft looks on the dear form
And guesses how it grew to womanhood,
And gladly would have watched the beauties bud

And the mild fire of precious life wax warm —
So I, long bound within the threefold charm 5
Of Dante's love sublimed to heavenly mood,
Had marveled, touching his Beatitude,
How grew such presence from man's shameful swarm

At length within this book I found portrayed Newborn that Paradisal Love of his, 10
And simple like a child, with whose clear aid
I understood. To such a child as this,
Christ, charging well his chosen ones, forbade Offense. "For lo! of such my kingdom is" 1870)

WORLD'S WORTH

'Tis of the Father Hilary
He strove, but could not pray; so took
The steep-coiled stair, where his feet shook
A sad blind echo Ever up

On the "Vita Nuova" of Dante The Vita Nuova (New Life) is an early lyrical sequence with prose commentary presenting the story of Dante's love life

5 threefold charm, a reference to the three parts of The Divine Comedy—Paradise, Purgatory, and Inferno 6 sublimed, raised to a sublime plane 7 Beatitude, Dante's blessed state, which came as a result of The Divine Comedy 14 of such . . . is. From Mark, 10:14—"Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of God"

World's Worth 1 Father Hilary, an early saint and bishop of the fourth century

He toiled 'Twas a sick sway of air 5
That autumn noon within the stair,
As dizzy as a turning cup.
His brain benumbed him, void and thin;
He shut his eyes and felt it spin;
The obscure deafness hemmed him in 10
He said, "O world, what world for me?"

He leaned unto the balcony
Where the chime keeps the night and day,
It hurt his brain, he could not pray
He had his face upon the stone; 15
Deep 'twixt the narrow shafts, his eye
Passed all the roofs to the stark sky,
Swept with no wing, with wind alone.
Close to his feet the sky did shake
With wind in pools that the rains make, 20
The ripple set his eyes to ache.
He said, "O world, what world for me?"

He stood within the mystery
Girding God's blessed Eucharist;
The organ and the chant had ceased. 25
The last words paused against his ear
Said from the altar; drawn round him
The gathering rest was dumb and dim
And now the sacring-bell rang clear
And ceased, and all was awe—the breath
Of God in man that warranteth 31
The inmost utmost things of faith
He said, "O God, my world in Thee!" (1850)

THE SEA-LIMITS

Consider the sea's listless chime.
Time's self it is, made audible —
The murmur of the earth's own shell.
Secret continuance sublime
Is the sea's end; our sight may pass 5
No furlong further Since time was,
This sound hath told the lapse of time

No quiet, which is death's — it hath
The mournfulness of ancient life,
Enduring always at dull strife. 10
As the world's heart of rest and wrath,
Its painful pulse is in the sands.
Last utterly, the whole sky stands,
Gray and not known, along its path.

Listen alone beside the sea, 15
Listen alone among the woods;
Those voices of twin solitudes
Shall have one sound alike to thee.
Hark where the murmurs of thronged men
Surge and sink back and surge again — 20
Still the one voice of wave and tree.

24 Eucharist, the sacrament of the Lord's Supper 29 sacring-bell, a bell rung at certain times during the Mass, or the Communion Service

Gather a shell from the strown beach
 And listen at its lips; they sigh
 The same desire and mystery,
 The echo of the whole sea's speech. 25
 And all mankind is thus at heart
 Not anything but what thou art;
 And Earth, Sea, Man, are all in each.
 (1849, 1850)

DANTE AT VERONA

"Yea, thou shalt learn how salt his food who fares
 Upon another's bread — how steep his path
 Who treadeth up and down another's stairs."

—Div. Com. Parad. xvii

"Behold, even I, even I am Beatrice"

—Div. Com. Purg. xxx.

Of Florence and of Beatrice
 Servant and singer from of old,
 O'er Dante's heart in youth had tolled
 The knell that gave his Lady peace,
 And now in manhood flew the dart 5
 Wherewith his city pierced his heart.

Yet if his Lady's home above
 Was heaven, on earth she filled his soul;
 And if his city held control
 To cast the body forth to rove, 10
 The soul could soar from earth's vain
 throng,
 And heaven and hell fulfill the song.

Follow his feet's appointed way —
 But little light we find that clears
 The darkness of the exiled years. 15
 Follow his spirit's journey — nay,
 What fires are blent, what winds are blown
 On paths his feet may tread alone?

Yet of the twofold life he led
 In chainless thought and fettered will 20
 Some glimpses reach us — somewhat still
 Of the steep stairs and bitter bread —
 Of the soul's quest whose stern avow
 For years had made him haggard now.

Alas! the Sacred Song whereto 25
 Both heaven and earth had set their hand

Dante at Verona This poem, originally called Dante in Exile, was written as an introduction to Rossetti's translation of Dante's Vita Nuova (See On the "Vita Nuova" of Dante and note, page 506) Dante Alighieri was born in Florence in 1265 and lived there until he was exiled in 1302 for opposing the policy of Pope Boniface, who desired to gain complete control of the city. The rest of Dante's life was spent in exile, few details of which are known. He died in Ravenna in 1321. The quotations below the title are from Dante's most famous work, The Divine Comedy, which is composed of three parts—Paradise, Purgatory, and Inferno.

1 Beatrice, the young woman whom Dante loved and who influenced the whole course of his later life. Tradition has identified her with the daughter of Folco Portinari, a wealthy Florentine. She died in 1290. 25 Sacred Song, The Divine Comedy

Not only at Fame's gate did stand Knocking to claim the passage through,
 But toiled to ope that heavier door
 Which Florence shut for evermore. 30

Shall not his birth's baptismal town
 One last high presage yet fulfill,
 And at that font in Florence still
 His forehead take the laurel-crown?
 O God! or shall dead souls deny 35
 The undying soul its prophecy?

Aye, 'tis their hour. Not yet forgot
 The bitter words he spoke that day
 When for some great charge far away
 Her rulers his acceptance sought. 40
 "And if I go, who stays?" — so rose
 His scorn — "and if I stay, who goes?"

"Lo! thou art gone now, and we stay"
 (The curled lips mutter), "and no star
 Is from thy mortal path so far 45
 As streets where childhood knew the way.
 To heaven and hell thy feet may win,
 But thine own house they come not in."

Therefore, the loftier rose the song
 To touch the secret things of God, 50
 The deeper pierced the hate that trod
 On base men's track who wrought the wrong;
 Till the soul's effluence came to be
 Its own exceeding agony.

Arriving only to depart, 55
 From court to court, from land to land,
 Like flame within the naked hand
 His body bore his burning heart,
 That still on Florence strove to bring
 God's fire for a burnt offering. 60

Even such was Dante's mood, when now,
 Mocked for long years with Fortune's sport,
 He dwelt at yet another court,
 There where Verona's knee did bow
 And her voice hailed with all acclaim 65
 Can Grande della Scala's name.

As that lord's kingly guest awhile
 His life we follow, through the days
 Which walked in exile's barren ways —
 The nights which still beneath one smile 70 Heard through all spheres one song increase —
 "Even I, even I am Beatrice."

34 laurel-crown A crown of laurel was often bestowed upon men for distinguished service or achievement. Within twenty years after his death Florence recognized Dante as her greatest man. 39 great charge Dante was selected in 1301 for an important embassy to the Pope. It is not known whether he went. 52 the wrong, Dante's exile. 66 Can Grande della Scala (1291-1329), the ruler of Verona from 1311 to 1329, and the leader of the Lombard Ghibellines, the party antagonistic to the Pope.

At Can La Scala's court, no doubt,
 Due reverence did his steps attend,
 The ushers on his path would bend 75
 At ingoing as at going out;
 The penman waited on his call
 At council-board, the grooms in hall.

And pages hushed their laughter down,
 And gay squires stilled the merry stir, 80
 When he passed up the dais-chamber
 With set brows lordlier than a frown;
 And tire-maids hidden among these Drew close their loosened bodices.

Perhaps the priests (exact to span 85
 All God's circumference), if at whiles
 They found him wandering in their aisles,
 Grudged ghostly greeting to the man
 By whom, though not of ghostly guild,
 With heaven and hell men's hearts were filled. 90

And the court-poets (he, forsooth,
 A whole world's poet strayed to court!)
 Had for his scorn their hate's retort.
 He'd meet them flushed with easy youth,
 Hot on their errands. Like noon-flies 95
 They vexed him in the ears and eyes

But at this court, peace still must wrench
 Her chaplet from the teeth of war:
 By day they held high watch afar,
 At night they cried across the trench; 100
 And still, in Dante's path, the fierce
 Gaunt soldiers wrangled o'er their spears

But vain seemed all the strength to him,
 As golden convoys sunk at sea
 Whose wealth might root out penury; 105
 Because it was not, limb with limb,
 Knit like his heart-strings round the wall
 Of Florence, that ill pride might fall.

Yet in the tiltyard, when the dust
 Cleared from the sundered press of knights
 Ere yet again it swoops and smites, 111
 He almost deemed his longing must Find force to wield that multitude
 And hurl that strength the way he would.

How should he move them — fame and gain
 On all hands calling them at strife? 116
 He still might find but his one life
 To give, by Florence counted vain;
 One heart the false hearts made her doubt
 One voice she heard once and cast out. 120

Oh! if his Florence could but come,
 A lily-sceptered damsel fair,

88 ghostly, spiritual

As her own Giotto painted her
 On many shields and gates at home —
 A lady crowned, at a soft pace 125
 Riding the lists round to the dais;

Till where Can Grande rules the lists,
 As young as Truth, as calm as Force,
 She draws her rein now, while her horse
 Bows at the turn of the white wrists; 130
 And when each knight within his stall
 Gives ear, she speaks and tells them all:

All the foul tale — truth sworn untrue
 And falsehood's triumph. All the tale?
 Great God! and must she not prevail 135
 To fire them ere they heard it through —
 And hand achieve ere heart could rest
 That high adventure of her quest?

How would his Florence lead them forth,
 Her bridle ringing as she went; 140
 And at the last within her tent,
 'Neath golden lilies worship-worth,
 How queenly would she bend the while
 And thank the victors with her smile!

Also her lips should turn his way 145
 And murmur: "O thou tried and true,
 With whom I wept the long years through!
 What shall it profit if I say,
 Thee I remember? Nay, through thee
 All ages shall remember me " 150

Peace, Dante, peace! The task is long,
 The time wears short to compass it.
 Within thine heart such hopes may flit
 And find a voice in deathless song;
 But lo! as children of man's earth, 155
 Those hopes are dead before their birth

Fame tells us that Verona's court
 Was a fair place. The feet might still Wander forever at their will
 In many ways of sweet resort; 160
 And still in many a heart around
 The poet's name due honor found.

Watch we his steps He comes upon
 The women at their palm-playing
 The conduits round the gardens sing 165
 And meet in scoops of milk-white stone,
 Where wearied damsels rest and hold
 Their hands in the wet spurt of gold.

One of whom, knowing well that he,
 By some found stern, was mild with them,

123 Giotto, Giotto di Bondone (1276-1337), a famous Florentine painter, sculptor, and architect. See Browning's Old Pictures in Florence, page 224. 142 golden lilies, constituting the badge of the City of Florence. 164, palm-playing, a game lik. tennis, but in which the ball was struck by the hand instead of a racket

Would run and pluck his garment's hem, 171
Saying, "Messer Dante, pardon me" —
Praying that they might hear the song
Which first of all he made, when young,

"Donne che avete" . . . Thereunto 175
Thus would he murmur, having first
Drawn near the fountain, while she nursed
His hand against her side: a few
Sweet words, and scarcely those, half said;
Then turned, and changed, and bowed his
head. 180

For then the voice said in his heart,
"Even I, even I am Beatrice";
And his whole life would yearn to cease,
Till having reached his room, apart
Beyond vast lengths of palace-floor, 185
He drew the arras round his door.

At such times, Dante, thou hast set
Thy forehead to the painted pane
Full oft, I know; and if the rain
Smote it outside, her fingers met 190
Thy brow, and if the sun fell there,
Her breath was on thy face and hair.

Then, weeping, I think certainly Thou hast beheld, past sight of eyne —
Within another room of thine 195
Where now thy body may not be
But where in thought thou still remain'st —
A window often wept against:

The window thou, a youth, hast sought,
Flushed in the lumpid eventime, 200
Ending with daylight the day's rime
Of her; where oftenwhiles her thought
Held thee—the lamp untrimmed to write—
In joy through the blue lapse of night

At Can La Scala's court, no doubt, 205
Guests seldom wept. It was brave sport,
No doubt, at Can La Scala's court,
Within the palace and without;
Where music, set to madrigals,
Loitered all day through groves and halls

Because Can Grande of his life 211
Had not had six-and-twenty years
As yet. And when the chroniclers
Tell you of that Vicenza strife
And of strifes elsewhere — you must not 215
Conceive for church-sooth he had got

Just nothing in his wits but war;
Though doubtless 'twas the young man's joy
(Grown with his growth from a mere boy)
To mark his "Viva Cane!" scare 220
The foe's shut front, till it would reel
All blind with shaken points of steel.

But there were places — held too sweet
For eyes that had not the due veil
Of lashes and clear lids — as well 225
In favor as his saddle-seat;
Breath of low speech he scorned not there
Nor light, cool fingers in his hair.

Yet if the child whom the sire's plan
Made free of a deep treasure-chest 230
Scoffed it with ill-conditioned jest —
We may be sure too that the man
Was not mere thews, nor all content
With lewdness swathed in sentiment.

So you may read and marvel not 235
That such a man as Dante — one
Who, while Can Grande's deeds were done,
Had drawn his robe round him and thought —
Now at the same guest-table fared
Where keen Uguccio wiped his beard. 240

Through leaves and trellis-work the sun
Left the wine cool within the glass —
They feasting where no sun could pass;
And when the women, all as one,
Rose up with brightened cheeks to go, 245
It was a comely thing, we know.

But Dante recked not of the wine;
Whether the women stayed or went,
His visage held one stern intent;
And when the music had its sign 250
To breathe upon them for more ease,
Sometimes he turned and bade it cease.

And as he spared not to rebuke
The mirth, so oft in council he
To bitter truth bore testimony; 255
And when the crafty balance shook
Well poised to make the wrong prevail,
Then Dante's hand would turn the scale.

And if some envoy from afar
Sailed to Verona's sovereign port 260
For aid or peace, and all the court
Fawned on its lord, "the Mars of war,
Sole arbiter of life and death" —
Be sure that Dante saved his breath.

173-174 song . . . young, the Vita Nuova, written when Dante was twenty-five years old 175 "Donne che avete," the opening words of the first canzone of the Vita Nuova The sentence reads, "Ladies, who have intelligence of love, hear me" 214 Vicenza strife During his rule Scala forcefully extended his power over Vicenza and other cities of the province

220 "Viva Cane," may Can live! 240 Uguccio, Ugucione della Faggiuola, the captain of the Ghibellines and a friend and protector of Dante (See note on line 66) 262 Mars, the Greek god of war

And Can La Scala marked askance 265
 These things, accepting them for shame
 And scorn, till Dante's guestship came
 To be a peevish sufferance;
 His host sought ways to make his days
 Hateful — and such have many ways. 270

There was a jester, a foul lout,
 Whom the court loved for graceless arts;
 Sworn scholast of the bestial parts
 Of speech, a ribald mouth to shout
 In Folly's horny tympanum 275
 Such things as make the wise man dumb.

Much loved, him Dante loathed. And so,
 One day when Dante felt perplexed
 If any day that could come next
 Were worth the waiting for or no, 280
 And mute he sat amid their din —
 Can Grande called the jester in.

Rank words, with such, are wit's best wealth
 Lords mouthed approval; ladies kept Twittering with clustered heads, except 285
 Some few that took their trains by stealth
 And went. Can Grande shook his hair
 And smote his thighs and laughed i' the air.

Then, facing on his guest, he cried —
 "Say, Messer Dante, how it is 290
 I get out of a clown like this
 More than your wisdom can provide "
 And Dante: " 'Tis man's ancient whim
 That still his like seems good to him."

Also a tale is told, how once, 295
 At clearing tables after meat,
 Piled for a jest at Dante's feet
 Were found the dinner's well-picked bones,
 So laid, to please the banquet's lord,
 By one who crouched beneath the board 300

Then smiled Can Grande to the rest:
 "Our Dante's tuneful mouth indeed Lacks not the gift on flesh to feed!"
 "Fair host of mine," replied the guest,
 "So many bones you'd not descry 305
 If so it chanced the dog were I."

But wherefore should we turn the grout
 In a drained cup, or be at strife
 From the worn garment of a life
 To rip the twisted ravel out? 310
 Good needs expounding, but of ill
 Each hath enough to guess his fill.

They named him Justicer-at-Law:
 Each month to bear the tale in mind
 Of hues a wench might wear unfinned 315
 And of the load an ox might draw;
 To cavil in the weight of bread
 And to see purse-thieves gibbeted.

And when his spirit wove the spell
 (From under even to over-noon 320
 In converse with itself alone),
 As high as heaven, as low as hell —
 He would be summoned and must go;
 For had not Gian stabbed Giacomo?

Therefore the bread he had to eat 325
 Seemed brackish, less like corn than tares,
 And the rush-strown accustomed stairs
 Each day were steeper to his feet,
 And when the night-vigil was done,
 His brows would ache to feel the sun. 330

Nevertheless, when from his kin
 There came the tidings how at last
 In Florence a decree was passed
 Whereby all banished folk might win
 Free pardon, so a fine were paid 335
 And act of public penance made —

This Dante writ in answer thus,
 Words such as these. "That clearly they
 In Florence must not have to say —
 The man abode aloof from us 340
 Nigh fifteen years, yet lastly skulked
 Hither to candleshrift and mulct.

"That he was one the heavens forbid
 To traffic in God's justice sold
 By market-weight of earthly gold, 345
 Or to bow down over the lid
 Of steaming censers, and so be Made clean of manhood's obloquy.

"That since no gate led, by God's will,
 To Florence, but the one whereat 350
 The priests and money-changers sat,
 He still would wander, for that still,
 Even through the body's prison-bars,
 His soul possessed the sun and stars."

Such were his words. It is indeed 355
 Forever well our singers should Utter good words and know them good
 Not through song only; with close heed
 Lest, having spent for the work's sake
 Six days, the man be left to make. 360

Months o'er Verona, till the feast
 Was come for Florence the Free Town,

269-270 days. . Hateful. Edmund Gardner in Dante, page 36, states that "the old legend of Dante's having met with discourtesy at the hands of Can Grande is to be absolutely rejected" 273 scholast, commentator 306. the dog were I, a pun, cane is the Italian word for dog 307. grout, dregs

315 unfinned, without penalty 326 corn, wheat 342 candleshrift, a shrift, or ceremony of confession and forgiveness, in which candles are carried

And at the shrine of Baptist John
The exiles, girt with many a priest
And carrying candles as they went, 365
Were held to mercy of the saint.

On the high seats in sober state —
Gold neck-chains range o'er range below
Gold screen-work where the lilies grow —
The Heads of the Republic sate, 370 Marking the humbled face go by Each one of his house-enemy.

And as each proscrip't rose and stood
From kneeling in the ashen dust
On the shrine-steps, some magnate thrust
A beard into the velvet hood 376
Of his front colleague's gown, to see
The cinders stuck in the bare knee.

Tosinghi passed, Manelli passed,
Rinucci passed, each in his place; 380
But not an Alighieri's face
Went by that day from first to last
In the Republic's triumph; nor
A foot came home to Dante's door.

(RESPUBLICA — a public thing: 385
A shameful shameless prostitute,
Whose lust with one lord may not suit.
So takes by turns its reveling
A night with each, till each at morn
Is stripped and beaten forth forlorn, 390

And leaves her, cursing her If she,
Indeed, have not some spice-draft, hid
In scent under a silver lid,
To drench his open throat with — he Once hard asleep, and thrust him not 395
At dawn beneath the boards to rot.

Such this Republic!—not the Maid
He yearned for; she who yet should stand
With Heaven's accepted hand in hand,
Invulnerable and unbetrayed: 400
To whom, even as to God, should be Obeisance one with Liberty.)

Years filled out their twelve moons, and ceased
One in another; and alway
There were the whole twelve hours each day
And each night as the years increased; 406
And rising moon and setting sun
Beheld that Dante's work was done.

What of his work for Florence? Well
It was, he knew, and well must be. 410

363 shrine . . . John, the Baptistry of St. John, one of the oldest buildings in Florence 379 Tosinghi, etc., names of other exiled Florentines

Yet evermore her hate's decree
Dwelt in his thought intolerable:
His body to be burned — his soul
To beat its wings at hope's vain goal.

What of his work for Beatrice? 415
Now well-nigh was the third song writ —
The stars a third time sealing it
With sudden music of pure peace;
For echoing thrice the threefold song,
The unnumbered stars the tone prolong.

Each hour, as then the Vision passed, 421
He heard the utter harmony
Of the nine trembling spheres, till she Bowed her eyes toward him in the last,
So that all ended with her eyes, 425
Hell, Purgatory, Paradise.

"It is my trust, as the years fall,
To write more worthily of her
Who now, being made God's minister,
Looks on His visage and knows all." 430
Such was the hope that love did blend
With grief's slow fires, to make an end

Of the New Life, his youth's dear book;
Adding thereunto: "In such trust
I labor, and believe I must 435
Accomplish this which my soul took
In charge, if God, my Lord and hers,
Leave my life with me a few years."

The trust which he had borne in youth
Was all at length accomplished. He 440
At length had written worthily —
Yea even of her; no rimes uncouth
'Twixt tongue and tongue; but by God's aid
The first words Italy had said.

Ah! haply now the heavenly guide 445
Was not the last form seen by him;
But there that Beatrice stood slum
And bowed in passing at his side,
For whom in youth his heart made moan
Then when the city sat alone. 450

Clearly herself, the same whom he Met, not past girlhood, in the street,
Low-bosomed and with hidden feet;
And then as woman perfectly,
In years that followed, many an once —
And now at last among the suns 456

413 body to be burned This was the last sentence passed by Florence against Dante 416 third song, the Inferno, the third part of The Divine Comedy 417 stars . . . it. The last word in each of the parts of The Divine Comedy is stelle, meaning stars 422 harmony See note on line 54 of The Blessed Damozel, page 501 444 first words . . . said, a reference to the rise of vernacular literature 450 Then . . . alone, words used by Dante in the Vita Nuova when he speaks of Beatrice's death

In that high vision. But indeed
 It may be memory did recall
 Last to him then the first of all —
 The child his boyhood bore in heed 460
 Nine years. At length the voice brought peace —
 "Even I, even I am Beatrice."

All this, being there, we had not seen.
 Seen only was the shadow wrought
 On the strong features bound in thought,
 The vagueness gaining gait and mien; 466
 The white streaks gathering clear to view
 In the burnt beard the women knew.

For a tale tells that on his track,
 As through Verona's streets he went, 470
 This saying certain women sent:
 "Lo, he that strolls to hell and back
 At will! Behold him, how hell's reek
 Has crisped his beard and singed his cheek "

"Whereat" (Boccaccio's words) "he smiled
 For pride in fame." It might be so, 476
 Nevertheless we cannot know
 If haply he were not beguiled
 To bitterer mirth, who scarce could tell
 If he indeed were back from hell. 480

So the day came, after a space,
 When Dante felt assured that there
 The sunshine must lie sicklier
 Even than in any other place,
 Save only Florence When that day 485
 Had come, he rose and went his way.

He went and turned not. From his shoes
 It may be that he shook the dust,
 As every righteous dealer must Once and again ere life can close; 490
 And unaccomplished destiny
 Struck cold his forehead, it may be.

No book keeps record how the prince
 Sunned himself out of Dante's reach,
 Nor how the jester stank in speech; 495
 While courtiers, used to smile and wince,
 Poets and harlots, all the throng,
 Let loose their scandal and their song.

No book keeps record if the seat 499
 Which Dante held at his host's board
 Were sat in next by clerk or lord —
 If leman lolled with dainty feet

475 Boccaccio, Giovanni Boccaccio (1313-75), famous Italian prose writer. He was the first lecturer on Dante in Florence and left a brief treatise on Dante's life. shook the dust When Jesus sent the disciples forth to preach, he said to them "Whosoever shall not receive you, nor hear your words, when ye depart out of that house or city, shake off the dust of your feet" (Matthew, 10 14)

At ease, or hostage brooded there,
 Or priest lacked silence for his prayer.

Eat and wash hands, Can Grande; scarce
 We know their deeds now — hands which 506 fed
 Our Dante with that bitter bread;
 And thou the watchdog of those stairs
 Which, of all paths his feet knew well,
 Were steeper found than heaven or hell.

THE BURDEN OF NINEVEH

In our Museum galleries
 Today I lingered o'er the prize
 Dead Greece vouchsafes to living eyes —
 Her Art forever in fresh life
 From hour to hour rejoicing me. 5
 Sighing I turned at last to win
 Once more the London dirt and din;
 And as I made the swing-door spin
 And issued, they were hoisting in
 A winged beast from Nineveh. 10

A human face the creature wore,
 And hoofs behind and hoofs before,
 And flanks with dark runes fretted o'er.
 'Twas bull, 'twas mitered Minotaur,
 A dead disboweled mystery; 15
 The mummy of a buried faith
 Stark from the charnel without scathe,
 Its wings stood for the light to bathe —
 Such fossil cerements as might swathe
 The very corpse of Nineveh. 20

The print of its first rush-wrapping,
 Wound ere it dried, still ribbed the thing
 What song did the brown maidens sing,
 From purple mouths alternating,
 When that was woven languidly? 25
 What vows, what rites, what prayers preferred,
 What songs has the strange image heard?
 In what blind vigil stood interred
 For ages, till an English word
 Broke silence first at Nineveh? 30

Oh, when upon each sculptured court,
 Where even the wind might not resort —

The Burden of Nineveh The title is identical with the opening words of Nahum. Nineveh was the famous capital of the ancient Assyrian Empire. The city was destroyed by the Medes and the Chaldeans in 600 B.C. and during the centuries that followed was completely buried under drifting sands. In 1845-51 excavations on the site, under the direction of Sir Austen Layard (1817-94) of England, revealed ancient palaces, libraries, and sculptures, including colossal winged man-headed statues of bulls and lions. Rossetti got the suggestion for the poem while watching some of the sculptures being unpacked at the British Museum in London. 13 runes, ancient characters used in writing. They are called "dark" because their meaning is concealed. 14 Minotaur, a mythological monster slain by Theseus, a great hero of Athens. The beast was half man and half bull.

O'er which Time passed, of like import
 With the wild Arab boys at sport —
 A living face looked in to see. — 35
 Oh, seemed it not — the spell once broke —
 As though the carved warriors woke,
 As though the shaft the string forsook,
 The cymbals clashed, the chariots shook,
 And there was life in Nineveh? 40

On London stones our sun anew
 The beast's recovered shadow threw.
 (No shade that plague of darkness knew,
 No light, no shade, while older grew
 By ages the old earth and sea) 45
 Lo thou! could all thy priests have shown
 Such proof to make thy godhead known?
 From their dead Past thou liv'st alone;
 And still thy shadow is thine own,
 Even as of yore in Nineveh. 50

That day whereof we keep record,
 When near thy city-gates the Lord
 Sheltered his Jonah with a gourd,
 This sun (I said), here present, poured
 Even thus this shadow that I see. 55
 This shadow has been shed the same
 From sun and moon — from lamps which came

For prayer — from fifteen days of flame,
 The last, while smoldered to a name
 Sardanapalus' Nineveh. 60

Within thy shadow, haply, once
 Sennacherib has knelt, whose sons
 Smote him between the altar-stones;
 Or pale Semiramis her zones
 Of gold, her incense brought to thee, 65
 In love for grace, in war for aid . . .
 Aye, and who else? . . . till 'neath thy shade
 Within his trenches newly made
 Last year the Christian knelt and prayed —
 Not to thy strength — in Nineveh. 70

Now, thou poor god, within this hall
 Where the blank windows blind the wall
 From pedestal to pedestal,
 The kind of light shall on thee fall
 Which London takes the day to be; 75

53 Jonah . . . gourd. Angry because the repentant city of Nineveh was not to be destroyed by the Lord, Jonah "went out of the city and sat on the east side . . . And the Lord God prepared a gourd and made it to come up over Jonah that it might be a shadow over his head to deliver him from his grief" (Jonah, 4 5-6) 60 Sardanapalus, the Greek name of the last great Assyrian king, Assurbanipal (8th century B.C.). According to tradition he burned his wives, his treasures, and himself to avoid capture by the enemy 62 Sennacherib, king of Assyria (705-681 B.C.), a great warrior and builder of Nineveh. His palace was discovered by the excavators of 1846-51 64 Semiramis, a famous queen of Assyria, according to legend, the half-divine wife and successor of Ninus, the founder of Nineveh, c. 2000 B.C. 69 Last year . . . prayed During the excavations the workmen conducted their worship in the shadow of the great bulls

While school-foundations in the act
 Of holiday, three files compact,
 Shall learn to view thee as a fact Connected with that zealous tract:
 "Rome — Babylon and Nineveh." 80

Deemed they of this, those worshipers,
 When, in some mythic chain of verse
 Which man shall not again rehearse,
 The faces of thy ministers
 Earned pale with bitter ecstasy? 85
 Greece, Egypt, Rome — did any god
 Before whose feet men knelt unshod
 Deem that in this unblest abode
 Another scarce more unknown god
 Should house with him, from Nineveh? 90

Ah! in what quarries lay the stone
 From which this pygmy pile has grown,
 Unto man's need how long unknown,
 Since thy vast temples, court, and cone,
 Rose far in desert history? 95
 Ah! what is here that does not lie
 All strange to thine awakened eye?
 Ah! what is here can testify
 (Save that dumb presence of the sky)
 Unto thy day and Nineveh? 100

Why, of those mummies in the room
 Above, there might indeed have come
 One out of Egypt to thy home,
 An alien. Nay, but were not some
 Of these thine own "antiquity"? 105
 And now — they and their gods and thou
 All relics here together — now
 Whose profit? whether bull or cow,
 Isis or Ibis, who or how,
 Whether of Thebes or Nineveh? 110

The consecrated metals found,
 And ivory tablets, underground,
 Winged teraphim and creatures crowned
 When air and daylight filled the mound,
 Fell into dust immediately. 115
 And even as these, the images
 Of awe and worship — even as these —
 So, smitten with the sun's increase,
 Her glory moldered and did cease
 From immemorial Nineveh. 120

The day her builders made their halt,
 Those cities of the lake of salt

76 school-foundations, endowed schools 109 Isis, the chief Egyptian goddess, sometimes represented with the head of a cow 110 Ibis, the sacred ibis, a wading bird venerated by the Egyptians 110 Thebes, the ancient capital of Upper Egypt, on the Nile 113 teraphim, household idols 122 cities . . . salt, the ancient cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, situated in the plain of the Jordan River, which flowed into the Dead Sea (Salt Sea) southwest of Jerusalem The cities were destroyed because of their wickedness (See Genesis, 13 10-13, 19 1-29)

Stood firmly 'stablished without fault,
 Made proud with pillars of basalt,
 With sardonyx and porphyry. 125
 The day that Jonah bore abroad
 To Nineveh the voice of God,
 A brackish lake lay in his road,
 Where erst Pride fixed her sure abode,
 As then in royal Nineveh. 130

The day when he, Pride's lord and Man's,
 Showed all the kingdoms at a glance
 To Him before whose countenance
 The years recede, the years advance,
 And said, Fall down and worship me — 135
 'Mid all the pomp beneath that look,
 Then stirred there, haply, some rebuke,
 Where to the wind the salt pools shook,
 And in those tracts, of life forsook,
 That knew thee not, O Nineveh! 140

Delicate harlot! On thy throne
 Thou with a world beneath thee prone
 In state for ages sat'st alone;
 And needs were years and lusters flown
 Ere strength of man could vanquish thee, 145
 Whom even thy victor foes must bring,
 Still royal, among maids that sing
 As with doves' voices, taboring
 Upon their breasts, unto the King —
 A kingly conquest, Nineveh! 150

. . . Here woke my thought The wind's slow sway

Had waxed; and like the human play
 Of scorn that smiling spreads away,
 The sunshine shivered off the day;
 The callous wind, it seemed to me, 155
 Swept up the shadow from the ground;
 And pale as whom the Fates astound,
 The god forlorn stood winged and crowned,
 Within I knew the cry lay bound
 Of the dumb soul of Nineveh. 160

And as I turned, my sense half shut
 Still saw the crowds of curb and rut
 Go past as marshaled to the strut
 Of ranks in gypsum quaintly cut.
 It seemed in one same pageantry 165
 They followed forms which had been erst;
 To pass, till on my sight should burst
 That future of the best or worst
 When some may question which was first,
 Of London or of Nineveh 170

For as that Bull-god once did stand
 And watched the burial-clouds of sand,

127 voice of God. Jonah was commanded to go to Nineveh and "cry against it" because of its wickedness. As he entered the city he said, "Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown" (Jonah, 3 4). 148 taboring, striking lightly, as upon a tabor (a small drum). 162 crowds of curb and rut, crowds of common people—those of the curbstone and gutter.

Till these at last without a hand
 Rose o'er his eyes, another land,
 And blinded him with destiny — 175
 So may he stand again; till now,
 In ships of unknown sail and prow,
 Some tribe of the Australian plow
 Bear him afar — a relic now
 Of London, not of Nineveh! 180

Or it may chance indeed that when Man's age is hoary among men —
 His centuries threescore and ten —
 His furthest childhood shall seem then
 More clear than later times may be; 185
 Who, finding in this desert place
 This form, shall hold us for some race
 That walked not in Christ's lowly ways,
 But bowed its pride and vowed its praise
 Unto the god of Nineveh. 190

The smile rose first — anon drew nigh
 The thought: . . . Those heavy wings spread high
 So sure of flight, which do not fly;
 That set gaze never on the sky;
 Those scripted flanks it cannot see; 195
 Its crown, a brow-contracting load;
 Its planted feet which trust the sod: . . .
 (So grew the image as I trod)
 O Nineveh, was this thy God —
 Thine also, mighty Nineveh? 200

THE STAFF AND SCRIP

"Who owns these lands?" the Pilgrim said.
 "Stranger, Queen Blanchelys"
 "And who has thus harried them?" he said
 "It was Duke Luke did this;
 God's ban be his!" 5

The Pilgrim said: "Where is your house?
 I'll rest there, with your will"
 "You've but to climb these blackened boughs
 And you'll see it over the hill,
 For it burns still." 10

"Which road, to seek your Queen?" said he.
 "Nay, nay, but with some wound
 You'll fly back hither, it may be,
 And by your blood i' the ground
 My place be found." 15

"Friend, stay in peace. God keep your head,
 And mine, where I will go;

The Staff and Scrip This poem is based upon a story in the Gesta Romanorum (Deeds of the Romans), a famous collection of short tales in Latin, popular during the late Middle Ages. All pilgrims carried staff and scrip (a small bag)
 5 ban, curse

For He is here and there," he said. He passed the hillside, slow, And stood below.	20	And when he ceased, she suddenly Looked round upon her folk As though she woke.	70
The Queen sat idle by her loom; She heard the arras stir, And looked up sadly; through the room The sweetness sickened her Of musk and myrrh.	25	"Fight, sir," she said; "my prayers in pain Shall be your fellowship" He whispered one among her train — "Tomorrow bid her keep This staff and scrip"	75
Her women, standing two and two, In silence combed the fleece. The Pilgrim said, "Peace be with you, Lady," and bent his knees. She answered, "Peace"	30	She sent him a sharp sword, whose belt About his body there As sweet as her own arms he felt. He kissed its blade, all bare, Instead of her.	80
Her eyes were like the wave within; Like water-reeds the poise Of her soft body, dainty thin; And like the water's noise Her plaintive voice.	35	She sent him a green banner wrought With one white lily stem, To bind his lance with when he fought. He writ upon the same And kissed her name.	85
For him, the stream had never welled In desert tracts malign So sweet; nor had he ever felt So faint in the sunshine Of Palestine.	40	She sent him a white shield, whereon She bade that he should trace His will He blent fair hues that shone, And in a golden space He kissed her face	90
Right so, he knew that he saw weep Each night through every dream The Queen's own face, confused in sleep With visages supreme Not known to him.	45	Right so, the sunset skies unsealed, Like lands he never knew, Beyond tomorrow's battlefield Lay open out of view To ride into	95
"Lady," he said, "your lands lie burnt And waste. To meet your foe All fear; this I have seen and learnt. Say that it shall be so, And I will go."	50	Next day till dark the women prayed; Nor any might know there How the fight went — the Queen has bade That there do come to her No messenger.	100
She gazed at him "Your cause is just, For I have heard the same" He said: "God's strength shall be my trust. Fall it to good or grame, 'Tis in His name"	55	Weak now to them the voice o' the priest As any trance affords; And when each anthem failed and ceased, It seemed that the last chords Still sang the words.	105
"Sir, you are thanked. My cause is dead. Why should you toil to break A grave, and fall therein?" she said He did not pause but spake: "For my vow's sake."	60	Lo, Father, is thine ear inclined, And hath thine angel passed? For these thy watchers now are blind With vigil, and at last Dizzy with fast.	110
"Can such vows be, sir — to God's ear, Not to God's will?" "My vow Remains; God heard me there as here," He said with reverent brow, "Both then and now."	65	"Oh, what is the light that shines so red? 'Tis long since the sun set"; Quoth the youngest to the eldest maid: "'Twas dim but now, and yet The light is great"	115
They gazed together, he and she, The minute while he spoke,		Quoth the other: "'Tis our sight is dazed That we see flame i' the air."

But the Queen held her brows and gazed,
And said, "It is the glare
Of torches there " 120

"Oh, what are the sounds that rise and spread?
All day it was so still";
Quoth the youngest to the eldest maid:
"Unto the furthest hill
The air they fill " 125

Quoth the other: "'Tis our sense is blurred
With all the chants gone by "
But the Queen held her breath and heard,
And said, "It is the cry
Of victory." 130

The first of all the rout was sound,
The next were dust and flame,
And then the horses shook the ground;
And in the thick of them
A still band came. 135

"Oh, what do ye bring out of the fight,
Thus hid beneath these boughs?"
"Even him, thy conquering guest tonight,
Who yet shall not carouse,
Queen, in thy house." 140

"Uncover ye his face," she said.
"O changed in little space!"
She cried, "O pale that was so red!
O God, O God of grace!
Cover his face " 145

His sword was broken in his hand
Where he had kissed the blade.
"O soft steel that could not withstand!
O my hard heart unstayed,
That prayed and prayed!" 150

His bloodied banner crossed his mouth
Where he had kissed her name.
"O east, and west, and north, and south,
Fair flew my web, for shame,
To guide Death's aim!" 155

The tints were shredded from his shield
Where he had kissed her face.
"Oh, of all gifts that I could yield,
Death only keeps its place,
My gift and grace!" 160

Then stepped a damsel to her side,
And spoke, and needs must weep:
"For his sake, lady, if he died,
He prayed of thee to keep
This staff and scrip " 165

That night they hung above her bed,
Till morning wet with tears.

Year after year above her head
Her bed his token wears,
Five years, ten years. 170

That night the passion of her grief
Shook them as there they hung.
Each year the wind that shed the leaf
Shook them and in its tongue
A message flung. 175

And once she woke with a clear mind
That letters writ to calm
Her soul lay in the scrip, to find
Only a torpid balm
And dust of palm. 180

They shook far off with palace sport
When just and dance were rife;
And the hunt shook them from the court;
For hers, in peace or strife,
Was a queen's life. 185

A queen's death now; as now they shake
To gusts in chapel dim —
Hung where she sleeps, not seen to wake (Carved lovely white and slim),
With them by him. 190

Stand up today, still armed, with her,
Good knight, before His brow
Who then as now was here and there,
Who had in mind thy vow
Then even as now 195

The lists are set in heaven today,
The bright pavilions shine,
Fair hangs thy shield, and none gainsay,
The trumpets sound in sign
That she is thine. 200

Not tithed with days' and years' decease
He pays thy wage He owed,
But with imperishable peace
Here in His own abode,
Thy jealous God. (1849-1853; 1870)

SISTER HELEN

"Why did you melt your waxen man,
Sister Helen?
Today is the third since you began "
"The time was long, yet the time ran,
Little brother." 5
(O Mother, Mary Mother,
Three days today, between Hell and Heaven!)

201 ff Not tithed, etc His reward is not to be limited in time but is to be everlasting Sister Helen This poem is founded upon the old superstition that burning a waxen image of a person will bring suffering and death upon him The false lover whom Helen is punishing is Keith of Ewern (line 87)

- "But if you have done your work aright,
Sister Helen,
You'll let me play, for you said I might." 10
"Be very still in your play tonight,
Little brother."
(O Mother, Mary Mother,
Third night, tonight, between Hell and Heaven!)
- "You said it must melt ere vesper-bell, 15
Sister Helen;
If now it be molten, all is well "
"Even so — nay, peace! you cannot tell,
Little brother "
(O Mother, Mary Mother, 20
Oh, what is this, between Hell and Heaven?)
- "Oh, the waxen knave was plump today,
Sister Helen;
How like dead folk he has dropped away!"
"Nay now, of the dead what can you say, 25
Little brother?"
(O Mother, Mary Mother,
What of the dead, between Hell and Heaven?)
- "See, see, the sunken pile of wood,
Sister Helen, 30
Shines through the thinned wax red as blood!"
"Nay now, when looked you yet on blood,
Little brother?"
(O Mother, Mary Mother,
How pale she is, between Hell and Heaven!) 35
- "Now close your eyes, for they're sick and sore,
Sister Helen,
And I'll play without the gallery door."
"Aye, let me rest — I'll lie on the floor,
Little brother " 40
(O Mother, Mary Mother,
What rest tonight, between Hell and Heaven?)
- "Here high up in the balcony,
Sister Helen,
The moon flies face to face with me." 45
"Aye, look and say whatever you see,
Little brother."
(O Mother, Mary Mother,
What sight tonight, between Hell and Heaven?)
- "Outside it's merry in the wind's wake, 50
Sister Helen;
In the shaken trees the chill stars shake."
"Hush, heard you a horse-tread as you spake,
Little brother?"
(O Mother, Mary Mother, 55
What sound tonight, between Hell and Heaven?)
- "I hear a horse-tread, and I see,
Sister Helen,
Three horsemen that ride terribly "
- "Little brother, whence come the three, 60
Little brother?"
(O Mother, Mary Mother,
Whence should they come, between Hell and Heaven?)
- "They come by the hill-verge from Boyne Bar,
Sister Helen, 65
And one draws nigh, but two are afar."
"Look, look, do you know them who they are,
Little brother?"
(O Mother, Mary Mother,
Who should they be, between Hell and Heaven?)
- "Oh, it's Keith of Eastholm rides so fast, 71
Sister Helen,
For I know the white mane on the blast "
"The hour has come, has come at last,
Little brother!" 75
(O Mother, Mary Mother,
Her hour at last, between Hell and Heaven!)
- "He has made a sign and called Halloo!
Sister Helen,
And he says that he would speak with you " 81
"Oh, tell him I fear the frozen dew,"
Little brother "
(O Mother, Mary Mother,
Why laughs she thus, between Hell and Heaven?)
- "The wind is loud, but I hear him cry, 85
Sister Helen,
That Keith of Ewern's like to die."
"And he and thou, and thou and I,
Little brother."
(O Mother, Mary Mother, 90
And they and we, between Hell and Heaven!)
- "Three days ago, on his marriage-morn,
Sister Helen,
He sickened, and lies since then forlorn "
"For bridegroom's side is the bride a thorn, 95
Little brother?"
(O Mother, Mary Mother,
Cold bridal cheer, between Hell and Heaven!)
- "Three days and nights now he has lain abed,
Sister Helen, 100
And he prays in torment to be dead "
"The thing may chance, if he have prayed,
Little brother!"
(O Mother, Mary Mother,
If he have prayed, between Hell and Heaven!)
- "But he has not ceased to cry today, 106
Sister Helen,
That you should take your curse away."

"My prayer was heard — he need but pray,
 Little brother!" 110
(O Mother, Mary Mother, Shall God not hear, between Hell and Heaven?)

"But he says, till you take back your ban,
 Sister Helen,
 His soul would pass, yet never can " 115
 "Nay then, shall I slay a living man,
 Little brother?"
*(O Mother, Mary Mother,
 A living soul, between Hell and Heaven!)*

"But he calls forever on your name, 120
 Sister Helen,
 And says that he melts before a flame "
 "My heart for his pleasure fared the same,
 Little brother." 124
*(O Mother, Mary Mother,
 Fire at the heart, between Hell and Heaven!)*

"Here's Keith of Westholm riding fast,
 Sister Helen,
 For I know the white plume on the blast."
 "The hour, the sweet hour I forecast, 130
 Little brother!"
*(O Mother, Mary Mother,
 Is the hour sweet, between Hell and Heaven?)*

"He stops to speak, and he stills his horse,
 Sister Helen; 135
 But his words are drowned in the wind's
 course "
 "Nay hear, nay hear, you must hear perforce,
 Little brother!"
*(O Mother, Mary Mother,
 What word now heard, between Hell and Heaven!)*

"Oh, he says that Keith of Ewern's cry, 141
 Sister Helen,
 Is ever to see you ere he die "
 "In all that his soul sees, there am I,
 Little brother!" 145
*(O Mother, Mary Mother,
 The soul's one sight, between Hell and Heaven!)*

"He sends a ring and a broken coin,
 Sister Helen,
 And bids you mind the banks of Boyne " 150
 "What else he broke will he ever join,
 Little brother?"
*(O Mother, Mary Mother,
 No, never joined, between Hell and Heaven!)*

"He yields you these and craves full fain, 155
 Sister Helen,
 You pardon him in his mortal pain "

148 broken coin. The two had broken a coin, and each had kept half as a pledge

"What else he took will he give again,
 Little brother?"
*(O Mother, Mary Mother, 160
 Not twice to give, between Hell and Heaven!)*

"He calls your name in an agony,
 Sister Helen,
 That even dead Love must weep to see."
 "Hate, born of Love, is blind as he, 165
 Little brother!"
*(O Mother, Mary Mother, 160
 Love turned to hate, between Hell and Heaven!)*

"Oh, it's Keith of Keith now that rides fast,
 Sister Helen, 170
 For I know the white hair on the blast "
 "The short, short hour will soon be past,
 Little brother!"
*(O Mother, Mary Mother,
 Will soon be past, between Hell and Heaven!)*

"He looks at me and he tries to speak, 176
 Sister Helen,
 But oh! his voice is sad and weak!"
 "What here should the mighty Baron seek,
 Little brother?" 180
*(O Mother, Mary Mother,
 Is this the end, between Hell and Heaven?)*

"Oh, his son still cries, if you forgive,
 Sister Helen,
 The body dies, but the soul shall live " 185
 "Fire shall forgive me as I forgive,
 Little brother!"
*(O Mother, Mary Mother,
 As she forgives, between Hell and Heaven!)*

"Oh, he prays you, as his heart would rive,
 Sister Helen, 191
 To save his dear son's soul alive "
 "Fire cannot slay it, it shall thrive,
 Little brother!"
*(O Mother, Mary Mother, 195
 Alas, alas, between Hell and Heaven!)*

"He cries to you, kneeling in the road,
 Sister Helen,
 To go with him for the love of God!"
 "The way is long to his son's abode, 200
 Little brother "
*(O Mother, Mary Mother,
 The way is long, between Hell and Heaven!)*

"A lady's here, by a dark steed brought,
 Sister Helen, 205
 So darkly clad, I saw her not."
 "See her now or never see aught,
 Little brother!"
*(O Mother, Mary Mother,
 What more to see, between Hell and Heaven!)*

"Her hood falls back, and the moon shines fair, 211
Sister Helen,
On the Lady of Ewern's golden hair."
"Blest hour of my power and her despair,
Little brother!" 215
(O Mother, Mary Mother,
Hour blest and banned, between Hell and Heaven!)

"Pale, pale her cheeks, that in pride did glow,
Sister Helen,
'Neath the bridal-wreath three days ago."
"One morn for pride and three days for woe,
Little brother!" 221
(O Mother, Mary Mother,
Three days, three nights, between Hell and Heaven!)

"Her clasped hands stretch from her bending
head, 225
Sister Helen,
With the loud wind's wail her sobs are wed "
"What wedding-strains hath her bridal-bed,
Little brother!"
(O Mother, Mary Mother, 230
What strain but death's, between Hell and Heaven!)

"She may not speak, she sinks in a swoon,
Sister Helen—
She lifts her lips and gasps on the moon "
"Oh! might I but hear her soul's blithe tune,
Little brother!" 236
(O Mother, Mary Mother,
Her woe's dumb cry, between Hell and Heaven!)

"They've caught her to Westholm's saddle-bow,
Sister Helen, 240
And her moonlit hair gleams white in its
flow "
"Let it turn whiter than winter snow,
Little brother!"
(O Mother, Mary Mother,
Woe-withered gold, between Hell and Heaven!)

"O Sister Helen, you heard the bell,
Sister Helen!
More loud than the vesper-chime it fell."
"No vesper-chime, but a dying knell,
Little brother!" 250
(O Mother, Mary Mother,
His dying knell, between Hell and Heaven!)

"Alas! but I fear the heavy sound,
Sister Helen;
Is it in the sky or in the ground?" 255

"Say, have they turned their horses round,
Little brother?"
(O Mother, Mary Mother,
What would she more, between Hell and Heaven?)

"They have raised the old man from his knee,
Sister Helen, 261
And they ride in silence hastily "
"More fast the naked soul doth flee,
Little brother!"
(O Mother, Mary Mother,
The naked soul, between Hell and Heaven!)

"Flank to flank are the three steeds gone,
Sister Helen,
But the lady's dark steed goes alone "
"And lonely her bridegroom's soul hath flown,
Little brother." 271
(O Mother, Mary Mother,
The lonely ghost, between Hell and Heaven!)

"Oh, the wind is sad in the iron chill,
Sister Helen, 275
And weary sad they look by the hill."
"But Keith of Ewern's sadder still,
Little brother!"
(O Mother, Mary Mother,
Most sad of all, between Hell and Heaven!) 280

"See, see, the wax has dropped from its place,
Sister Helen,
And the flames are winning up apace!"
"Yet here they burn but for a space,
Little brother!" 285
(O Mother, Mary Mother,
Here for a space, between Hell and Heaven!)

"Ah! what white thing at the door has crossed,
Sister Helen?
Ah! what is this that sighs in the frost?" 290
"A soul that's lost as mine is lost,
Little brother!"
(O Mother, Mary Mother,
Lost, lost, all lost, between Hell and Heaven!)
(1851-1852; 1853, 1870)

PENUMBRA

I did not look upon her eyes (Though scarcely seen, with no surprise,
'Mid many eyes a single look),
Because they should not gaze rebuke,
At night, from stars in sky and brook. 5

I did not take her by the hand
 (Though little was to understand
 From touch of hand all friends might take),
 Because it should not prove a flake
 Burnt in my palm to boil and ache. 10

I did not listen to her voice
 (Though none had noted, where at choice
 All might rejoice in listening),
 Because no such a thing should cling
 In the wood's moan at evening. 15

I did not cross her shadow once (Though from the hollow west the sun's Last shadow runs along so far),
 Because in June it should not bar
 My ways, at noon when fevers are. 20

They told me she was sad that day
 (Though wherefore tell what love's soothsay, Sooner than they, did register?),
 And my heart leapt and wept to her,
 And yet I did not speak nor stir. 25

So shall the tongues of the sea's foam
 (Though many voices therewith come From drowned hope's home to cry to me),
 Bewail one hour the more, when sea
 And wind are one with memory. (1870)

FIRST LOVE REMEMBERED

Peace in her chamber, wheresoe'er
 It be, a holy place;
 The thought still brings my soul such grace
 As morning meadows wear.

Whether it still be small and light, 5
 A maid's who dreams alone,
 As from her orchard-gate the moon
 Its ceiling showed at night;

Or whether, in a shadow dense 10
 As nuptial hymns invoke,
 Innocent maidenhood awoke
 To married innocence —

There still the thanks unheard await
 The unconscious gift bequeathed;
 For there my soul this hour has breathed 15
 An air inviolate. (1870)

SUDDEN LIGHT

I have been here before,
 But when or how I cannot tell
 I know the grass beyond the door,
 The sweet keen smell,
 The sighing sound, the lights around the 5
 shore.

You have been mine before —
 How long ago I may not know;
 But just when at that swallow's soar
 Your neck turned so,
 Some veil did fall — I knew it all of yore. 10

Has this been thus before?
 And shall not thus time's eddying flight
 Still with our lives our loves restore
 In death's despite,
 And day and night yield one delight once 15
 more? (1870)

THE WOODSPURGE

The wind flapped loose, the wind was still,
 Shaken out dead from tree and hill;
 I had walked on at the wind's will —
 I sat now, for the wind was still.

Between my knees my forehead was — 5
 My lips, drawn in, said not Alas!
 My hair was over in the grass,
 My naked ears heard the day pass.

My eyes, wide open, had the run
 Of some ten weeds to fix upon; 10
 Among those few, out of the sun,
 The woodspurge flowered, three cups in one

From perfect grief there need not be
 Wisdom or even memory;
 One thing then learned remains to me — 15
 The woodspurge has a cup of three. (1870)

THE HONEYSUCKLE

I plucked a honeysuckle where
 The hedge on high is quick with thorn,
 And climbing for the prize, was torn,
 And fouled my feet in quag-water;
 And by the thorns and by the wind 5
 The blossom that I took was thinned,
 And yet I found it sweet and fair.

Thence to a richer growth I came,
 Where, nursed in mellow intercourse,
 The honeysuckles sprang by scores, 10
 Not harried like my single stem,
 All virgin lamps of scent and dew
 So from my hand that first I threw,
 Yet plucked not any more of them
 (1870)

The Woodspurge Woodspurge is a species of weed that exudes a milky fluid Rossetti wrote the poem after he noticed a drawing of the plant in a botanical book.

THE SONG OF THE BOWER

Say, is it day, is it dusk in thy bower,
 Thou whom I long for, who longest for me?
 Oh! be it light, be it night, 'tis Love's hour,
 Love's that is fettered as Love's that is free,
 Free Love has leaped to that innermost
 chamber, 5

Oh! the last time, and the hundred before,
 Fettered Love, motionless, can but remember

Yet something that sighs from him passes
 the door.

Nay, but my heart when it flies to thy bower,
 What does it find there that knows it again?
 There it must droop like a shower-beaten
 flower, 11

Red at the rent core and dark with the rain
 Ah! yet what shelter is still shed above it —
 What waters still image its leaves torn apart?

Thy soul is the shade that clings round it to love it, 15
 And tears are its mirror deep down in thy
 heart.

What were my prize, could I enter thy bower.
 This day, tomorrow, at eve or at morn?
 Large lovely arms and a neck like a tower,
 Bosom then heaving that now lies forlorn.
 Kindled with love-breath (the sun's kiss is colder!) 21

Thy sweetness all near me, so distant today,
 My hand round thy neck and thy hand on my shoulder,
 My mouth to thy mouth as the world
 melts away. 24

What is it keeps me afar from thy bower —
 My spirit, my body, so fain to be there?
 Waters engulfing or fires that devour? — Earth heaped against me or death in the air?

Nay, but in day-dreams, for terror, for pity,
 The trees wave their heads with an omen to tell, 30

Nay, but in night-dreams, throughout the dark city,
 The hours, clashed together, lose count in the bell.

Shall I not one day remember thy bower,
 One day when all days are one day to
 me?

Thinking, "I stirred not, and yet had the power" — 35

Yearning, "Ah, God, if again it might be!"
 Peace, peace! such a small lamp illumines, on this highway,

So dimly so few steps in front of my feet —

Yet shows me that her way is parted from my way. . . .

Out of sight, beyond light, at what goal may we meet? 40
 (1870)

AN OLD SONG ENDED

"How should I your true love know
 From another one?"

"By his cockle-hat and staff
 And his sandal-shoon"

"And what signs have told you now 5
 That he hastens home?"

"Lo! the spring is nearly gone,
 He is nearly come"

"For a token is there naught,
 Say, that he should bring?" 10

"He will bear a ring I gave
 And another ring"

"How may I, when he shall ask,
 Tell him who lies there?" 15

"Nay, but leave my face unveiled
 And unbound my hair."

"Can you say to me some word
 I shall say to him?"

"Say I'm looking in his eyes
 Though my eyes are dim." 20

ASPECTA MEDUSA

(For a Drawing)

Andromeda, by Perseus saved and wed,
 Hankered each day to see the Gorgon's head,
 Till o'er a fount he held it, bade her lean,
 And mirrored in the wave was safely seen
 That death she lived by 5

Let not thine eyes know
 Any forbidden thing itself, although
 It once should save as well as kill, but be
 Its shadow upon life enough for thee
 (1865; 1870)

An Old Song Ended The first stanza is quoted from Ophelia's song in Hamlet, IV, 5, 23-26

Aspecta Medusa These lines were written for a design from which Rossetti intended to paint a picture of Perseus allowing Andromeda to look at the severed head of Medusa as it was reflected from a tank of water. The picture, however, was never painted. Medusa was one of the Gorgons, fabulous monsters with snake hair and of terrible aspect that turned the beholder to stone. Perseus, the son of Zeus, king of the gods, cut off Medusa's head by looking at its reflection in his shield. Andromeda was the daughter of Cassiopeia, king of Ethiopia. In order to expiate a curse upon her father's land, she was chained to a cliff to be devoured by a monster. Perseus slew the monster and married Andromeda.

EDEN BOWER

It was Lilith the wife of Adam;
(Eden bower's in flower.)
 Not a drop of her blood was human,
 But she was made like a soft sweet woman

Lilith stood on the skirts of Eden; 5
(And O the bower and the hour!)
 She was the first that thence was driven;
 With her was hell and with Eve was heaven.

In the ear of the Snake said Lilith:
(Eden bower's in flower) 10
 "To thee I come when the rest is over;
 A snake was I when thou wast my lover

"I was the fairest snake in Eden;
(And O the bower and the hour!)
 By the earth's will, new form and feature 15
 Made me a wife for the earth's new creature.

"Take me thou as I come from Adam.
(Eden bower's in flower)
 Once again shall my love subdue thee;
 The past is past and I am come to thee. 20

"O but Adam was thrall to Lilith!
(And O the bower and the hour!)
 All the threads of my hair are golden,
 And there in a net his heart was holden

"O and Lilith was queen of Adam! 25
(Eden bower's in flower)
 All the day and the night together
 My breath could shake his soul like a feather.

"What great joys had Adam and Lilith! —
(And O the bower and the hour!) 30
 Sweet close rings of the serpent's twining,
 As heart in heart lay sighing and pining.

"What bright babes had Lilith and Adam! —
(Eden bower's in flower)
 Shapes that coiled in the woods and waters, 35
 Glittering sons and radiant daughters.

"O thou God, the Lord God of Eden!
(And O the bower and the hour!)
 Say, was this fair body for no man,
 That of Adam's flesh thou mak'st him a 40
 woman?

"O thou Snake, the King-snake of Eden!
(Eden bower's in flower)
 God's strong will our necks are under,
 But thou and I may cleave it in sunder.

Eden Bower This poem is based upon an ancient legend that regarded Lilith as the first wife of Adam. Cf. Browning's Adam, Lilith, and Eve, page 352

"Help, sweet Snake, sweet lover of Lilith! 45
(And O the bower and the hour!)
 And let God learn how I loved and hated
 Man in the image of God created.

"Help me once against Eve and Adam!
(Eden bower's in flower) 50
 Help me once for this one endeavor,
 And then my love shall be thine forever!

"Strong is God, the fell foe of Lilith —
(And O the bower and the hour!) 54
 Naught in heaven or earth may affright him,
 But join thou with me and we will smite him.

"Strong is God, the great God of Eden;
(Eden bower's in flower)
 Over all He made He hath power;
 But lend me thou thy shape for an hour! 60

"Lend thy shape for the love of Lilith!
(And O the bower and the hour!)
 Look, my mouth and my cheek are ruddy,
 And thou art cold, and fire is my body.

"Lend thy shape for the hate of Adam! 65
(Eden bower's in flower)
 That he may wail my joy that forsook him,
 And curse the day when the bride-sleep took him.

"Lend thy shape for the shame of Eden!
(And O the bower and the hour!) 70
 Is not the foe-God weak as the foeman
 When love grows hate in the heart of a woman?

"Would'st thou know the heart's hope of Lilith?
(Eden bower's in flower)
 Then bring thou close thine head till it glisten
 Along my breast, and lip me and listen. 76

"Am I sweet, O sweet Snake of Eden?
(And O the bower and the hour!)
 Then ope thine ear to my warm mouth's cooing
 And learn what deed remains for our doing 80

"Thou didst hear when God said to Adam:
(Eden bower's in flower.)
 'Of all this wealth I have made thee warden;
 Thou'rt free to eat of the trees of the garden,

"Only of one tree eat not in Eden; 85
(And O the bower and the hour!)
 All save one I give to thy freewill —
 The Tree of the Knowledge of Good and Evil.'

"O my love, come nearer to Lilith!
(Eden bower's in flower) 90

In thy sweet folds bind me and bend me,
And let me feel the shape thou shalt lend me!

"In thy shape I'll go back to Eden;
(And O the bower and the hour!)
In these coils that Tree will I grapple, 95
And stretch this crowned head forth by the apple.

"Lo, Eve bends to the breath of Lilith!
(Eden bower's in flower.)
O how then shall my heart desire
All her blood as food to its fire! 100

"Lo, Eve bends to the words of Lilith! —
(And O the bower and the hour!)
'Nay, this Tree's fruit — why should ye hate it,
Or Death be born the day that ye ate it?

" 'Nay, but on that great day in Eden, 105
(Eden bower's in flower)
By the help that in this wise Tree is,
God knows well ye shall be as He is.'

"Then Eve shall eat and give unto Adam;
(And O the bower and the hour!) 110
And then they both shall know they are naked,
And their hearts ache as my heart hath achéd.

"Aye, let them hide in the trees of Eden,
(Eden bower's in flower.)
As in the cool of the day in the garden 115
God shall walk without pity or pardon.

"Hear, thou Eve, the man's heart in Adam!
(And O the bower and the hour!)
Of his brave words hark to the bravest:
'This the woman gave that thou gavest.' 120

"Hear Eve speak, yea, list to her, Lilith!
(Eden bower's in flower.)
Feast thine heart with words that shall sate
it —
'This the serpent gave and I ate it.'

"O proud Eve, cling close to thine Adam, 125
(And O the bower and the hour!)
Driven forth as the beasts of his naming
By the sword that forever is flaming.

"Know, thy path is known unto Lilith!
(Eden bower's in flower) 130
While the blithe birds sang at thy wedding
There her tears grew thorns for thy threading.

"O my love, thou Love-snake of Eden!
(And O the bower and the hour!)
O today and the day to come after! 135
Loose me, love — give breath to my laughter!

"O bright Snake, the Death-worm of Adam!
(Eden bower's in flower)
Wreathe thy neck with my hair's bright
tether,
And wear my gold and thy gold together! 140

"On that day on the skirts of Eden,
(And O the bower and the hour!)
In thy shape shall I glide back to thee,
And in my shape for an instant view thee.

"But when thou'rt thou and Lilith is Lilith,
(Eden bower's in flower) 146
In what bliss past hearing or seeing Shall each one drink of the other's being!

"With cries of 'Eve!' and 'Eden' and 'Adam!'
(And O the bower and the hour!) 150
How shall we mingle our love's caresses,
I in thy coils, and thou in my tresses!

"With those names, ye echoes of Eden,
(Eden bower's in flower)
Fire shall cry from my heart that burneth —
'Dust he is and to dust returneth!' 156

"Yet today, thou master of Lilith —
(And O the bower and the hour!)
Wrap me round in the form I'll borrow
And let me tell thee of sweet tomorrow. 160

"In the planted garden eastward in Eden,
(Eden bower's in flower)
Where the river goes forth to water the garden,
The springs shall dry and the soil shall harden.

"Yea, where the bride-sleep fell upon Adam,
(And O the bower and the hour!) 166
None shall hear when the storm-wind whistles Through roses choked among thorns and thistles.

"Yea, beside the east-gate of Eden,
(Eden bower's in flower) 170
Where God joined them and none might sever
The sword turns this way and that forever.

"What of Adam cast out of Eden?
(And O the bower and the hour!)
Lo! with care like a shadow shaken, 175
He tills the hard earth whence he was taken.

"What of Eve too, cast out of Eden?
(Eden bower's in flower)
Nay, but she, the bride of God's giving,
Must yet be mother of all men living 180

156 Dust returneth. Cf Ecclesiastes, 3 20 — "All go unto one place, all are of the dust, and all turn to dust
again"

"Lo, God's grace, by the grace of Lilith!
 (And O the bower and the hour!)
 To Eve's womb, from our sweet tomorrow,
 God shall greatly multiply sorrow.

"Fold me fast, O God-snake of Eden! 185
 (Eden bower's in flower.)
 What more prize than love to impel thee?
 Grip and lip my limbs as I tell thee!

"Lo! two babes for Eve and for Adam!
 (And O the bower and the hour!) 190
 Lo! sweet Snake, the travail and treasure —
 Two men-children born for their pleasure!

"The first is Cain and the second Abel;
 (Eden bower's in flower.)
 The soul of one shall be made thy brother,
 And thy tongue shall lap the blood of the other." 196
 (And O the bower and the hour!) (1870)

THE BALLAD OF DEAD LADIES

(FROM FRANÇOIS VILLON)

Tell me now in what hidden way is Lady Flora the lovely Roman?
 Where's Hipparchia, and where is Thais,
 Neither of them the fairer woman?
 Where is Echo, beheld of no man, 5
 Only heard on river and mere —
 She whose beauty was more than human? . . .
 But where are the snows of yster-year?

Where's Héloïse, the learned nun,
 For whose sake Abeillard, I ween, 10
 Lost manhood and put priesthood on?

The Ballad of Dead Ladies. This is a translation of Ballade des Dames du Temp Jadis, by François Villon, the greatest of the French medieval poets (See Swinburne's A Ballad of François Villon, page 715). The next two poems are also translations from the Old French.

2 Lady Flora, perhaps the Roman goddess of flowers and spring, late tradition made her a wealthy and beautiful woman. Other identifications include several famous courtesans of Rome named Flora. 3 Hipparchia, the wife of Crates, the famous Cynic philosopher of Thebes, Greece. She lived during the 3d century B.C. 4 Thais, perhaps the celebrated Athenian courtesan who accompanied Alexander the Great on his expedition into Asia, 331 B.C., see Dryden's Alexander's Feast. Another Thais was the famous Egyptian courtesan who became a saint. 5 Echo, a beautiful nymph who for love of Narcissus pined away until nothing was left of her but her voice. 9 Héloïse, the beautiful niece of Canon Fulbert, of Paris. She fell in love with her teacher, Pierre Abélard (1079-1142), a scholastic philosopher and theologian. After they eloped and were married, she returned to her uncle's house and denied the marriage in order that her love might not be a hindrance to Abélard's advancement in the church. Fulbert was so enraged at this move that he caused Abélard to be emasculated in order to make him canonically incapable of ecclesiastical preferment. Abélard then became a monk in the abbey of St. Denis, in Paris, and induced Héloïse to become a nun. 10 ween, think.

(From Love he won such dule and teen!)
 And where, I pray you, is the Queen
 Who willed that Buridan should steer
 Sewed in a sack's mouth down the Seine? . . .
 But where are the snows of yester-year? 16

White Queen Blanche, like a queen of lilies,
 With a voice like any mermaiden —
 Bertha Broadfoot, Beatrice, Alice,
 And Ermengarde the lady of Maine — 20
 And that good Joan whom Englishmen
 At Rouen doomed and burned her there —
 Mother of God, where are they then? . . .
 But where are the snows of yester-year?

Nay, never ask this week, fair lord, 25
 Where they are gone, nor yet this year,
 Except with this for an overword —
 But where are the snows of yester-year?
 (1869; 1869)

JOHN OF TOURS

(Old French)

John of Tours is back with peace,
 But he comes home ill at ease.

"Good-morrow, mother" "Good-morrow,
 son;
 Your wife has borne you a little one"

"Go now, mother, go before, 5
 Make me a bed upon the floor,

"Very low your foot must fall,
 That my wife hear not at all"

As it neared the midnight toll,
 John of Tours gave up his soul. 10

"Tell me now, my mother my dear,
 What's the crying that I hear?"

12 dule and teen, grief and pain. 13 the Queen, Marguerite de Bourgogne, wife of Louis le Hutin (14th century). She is the heroine of the legend of the Tour de Nesle, according to which she had her numerous lovers killed and thrown into the Seine. Jean Buridan, rector of the University of Paris, escaped this fate. 17 Queen Blanche, probably Blanche of Castile, mother of Louis IX, king of France (1226-70). 19 Bertha Broadfoot, the mother of Charlemagne, king of the Franks and emperor of the West (742-814). She is a prominent character in medieval romances dealing with Charlemagne and his court. Beatrice, Alice. These were names of various well-known women of the Middle Ages, and it is impossible to tell the exact persons meant. Beatrice might be Dante's Beatrice (see Dante at Verona, page 507) or Béatrix de Provence, wife of Charles, son of Louis VIII, king of France (1223-26). Alice may be Ælis, one of the characters in the romance Aliscans, or Alix de Champagne, wife of Louis le Jeune (12th century). 20 Ermengarde, the daughter of d'Helie, Count of Maine, an old province in northwestern France. She was the wife of Foulques V, Count of Anjou. She died in 1126. 21 Joan, Joan of Arc (1412-31), who saved France from conquest, but who later was imprisoned at Rouen, France, by the English, convicted of witchcraft and heresy, and burned at the stake. She was canonized in 1920.

"Daughter, it's the children wake Crying with their teeth that ache."

"Tell me though, my mother my dear, 15
What's the knocking that I hear?"

"Daughter, it's the carpenter Mending planks upon the stair."

"Tell me too, my mother my dear, 20
What's the singing that I hear?"

"Daughter, it's the priests in rows Going round about our house."

"Tell me then, my mother my dear,
What's the dress that I should wear?"

"Daughter, any reds or blues, 25
But the black is most in use."

"Nay, but say, my mother my dear,
Why do you fall weeping here?"

"Oh! the truth must be said — 30
It's that John of Tours is dead."

"Mother, let the sexton know
That the grave must be for two;

"Aye, and still have room to spare,
For you must shut the baby there." (1870)

MY FATHER'S CLOSE

(Old French)

Inside my father's close
(Fly away, O my heart, away!)
Sweet apple-blossom blows
So sweet.

Three kings' daughters fair, 5
(Fly away, O my heart, away!)
They lie below it there
So sweet.

"Ah!" says the eldest one,
(Fly away, O my heart, away!) 10
"I think the day's begun
So sweet."

"Ah!" says the second one,
(Fly away, O my heart, away!)
"Far off I hear the drum 15
So sweet."

"Ah!" says the youngest one,
(Fly away, O my heart, away!)
"It's my true love, my own, 20
So sweet."

My Father's Close A close is an enclosed place

"Oh! if he fight and win,"
(Fly away, O my heart, away!)
"I keep my love for him,
So sweet;
Oh! let him lose or win, 25
He hath it still complete." (1870)

MARY MAGDALENE

AT THE DOOR OF SIMON THE PHARISEE

(For a Drawing)

"Why wilt thou cast the roses from thine hair?
Nay, be thou all a rose — wreath, lips, and
cheek.

Nay, not this house — that banquet-house we seek;

See how they kiss and enter; come thou there.
This delicate day of love we two will share 5
Till at our ear love's whispering night shall speak.

What, sweet one — hold'st thou still the foolish freak?

Nay, when I kiss thy feet they'll leave the stair "

"Oh, loose me! See'st thou not my Bridegroom's face

That draws me to Him? For His feet my kiss, 10

My hair, my tears He craves today — and oh!
What words can tell what other day and place
Shall see me clasp those blood-stained feet of His?

He needs me, calls me, loves me; let me go!"
(1869?; 1870)

TROY TOWN

Heavenborn Helen, Sparta's queen, 5
(O Troy Town!)
Had two breasts of heavenly sheen,
The sun and moon of the heart's desire;
All Love's lordship lay between. 5
(O Troy's down, Tall Troy's on fire!)

Mary Magdalene When Jesus was being entertained at the home of Simon the Pharisee, "a woman in the city, which was a sinner brought an alabaster box of ointment, And stood at his feet before him weeping, and began to wash his feet with tears, and did wipe them with the hairs of her head, and kissed his feet, and anointed them with the ointment" (Luke, 7 37-38) For Rossetti's prose description of the picture see Critical Notes In the drawing Mary has left a procession of revelers and is ascending the steps of the house where she sees Christ Her lover has followed her and is trying to turn her back

Troy Town The theme of this poem is Helen's dedication of a goblet molded in the shape of her breast to Venus, goddess of love The legend is found in Pliny (23-79 A D.), a famous Roman historian and naturalist For Helen's place in the story of Troy, see introductory note to Browning's Development, page 355

A spirit is born who lifts apart
 His tremulous wings and looks at me;
 Who on my mouth his finger lays,
 And shows, while whispering lutes confer,
 That Eden of Love's watered ways 15
 Whose winds and spirits worship her.

Brows, hands, and lips, heart, mind, and voice,

Kisses and words of Love-Lily —
 Oh! bid me with your joy rejoice
 Till riotous longing rest in me! 20
 Ah! let not hope be still distraught,
 But find in her its gracious goal,
 Whose speech Truth knows not from her
 thought,
 Nor Love her body from her soul.
 (1869, 1870)

' From THE HOUSE OF LIFE

THE SONNET

*A sonnet is a moment's monument —
 Memorial from the Soul's eternity
 To one dead deathless hour Look that it be,
 Whether for lustral rite or dire portent,
 Of its own arduous fullness reverent 5
 Carve it in ivory or in ebony,
 As Day or Night may rule; and let Time see
 Its flowering crest impearled and orient.
 A sonnet is a coin; its face reveals
 The Soul — its converse, to what Power 'tis due: — 10
 Whether for tribute to the august appeals
 Of Life, or dower in Love's high retinue,
 It serve; or 'mid the dark wharf's cavernous
 breath,
 In Charon's palm it pay the toll to Death
 (1880, 1881)*

From PART I. YOUTH AND CHANGE

I. LOVE ENTHRONED

I marked all kindred Powers the heart finds
 fair:
 Truth, with awed lips, and Hope, with eyes
 upcast;
 And Fame, whose loud wings fan the ashen
 Past

The House of Life These sonnets were written during a period of thirty-three years—1848-81. Although they do not form an organic whole, they fulfill the mission indicated in the introductory sonnet. The title came from Rossetti's interest in astrology, as if the heavens were regarded as divided into "houses," the most important of which was the "house of human life." The sonnets are largely autobiographical. They were mainly inspired by Elizabeth Siddal, with whom Rossetti fell deeply in love in 1850 and whom he married in 1860.

The Sonnet See Critical Notes.

4 lustral rite, ceremony of purification 14 Charon
Death. Charon was the boatman who ferried the souls of the dead over the Styx, one of the rivers of Hades. His pay was a coin found in the mouth of the passenger

To signal-fires, Oblivion's flight to scare;
 And Youth, with still some single golden hair
 Unto his shoulder clinging, since the last 6
 Embrace wherein two sweet arms held him
 fast;

And Life, still wreathing flowers for Death to wear.

Love's throne was not with these; but far above

All passionate wind of welcome and farewell
 He sat in breathless bowers they dream not of; 11

Though Truth foreknow Love's heart, and Hope foretell,

And Fame be for Love's sake desirable,
 And Youth be dear, and Life be sweet to Love. (1881)

2. BRIDAL BIRTH

As when desire, long darkling, dawns, and first

The mother looks upon the new-born child,
 Even so my Lady stood at gaze and smiled
 When her soul knew at length the Love it nursed

Born with her life, creature of poignant thirst
 And exquisite hunger, at her heart Love lay 6
 Quickening in darkness, till a voice that day
 Cried on him, and the bonds of birth were burst

Now, shadowed by his wings, our faces yearn
 Together, as his fullgrown feet now range 10
 The grove, and his warm hands our couch prepare;

Till to his song our bodiless souls in turn
 Be born his children, when Death's nuptial change

Leaves us for light the halo of his hair (1870)

3. LOVE'S TESTAMENT

O thou who at Love's hour ecstatically
 Unto my heart dost ever more present,
 Clothed with his fire, thy heart his testament;
 Whom I have neared and felt thy breath to be
 The inmost incense of his sanctuary; 5
 Who without speech hast owned him, and, intent

Upon his will, thy life with mine hast blent,
 And murmured, "I am thine, thou'rt one
 with me!"

O what from thee the grace, to me the prize,
 And what to Love the glory — when the whole 10

Of the deep stair thou tread'st to the dim shoal

And weary water of the place of sighs,
 And there dost work deliverance, as thine eyes
 Draw up my prisoned spirit to thy soul! (1870)

4. LOVESIGHT

When do I see thee most, beloved one?
 When in the light the spirits of mine eyes
 Before thy face, their altar, solemnize
 The worship of that Love through thee made known?

Of when in the dusk hours (we two alone) 5
 Close-kissed and eloquent of still replies
 Thy twilight-hidden glimmering visage lies,
 And my soul only sees thy soul its own?
 O love, my love! if I no more should see
 Thyself, nor on the earth the shadow of thee,
 Nor image of thine eyes in any spring — 11
 How then should sound upon Life's darkening slope
 The ground-whirl of the perished leaves of Hope,
 The wind of Death's imperishable wing?
 (1870)

5 HEART'S HOPE

By what word's power, the key of paths
 untrod,
 Shall I the difficult deeps of Love explore,
 Till parted waves of Song yield up the shore
 Even as that sea which Israel crossed dryshod?
 For lo! in some poor rhythmic period, 5
 Lady, I fain would tell how evermore
 Thy soul I know not from thy body, nor Thee from myself, neither our love from God
 Yea, in God's name, and Love's, and thine, would I
 Draw from one loving heart such evidence 10
 As to all hearts all things shall signify;
 Tender as dawn's first hill-fire, and intense
 As instantaneous penetrating sense,
 In Spring's birth-hour, of other Springs gone
 by. (1881)

7. SUPREME SURRENDER

To all the spirits of Love that wander by Along his love-sown harvest-field of sleep
 My lady lies apparent, and the deep
 Calls to the deep; and no man sees but I.
 The bliss so long afar, at length so nigh, 5
 Rests there attained. Methinks proud Love must weep
 When Fate's control doth from his harvest reap
 The sacred hour for which the years did sigh.
 First touched, the hand now warm around my neck
 Taught memory long to mock desire — and lo! 10
 Across my breast the abandoned hair doth
 flow,

Sonnet 5 Heart's Hope 4 sea . . dryshod The Israelites escaped from the Egyptians by passing through the Red Sea, which became dry ground by the power of the Lord (Exodus, 14).

Where one shorn tress long stirred the longing ache;
 And next the heart that trembled for its sake
 Lies the queen-heart in sovereign overthrow.
 (1870)

8. LOVE'S LOVERS

Some ladies love the jewels in Love's zone,
 And gold-tipped darts he hath for painless play
 In idle scornful hours he flings away;
 And some that listen to his lute's soft tone
 Do love to vaunt the silver praise their own; 5
 Some prize his blindfold sight; and there be they
 Who kissed his wings which brought him yesterday
 And thank his wings today that he is flown
 My lady only loves the heart of Love, Therefore Love's heart, my lady, hath for thee 10
 His bower of unimagined flower and tree.
 There kneels he now, and all-anhungered of Thine eyes gray-lit in shadowing hair above,
 Seals with thy mouth his immortality. (1870)

9. PASSION AND WORSHIP

One flame-winged brought a white-winged harp-player
 Even where my lady and I lay all alone,
 Saying: "Behold, this minstrel is unknown,
 Bid him depart, for I am minstrel here —
 Only my strains are to Love's dear ones dear "
 Then said I: "Through thine hautboy's rapturous tone 6
 Unto my lady still this harp makes moan,
 And still she deems the cadence deep and
 clear "
 Then said my lady. "Thou art Passion of
 Love,
 And this Love's Worship, both he plights to
 me 10
 Thy mastering music walks the sunlit sea,
 But where wan water trembles in the grove
 And the wan moon is all the light thereof,
 This harp still makes my name its voluntary "
 (1870)

10 THE PORTRAIT

O Lord of all compassionate control,
 O Love! let this my lady's picture glow
 Under my hand to praise her name, and show
 Even of her inner self the perfect whole, 4
 That he who seeks her beauty's furthest goal,
 Beyond the light that the sweet glances throw
 And reflux wave of the sweet smile, may
 know

Sonnet 8 Love's Lovers 1 zone, girdle
Sonnet 9 Passion and Worship 6 hautboy, oboe, a wind instrument

The very sky and sea-line of her soul.
Lo! it is done. Above the enthroning throat
The mouth's mold testifies of voice and kiss, 10
The shadowed eyes remember and foresee.
Her face is made her shrine. Let all men note
That in all years (O Love, thy gift is this!)
They that would look on her must come to
me. (1870)

II. THE LOVE-LETTER

Warmed by her hand and shadowed by her
hair
As close she leaned and poured her heart
through thee,
Whereof the articulate throbs accompany
The smooth black stream that makes thy whiteness fair —
Sweet fluttering sheet, even of her breath
aware — 5
Oh, let thy silent song disclose to me
That soul wherewith her lips and eyes agree
Like married music in Love's answering air.
Fain had I watched her when, at some fond
thought,
Her bosom to the writing closelier pressed, 10
And her breast's secrets peered into her breast,
When, through eyes raised an instant, her soul sought
My soul, and from the sudden confluence caught
The words that made her love the loveliest.
(1870)

13. YOUTH'S ANTIPHONY

"I love you, sweet; how can you ever learn
How much I love you?" "You I love even so,
And so I learn it." "Sweet, you cannot know
How fair you are" "If fair enough to earn
Your love, so much is all my love's concern"
"My love grows hourly, sweet." "Mine, too, doth grow, 6
Yet love seemed full so many hours ago!"
Thus lovers speak, till kisses clam their turn.
Ah! happy they to whom such words as these
In youth have served for speech the whole day long, 10
Hour after hour, remote from the world's throng,
Work, contest, fame, all life's confederate pleas —
What while Love breathed in sighs and
silences
Through two blent souls one rapturous under-song. (1881)

15. THE BIRTH-BOND

Have you not noted, in some family
Where two were born of a first marriage-bed,

How still they own their gracious bond,
though fed
And nursed on the forgotten breast and
knee? —
How to their father's children they shall
be 5
In act and thought of one goodwill, but each
Shall for the other have, in silence speech,
And in a word complete community?
Even so, when first I saw you, seemed it,
love,
That among souls allied to mine was yet 10
One nearer kindred than life hinted of.
O born with me somewhere that men forget,
And though in years of sight and sound
unmet,
Known for my soul's birth-partner well enough! (1854; 1870)

18. GENIUS IN BEAUTY

Beauty like hers is genius. Not the call
Of Homer's or of Dante's heart sublime —
Not Michael's hand furrowing the zones of time —
Is more with compassed mysteries musical;
Nay, not in Spring's or Summer's sweet footfall 5
More gathered gifts exuberant Life bequeathes
Than doth this sovereign face, whose love-spell breathes
Even from its shadowed contour on the wall.
As many men are poets in their youth,
But for one sweet-strung soul the wires prolong 10
Even through all change the indomitable
song;
So in like wise the envenomed years, whose tooth
Rends shallower grace with ruin void of ruth,
Upon this beauty's power shall wreak no
wrong. (1881)

19. SILENT NOON

Your hands lie open in the long, fresh grass —
The finger-points look through like rosy blooms;
Your eyes smile peace. The pasture gleams and glooms
'Neath billowing skies that scatter and amass
All round our nest, far as the eye can pass, 5
Are golden kingcup-fields with silver edge
Where the cow-parsley skirts the hawthorn hedge.

Sonnet 15 The Birth-Bond 5 father's children, i.e., children by a second marriage

Sonnet 18 Genius in Beauty 3 Michael, Michelangelo (1475-1564), famous Italian painter, sculptor, architect, and poet The reference is to his figures of Night, Day, Evening, etc

'Tis visible silence, still as the hour-glass.
 Deep in the sun-searched growths the dragonfly
 Hangs like a blue thread loosened from the sky — 10
 So this winged hour is dropped to us from
 above
 Oh! clasp we to our hearts, for deathless
 dower,
 This close-companioned inarticulate hour
 When twofold silence was the song of love.
 (1881)

21. LOVE-SWEETNESS

Sweet dimness of her loosened hair's downfall
 About thy face; her sweet hands round thy
 head
 In gracious fostering union garlanded,
 Her tremulous smiles, her glances' sweet recall
 Of love, her murmuring sighs memorial; 5
 Her mouth's culled sweetness by thy kisses
 shed
 On cheeks and neck and eyelids, and so led Back to her mouth which answers there for
 all. —
 What sweeter than these things, except the thing
 In lacking which all these would lose their
 sweet — 10
 The confident heart's still fervor, the swift beat
 And soft subsidence of the spirit's wing,
 Then when it feels in cloud-girt wayfaring,
 The breath of kindred plumes against its feet? (1870)

24. PRIDE OF YOUTH

Even as a child, of sorrow that we give
 The dead, but little in his heart can find,
 Since without need of thought to his clear mind
 Their turn it is to die and his to live —
 Even so the winged New Love smiles to receive 5
 Along his eddying plumes the auroral wind, Nor, forward glorying, casts one look behind
 Where night-rack shrouds the Old Love fugitive
 There is a change in every hour's recall,
 And the last cowslip in the fields we see 10
 On the same day with the first corn-poppy.
 Alas for hourly change! Alas for all
 The loves that from his hand proud Youth lets fall,
 Even as the beads of a told rosary! (1881)

25. WINGED HOURS

Each hour until we meet is as a bird
 That wings from far his gradual way along
 The rustling covert of my soul — his song
 Still loudlier trilled through leaves more deeply stirred.
 But at the hour of meeting, a clear word 5
 Is every note he sings, in Love's own tongue;
 Yet, Love, thou know'st the sweet strain
 suffers wrong,
 Through our contending kisses oft unheard
 What of that hour at last, when for her sake
 No wing may fly to me nor song may flow,
 When, wandering round my life unleaved, I
 know 11
 The bloodied feathers scattered in the brake,
 And think how she, far from me, with like eyes
 Sees through the untuneful bough the wingless skies? (1870)

27. HEART'S COMPASS

Sometimes thou seem'st not as thyself alone,
 But as the meaning of all things that are;
 A breathless wonder, shadowing forth afar
 Some heavenly solstice hushed and halcyon,
 Whose unstirred lips are music's visible tone, 5
 Whose eyes the sun-gate of the soul unbar,
 Being of its furthest fires oracular —
 The evident heart of all life sown and mown
 Even such love is, and is not thy name Love?
 Yea, by thy hand the Love-god rends apart
 All gathering clouds of Night's ambiguous art; 11
 Flings them far down, and sets thine eyes
 above;
 And simply, as some gage of flower or glove, Stakes with a smile the world against thy
 heart. (1881)

31. HER GIFTS

High grace, the dower of queens; and therewithal
 Some wood-born wonder's sweet simplicity;
 A glance like water brimming with the sky
 Or hyacinth-light where forest-shadows fall,
 Such thrilling pallor of cheek as doth enthrall
 The heart; a mouth whose passionate forms imply 6
 All music and all silence held thereby;
 Deep golden locks, her sovereign coronal;
 A round reared neck, meet column of Love's shrine
 To cling to when the heart takes sanctuary;
 Hands which forever at Love's bidding be, 11
 And soft-stirred feet still answering to his sign —

These are her gifts, as tongue may tell them
 o'er Breathe low her name, my soul; for that means more. (1881)

34 THE DARK GLASS

Not I myself know all my love for thee;
 How should I reach so far, who cannot weigh Tomorrow's dower by gage of yesterday?
 Shall birth and death, and all dark names that be
 As doors and windows bared to some loud sea, Lash deaf mine ears and blind my face with spray, 6
 And shall my sense pierce love — the last relay
 And ultimate outpost of eternity?
 Lo! what am I to Love, the Lord of all?
 One murmuring shell he gathers from the sand, 10
 One little heart-flame sheltered in his hand
 Yet through thine eyes he grants me clearest
 call
 And veriest touch of powers primordial
 That any hour-girt life may understand (1881)

40. SEVERED SELVES

Two separate divided silences,
 Which, brought together, would find loving
 voice;
 Two glances, which together would rejoice
 In love, now lost like stars beyond dark trees,
 Two hands apart, whose touch alone gives ease; 5
 Two bosoms, which, heart-shrined with mutual flame,
 Would, meeting in one clasp, be made the same;
 Two souls, the shores wave-mocked of sundering seas —
 Such are we now. Ah! may our hope forecast
 Indeed one hour again, when on this stream
 Of darkened love once more the light shall gleam? — 11
 An hour how slow to come, how quickly
 past —
 Which blooms and fades, and only leaves at last,
 Faint as shed flowers, the attenuated dream.
 (1881)

48 DEATH-IN-LOVE

There came an image in Life's retinue
 That had Love's wings and bore his gon-falon,

Fair was the web, and nobly wrought
 thereon,
 O soul-sequestered face, thy form and hue!
 Bewildering sounds, such as spring wakens
 to, 5
 Shook in its folds, and through my heart its power
 Sped trackless as the immemorable hour
 When birth's dark portal groaned and all was new.
 But a veiled woman followed, and she caught
 The banner round its staff, to furl and cling —
 Then plucked a feather from the bearer's wing, 11
 And held it to his lips that stirred it not,
 And said to me, "Behold, there is no breath,
 I and this Love are one, and I am Death"
 (1870)

49 WILLOWWOOD — 1

I sat with Love upon a woodside well,
 Leaning across the water, I and he,
 Nor ever did he speak nor looked at me,
 But touched his lute wherein was audible
 The certain secret thing he had to tell 5
 Only our mirrored eyes met silently
 In the low wave; and that sound came to be The passionate voice I knew, and my tears fell
 And at their fall, his eyes beneath grew hers,
 And with his foot and with his wing-feathers
 He swept the spring that watered my heart's drouth. 11
 Then the dark ripples spread to waving hair,
 And as I stooped, her own lips rising there
 Bubbled with brimming kisses at my mouth
 (1868; 1869)

50. WILLOWWOOD — 2

And now Love sang; but his was such a song,
 So meshed with half-remembrance hard to
 free,
 As souls disused in death's sterility
 May sing when the new birthday tarries long
 And I was made aware of a dumb throng 5
 That stood aloof, one form by every tree,
 All mournful forms, for each was I or she,
 The shades of those our days that had no
 tongue.
 They looked on us, and knew us and were
 known,
 While fast together, alive from the abyss, 10
 Clung the soul-wrung implacable close kiss,
 And pity of self through all made broken
 moan

Sonnets 49-52 Willowwood The title given to this series of four sonnets is poetical for The Woodland of Weeping
 The willow is a symbol of mourning

Which said, "For once, for once, for once alone!"
And still Love sang, and what he sang was this: (1868; 1869)

51. WILLOWWOOD — 3

"O ye, all ye that walk in Willowwood,
That walk with hollow faces burning white:
What fathom-depth of soul-struck widowhood,
What long, what longer hours, one lifelong
night,
Ere ye again, who so in vain have wooed 5
Your last hope lost, who so in vain invite
Your lips to that their unforgotten food,
Ere ye, ere ye again shall see the light!
Alas! the bitter banks in Willowwood,
With tear-spurge wan, with blood-wort burning red. 10
Alas! if ever such a pillow could Steep deep the soul in sleep till she were
dead —
Better all life forget her than this thing,
That Willowwood should hold her wandering!" (1868; 1869)

52 WILLOWWOOD — 4

So sang he, and as meeting rose and rose
Together cling through the wind's well-away
Nor change at once, yet near the end of day
The leaves drop loosened where the heart-stain glows —
So when the song died did the kiss uncloze, 5
And her face fell back drowned, and was as gray
As its gray eyes; and if it ever may Meet mine again I know not if Love knows.
Only I know that I leaned low and drank
A long draft from the water where she sank, 10
Her breath and all her tears and all her soul,
And as I leaned, I know I felt Love's face Pressed on my neck with moan of pity and
grace,
Till both our heads were in his aureole.
(1868; 1869)

53. WITHOUT HER

What of her glass without her? The blank
gray
There where the pool is blind of the moon's
face.
Her dress without her? The tossed empty space
Of cloud-rack whence the moon has passed away.

Her paths without her? Day's appointed sway 5
Usurped by desolate night. Her pillowed
place
Without her? Tears, ah me! for love's good
grace,
And cold forgetfulness of night or day.
What of the heart without her? Nay, poor
heart,
Of thee what word remains ere speech be still? 10
A wayfarer by barren ways and chill,
Steep ways and weary, without her thou art,
Where the long cloud, the long wood's counterpart,
Sheds doubled darkness up the laboring hill (1881)

55. STILLBORN LOVE

The hour which might have been yet might not be,
Which man's and woman's heart conceived and bore
Yet whereof life was barren — on what shore
Bides it the breaking of Time's weary sea?
Bondchild of all consummate joys set free, 5
It somewhere sighs and serves, and mute
before
The house of Love, hears through the echoing
door
His hours elect in choral consonancy
But lo! what wedded souls now hand in hand
Together tread at last the immortal strand 10
With eyes where burning memory lights love
home?
Lo! how the little outcast hour has turned
And leaped to them and in their faces yearned —
"I am your child, O parents, ye have come!" (1869, 1870)

56. TRUE WOMAN—I HERSELF

To be a sweetness more desired than spring,
A bodily beauty more acceptable
Than the wild rose-tree's arch that crowns
the fell,
To be an essence more environing 4
Than wine's drained juice; a music ravishing
More than the passionate pulse of Philomel,
To be all this 'neath one soft bosom's swell
That is the flower of life — how strange a
thing!
How strange a thing to be what Man can
know

Sonnet 56. True Woman, 1 3 fell, moor 6. Philomel, the nightingale (See Arnold's Philomela, page 470.)

But as a sacred secret! Heaven's own screen Hides her soul's purest depth and loveliest glow, 11
Closely withheld, as all things most unseen —
The wave-bowered pearl — the heart-shaped seal of green
That flecks the snowdrop underneath the snow.

57. TRUE WOMAN—2 HER LOVE

She loves him; for her infinite soul is Love,
And he her lodestar. Passion in her is
A glass facing his fire, where the bright bliss
Is mirrored, and the heat returned. Yet move That glass, a stranger's amorous flame to prove, 5
And it shall turn, by instant contraries,
Ice to the moon; while her pure fire to his
For whom it burns, clings close i' the heart's alcove
Lo! they are one. With wifely breast to breast
And circling arms, she welcomes all command 10
Of love—her soul to answering ardors
fanned;
Yet as morn springs or twilight sinks to rest,
Ah! who shall say she deems not loveliest
The hour of sisterly sweet hand-in-hand? 5
(1881)

58 TRUE WOMAN—3 HER HEAVEN

If to grow old in Heaven is to grow young (As the Seer saw and said), then blest were he With youth forevermore whose heaven should
be True Woman, she whom these weak notes
have sung,
Here and hereafter — choir-strains of her
tongue — 5
Sky-spaces of her eyes — sweet signs that flee
About her soul's immediate sanctuary —
Were Paradise all uttermost worlds among
The sunrise blooms and withers on the hill
Like any hillflower, and the noblest troth 10
Dies here to dust Yet shall Heaven's promise clothe
Even yet those lovers who have cherished
still
This test for love — in every kiss sealed fast
To feel the first kiss and forbode the last 5
(1881)

From PART II CHANGE AND FATE

60 TRANSFIGURED LIFE

As growth of form or momentary glance
In a child's features will recall to mind
The father's with the mother's face combined —
Sweet interchange that memories still enhance,
And yet, as childhood's years and youth's advance, 5
The gradual moldings leave one stamp behind,
Till in the blended likeness now we find
A separate man's or woman's countenance —
So in the Song, the singer's Joy and Pain,
Its very parents, evermore expand 10
To bid the passion's fullgrown birth remain,
By Art's transfiguring essence subtly spanned,
And from that song-cloud shaped as a man's hand
There comes the sound as of abundant rain
(1881)

63 INCLUSIVENESS

The changing guests, each in a different mood,
Sit at the roadside table and arise;
And every life among them in likewise
Is a soul's board set daily with new food.
What man has bent o'er his son's sleep, to brood 5
How that face shall watch his when cold it lies? —
Or thought, as his own mother kissed his eyes,
Of what her kiss was when his father wooed?
May not this ancient room thou sit'st in dwell
In separate living souls for joy or pain? 10
Nay, all its corners may be painted plain Where heaven shows pictures of some life spent well,
And may be stamped, a memory all in vain,
Upon the sight of lidless eyes in hell
(1860; 1870)

65 KNOWN IN VAIN

As two whose love, first foolish, widening scope,
Knows suddenly, to music high and soft,
The Holy of holies; who because they scoffed
Are now amazed with shame, nor dare to cope
With the whole truth aloud, lest heaven should ope; 5
Yet, at their meetings, laugh not as they laughed
In speech, nor speak, at length, but sitting oft

Together, within hopeless sight of hope
 For hours are silent — so it happeneth
 When Work and Will awake too late, to gaze 10
 After their life sailed by, and hold their
 breath
 Ah! who shall dare to search through what sad maze
 Thenceforth their incommunicable ways
 Follow the desultory feet of Death?
 (1853; 1870)

66 THE HEART OF THE NIGHT

From child to youth, from youth to arduous
 man,
 From lethargy to fever of the heart,
 From faithful life to dream-dowered days
 apart;
 From trust to doubt, from doubt to brink of ban —
 Thus much of change in one swift cycle ran 5
 Till now Alas, the soul! — how soon must she Accept her primal immortality —
 The flesh resume its dust whence it began?
 O Lord of work and peace! O Lord of life!
 O Lord, the awful Lord of will! though late,
 Even yet renew this soul with duteous
 breath: 11
 That when the peace is garnered in from
 strife,
 The work retrieved, the will regenerate,
 This soul may see thy face, O Lord of death!
 (1881)

69 AUTUMN IDLENESS

This sunlight shames November where he grieves
 In dead red leaves, and will not let him shun
 The day, though bough with bough be overrun.
 But with a blessing every glade receives
 High salutation; while from hillock-eaves 5
 The deer gaze calling, dappled white and dun,
 As if, being foresters of old, the sun
 Had marked them with the shade of forest-leaves.
 Here dawn today unveiled her magic glass;
 Here noon now gives the thirst and takes the dew; 10
 Till eve bring rest when other good things
 pass.
 And here the lost hours the lost hours renew
 While I still lead my shadow o'er the grass, Nor know, for longing, that which I should do.
 (1870)

 tion

70 THE HILL SUMMIT

This feast-day of the sun, his altar there
 In the broad west has blazed for vesper-song,
 And I have loitered in the vale too long
 And gaze now a belated worshiper.
 Yet may I not forget that I was 'ware, 5
 So journeying, of his face at intervals
 Transfigured where the fringed horizon falls —
 A fiery bush with coruscating hair.
 And now that I have climbed and won this height,
 I must tread downward through the sloping
 shade 10
 And travel the bewildered tracks till night
 Yet for this hour I still may here be stayed
 And see the gold air and the silver fade
 And the last bird fly into the last light (1853; 1870)

71 THE CHOICE — I

Eat thou and drink, tomorrow thou shalt die
 Surely the earth, that's wise (being very old), Needs not our help. Then loose me, love,
 and hold
 Thy sultry hair up from my face, that I May pour for thee this golden wine, brim-
 high, 5
 Till round the glass thy fingers glow like gold.
 We'll drown all hours, thy song, while hours
 are tolled,
 Shall leap, as fountains veil the changing sky
 Now kiss, and think that there are really those,
 My own high-bosomed beauty, who increase Vain gold, vain lore, and yet might choose our way! 11
 Through many years they toil, then on a day
 They die not — for their life was death —
 but cease;
 And round their narrow lips the mold falls close (1848; 1870)

72 THE CHOICE — 2

Watch thou and fear; tomorrow thou shalt
 die
 Or art thou sure thou shalt have time for
 death?

Sonnets 71-73 The Choice Of the three sonnets under this title, William Rossetti, the poet's brother, says "This trio is important as indicating Rossetti's youthful conception of life as a moral discipline and problem. He propounds three theories 1, Eat thou and drink, tomorrow thou shalt die, 2, Watch thou and pray, 3, Think thou and act. It is manifest, however, that Rossetti intends us to set aside the 'Eat thou and drink' theory of life, and not to accept without much reservation the 'Watch thou and pray' theory 'Think thou and act' is what he abides by."
Sonnet 71. The Choice, 1-13 They die not, etc. Cf.
 Browning's In a Gondola, 229 ff., page 196. Rossetti states that he wrote the sonnet before he had read Browning's poem, but that he was annoyed by the resemblance

Is not the day which God's word promiseth
 To come man knows not when? In yonder
 sky,
 Now while we speak, the sun speeds forth;
 can I⁵
 Or thou assure him of his goal? God's breath
 Even at this moment haply quickeneth
 The air to a flame; till spirits, always nigh
 Though screened and hid, shall walk the daylight here.
 And dost thou prate of all that man shall do?
 Canst thou, who hast but plagues, presume to be¹¹
 Glad in his gladness that comes after thee?
 Will his strength slay thy worm in Hell?
 Go to,
 Cover thy countenance, and watch, and fear
 (1848; 1870)

73. THE CHOICE — 3

Think thou and act, tomorrow thou shalt die Outstretched in the sun's warmth upon the
 shore,
 Thou say'st "Man's measured path is all gone o'er,
 Up all his years, steeply, with strain and sigh,
 Man clomb until he touched the truth, and I,
 Even I, am he whom it was destined for" ⁶
 How should this be? Art thou then so much
 more
 Than they who sowed, that thou shouldst reap thereby?
 Nay, come up hither. From this wave-washed mound
 Unto the furthest flood-brim look with me,
 Then reach on with thy thought till it be drowned.¹¹
 Miles and miles distant though the gray line
 be,
 And though thy soul sail leagues and leagues beyond —
 Still, leagues beyond those leagues, there is more sea.
 (1848, 1870)

77 SOUL'S BEAUTY

(Sibylla Palmifera)

Under the arch of Life, where love and death,
 Terror and mystery, guard her shrine, I saw Beauty enthroned, and though her gaze struck awe,
 I drew it in as simply as my breath.
 Hers are the eyes which, over and beneath, ⁵

Sonnet 77 Soul's Beauty This sonnet, originally called Sibylla Palmifera, was written for a painting of that name, the palm-bearing Sibyl, or prophetess. In the picture she bears a branch of palm and is seated on a throne beneath a stone canopy overlooking a temple court

The sky and sea bend on thee — which can draw,
 By sea or sky or woman, to one law,
 The allotted bondman of her palm and wreath
 This is that Lady Beauty, in whose praise
 Thy voice and hand shake still, — long known to thee¹⁰
 By flying hair and fluttering hem — the beat
 Following her daily of thy heart and feet,
 How passionately and irretrievably,
 In what fond flight, how many ways and days!
 (1866, 1870)

78. BODY'S BEAUTY

(Lilith)

Of Adam's first wife, Lilith, it is told
 (The witch he loved before the gift of Eve)
 That, ere the snake's, her sweet tongue could deceive,
 And her enchanted hair was the first gold.
 And still she sits, young while the earth is old,⁵
 And, subtly of herself contemplative, Draws men to watch the bright web she can weave,
 Till heart and body and life are in its hold.
 The rose and poppy are her flowers, for where
 Is he not found, O Lilith, whom shed scent 10
 And soft-shed kisses and soft sleep shall snare?
 Lo! as that youth's eyes burned at thine, so went Thy spell through him, and left his straight neck bent
 And round his heart one strangling golden
 hair.
 (1864, 1870)

81. MEMORIAL THRESHOLDS

What place so strange — though unrevealed
 snow
 With unimaginable fires arise
 At the earth's end — what passion of surprise
 Like frost-bound fire-girt scenes of long ago?
 Lo! this is none but I this hour, and lo!⁵
 This is the very place which to mine eyes
 Those mortal hours in vain immortalize,
 'Mid hurrying crowds, with what alone I
 know.
 City, of thine a single simple door,
 By some new Power reduplicate, must be ¹⁰
 Even yet my life-porch in eternity,

Sonnet 78 Body's Beauty This sonnet was originally called Lilith, after the traditional first wife of Adam (See Browning's Adam, Lilith, and Eve, page 352, and Rossetti's Eden Bower, page 522) The sonnet was written for a painting entitled Lady Lilith. In both the painting and the sonnet, Lilith represents fleshly beauty and amorous passion

Even with one presence filled, as once of yore;
Or mocking winds whirl round a chaff-strown floor
Thee and thy years and these my words and
me. (1874; 1881)

82. HOARDED JOY

I said: "Nay, pluck not — let the first fruit
be,

Even as thou sayest, it is sweet and red,
But let it ripen still The tree's bent head
Sees in the stream its own fecundity
And bides the day of fullness Shall not we 5
At the sun's hour that day possess the shade,
And claim our fruit before its ripeness fade,
And eat it from the branch and praise the tree?"

I say: "Alas! our fruit hath wooed the sun Too long — 'tis fallen and floats adown the stream 10

Lo, the last clusters! Pluck them every one,
And let us sup with summer, ere the gleam
Of autumn set the year's pent sorrow free,
And the woods wail like echoes from the sea (1870)

83. BARREN SPRING

Once more the changed year's turning wheel returns,

And as a girl sails balanced in the wind,
And now before and now again behind
Stoops as it swoops, with cheek that laughs and burns —

So spring comes merry toward me here, but earns 5

No answering smile from me, whose life is twined

With the dead boughs that winter still must bind,

And whom today the spring no more concerns

Behold, this crocus is a withering flame;
This snowdrop, snow; this apple-blossom's part 10

To breed the fruit that breeds the serpent's
art.

Nay, for these spring-flowers, turn thy face
from them,

Nor stay till on the year's last lily-stem
The white cup shrivels round the golden
heart. (1870)

86. LOST DAYS

The lost days of my life until today,
What were they, could I see them on the street

Lie as they fell? Would they be ears of wheat
Sown once for food but trodden into clay?
Or golden coins squandered and still to pay? 5
Or drops of blood dabbling the guilty feet?
Or such spilt water as in dreams must cheat
The undying throats of hell, athirst away?
I do not see them here; but after death
God knows I know the faces I shall see, 10
Each one a murdered self, with low last
breath.

"I am thyself — what hast thou done to
me?"

"And I — and I — thyself" (lo! each one saith),

"And thou thyself to all eternity!" (1858; 1869)

90. "RETRO ME, SATHANA!"

Get thee behind me. Even as, heavy-curved,
Stooping against the wind, a charioteer
Is snatched from out his chariot by the hair,
So shall Time be; and as the void car, hurled
Abroad by reinless steeds, even so the world.
Yea, even as chariot-dust upon the air, 6
It shall be sought and not found anywhere.
Get thee behind me, Satan. Oft unfurled,
Thy perilous wings can beat and break like lath

Much mightiness of men to win thee praise. 10
Leave these weak feet to tread in narrow ways.

Thou still, upon the broad vine-sheltered
path,

Mayst wait the turning of the phials of wrath
For certain years, for certain months and
days. (1847; 1870)

94. MICHELANGELO'S KISS

Great Michelangelo, with age grown bleak
And uttermost labors, having once o'ersaid
All grievous memories on his long life shed,
This worst regret to one true heart could
speak.

That when, with sorrowing love and reverence meek, 5

He stooped o'er sweet Colonna's dying bed,
His Muse and dominant Lady, spirit-wed —
Her hand he kissed, but not her brow or
cheek.

Sonnet 90 "Retro Me, Sathana!" The title means Get behind Me, Satan. These are the words spoken by Christ to Satan at the time of the temptation, as told in Luke, 4 8

Sonnet 94 Michelangelo's Kiss Michelangelo Buonarroti (1475-1564) was a famous Italian painter, sculptor, architect, and poet

4 one true heart, Ascanio Condivi, who published a biography of his master Michelangelo, in 1553. He is authority for the statement contained in lines 4-8 of the sonnet. 6 Colonna, Vittoria Colonna (1490-1547), an Italian poet, beloved friend of Michelangelo. She is referred to as one of the most beautiful characters of the Italian Renaissance

O Buonarroti—good at Art's fire-wheels
 To urge her chariot! — even thus the Soul, 10 Touching at length some sorely-chastened
 goal,
 Earns oftenest but a little; her appeals
 Were deep and mute — lowly her claim.
 Let be;
 What holds for her Death's garner? And for thee?

(1881)

97. A SUPERScription

Look in my face, my name is Might-have-
 been;
 I am also called No-more, Too-late, Farewell;
 Unto thine ear I hold the dead-sea shell
 Cast up thy Life's foam-fretted feet between,
 Unto thine eyes the glass where that is seen
 Which had Life's form and Love's, but by my spell 6
 Is now a shaken shadow intolerable,
 Of ultimate things unuttered the frail screen
 Mark me, how still I am! But should there dart
 One moment through thy soul the soft surprise 10
 Of that winged Peace which lulls the breath of sighs —
 Then shalt thou see me smile, and turn apart
 Thy visage to mine ambush at thy heart
 Sleepless with cold, commemorative eyes.

(1869, 1869)

99. NEWBORN DEATH—I

Today Death seems to me an infant child
 Which her worn mother Life upon my knee
 Has set to grow my friend and play with me,
 If haply so my heart might be beguiled
 To find no terrors in a face so mild — 5
 If haply so my weary heart might be Unto the newborn milky eyes of thee,
 O Death, before resentment reconciled.
 How long, O Death? And shall thy feet depart
 Still a young child's with mine, or wilt thou
 stand 10
 Fullgrown the helpful daughter of my heart,
 What time with thee indeed I reach the strand
 Of the pale wave which knows thee what thou art,
 And drink it in the hollow of thy hand?

(1868; 1870)

9 good . . . fire-wheels. Rossetti uses this phrase as a play on the name Buonarroti, but he follows a mistaken etymology. The name would have to be Buoni ruoti to mean good wheels.

100. NEWBORN DEATH—2

And thou, O Life, the lady of all bliss,
 With whom, when our first heart beat full and fast,
 I wandered till the haunts of men were passed,
 And in fair places found all bowers amiss Till only woods and waves might hear our
 kiss, 5
 While to the winds all thought of Death
 we cast —
 Ah, Life! and must I have from thee at last
 No smile to greet me and no babe but this?
 Lo! Love, the child once ours; and Song, whose hair
 Blew like a flame and blossomed like a wreath, 10
 And Art, whose eyes were worlds by God found fair;
 These o'er the book of Nature mixed their
 breath
 With neck-twined arms, as oft we watched them there
 And did these die that thou mightst bear me
 Death? (1868; 1870)

101. THE ONE HOPE —

When vain desire at last and vain regret
 Go hand in hand to death, and all is vain,
 What shall assuage the unforgotten pain
 And teach the forgetful to forget?
 Shall Peace be still a sunk stream long
 unmet — 5
 Or may the soul at once in a green plain Stoop through the spray of some sweet life-fountain
 And cull the dew-drenched flowering amulet?
 Ah! when the wan soul in that golden air
 Between the scripted petals softly blown 10
 Peers breathless for the gift of grace unknown,
 Ah! let none other alien spell soe'er
 But only the one Hope's one name be there —
 Not less nor more, but even that word alone
 (1869; 1870)

THREE SHADOWS

I looked and saw your eyes
 In the shadow of your hair,
 As a traveler sees the stream
 In the shadow of the wood;
 And I said, "My faint heart sighs, 5
 Ah me! to linger there,
 To drink deep and to dream
 In that sweet solitude."

I looked and saw your heart
 In the shadow of your eyes, 10

As a seeker sees the gold
 In the shadow of the stream,
 And I said, "Ah me! what art
 Should win the immortal prize,
 Whose want must make life cold 15
 And heaven a hollow dream?"

I looked and saw your love
 In the shadow of your heart,
 As a diver sees the pearl
 In the shadow of the sea; 20
 And I murmured, not above
 My breath, but all apart —
 "Ah! you can love, true girl,
 And is your love for me?"
 (1876; 1881)

THE WHITE SHIP

HENRY I OF ENGLAND — 25TH NOV., 1120

By none but me can the tale be told,
 The butcher of Rouen, poor Berold
 (Lands are swayed by a King on a throne)
 'Twas a royal train put forth to sea,
 Yet the tale can be told by none but me 5
 (The sea hath no King but God alone)

King Henry held it as life's whole gain
 That after his death his son should reign.

'Twas so in my youth I heard men say,
 And my old age calls it back today. 10

King Henry of England's realm was he,
 And Henry Duke of Normandy.

The times had changed when on either coast
 "Clerkly Harry" was all his boast.

Of ruthless strokes full many an one 15
 He had struck to crown himself and his son,
 And his elder brother's eyes were gone

And when to the chase his court would crowd,
 The poor flung plowshares on his road,
 And shrieked: "Our cry is from King to God!" 20

But all the chiefs of the English land
 Had knelt and kissed the Prince's hand

The White Ship This poem relates an actual incident. Henry I ruled in England from 1100 to 1135. He conquered Normandy in 1106.

2 Rouen, an important city in France, the ancient capital of Normandy. 14 Clerkly, learned, scholarly. Henry was called "Beauclerk" because of his scholarly tastes. 17 elder . . . gone Henry seized the throne when his elder brother Robert, the rightful heir, was on a crusade to the Holy Land. When Henry conquered Normandy in 1106, he captured his brother and imprisoned him for the rest of his life.

And next with his son he sailed to France
 To claim the Norman allegiance,

And every baron in Normandy 25
 Had taken the oath of fealty.

'Twas sworn and sealed, and the day had come
 When the King and the Prince might journey
 home;

For Christmas cheer is to home hearts dear,
 And Christmas now was drawing near. 30

Stout Fitz-Stephen came to the King —
 A pilot famous in seafaring;

And he held to the King, in all men's sight,
 A mark of gold for his tribute's right.

"Liege Lord! my father guided the ship 35
 From whose boat your father's foot did slip
 When he caught the English soil in his grip,

"And cried. 'By this clasp I claim command
 O'er every rood of English land!'

"He was borne to the realm you rule o'er now
 In that ship with the archer carved at her prow; 41

"And thither I'll bear, an' it be my due,
 Your father's son and his grandson too.

"The famed White Ship is mine in the bay;
 From Harfleur's harbor she sails today, 45

"With masts fair-pennoned as Norman spears
 And with fifty well-trying mariners."

Quoth the King. "My ships are chosen each
 one,
 But I'll not say nay to Stephen's son.

"My son and daughter and fellowship 50
 Shall cross the water in the White Ship."

The King set sail with the eve's south wind,
 And soon he left that coast behind.

The Prince and all his, a princely show,
 Remained in the good White Ship to go 55

With noble knights and with ladies fair,
 With courtiers and sailors gathered there,
 Three hundred living souls we were,

And I Berold was the meanest hind
 In all that train to the Prince assigned. 60

45 Harfleur, a town in northern France

The Prince was a lawless shameless youth,
From his father's loins he sprang without ruth

Eighteen years till then he had seen,
And the devil's dues in him were eighteen.

And now he cried: "Bring wine from below,
Let the sailors revel ere yet they row. 66

"Our speed shall o'ertake my father's flight
Though we sail from the harbor at midnight."

The rowers made good cheer without check;
The lords and ladies obeyed his beck; 70
The night was light, and they danced on the deck.

But at midnight's stroke they cleared the bay,
And the White Ship furrowed the waterway.

The sails were set, and the oars kept tune
To the double flight of the ship and the moon.

Swifter and swifter the White Ship sped 76
Till she flew as the spirit flies from the dead,

As white as a lily glimmered she
Like a ship's fair ghost upon the sea.

And the Prince cried, "Friends, 'tis the hour to sing! 80
Is a songbird's course so swift on the wing?"

And under the winter stars' still throng,
From brown throats, white throats, merry and
strong,
The knights and the ladies raised a song

A song — nay, a shriek that rent the sky, 85
That leaped o'er the deep! — the grievous cry
Of three hundred living that now must die

An instant shriek that sprang to the shock
As the ship's keel felt the sunken rock

'Tis said that afar — a shrill strange sigh — 90
The King's ships heard it and knew not why

Pale Fitz-Stephen stood by the helm
'Mid all those folk that the waves must whelm.

A great King's heir for the waves to whelm,
And the helpless pilot pale at the helm! 95

The ship was eager and sucked athirst,
By the stealthy stab of the sharp reef pierced;

And like the moil round a sinking cup,
The waters against her crowded up.

A moment the pilot's senses spin — 100
The next he snatched the Prince 'mid the din,
Cut the boat loose, and the youth leaped in

A few friends leaped with him, standing near.
"Row! the sea's smooth and the night is
clear!" 104

"What! none to be saved but these and I?"
"Row, row as you'd live! All here must die!"

Out of the churn of the choking ship,
Which the gulf grapples and the waves strip,
They struck with the strained oars' flash and
dip. 109

'Twas then o'er the splitting bulwarks' brim
The Prince's sister screamed to him.

He gazed aloft, still rowing apace,
And through the whirled surf he knew her
face

To the toppling decks clave one and all
As a fly cleaves to a chamber-wall. 115

I Berold was clinging anear;
I prayed for myself and quaked with fear,
But I saw his eyes as he looked at her.

He knew her face and he heard her cry, 119
And he said, "Put back! she must not die!"

And back with the current's force they reel
Like a leaf that's drawn to a water-wheel

'Neath the ship's travail they scarce might float,
But he rose and stood in the rocking boat.

Low the poor ship leaned on the tide; 125
O'er the naked keel as she best might slide,
The sister toiled to the brother's side.

He reached an oar to her from below,
And stiffened his arms to clutch her so. 129

But now from the ship some spied the boat,
And "Saved!" was the cry from many a throat.

And down to the boat they leaped and fell,
It turned as a bucket turns in a well,
And nothing was there but the surge and swell 134

The Prince that was and the King to come,
There in an instant gone to his doom,

Despite of all England's bended knee
And maugre the Norman fealty¹

He was a Prince of lust and pride;
He showed no grace till the hour he died 140

When he should be King, he oft would vow,
He'd yoke the peasant to his own plow.
O'er him the ships score their furrows now.

God only knows where his soul did wake,
But I saw him die for his sister's sake. 145

By none but me can the tale be told,
The butcher of Rouen, poor Berold.
(Lands are swayed by a King on a throne.)

'Twas a royal train put forth to sea,
Yet the tale can be told by none but me. 150
(The sea hath no King but God alone.)

And now the end came o'er the water's womb
Like the last great Day that's yet to come.

With prayers in vain and curses in vain, 154
The White Ship sundered on the mid-main,

And what were men and what was a ship
Werc toys and splinters in the sea's grip.

I Berold was down in the sea;
And passing strange though the thing may be,
Of dreams then known I remember me 160

Blithe is the shout on Harfleur's strand
When morning lights the sails to land;

And blithe is Honfleur's echoing gloam
When mothers call the children home;

And high do the bells of Rouen beat 165
When the Body of Christ goes down the street.

These things and the like were heard and shown
In a moment's trance 'neath the sea alone,

And when I rose, 'twas the sea did seem,
And not these things, to be all a dream. 170

The ship was gone and the crowd was gone,
And the deep shuddered and the moon shone;

And in a strait grasp my arms did span
The mainyard rent from the mast where it ran;

And on it with me was another man 175

Where lands were none 'neath the dim sea-
sky,
We told our names, that man and I.

"O I am Godefroy de l'Aigle hight,
And son I am to a belted knight."

"And I am Berold the butcher's son 180
Who slays the beasts in Rouen town."

Then cried we upon God's name, as we Did drift on the bitter winter sea.

But lo! a third man rose o'er the wave,
And we said, "Thank God! us three may He save!" 185

He clutched to the yard with panting stare,
And we looked and knew Fitz-Stephen there.

He clung, and "What of the Prince?" quoth
he.

"Lost, lost!" we cried. He cried, "Woe on
me!" 189

And loosed his hold and sank through the sea

And soul with soul again in that space
We two were together face to face,

And each knew each, as the moments sped,
Less for one living than for one dead,

And every still star overhead 195
Seemed an eye that knew we were but dead.

And the hours passed; till the noble's son Sighed, "God be thy help! my strength's fore-done!"

"O farewell, friend, for I can no more!"
"Christ take thee!" I moaned, and his life was o'er. 200

Three hundred souls were all lost but one,
And I drifted over the sea alone

At last the morning rose on the sea
Like an angel's wing that beat toward me

Sore numbed I was in my sheepskin coat, 205
Half dead I hung, and might nothing note,
Till I woke sun-warmed in a fisher-boat

The sun was high o'er the eastern brim
As I praised God and gave thanks to Him.

That day I told my tale to a priest, 210
Who charged me, till the shrift were released,
That I should keep it in mine own breast.

163 Honfleur, a town in northwestern France

And with the priest I thence did fare
To King Henry's court at Winchester. 214

We spoke with the King's high chamberlain,
And he wept and mourned again and again,
As if his own son had been slain;

And round us ever there crowded fast
Great men with faces all aghast. 219

And who so bold that might tell the thing
Which now they knew to their lord the King?
Much woe I learnt in their communing.

The King had watched with a heart sore stirred
For two whole days, and this was the third,

And still to all his court would he say, 225
"What keeps my son so long away?"

And they said: "The ports lie far and wide
That skirt the swell of the English tide,

"And England's cliffs are not more white
Than her women are, and scarce so light 230
Her skies as their eyes are blue and bright,

"And in some port that he reached from France
The Prince has lingered for his pleasure."

But once the King asked "What distant cry
Was that we heard 'twixt the sea and sky?"

And one said "With suchlike shouts, pardie!
Do the fishers fling their nets at sea." 237

And one: "Who knows not the shrieking quest
When the sea-mew misses its young from the nest?"

'Twas thus till now they had soothed his dread, 240
Albeit they knew not what they said,

But who should speak today of the thing
That all knew there except the King?

Then pondering much they found a way, 244
And met round the King's high seat that day,

And the King sat with a heart sore stirred,
And seldom he spoke and seldom heard.

'Twas then through the hall the King was 'ware
Of a little boy with golden hair,

214 Winchester, a city in Wessex, England, sixty miles southwest of London. It was the residence of the early English kings. 233 pleasure, pleasure. 236 pardie, a French oath—par Dieu, meaning by God

As bright as the golden poppy is 250
That the beach breeds for the surf to kiss;

Yet pale his cheek as the thorn in spring.
And his garb black like the raven's wing.

Nothing heard but his foot through the hall,
For now the lords were silent all. 255

And the King wondered, and said, "Alack!
Who send me a fair boy dressed in black?"

"Why, sweet heart, do you pace through the hall
As though my court were a funeral?"

Then lowly knelt the child at the dais, 260
And looked up weeping in the King's face.

"O wherefore, O King, ye may say,
For white is the hue of death today.

"Your son and all his fellowship
Lie low in the sea with the White Ship." 265

King Henry fell as a man struck dead;
And speechless still he stared from his bed
When to him next day my rede I read.

There's many an hour must needs beguile 269
A King's high heart that he should smile —

Full many a lordly hour, full fain
Of his realm's rule and pride of his reign —

But this King never smiled again.

By none but me can the tale be told,
The butcher of Rouen, poor Berold. 275
(Lands are swayed by a King on a throne)

'Twas a royal train put forth to sea,
Yet the tale can be told by none but me.
(The sea hath no King but God alone)

Mystery: lo! betwixt the sun and moon

268 rede, story, counsel
Astarte Syriaca Astarte is Ishtar, an Assyrian goddess known as queen of the gods. She was identified with the planet Venus. Aphrodite was the Greek goddess of love and beauty. Many of her attributes were derived from the Assyrian goddess

Love-freighted lips and absolute eyes that wean
The pulse of hearts to the spheres' dominant tune.

Torch-bearing, her sweet ministers compel
All thrones of light beyond the sky and sea
The witnesses of Beauty's face to be, 11
That face, of Love's all-penetrative spell
Amulet, talisman, and oracle —
Betwixt the sun and moon a mystery.

INSOMNIA

Thin are the night-skirts left behind
By daybreak hours that onward creep,
And thin, alas! the shred of sleep
That wavers with the spirit's wind,
But in half-dreams that shift and roll 5
And still remember and forget,
My soul this hour has drawn your soul
A little nearer yet

Our lives, most dear, are never near,
Our thoughts are never far apart, 10
Though all that draws us heart to heart
Seems fainter now and now more clear
Tonight Love claims his full control,
And with desire and with regret
My soul this hour has drawn your soul 15
A little nearer yet

Is there a home where heavy earth
Melts to bright air that breathes no pain,
Where water leaves no thirst again
And springing fire is Love's new birth? 20
If faith long bound to one true goal
May there at length its hope beget,
My soul that hour shall draw your soul
Forever nearer yet. (1881)

ALAS, SO LONG!

Ah! dear one, we were young so long,
It seemed that youth would never go,
For skies and trees were ever in song
And water in singing flow
In the days we never again shall know. 5
Alas, so long!
Ah! then was it all spring weather?
Nay, but we were young and together

Ah! dear one, I've been old so long,
It seems that age is loath to part, 10
Though days and years have never a song,
And oh! have they still the art
That warmed the pulses of heart to heart?
Alas, so long!

8 spheres' tune The ancients believed that the stars made music as they revolved in their spheres

Ah! then was it all spring weather? 15
Nay, but we were young and together

Ah! dear one, you've been dead so long —
How long until we meet again,
Where hours may never lose their song
Nor flowers forget the rain 20
In glad noonlight that never shall wane?
Alas, so long!
Ah! shall it be then spring weather,
And ah! shall we be young together?

FIVE ENGLISH POETS

I. THOMAS CHATTERTON

With Shakespeare's manhood at a boy's wild heart —
Through Hamlet's doubt to Shakespeare near allied,
And kin to Milton through his Satan's pride —
At Death's sole door he stooped, and craved a dart,
And to the dear new bower of England's art — 5
Even to that shrine Time else had deified,
The unuttered heart that soared against his side —
Drove the fell point, and smote life's seals apart.
Thy nested home-loves, noble Chatterton,
The angel-trodden stair thy soul could trace
Up Redcliffe's spire, and in the world's armed space 11
Thy gallant sword-play — these to many an one
Are sweet forever, as thy grave unknown
And love-dream of thine unrecorded face (1881)

2. WILLIAM BLAKE

This is the place. Even here the dauntless soul,
The unflinching hand, wrought on; till in that nook,

Five English Poets Rossetti was an enthusiastic admirer of the five poets enshrined in these sonnets

1 Thomas Chatterton Chatterton was born in 1752, he died, by suicide, in 1770. He was unable to find employment in London, and he was too proud to become the object of charity

2 Hamlet's doubt. Hamlet doubted the propriety and the expediency of suicide. See his speech beginning "To be or not to be," Hamlet, III, 1, 56 ff. 9 nested home-loves, a reference to the deep love of Chatterton for Bristol, the city of his birth. 11 Redcliffe's spire. Chatterton spent much of his time in the attic of the church St. Mary Redcliffe, in Bristol. In his visions he saw angels going up and down the spire. 12 gallant sword-play, a reference to Chatterton's dreams of chivalrous encounter as expressed in The Bristowe Tragedie and other poems

2 William Blake Blake (1757-1827) was a mystic poet and artist. Rossetti addressed the poem to Frederick Shields, who had made a sketch of Blake's workroom and death-room at 3 Fountain Court, Strand, near the Thames River, London. Cf. Thomson's William Blake, page 575

As on that very bed, his life partook
 New birth, and passed Yon river's dusky
 shoal,
 Whereto the close-built coiling lanes unroll, 5
 Faced his work-window, whence his eyes would stare,
 Thought-wandering, unto naught that met
 them there,
 But to the unfettered irreversible goal
 This cupboard, Holy of Holies, held the cloud
 Of his soul writ and limned; this other one, 10
 His true wife's charge, full oft to their abode
 Yielded for daily bread the martyr's stone,
 Ere yet their food might be that Bread alone.
 The words now home-speech of the mouth of
 God. (1880, 1881)

3. SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE

His Soul fared forth (as from the deep home grove
 The father-songster plies the hour-long quest)
 To feed his soul-brood hungering in the nest,
 But his warm Heart, the mother-bird, above
 Their callow fledgling progeny still hove 5
 With tented roof of wings and fostering breast
 Till the Soul fed the soul-brood Richly blest
 From Heaven their growth, whose food was Human Love
 Yet ah! Like desert pools that show the stars
 Once in long leagues — even such the scarce-snatched hours 10
 Which deepening pain left to his lordliest powers —
 Heaven lost through spider-trammeled prison-bars.
 Six years, from sixty saved! Yet kindling
 skies
 Own them, a beacon to our centuries
 (1880; 1881)

 wife 12 martyr's stone In the sermon on the mount, Christ asked his listeners, "What man is there of you, whom if his son ask bread, will he give him a stone?" (Matthew, 7 9) Rossetti suggests that Blake was neglected and abused by his contemporaries

 habitual use of this drug 12 lost . . . prison-bars

 webs of philosophy Nearly all his great poems were written during the six years from 1797 to 1803

4 John Keats Rossetti uses classical names in this poem to suggest the classical element in Keats's poems.

The bright Castalian brink and Latmos'
 steep —
 Even such his life's cross-paths; till deathly deep 5
 He toiled through sands of Lethe, and long
 pain,
 Weary with labor spurned and love found
 vain,
 In dead Rome's sheltering shadow wrapped his sleep.
 O pang-dowered Poet, whose reverberant lips
 And heart-strung lyre awoke the Moon's eclipse — 10
 Thou whom the daisies glory in growing
 o'er —
 Their fragrance clings around thy name, not writ
 But rumored in water, while the fame of it
 Along Time's flood goes echoing evermore.
 (1880; 1881)

5 PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY

(INSCRIPTION FOR THE COUCH, STILL PRESERVED, ON WHICH HE PASSED THE LAST NIGHT OF HIS LIFE)

'Twixt those twin worlds — the world of Sleep, which gave
 No dream to warm, the tidal world of Death,
 Which the earth's sea, as the earth, replen-isheth —
 Shelley, Song's orient sun, to breast the wave, Rose from this couch that morn. Ah! did he brave 5
 Only the sea? — or did man's deed of hell
 Engulf his bark 'mid mists impenetrable? . .
 No eye discerned, nor any power might save When that mist cleared, O Shelley! what dread veil
 Was rent for thee, to whom far-darling Truth
 Reigned sovereign guide through thy brief
 ageless youth? 11
 Was the Truth thy Truth, Shelley? — Hush!
 All-Hail,
 Past doubt, thou gav'st it, and in Truth's bright sphere
 Art first of praisers, being most praised here.¹

 Parnassus, in Greece, sacred to Apollo, god of poetry and music, and the Muses, hence the source of inspiration Lat-mos was a mountain in Asia Minor, the scene of the story of the love of Selene (the moon goddess) and Endymion (the shepherd boy) as told in Keats's Endymion 6 Lethe, the

FOR "THE WINE OF CIRCE"

(BY EDWARD BURNE-JONES)

Dusk-haired and gold-robed o'er the golden wine
She stoops, wherein, distilled of death and shame,
Sink the black drops; while, lit with fragrant
flame,
Round her spread board the golden sunflowers shine.
Doth Helios here with Hecaté combine 5
(O Circe, thou their votaress!) to proclaim
For these thy guests all rapture in Love's
name,
Till pitiless Night give Day the countersign?
Lords of their hour, they come. And by her
knee
Those cowering beasts, their equals heretofore, 10
Wait, who with them in new equality
Tonight shall echo back the unchanging roar
Which sounds forever from the tide-strown
shore
Where the disheveled seaweed hates the sea

"FOUND"

"There is a budding morrow in midnight" —
So sang our Keats, our English nightingale
And here, as lamps across the bridge turn pale
In London's smokeless resurrection-light,
Dark breaks to dawn But o'er the deadly blight 5
Of love deflowered and sorrow of none avail
Which makes this man gasp and this woman
quail,
Can day from darkness ever again take flight?
Ah! gave not these two hearts their mutual pledge,
Under one mantle sheltered 'neath the hedge
In gloaming courtship? And O God! today 11
He only knows he holds her — but what part Can life now take? She cries in her locked
heart,
"Leave me — I do not know you — go away!"
(1881; 1881)

For "The Wine of Circe" This poem was written for a picture by Sir Edward Burne-Jones (1833-98), an English painter noted for highly decorative design. He was a pupil of Rossetti. Circe was a sorceress who could turn men into beasts.

5 Helios, god of the sun, representing day Hecaté, goddess of the night

"Found" The picture for which this sonnet was written represents a lost girl found in the city streets by her former lover, a countryman bound to market with a white calf in his cart.

1 "There . . . midnight," quoted from Keats's To Homer, line 11

THE KING'S TRAGEDY

JAMES I OF SCOTS. — 20TH FEBRUARY, 1437

I Catherine am a Douglas born,
A name to all Scots dear;
And Kate Barlass they've called me now
Through many a waning year.
This old arm's withered now. 'Twas once 5
Most deft 'mong maidens all
To rein the steed, to wing the shaft,
To smite the palm-play ball.
In hall adown the close-linked dance
It has shone most white and fair; 10
It has been the rest for a true lord's head,
And many a sweet babe's nursing-bed,
And the bar to a King's chambère.
Aye, lasses, draw round Kate Barlass,
And hark with bated breath 15
How good King James, King Robert's son,
Was foully done to death.
Through all the days of his gallant youth
The princely James was pent,
By his friends at first and then by his foes,
In long imprisonment. 21
For the elder Prince, the kingdom's heir,
By treason's murderous brood
Was slain; and the father quaked for the child
With the royal mortal blood. 25
I' the Bass Rock fort, by his father's care,
Was his childhood's life assured,
And Henry the subtle Bolingbroke,
Proud England's King, 'neath the southron yoke
His youth for long years immured. 30

The King's Tragedy The events recorded in this ballad are historical, as are also the persons mentioned. Because of his violent suppression of the nobles, James was murdered on Feb. 20, 1437, by Sir Robert Graham (who had previously been banished) and his band at the instigation of Walter Stewart, earl of Atholl, whose hope of the throne had been destroyed by the birth of James's son.

"Tradition says that Catherine Douglas, in honor of her heroic act when she barred the door with her arm against the murderers of James the First of Scots, received popularly the name of 'Barlass.' The name remains to her descendants, the Barlas family, in Scotland, who bear for their crest a broken arm. . . . A few stanzas from King James's lovely poem, known as The King's Quair [Quair means Book], are quoted in the course of this ballad. The writer must express regret for the necessity which has compelled him to shorten the ten-syllabled lines to eight syllables, in order that they might harmonize with the ballad meter" (Rossetti's note.)

8 palm-play ball See note on line 164, page 508 16 King Robert, Robert III (1390-1424) 19 James was pent Upon the death of his elder brother David, James was sent to France for safety, but the vessel was stopped by the English and James was taken into custody and kept as a prisoner in various places in England for nearly twenty years, until 1424. 26 Bass Rock fort, a small island at the entrance to the Firth of Forth, on the east coast of Scotland, where James embarked for France. 28 Henry, Henry IV, king of England (1399-1413) 29 southron, archaic for southern See note on line 19 30 His, James's

Yet in all things meet for a kingly man
Himself did he approve;
And the nightingale through his prison-wall
Taught him both lore and love

For once, when the bird's song drew him
close 35

To the opened window-pane,
In her bowers beneath a lady stood,
A light of life to his sorrowful mood,
Like a lily amid the rain.

And for her sake, to the sweet bird's note, 40
He framed a sweeter song,
More sweet than ever a poet's heart
Gave yet to the English tongue.

She was a lady of royal blood,
And when, past sorrow and teen, 45
He stood where still through his crownless
years

His Scottish realm had been,
At Scone were the happy lovers crowned,
A heart-wed King and Queen.

But the bird may fall from the bough of youth, 50

And song be turned to moan,
And Love's storm-cloud be the shadow of Hate,

When the tempest-waves of a troubled State
Are beating against a throne.

Yet well they loved; and the god of Love, 55
Whom well the King had sung,
Might find on the earth no truer hearts
His lowliest swains among.

From the days when first she rode abroad
With Scottish maids in her train, 60
I Catherine Douglas won the trust
Of my mistress sweet Queen Jane.

And oft she sighed, "To be born a King!"
And oft along the way
When she saw the homely lovers pass 65
She has said, "Alack the day!"

Years waned — the loving and toiling
years —
Till England's wrong renewed

37 a lady, Joan Beaufort, daughter of the Earl of Somerset. She became the wife of James in 1424. 41 sweeter song, a reference to King James's The King's Quair. In the poem James tells the story of his love for Lady Joan Beaufort, including this episode of the nightingale. 45 teen, sorrow, grief. 48 Scone, a city in Perthshire, Scotland, the traditional place of Scottish coronations. James and Joan were crowned on May 21, 1424. 68 ff England's wrong renewed, depredations by the English on the Scottish border. The English also attempted to capture James's daughter while she was on her way to France. These actions led James to attack Roxburgh Castle (on the River Tweed, near the English Border) in October, 1436, but he withdrew his forces after a fifteen-day siege.

Drove James, by outrage cast on his crown,
To the open field of feud. 70

'Twas when the King and his host were met
At the leaguer of Roxbro' hold,
The Queen o' the sudden sought his camp
With a tale of dread to be told.

And she showed him a secret letter writ 75
That spoke of treasonous strife,
And how a band of his noblest lords
Were sworn to take his life.

"And it may be here or it may be there,
In the camp or the court," she said; 80
"But for my sake come to your people's arms
And guard your royal head."

Quoth he, "'Tis the fifteenth day of the siege,
And the castle's nigh to yield."
Oh, face your foes on your throne," she cried,
"And show the power you wield; 86
And under your Scottish people's love
You shall sit as under your shield."

At the fair Queen's side I stood that day
When he bade them raise the siege, 90
And back to his Court he sped to know
How the lords would meet their Liege.

But when he summoned his Parliament,
The louring brows hung round,
Like clouds that circle the mountain-head
Ere the first low thunders sound. 96

For he had tamed the nobles' lust
And curbed their power and pride,
And reached out an arm to right the poor
Through Scotland far and wide, 100
And many a lordly wrongdoer
By the headsman's ax had died.

'Twas then upspeak Sir Robert Græme,
The bold o'ermastering man,
"O King, in the name of your Three Estates
I set you under their ban! 106

"For, as your lords made oath to you
Of service and fealty,
Even in likewise you pledged your oath
Their faithful sire to be; 110

"Yet all we here that are nobly sprung
Have mourned dear kith and kin
Since first for the Scottish Barons' curse
Did your bloody rule begin."

72 leaguer . . . hold, the siege of Roxburgh Castle (in 1436). 105 Three Estates, the nobility, the clergy, and the common people.

With that he laid his hands on his King — 115
 "Is this not so, my lords?"
 But of all who had sworn to league with him
 Not one spake back to his words.

Quoth the King. "Thou speak'st but for one Estate,
 Nor doth it avow thy gage. 120
 Let my liege lords hale this traitor hence!"
 The Græme fired dark with rage,
 "Who works for lesser men than himself,
 He earns but a witless wage!"

But soon from the dungeon where he lay 125
 He won by privy plots,
 And forth he fled with a price on his head
 To the country of the Wild Scots.

And word there came from Sir Robert Græme
 To the King at Edinbro': 130
 "No Liege of mine thou art, but I see
 From this day forth alone in thee
 God's creature, my mortal foe.

"Through thee are my wife and children lost,
 My heritage and lands; 135
 And when my God shall show me a way,
 Thyself my mortal foe will I slay
 With these my proper hands"

Against the coming of Christmastide
 That year the King bade call 140
 I' the Black Friars' Charterhouse of Perth
 A solemn festival.

And we of his household rode with him
 In a close-ranked company;
 But not till the sun had sunk from his throne
 Did we reach the Scottish Sea. 146

That eve was clenched for a boding storm,
 'Neath a toilsome moon half seen,
 The cloud stooped low and the surf rose high;
 And where there was a line of the sky, 150
 Wild wings loomed dark between.

And on a rock of the black beach-side
 By the veiled moon dimly lit,
 There was something seemed to heave with
 life
 As the King drew nigh to it 155

And was it only the tossing furze
 Or brake of the waste sea-wold?

Or was it an eagle bent to the blast?
 When near we came, we knew it at last
 For a woman tattered and old. 160

But it seemed as though by a fire within
 Her writhen limbs were wrung,
 And as soon as the King was close to her,
 She stood up gaunt and strong.

'Twas then the moon sailed clear of the rack
 On high in her hollow dome; 166
 And still as aloft with hoary crest
 Each clamorous wave rang home,
 Like fire in snow the moonlight blazed
 Amid the champing foam. 170

And the woman held his eyes with her eyes
 "O King, thou art come at last;
 But thy wraith has haunted the Scottish Sea
 To my sight for four years past.

"Four years it is since first I met, 175
 'Twixt the Duchray and the Dhu,
 A shape whose feet clung close in a shroud,
 And that shape for thine I knew.

"A year again, and on Inchkeith Isle
 I saw thee pass in the breeze, 180
 With the cerecloth risen above thy feet
 And wound about thy knees.

While the woman spoke, the King's horse reared
As if it would breast the sea,
And the Queen turned pale as she heard on the gale
The voice die dolorously

When the woman ceased, the steed was still,
But the King gazed on her yet, 206
And in silence save for the wail of the sea
His eyes and her eyes met

At last he said, "God's ways are His own,
Man is but shadow and dust 210

Tonight I wend to the Feast of His Son,
And in Him I set my trust.

The woman stood as the train rode past,
And moved nor limb nor eye, 230
And when we were shipped, we saw her there
Still standing against the sky.

As the ship made way, the moon once more
Sank slow in her rising pall;
And I thought of the shrouded wraith of the King, 235
And I said, "The Heavens know all."

And now, ye lasses, must ye hear
How my name is Kate Barlass —
But a little thing, when all the tale
Is told of the weary mass 240
Of crime and woe which in Scotland's realm
God's will let come to pass.

'Twas in the Charterhouse of Perth
That the King and all his Court
Were met, the Christmas Feast being done,
For solace and disport. 246

217 hind, peasant

'Twas a wind-wild eve in February,
And against the casement-pane
The branches smote like summoning hands
And muttered the driving rain. 250

And when the wind swooped over the lift
And made the whole heaven frown,
It seemed a grip was laid on the walls
To tug the housetop down.

And the Queen was there, more stately fair 255
Than a lily in garden set;
And the King was loath to stir from her side,
For as on the day when she was his bride,
Even so he loved her yet.

And the Earl of Athole, the King's false friend, 260
Sat with him at the board;
And Robert Stuart the chamberlain
Who had sold his sovereign Lord.

Yet the traitor Christopher Chaumber there
Would fain have told him all, 265
And vainly four times that night he strove
To reach the King through the hall.

But the wine is bright at the goblet's brim
Though the poison lurk beneath;
And the apples still are red on the tree 270
Within whose shade may the adder be
That shall turn thy life to death

There was a knight of the King's fast friends
Whom he called the King of Love;
And to such bright cheer and courtesy 275
That name might best behave

And the King and Queen both loved him well
For his gentle knightliness;
And with him the King, as that eve wore on,
Was playing at the chess 280

And the King said (for he thought to jest
And soothe the Queen thereby),
"In a book 'tis writ that this same year
A King shall in Scotland die.

"And I have pondered the matter o'er, 285
And this have I found, Sir Hugh —
There are but two kings on Scottish ground,
And those kings are I and you

"And I have a wife and a newborn heir,
And you are yourself alone; 290
So stand you stark at my side with me
To guard our double throne

"For here sit I and my wife and child,
As well your heart shall approve,

251 lift, sky, air

In full surrender and soothfastness,
Beneath your Kingdom of Love” 295

And the Knight laughed, and the Queen too smiled;

But I knew her heavy thought,
And I strove to find in the good King’s jest
What cheer might thence be wrought. 300

And I said, “My Liege, for the Queen’s dear
love

Now sing the song that of old
You made, when a captive Prince you lay,
And the nightingale sang sweet on the spray,
In Windsor’s castle-hold” 305

Then he smiled the smile I knew so well
When he thought to please the Queen;
The smile which under all bitter frowns
Of hate that rose between,
Forever dwelt at the poet’s heart 310
Like the bird of love unseen.

And he kissed her hand and took his harp,
And the music sweetly rang;
And when the song burst forth, it seemed
’Twas the nightingale that sang. 315

“*Worship, ye lovers, on this May;
Of bliss your kalends are begun.
Sing with us, Away, Winter, away!
Come, Summer, the sweet season and sun!
Awake for shame — your heaven is won —
And amorously your heads lift all;* 321
Thank Love, that you to his grace doth call!”

But when he bent to the Queen, and sang
The speech whose praise was hers,
It seemed his voice was the voice of the spring
And the voice of the bygone years. 326

“*The fairest and the freshest flower
That ever I saw before that hour,
The which o’ the sudden made to start
The blood of my body to my heart.* 330

*Ah sweet, are ye a worldly creature
Or heavenly thing in form of nature?”*

And the song was long, and richly stored
With wonder and beauteous things;
And the harp was tuned to every change 335
Of minstrel ministrings;
But when he spoke of the Queen at the last,
Its strings were his own heart-strings.

305 Windsor During the period of his imprisonment, James was kept for a time in Windsor Castle. 316 Worship, ye lovers, etc The lines printed in italics are adapted from King James’s The King’s Quair (see Critical Notes) 317
kalends, the first day of the ancient Roman month

“*Unworthy but only of her grace,
Upon Love’s rock that’s easy and sure,* 340
*In guerdon of all my love’s space
She took me her humble creature.
Thus fell my blissful adventure
In youth of love that from day to day
Flowereth aye new, and further I say.* 345

“*To reckon all the circumstance
As happed when lessen gan my sore,
Of my rancor and woeful chance,
It were too long — I have done therefor.
And of this flower I say no more* 350
*But unto my help her heart hath tended
And even from death her man defended.”*

“Aye, even from death,” to myself I said,
For I thought of the day when she Had borne him the news, at Roxbro’ siege,
Of the fell confederacy. 366

But Death even then took aim as he sang
With an arrow deadly bright;
And the grinning skull lurked grimly aloof,
And the wings were spread far over the roof
More dark than the winter night. 361

Yet truly along the amorous song
Of Love’s high pomp and state,
There were words of Fortune’s trackless doom
And the dreadful face of Fate 365

And oft have I heard again in dreams
The voice of dire appeal
In which the King then sang of the pit
That is under Fortune’s wheel

“And under the wheel beheld I there 370
*An ugly Pit as deep as hell,
That to behold I quaked for fear.
And this I heard, that who therein fell
Came no more up, tidings to tell;
Whereat, astound of the fearful sight,
I wist not what to do for fright.”* 375

And oft has my thought called up again
These words of the changeful song:
“*Wist thou thy pain and thy travail
To come, well might’st thou weep and wail!”*
And our wail, O God! is long 381

But the song’s end was all of his love,
And well his heart was graced
With her smiling lips and her tear-bright eyes
As his arm went round her waist 385

And on the swell of her long fair throat
Close clung the necklet-chain
As he bent her pearl-tired head aside,

343 adventure, fortune, adventure 388 pearl-tired, attired in pearls

And in the warmth of his love and pride
He kissed her lips full fain. 390

And her true face was a rosy red,
The very red of the rose
That, couched on the happy garden-bed,
In the summer sunlight glows.

And all the wondrous things of love 395
That sang so sweet through the song
Were in the look that met in their eyes,
And the look was deep and long.

'Twas then a knock came at the outer gate,
And the usher sought the King 400
"The woman you met by the Scottish Sea,
My Liege, would tell you a thing;
And she says that her present need for speech
Will bear no gainsaying "

And the King said: "The hour is late, 405
Tomorrow will serve, I ween "
Then he charged the usher strictly, and said:
"No word of this to the Queen "

But the usher came again to the King.
"Shall I call her back?" quoth he, 410
"For as she went on her way, she cried, 'Woe! Woe! then the thing must be!'"

And the King paused, but he did not speak.
Then he called for the Voidee-cup;
And as we heard the twelfth hour strike, 415
There by true lips and false lips alike
Was the draft of trust drained up.

So with reverence meet to King and Queen,
To bed went all from the board,
And the last to leave of the courtly train 420
Was Robert Stuart the chamberlain
Who had sold his sovereign lord.

And all the locks of the chamber door
Had the traitor riven and brast,
And that Fate might win sure way from afar
He had drawn out every bolt and bar 426
That made the entrance fast.

And now at midnight he stole his way
To the moat of the outer wall,
And laid strong hurdles closely across 430
Where the traitors' tread should fall

But we that were the Queen's bower-maids
Alone were left behind;
And with heed we drew the curtains close
Against the winter wind. 435

414 Voidee-cup, a spiced wine served late in the evening before bedtime 424 riven and brast, torn and broken 430 hurdles, narrow boards.

And now that all was still through the hall,
More clearly we heard the rain
That clamored ever against the glass
And the boughs that beat on the pane.

But the fire was bright in the ingle-nook, 440
And through empty space around
The shadows cast on the arras wall
'Mid the pictured kings stood sudden and tall
Like specters sprung from the ground.

And the bed was dight in a deep alcove, 445
And as he stood by the fire
The King was still in talk with the Queen
While he doffed his goodly attire

And the song had brought the image back
Of many a bygone year; 450
And many a loving word they said
With hand in hand and head laid to head;
And none of us went anear.

But Love was weeping outside the house,
A child in the piteous rain, 455
And as he watched the arrow of Death,
He waited for his own shafts close in the sheath
That never should fly again.

And now beneath the window arose
A wild voice suddenly, 460
And the King reared straight, but the Queen fell back
As for bitter dule to dree;
And all of us knew the woman's voice
Who spoke by the Scottish Sea

"O King," she cried, "in an evil hour 465
They drove me from thy gate,
And yet my voice must rise to thine ears,
But alas! it comes too late!

"Last night at mid-watch, by Aberdour,
When the moon was dead in the skies, 470
O King, in a death-light of thine own
I saw thy shape arise

"And in full season, as erst I said,
The doom had gained its growth;
And the shroud had risen above thy neck 475
And covered thine eyes and mouth

"And no moon woke, but the pale dawn broke,
And still thy soul stood there,
And I thought its silence cried to my soul
As the first rays crowned its hair 480

445 dight, prepared 462 dule to dree, sorrow to suffer 469. Aberdour, a town on the north shore of the Firth of Forth, across from Edinburgh.

"Since then have I journeyed fast and fain
In very despite of Fate,
Lest Hope might still be found in God's will,
But they drove me from thy gate

"For every man on God's ground, O King, 485
His death grows up from his birth
In a shadow-plant perpetually,
And thine towers high, a black yew-tree,
O'er the Charterhouse of Perth!"

That room was built far out from the house,
And none but we in the room 491
Might hear the voice that rose beneath,
Nor the tread of the coming doom.

For now there came a torchlight-glare,
And a clang of arms there came, 495
And not a soul in that space but thought
Of the foe Sir Robert Græme.

Yea, from the country of the Wild Scots,
O'er mountain, valley, and glen,
He had brought with him in murderous league 500
Three hundred arméd men.

The King knew all in an instant's flash,
And like a King did he stand,
But there was no armor in all the room,
Nor weapon lay to his hand. 505

And all we women flew to the door
And thought to have made it fast,
But the bolts were gone and the bars were gone
And the locks were riven and brast.

And he caught the pale pale Queen in his arms 510
As the iron footsteps fell —
Then loosed her, standing alone, and said,
"Our bliss was our farewell!"

And 'twixt his lips he murmured a prayer,
And he crossed his brow and breast, 515
And proudly in royal hardhood
Even so with folded arms he stood —
The prize of the bloody quest

Then on me leaped the Queen like a deer —
"O Catherine, help!" she cried 520
And low at his feet we clasped his knees
Together side by side.
"Oh! even a king, for his people's sake,
From treasonous death must hide!"

"For her sake most!" I cried, and I marked
The pang that my words could wring 526
And the iron tongs from the chimney-nook

I snatched and held to the King —
"Wrench up the plank! and the vault beneath Shall yield safe harboring " 530

With brows low-bent, from my eager hand
The heavy heft did he take;
And the plank at his feet he wrenched and tore;
And as he frowned through the open floor,
Again I said, "For her sake!" 535

Then he cried to the Queen, "God's will be
done!"
For her hands were clasped in prayer.
And down he sprang to the inner crypt;
And straight we closed the plank he had ripped
And toiled to smoothe it fair. 540

(Alas! in that vault a gap once was Wherethrough the King might have fled,
But three days since close-walled had it been
By his will; for the ball would roll therein
When without at the palm he played.) 545

Then the Queen cried, "Catherine, keep the
door,
And I to this will suffice!"
At her word I rose all dazed to my feet,
And my heart was fire and ice

And louder ever the voices grew, 550
And the tramp of men in mail,
Until to my brain it seemed to be
As though I tossed on a ship at sea
In the teeth of a crashing gale.

Then back I flew to the rest, and hard 555
We strove with sinews knit
To force the table against the door,
But we might not compass it

Then my wild gaze sped far down the hall
To the place of the hearthstone-sill, 560
And the Queen bent ever above the floor,
For the plank was rising still

And now the rush was heard on the stair,
And "God, what help?" was our cry.
And was I frenzied or was I bold? 565
I looked at each empty stanchion-hold,
And no bar but my arm had I!

Like iron felt my arm, as through
The staple I made it pass —
Alack! it was flesh and bone — no more! 570
'Twas Catherine Douglas sprang to the door,
But I fell back Kate Barlass.

532 heft, handle 545 at the palm See note on line 164, page 508 566 stanchion-hold, a large staple or socket for securing the bar that fastened the door

With that they all thronged into the hall,
 Half dim to my failing ken;
 And the space that was but a void before 575
 Was a crowd of wrathful men.

Behind the door I had fall'n and lay,
 Yet my sense was wildly aware,
 And for all the pain of my shattered arm
 I never fainted there 580

Even as I fell, my eyes were cast
 Where the King leaped down to the pit,
 And lo! the plank was smooth in its place,
 And the Queen stood far from it.

And under the litters and through the bed
 And within the presses all 586
 The traitors sought for the King, and pierced
 The arras around the wall.

And through the chamber they ramped and stormed
 Like lions loose in the lair, 590
 And scarce could trust to their very eyes —
 For behold! no King was there.

Then one of them seized the Queen, and cried,
 "Now tell us, where is thy lord?"
 And he held the sharp point over her heart.
 She drooped not her eyes nor did she start, 596
 But she answered never a word.

Then the sword half pierced the true true
 breast,
 But it was the Græme's own son
 Cried, "This is a woman — we seek a man!"
 And away from her girdle-zone 601
 He struck the point of the murderous steel;
 And that foul deed was not done.

And forth flowed all the throng like a sea,
 And 'twas empty space once more, 605
 And my eyes sought out the wounded Queen
 As I lay behind the door.

And I said, "Dear Lady, leave me here,
 For I cannot help you now;
 But fly while you may, and none shall reck
 Of my place here lying low " 611

And she said, "My Catherine, God help thee!"
 Then she looked to the distant floor,
 And clasping her hands, "O God help him,"
 She sobbed, "for we can no more" 615

But God He knows what help may mean,
 If it mean to live or to die,
 And what sore sorrow and mighty moan
 On earth it may cost ere yet a throne
 Be filled in His house on high. 620

And now the ladies fled with the Queen,
 And through the open door
 The night-wind wailed round the empty room
 And the rushes shook on the floor.

And the bed drooped low in the dark recess
 Whence the arras was rent away, 626
 And the firelight still shone over the space
 Where our hidden secret lay.

And the rain had ceased, and the moonbeams lit
 The window high in the wall — 630
 Bright beams that on the plank that I knew
 Through the painted pane did fall
 And gleamed with the splendor of Scotland's crown
 And shield armorial

But then a great wind swept up the skies, 635
 And the climbing moon fell back,
 And the royal blazon fled from the floor,
 And naught remained on its track,
 And high in the darkened window-pane
 The shield and the crown were black. 640

And what I say next I partly saw
 And partly I heard in sooth,
 And partly since from the murderers' lips
 The torture wrung the truth

For now again came the armed tread, 645
 And fast through the hall it fell;
 But the throng was less — and ere I saw,
 By the voice without I could tell
 That Robert Stuart had come with them
 Who knew that chamber well 650

And over the space the Græme strode dark
 With his mantle round him flung,
 And in his eye was a flaming light
 But not a word on his tongue.

And Stuart held a torch to the floor, 655
 And he found the thing he sought,
 And they slashed the plank away with their swords,
 And O God! I fainted not!

And the traitor held his torch in the gap,
 All smoking and smoldering, 660
 And through the vapor and fire, beneath
 In the dark crypt's narrow ring,
 With a shout that pealed to the room's high roof
 They saw their naked King

Half naked he stood, but stood as one 665
 Who yet could do and dare,

664 naked, unarmed

With the crown, the King was stript away —
The Knight was reft of his battle-array —
But still the Man was there.

From the rout then stepped a villain forth —
Sir John Hall was his name; 671
With a knife unsheathed he leapt to the vault
Beneath the torchlight-flame.

Of his person and stature was the King
A man right manly strong, 675
And mightily by the shoulder-blades
His foe to his feet he flung.

Then the traitor's brother, Sir Thomas Hall,
Sprang down to work his worst;
And the King caught the second man by the neck 680
And flung him above the first.

And he smote and trampled them under him,
And a long month thence they bare All black their throats with the grip of his hands
When the hangman's hand came there. 685

And sore he strove to have had their knives,
But the sharp blades gashed his hands.
Oh, James! so armed, thou hadst battled
there
Till help had come of thy bands;
And oh! once more thou hadst held our throne 690
And ruled thy Scottish lands!

But while the King o'er his foes still raged
With a heart that naught could tame,
Another man sprang down to the crypt,
And with his sword in his hand hard-gripped
There stood Sir Robert Græme. 696

(Now shame on the recreant traitor's heart
Who durst not face his King
Till the body unarmed was wearied out
With twofold combating! 700

Ah! well might the people sing and say,
As oft ye have heard aright —
"O Robert Græme, O Robert Græme,
Who slew our King, God gave thee shame!"
For he slew him not as a knight.) 705

And the naked King turned round at bay,
But his strength had passed the goal,
And he could but gasp, "Mine hour is come;
But oh! to succor thine own soul's doom,
Let a priest now shrive my soul!" 710

And the traitor looked on the King's spent strength
And said, "Have I kept my word? —

Yea, King, the mortal pledge that I gave?
No black friar's shrift thy soul shall save,
But the shrift of this red sword!" 715

With that he smote his King through the
breast;
And all they three in the pen
Fell on him and stabbed and stabbed him
there
Like merciless murderous men.

Yet seemed it now that Sir Robert Græme,
Ere the King's last breath was o'er, 721
Turned sick at heart with the deadly sight
And would have done no more.

But a cry came from the troop above:
"If him thou do not slay, 725
The price of his life that thou dost spare
Thy forfeit life shall pay!"

O God! what more did I hear or see,
Or how should I tell the rest?
But there at length our King lay slain 730
With sixteen wounds in his breast.

O God! and now did a bell boom forth,
And the murderers turned and fled, —
Too late, too late, O God, did it sound! —
And I heard the true men mustering round,
And the cries and the coming tread 736

But ere they came, to the black death-gap
Somewise did I creep and steal;
And lo! or ever I swooned away,
Through the dusk I saw where the white face
lay 740
In the Pit of Fortune's Wheel.

And now, ye Scottish maids who have heard
Dread things of the days grown old —
Even at the last, of true Queen Jane
May somewhat yet be told, 745
And how she dealt for her dear lord's sake
Dire vengeance manifold.

'Twas in the Charterhouse of Perth,
In the fair-lit Death-chapelle,
That the slain King's corpse on bier was laid
With chaunt and requiem-knell 751

And all with royal wealth of balm
Was the body purified;
And none could trace on the brow and lips
The death that he had died. 755

In his robes of state he lay asleep
With orb and scepter in hand,

751 requiem-knell, the bell sounded at requiem-mass for the dead 757 orb, a small globe and cross mounted on the scepter, a part of the royal regalia.

And by the crown he wore on his throne
Was his kingly forehead spanned.

And, girls, 'twas a sweet sad thing to see 760
How the curling golden hair,
As in the day of the poet's youth,
From the King's crown clustered there.

And if all had come to pass in the brain 765
That throbbed beneath those curls,
Then Scots had said in the days to come
That thus their soil was a different home
And a different Scotland, girls!

And the Queen sat by him night and day,
And oft she knelt in prayer, 770
All wan and pale in the widow's veil
That shrouded her shining hair.

And I had got good help of my hurt.
And only to me some sign
She made; and save the priests that were 775
there
No face would she see but mine.

And the month of March wore on apace;
And now fresh couriers fared
Still from the country of the Wild Scots
With news of the traitors snared 780

And still as I told her day by day,
Her pallor changed to sight,
And the frost grew to a furnace-flame
That burnt her visage white.

And evermore as I brought her word, 785
She bent to her dead King James,
And in the cold ear with fire-drawn breath
She spoke the traitors' names.

But when the name of Sir Robert Græme
Was the one she had to give, 790
I ran to hold her up from the floor;
For the froth was on her lips, and sore
I feared that she could not live

And the month of March wore nigh to its end,
And still was the death-pall spread; 795
For she would not bury her slaughtered lord
Till his slayers all were dead.

And now of their dooms dread tidings came,
And of torments fierce and dire;
And naught she spake — she had ceased to 800
speak —
But her eyes were a soul on fire.

But when I told her the bitter end
Of the stern and just award,
She leaned o'er the bier, and thrice three times
She kissed the lips of her lord. 805

And then she said, "My King, they are dead!"
And she knelt on the chapel-floor,
And whispered low with a strange proud smile —
"James, James, they suffered more!"

Last she stood up to her queenly height, 810
But she shook like an autumn leaf,
As though the fire wherein she burned
Then left her body, and all were turned
To winter of life-long grief.

And "O James!" she said — "My James!"
she said — 815
"Alas for the woeful thing,
That a poet true and a friend of man,
In desperate days of bale and ban,
Should needs be born a King!"

CHRISTINA ROSSETTI (1830-1894)

SONG

When I am dead, my dearest,
Sing no sad songs for me;
Plant thou no roses at my head,
Nor shady cypress tree.
Be the green grass above me 5
With showers and dewdrops wet,
And if thou wilt, remember,
And if thou wilt, forget.

I shall not see the shadows,
I shall not feel the rain, 10
I shall not hear the nightingale
Sing on as if in pain
And dreaming through the twilight
That doth not rise nor set,
Haply I may remember, 15
And haply may forget. (1848; 1862)

DREAM LAND

Where sunless rivers weep
Their waves into the deep,
She sleeps a charmed sleep;
Awake her not.
Led by a single star, 5
She came from very far
To seek where shadows are
Her pleasant lot.

She left the rosy morn,
She left the fields of corn, 10

818 bale and ban, evil and enmity
Song 4 cypress tree The cypress is a symbol of mourning, it is a common tree in graveyards
Dream Land 10 corn, wheat

For twilight cold and lorn
 And water springs
 Through sleep, as through a veil,
 She sees the sky look pale,
 And hears the nightingale 15
 That sadly sings

Rest, rest, a perfect rest
 Shed over brow and breast,
 Her face is toward the west,
 The purple land 20
 She cannot see the grain
 Ripening on hill and plain,
 She cannot feel the rain
 Upon her hand

Rest, rest, for evermore 25
 Upon a mossy shore,
 Rest, rest at the heart's core
 Till time shall cease
 Sleep that no pain shall wake,
 Night that no morn shall break, 30
 Till joy shall overtake
 Her perfect peace (1849; 1850)

AFTER DEATH

The curtains were half drawn; the floor was swept

And strewn with rushes; rosemary and may Lay thick upon the bed on which I lay,
 Where, through the lattice, ivy-shadows crept
 He leaned above me, thinking that I slept 5
 And could not hear him; but I heard him
 say,

"Poor child, poor child"; and as he turned
 away

Came a deep silence, and I knew he wept.
 He did not touch the shroud, or raise the fold
 That hid my face, or take my hand in his, 10
 Or ruffle the smooth pillows for my head.
 He did not love me living; but once dead
 He pitied me; and very sweet it is
 To know he still is warm though I am cold.
 (1849, 1862)

REMEMBER

Remember me when I am gone away,
 Gone far away into the silent land,
 When you can no more hold me by the hand,
 Nor I half turn to go yet turning stay
 Remember me when no more day by day 5
 You tell me of our future that you planned
 Only remember me; you understand
 It will be late to counsel then or pray
 Yet if you should forget me for a while
 And afterwards remember, do not grieve; 10

After Death 2 rosemary, a fragrant shrub, the emblem of fidelity may, hawthorn

For if the darkness and corruption leave
 A vestige of the thoughts that once I had,
 Better by far you should forget and smile
 Than that you should remember and be sad

THE THREE ENEMIES

THE FLESH

"Sweet, thou art pale "
 "More pale to see,
 Christ hung upon the cruel tree
 And bore His Father's wrath for me "

"Sweet, thou art sad "
 "Beneath a rod
 More heavy, Christ for my sake trod 5
 The winepress of the wrath of God."

"Sweet, thou art weary "
 "Not so Christ,
 Whose mighty love of me sufficed
 For Strength, Salvation, Eucharist "

"Sweet, thou art footsore "
 "If I bleed, 10
 His feet have bled, yea, in my need
 His Heart once bled for mine indeed "

"Sweet, thou art young "
 "So He was young
 Who for my sake in silence hung
 Upon the Cross with Passion wrung " 15

"Look, thou art fair."
 "He was more fair
 Than men, Who deigned for me to wear
 A visage marred beyond compare."

"And thou hast riches."
 "Daily bread,
 All else is His — Who, living, dead, 20
 For me lacked where to lay His Head "

"And life is sweet."
 "It was not so
 To Him, Whose Cup did overflow
 With mine unutterable woe."

THE DEVIL

"Thou drinkest deep "
 "When Christ would sup 25
 He drained the dregs from out my cup;
 So how should I be lifted up?"

30

"Thou shalt have Knowledge "

In thee, O Lord, I put my trust, Answer Thou for me, Wise and Just."

"And Might " —

"Get thee behind me. Lord,
Who hast redeemed and not abhorred
My soul, oh, keep it by Thy Word."

PARADISE

Once in a dream I saw the flowers
That bud and bloom in Paradise;
More fair they are than waking eyes
Have seen in all this world of ours.
And faint the perfume-bearing rose,
And faint the lily on its stem,
And faint the perfect violet,
Compared with them

5

I heard the songs of Paradise:
Each bird sat singing in his place;
A tender song so full of grace
It soared like incense to the skies.
Each bird sat singing to his mate
Soft cooing notes among the trees;
The nightingale herself were cold
To such as these.

10

I saw the fourfold River flow,
And deep it was, with golden sand;
It flowed between a mossy land
With murmured music grave and low.
It hath refreshment for all thirst,
For fainting spirits strength and rest;
Earth holds not such a draft as this
From east to west.

20

The Tree of Life stood budding there,
Abundant with its twelvefold fruits,
Eternal sap sustains its roots,
Its shadowing branches fill the air.
Its leaves are healing for the world,
Its fruit the hungry world can feed,

Paradise This poem is based upon John's vision of the New Jerusalem in Revelation, 21-22

17 fourfold River, the river of the water of life (Revelation, 22 1) Cf Genesis, 2 10—"And a river went out of Eden to water the garden, and from thence it was parted, and became into four heads" 25ff Tree of life, etc From Revelation, 22 2—"On either side of the river was there the tree of life, which bare twelve manner of fruits, and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations "

Sweeter than honey to the taste
And balm indeed

I saw the Gate called Beautiful,
And looked, but scarce could look within,
I saw the golden streets begin,
And outskirts of the glassy pool
O harps, O crowns of plenteous stars,
O green palm branches many-leaved —
Eye hath not seen, nor ear hath heard,
Nor heart conceived

40

I hope to see these things again,
But not as once in dreams by night;
To see them with my very sight,
And touch and handle and attain —
To have all heaven beneath my feet
For narrow way that once they trod,
To have my part with all the saints,
And with my God. (1854; 1865)

45

A BETTER RESURRECTION

I have no wit, no words, no tears;
My heart within me like a stone
Is numbed too much for hopes or fears
Look right, look left, I dwell alone,
I lift mine eyes, but dimmed with grief
No everlasting hills I see.
My life is in the falling leaf;
O Jesus, quicken me.

5

My life is like a faded leaf,
My harvest dwindled to a husk;
Truly my life is void and brief
And tedious in the barren dusk;
My life is like a frozen thing,
No bud nor greenness can I see;
Yet rise it shall — the sap of Spring;
O Jesus, rise in me

10

15

My life is like a broken bowl.
A broken bowl that cannot hold
One drop of water for my soul
Or cordial in the searching cold;
Cast in the fire the perished thing;
Melt and remold it, till it be
A royal cup for Him, my King,
O Jesus, drink of me (1857; 1862)

A BIRTHDAY

My heart is like a singing bird
Whose nest is in a watered shoot;
My heart is like an apple-tree

35 golden streets "The street of the city was pure gold, as it were transparent glass" (Revelation, 21 21) 36 glassy pool See note on line 6 of The Convent Threshold, page 537 39-40. Eye . . conceived From 1 Corinthians, 2 9—"Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him "

Whose boughs are bent with thickset fruit,
My heart is like a rainbow shell 5
That paddles in a halcyon sea;
My heart is gladder than all these
Because my love is come to me.

Raise me a dais of silk and down;
Hang it with vair and purple dyes; 10
Carve it in doves and pomegranates,
And peacocks with a hundred eyes;
Work it in gold and silver grapes,
In leaves and silver fleurs-de-lys;
Because the birthday of my life 15
Is come, my love is come to me
(1857; 1861)

AN APPLE GATHERING

I plucked pink blossoms from mine apple-tree
And wore them all that evening in my hair,
Then in due season when I went to see,
I found no apples there.

With dangling basket all along the grass 5
As I had come I went the self-same track,
My neighbors mocked me while they saw me
pass
So empty-handed back.

Lilian and Liliast smiled in trudging by,
Their heaped-up basket teased me like a jeer; 10
Sweet-voiced they sang beneath the sunset
sky —
Their mother's home was near.

Plump Gertrude passed me with her basket full,
A stronger hand than hers helped it along,
A voice talked with her through the shadows
cool 15
More sweet to me than song.

Ah Willie, Willie, was my love less worth Than apples with their green leaves piled above?
I counted rosiest apples on the earth
Of far less worth than love. 20

So once it was with me you stooped to talk,
Laughing and listening in this very lane;
To think that by this way we used to walk
We shall not walk again!

I let my neighbors pass me, ones and twos 25
And groups; the latest said the night grew chill,
And hastened. But I loitered; while the dews
Fell fast I loitered still. (1857; 1862)

ADVENT

This Advent moon shines cold and clear,
These Advent nights are long;
Our lamps have burned year after year,
And still their flame is strong.
"Watchman, what of the night?" we cry, 5
Heart-sick with hope deferred;
"No speaking signs are in the sky,"
Is still the watchman's word.

The Porter watches at the gate,
The servants watch within; 10
The watch is long betimes and late,
The prize is slow to win.
"Watchman, what of the night?" But still
His answer sounds the same:
"No daybreak tops the utmost hill, 15
Nor pale our lamps of flame."

One to another hear them speak
The patient virgins wise:
"Surely He is not far to seek" —
"All night we watch and rise." 20
"The days are evil looking back,
The coming days are dim;
Yet count we not His promise slack,
But watch and wait for Him "

One with another, soul with soul, 25
They kindle fire from fire:
"Friends watch us who have touched the goal "
"They urge us, come up higher "
"With them shall rest our waysore feet,
With them is built our home, 30
With Christ." — "They sweet, but He most
sweet,
Sweeter than honeycomb."

There no more parting, no more pain,
The distant ones brought near,
The lost so long are found again, 35
Long lost but longer dear;
Eye hath not seen, ear hath not heard,
Nor heart conceived that rest,
With them our good things long deferred,
With Jesus Christ our Best 40

We weep because the night is long,
We laugh for day shall rise,
We sing a slow contented song
And knock at Paradise
Weeping we hold Him fast Who wept 45
For us, we hold Him fast;

Advent Advent is the period including the four Sundays
preceding Christmas

And will not let Him go except
He bless us first or last.

Weeping we hold Him fast tonight;
We will not let Him go 50
Till daybreak smite our wearied sight
And summer smite the snow.
Then figs shall bud, and dove with dove
Shall coo the livelong day;
Then He shall say, "Arise, My love, 55
My fair one, come away." (1858; 1862)

AT HOME

When I was dead, my spirit turned
To seek the much-frequented house.
I passed the door, and saw my friends
Feasting beneath green orange-boughs;
From hand to hand they pushed the wine, 5
They sucked the pulp of plum and peach,
They sang, they jested, and they laughed,
For each was loved of each

I listened to their honest chat.
Said one: "Tomorrow we shall be 10
Plod plod along the featureless sands,
And coasting miles and miles of sea."
Said one: "Before the turn of tide
We will achieve the eyrie-seat"
Said one: "Tomorrow shall be like 15
Today, but much more sweet."

"Tomorrow," said they, strong with hope,
And dwelt upon the pleasant way.
"Tomorrow," cried they one and all,
While no one spoke of yesterday. 20
Their life stood full at blessed noon;
I, only I, had passed away.
"Tomorrow and today," they cried;
I was of yesterday.

I shivered comfortless, but cast 25
No chill across the tablecloth;
I, all-forgotten, shivered, sad
To stay and yet to part how loath;
I passed from the familiar room,
I who from love had passed away, 30
Like the remembrance of a guest
That tarrieth but a day. (1858; 1862)

UPHILL

Does the road wind uphill all the way?
Yes, to the very end
Will the day's journey take the whole long
day?
From morn to night, my friend.

But is there for the night a resting-place? 5
A roof for when the slow dark hours begin.

May not the darkness hide it from my face?
You cannot miss that inn.

Shall I meet other wayfarers at night?
Those who have gone before. 10
Then must I knock, or call when just in sight?
They will not keep you standing at that
door.

Shall I find comfort, travel-sore and weak?
Of labor you shall find the sum.
Will there be beds for me and all who seek?
Yea, beds for all who come. 16
(1858; 1861)

THE CONVENT THRESHOLD

There's blood between us, love, my love,
There's father's blood, there's brother's blood
And blood's a bar I cannot pass.
I choose the stairs that mount above,
Stair after golden sky-ward stair, 5
To city and to sea of glass.
My lily feet are soiled with mud,
With scarlet mud which tells a tale
Of hope that was, of guilt that was,
Of love that shall not yet avail; 10
Alas, my heart, if I could bare
My heart, this selfsame stain is there.
I seek the sea of glass and fire
To wash the spot, to burn the snare;
Lo, stairs are meant to lift us higher — 15
Mount with me, mount the kindled stair.

Your eyes look earthward, mine look up.
I see the far-off city grand,
Beyond the hills a watered land,
Beyond the gulf a gleaming strand 20
Of mansions where the righteous sup,
Who sleep at ease among their trees,
Or wake to sing a cadenced hymn
With Cherubim and Seraphim.
They bore the Cross, they drained the cup, 25 Racked, roasted, crushed, wrenched limb from limb,
They the offscouring of the world
The heaven of starry heavens unfurled,
The sun before their face is dim.

You looking earthward, what see you? 31
Milk-white, wine-flushed among the vines,
Up and down leaping, to and fro,
Most glad, most full, made strong with wines,
Blooming as peaches pearled with dew,

11-12 knock . door. From Revelation, 3 20 — "Behold,
I stand at the door and knock."
The Convent Threshold 6 sea of glass In one of his visions John saw "a sea of glass mingled with fire" (Reve- lation, 15 2; 4 6). 24 Cherubim and Seraphim, two orders of angels. The first place in the hierarchy was given to the Seraphim, angels of love, the next place was given to the Cherubim, angels of light.

Their golden windy hair afloat, 35
 Love-music warbling in their throat,
 Young men and women come and go.

 You linger, yet the time is short.
 Flee for your life, gird up your strength
 To flee; the shadows stretched at length 40
 Show that day wanes, that night draws nigh;
 Flee to the mountain, tarry not.
 Is this a time for smile and sigh,
 For songs among the secret trees
 Where sudden blue birds nest and sport? 45
 The time is short and yet you stay
 Today, while it is called today,
 Kneel, wrestle, knock, do violence, pray;
 Today is short, tomorrow nigh —
 Why will you die? why will you die? 50

 You sinned with me a pleasant sin,
 Repent with me, for I repent
 Woe's me the lore I must unlearn!
 Woe's me that easy way we went,
 So rugged when I would return! 55
 How long until my sleep begin,
 How long shall stretch these nights and days?
 Surely, clean angels cry, she prays,
 She laves her soul with tedious tears;
 How long must stretch these years and years?

 I turn from you my cheeks and eyes, 61
 My hair which you shall see no more —
 Alas for joy that went before,
 For joy that dies, for love that dies!
 Only my lips still turn to you, 65
 My livid lips that cry "Repent!"
 O weary life, O weary Lent,
 O weary time whose stars are few!
 How should I rest in paradise,
 Or sit on steps of heaven alone? 70
 If saints and angels spoke of love,
 Should I not answer from my throne,
 "Have pity upon me, ye my friends,
 For I have heard the sound thereof?"
 Should I not turn with yearning eyes, 75
 Turn earthwards with a pitiful pang?
 Oh, save me from a pang in heaven!
 By all the gifts we took and gave,
 Repent, repent, and be forgiven.
 This life is long, but yet it ends; 80
 Repent and purge your soul and save —
 No gladder song the morning stars
 Upon their birthday morning sang
 Than angels sing when one repents.

 I tell you what I dreamed last night. 85
 A spirit with transfigured face

 82-83 morning stars . . . sang From Job, 38 7 —
 "When the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy" 84 angels . . . repents. From Luke, 15 7 — "I say unto you, that likewise joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth"

Fire-footed clomb an infinite space.
 I heard his hundred pinions clang,
 Heaven-bells rejoicing rang and rang,
 Heaven-air was thrilled with subtle scents, 90
 Worlds spun upon their rushing cars.
 He mounted, shrieking, "Give me light!"
 Still light was poured on him, more light,
 Angels, archangels he outstripped,
 Exulting in exceeding might, 95
 And trod the skirts of cherubim.
 Still "Give me light," he shrieked; and dipped
 His thirsty face, and drank a sea,
 Athirst with thirst it could not slake
 I saw him, drunk with knowledge, take 100
 From aching brows the aureole crown —
 His locks writhe like a cloven snake —
 He left his throne to grovel down
 And lick the dust of seraphs' feet;
 For what is knowledge duly weighed? 105
 Knowledge is strong, but love is sweet;
 Yea, all the progress he had made
 Was but to learn that all is small
 Save love, for love is all in all.

 I tell you what I dreamed last night. 110
 It was not dark, it was not light,
 Cold dew had drenched my plenteous hair
 Through clay; you came to seek me there,
 And "Do you dream of me?" you said.
 My heart was dust that used to leap 115
 To you; I answered half asleep.
 "My pillow is damp, my sheets are red,
 There's a leaden tester to my bed;
 Find you a warmer playfellow,
 A warmer pillow for your head, 120
 A kinder love to love than mine."
 You wrung your hands, while I, like lead,
 Crushed downwards through the sodden earth,
 You smote your hands but not in mirth,
 And reeled but were not drunk with wine 125

 For all night long I dreamed of you;
 I woke and prayed against my will,
 Then slept to dream of you again
 At length I rose and knelt and prayed
 I cannot write the words I said — 130
 My words were slow, my tears were few,
 But through the dark my silence spoke
 Like thunder. When this morning broke,
 My face was pinched, my hair was gray,
 And frozen blood was on the sill 135
 Where stifling in my struggle I lay.

 If now you saw me you would say:
 "Where is the face I used to love?"
 And I would answer: "Gone before;
 It carries veiled in paradise. 140
 When once the morning star shall rise,
 When earth with shadow flees away

And we stand safe within the door,
Then you shall lift the veil thereof.
Look up, rise up, for far above 145
Our palms are grown, our place is set;
There we shall meet as once we met,
And love with old familiar love." (1858; 1862)

GOBLIN MARKET

Morning and evening
Maids heard the goblins cry,
"Come buy our orchard fruits,
Come buy, come buy:
Apples and quinces, 5
Lemons and oranges,
Plump unpecked cherries,
Melons and raspberries,
Bloom-down-cheeked peaches,
Swart-headed mulberries, 10
Wild free-born cranberries,
Crab-apples, dewberries,
Pineapples, blackberries,
Apricots, strawberries —
All ripe together 15
In summer weather —
Morns that pass by,
Fair eyes that fly;
Come buy, come buy:
Our grapes fresh from the vine, 20
Pomegranates full and fine,
Dates and sharp bullaces,
Rare pears and greengages,
Damsons and bilberries,
Taste them and try;
Currants and gooseberries,
Bright-fire-like barberries,
Figs to fill your mouth,
Citrons from the South, 30
Sweet to tongue and sound to eye;
Come buy, come buy."

Evening by evening
Among the brook-side rushes,
Laura bowed her head to hear,
Lizzie veiled her blushes; 35
Crouching close together
In the cooling weather,
With clasping arms and cautioning lips,
With tingling cheeks and finger tips.
"Lie close," Laura said, 40
Pricking up her golden head.
"We must not look at goblin men,
We must not buy their fruits;
Who knows upon what soil they fed
Their hungry thirsty roots?" 45
"Come buy," call the goblins

Hobbling down the glen.
"Oh," cried Lizzie, "Laura, Laura,
You should not peep at goblin men." 50
Lizzie covered up her eyes,
Covered close lest they should look;
Laura reared her glossy head,
And whispered like the restless brook:
"Look, Lizzie, look, Lizzie,
Down the glen tramp little men. 55
One hauls a basket,
One bears a plate,
One lugs a golden dish
Of many pounds' weight.
How fair the vine must grow 60
Whose grapes are so luscious!
How warm the wind must blow
Through those fruit bushes!"
"No," said Lizzie, "No, no, no;
Their offers should not charm us, 65
Their evil gifts would harm us."
She thrust a dimpled finger
In each ear, shut eyes and ran
Curious Laura chose to linger,
Wondering at each merchant man. 70
One had a cat's face,
One whisked a tail,
One tramped at a rat's pace,
One crawled like a snail,
One like a wombat prowled obtuse and furry, 75
One like a ratel tumbled hurry-scurry
She heard a voice like voice of doves
Cooing all together,
They sounded kind and full of loves
In the pleasant weather 80
25
Laura stretched her gleaming neck
Like a rush-imbedded swan,
Like a lily from the beck,
Like a moonlit poplar branch,
Like a vessel at the launch 85
30
When its last restraint is gone
Backward up the mossy glen Turned and trooped the goblin men,
With their shrill repeated cry,
"Come buy, come buy" 90
35
When they reached where Laura was
They stood stock still upon the moss,
Leering at each other,
Brother with queer brother;
Signaling each other, 95 40
Brother with sly brother.
One set his basket down,
One reared his plate;
One began to weave a crown
Of tendrils, leaves, and rough nuts brown 100

(Men sell not such in any town), One heaved the golden weight Of dish and fruit to offer her; "Come buy, come buy" was still their cry. Laura stared but did not stir, 105 Longed but had no money. The whisk-tailed merchant bade her taste In tones as smooth as honey, The cat-faced purred, The rat-paced spoke a word 110 Of welcome, and the snail-paced even was heard; One parrot-voiced and jolly Cried, "Pretty Goblin" still for "Pretty Polly"; One whistled like a bird	Found them no more, but dwindled and grew gray; Then fell with the first snow, While to this day no grass will grow Where she lies low; I planted daisies there a year ago 160 That never blow. You should not loiter so." "Nay, hush," said Laura; "Nay, hush, my sister. I ate and ate my fill, 165 Yet my mouth waters still. Tomorrow night I will Buy more"; and kissed her. "Have done with sorrow; I'll bring you plums tomorrow 170 Fresh on their mother twigs, Cherries worth getting; You cannot think what figs My teeth have met in, What melons icy-cold 175 Piled on a dish of gold Too huge for me to hold, What peaches with a velvet nap, Pellucid grapes without one seed Odorous indeed must be the mead 180 Whereon they grow, and pure the wave they drink With lilies at the brink, And sugar-sweet their sap "
But sweet-tooth Laura spoke in haste: 115 "Good folk, I have no coin; To take were to purloin. I have no copper in my purse, I have no silver either, And all my gold is on the furze 120 That shakes in windy weather Above the rusty heather." "You have much gold upon your head," They answered all together; "Buy from us with a golden curl " 125 She clipped a precious golden lock, She dropped a tear more rare than pearl, Then sucked their fruit globes fair or red Sweeter than honey from the rock, Stronger than man-rejoicing wine, 130 Clearer than water flowed that juice, She never tasted such before, How should it cloy with length of use? She sucked and sucked and sucked the more Fruits which that unknown orchard bore, 135 She sucked until her lips were sore; Then flung the emptied rinds away, But gathered up one kernel stone, And knew not was it night or day As she turned home alone. 140	Golden head by golden head, Like two pigeons in one nest 185 Folded in each other's wings, They lay down in their curtained bed; Like two blossoms on one stem, Like two flakes of new-fall'n snow, Like two wands of ivory 190 Tipped with gold for awful kings. Moon and stars gazed in at them, Wind sang to them lullaby, Lumbering owls forebore to fly, Not a bat flapped to and fro 195 Round their nest; Cheek to cheek and breast to breast Locked together in one nest
Lizzie met her at the gate, Full of wise upbraidings. "Dear, you should not stay so late, Twilight is not good for maidens; Should not loiter in the glen 145 In the haunts of goblin men. Do you not remember Jeanie, How she met them in the moonlight, Took their gifts both choice and many, Ate their fruits and wore their flowers 150 Plucked from bowers Where summer ripens at all hours? But ever in the moonlight She pined and pined away; Sought them by night and day, 155	Early in the morning When the first cock crowed his warning, 200 Neat like bees, as sweet and busy, Laura rose with Lizzie; Fetched in honey, milked the cows, Aired and set to rights the house, Kneaded cakes of whitest wheat, 205 Cakes for dainty mouths to eat, Next churned butter, whipped up cream, Fed their poultry, sat and sewed, Talked as modest maidens should — Lizzie with an open heart, 210

Laura in an absent dream,
 One content, one sick in part,
 One warbling for the mere bright day's delight,
 One longing for the night.

At length slow evening came 215
 They went with pitchers to the reedy brook,
 Lizzie most placid in her look,
 Laura most like a leaping flame
 They drew the gurgling water from its deep.
 Lizzie plucked purple and rich golden flags,
 Then turning homeward said: "The sunset
 flushes 221

Those furthest loftiest crags,
 Come, Laura, not another maiden lags
 No willful squirrel wags;
 The beasts and birds are fast asleep " 225

But Laura loitered still among the rushes,
 And said the bank was steep,
 And said the hour was early still,
 The dew not fall'n, the wind not chill;
 Listening ever, but not catching 230
 The customary cry,
 "Come buy, come buy,"
 With its iterated jingle
 Of sugar-baited words;
 Not for all her watching 235
 Once discerning even one goblin
 Racing, whisking, tumbling, hobbling —
 Let alone the herds
 That used to tramp along the glen,
 In groups or single, 240
 Of brisk fruit-merchant men

Till Lizzie urged, "O Laura, come;
 I hear the fruit-call, but I dare not look
 You should not loiter longer at this brook,
 Come with me home. 245
 The stars rise, the moon bends her arc,
 Each glowworm winks her spark
 Let us get home before the night grows dark,
 For clouds may gather
 Though this is summer weather, 250
 Put out the lights and drench us through;
 Then if we lost our way what should we do?"

Laura turned cold as stone
 To find her sister heard that cry alone,
 That goblin cry, 255
 "Come buy our fruits, come buy "
 Must she then buy no more such dainty fruit?
 Must she no more such succous pasture find,
 Gone deaf and blind?
 Her tree of life drooped from the root; 260
 She said not one word in her heart's sore ache,

258 succous, juicy

But peering through the dimness, naught discerning,
 Trudged home, her pitcher dripping all the
 way;
 So crept to bed, and lay
 Silent till Lizzie slept, 265
 Then sat up in a passionate yearning,
 And gnashed her teeth for balked desire, and wept
 As if her heart would break.

Day after day, night after night,
 Laura kept watch in vain 270
 In sullen silence of exceeding pain.
 She never caught again the goblin cry,
 "Come buy, come buy";
 She never spied the goblin men
 Hawking their fruits along the glen. 275
 But when the noon waxed bright
 Her hair grew thin and gray;
 She dwindled, as the fair full moon doth turn
 To swift decay and burn
 Her fire away. 280

One day, remembering her kernel-stone,
 She set it by a wall that faced the south;
 Dewed it with tears, hoped for a root,
 Watched for a waxing shoot,
 But there came none. 285
 It never saw the sun,
 It never felt the trickling moisture run;
 While with sunk eyes and faded mouth
 She dreamed of melons, as a traveler sees False waves in desert drouth 290
 With shade of leaf-crowned trees,
 And burns the thirstier in the sandful breeze

She no more swept the house,
 Tended the fowls or cows,
 Fetched honey, kneaded cakes of wheat, 295
 Brought water from the brook;
 But sat down listless in the chimney-nook
 And would not eat

Tender Lizzie could not bear
 To watch her sister's cankerous care, 300
 Yet not to share
 She night and morning
 Caught the goblins' cry
 "Come buy our orchard fruits,
 Come buy, come buy " 305
 Beside the brook, along the glen,
 She heard the tramp of goblin men,
 The voice and stir
 Poor Laura could not hear,
 Longed to buy fruit to comfort her, 310
 But feared to pay too dear.
 She thought of Jeane in her grave,
 Who should have been a bride.

But who for joys brides hope to have		They answered, grinning,	370
Fell sick and died	315	"Our feast is but beginning.
In her gay prime,		Night yet is early,
In earliest winter time,		Warm and dew-pearly,
With the first glazing rime,		Wakeful and starry.
With the first snow-fall of crisp winter time.		Such fruits as these	375
		No man can carry;
Till Laura dwindling	320	Half their bloom would fly,
Seemed knocking at Death's door		Half their dew would dry,
Then Lizzie weighed no more		Half their flavor would pass by.
Better and worse;		Sit down and feast with us,	380
But put a silver penny in her purse,		Be welcome guest with us,
Kissed Laura, crossed the heath with clumps		Cheer you and rest with us " —
of furze	325	"Thank you," said Lizzie, "but one waits
At twilight, halted by the brook,		At home alone for me;
And for the first time in her life		So without further parleying,	385
Began to listen and look.		If you will not sell me any
		Of your fruits though much and many,
Laughed every goblin		Give me back my silver penny
When they spied her peeping;	330	I tossed you for a fee " —
Came toward her hobbling,		They began to scratch their pates,	390
Flying, running, leaping,		No longer wagging, purring,
Puffing and blowing,		But visibly demurring,
Chuckling, clapping, crowing,		Grunting and snarling.
Clucking and gobbling,	335	One called her proud,
Mopping and mowing,		Cross-grained, uncivil;	395
Full of airs and graces,		Their tones waxed loud,
Pulling wry faces,		Their looks were evil.
Demure grimaces,		Lashing their tails,
Cat-like and rat-like,	340	They trod and hustled her,
Ratel- and wombat-like,		Elbowed and jostled her,	400
Snail-paced in a hurry,		Clawed with their nails,
Parrot-voiced and whistler,		Barking, mewling, hissing, mocking,
Helter-skelter, hurry-skurry,		Tore her gown and soiled her stocking,
Chattering like magpies,	345	Twitched her hair out by the roots,
Fluttering like pigeons,		Stamped upon her tender feet,	405
Gliding like fishes —		Held her hands and squeezed their fruits
Hugged her and kissed her,		Against her mouth to make her eat.
Squeezed and caressed her,
Stretched up their dishes,	350	White and golden Lizzie stood,
Panniers, and plates:		Like a lily in a flood —
"Look at our apples		Like a rock of blue-veined stone	410
Russet and dun,		Lashed by tides obstreperously —
Bob at our cherries,		Like a beacon left alone
Bite at our peaches,	355	In a hoary, roaring sea,
Citrons and dates,		Sending up a golden fire —
Grapes for the asking,		Like a fruit-crowned orange-tree	415
Pears red with basking		White with blossoms honey-sweet
Out in the sun,		Sore beset by wasp and bee —
Plums on their twigs;	360	Like a royal virgin town
Pluck them and suck them —		Topped with gilded dome and spire
Pomegranates, figs "		Close beleaguered by a fleet	420
		Mad to tug her standard down
"Good folk," said Lizzie,
Mindful of Jeanie,		One may lead a horse to water;
"Give me much and many";	365	Twenty cannot make him drunk.
Held out her apron,		Though the goblins cuffed and caught her,
Tossed them her penny.		Coaxed and fought her,	425
"Nay, take a seat with us,		Bullied and besought her,
Honor and eat with us,"		Scratched her, pinched her black as ink,

Kicked and knocked her,
 Mauled and mocked her,
 Lizzie uttered not a word, 430
 Would not open lip from lip
 Lest they should cram a mouthful in;
 But laughed in heart to feel the drip
 Of juice that siruped all her face,
 And lodged in dimples of her chin, 435
 And streaked her neck which quaked like curd.

At last the evil people,
 Worn out by her resistance,
 Flung back her penny, kicked their fruit
 Along whichever road they took, 440
 Not leaving root or stone or shoot;
 Some writhed into the ground,
 Some dived into the brook
 With ring and ripple,
 Some scudded on the gale without a sound,
 Some vanished in the distance. 446

In a smart, ache, tingle,
 Lizzie went her way;
 Knew not was it night or day;
 Sprang up the bank, tore through the furze,
 Threaded copse and dingle, 451
 And heard her penny jingle
 Bouncing in her purse —
 Its bounce was music to her ear.
 She ran and ran 455
 As if she feared some goblin man
 Dogged her with gibe or curse
 Or something worse;
 But not one goblin skurried after,
 Nor was she pricked by fear; 460
 The kind heart made her windy-paced
 That urged her home quite out of breath with haste
 And inward laughter.

She cried, "Laura," up the garden,
 "Did you miss me?" 465
 Come and kiss me
 Never mind my bruises,
 Hug me, kiss me, suck my juices
 Squeezed from goblin fruits for you,
 Goblin pulp and goblin dew. 470
 Eat me, drink me, love me;
 Laura, make much of me;
 For your sake I have braved the glen
 And had to do with goblin merchant men "

Laura started from her chair, 475
 Flung her arms up in the air,
 Clutched her hair.
 "Lizzie, Lizzie, have you tasted
 For my sake the fruit forbidden?
 Must your light like mine be hidden, 480
 Your young life like mine be wasted,
 Undone in mine undoing,

And ruined in my ruin,
 Thirsty, cankered, goblin-ridden?" —
 She clung about her sister, 485
 Kissed and kissed and kissed her;
 Tears once again
 Refreshed her shrunken eyes,
 Dropping like rain
 After long sultry drouth, 490
 Shaking with aguish fear, and pain,
 She kissed and kissed her with a hungry
 mouth.

Her lips began to scorch,
 That juice was wormwood to her tongue,
 She loathed the feast. 495
 Writhing as one possessed, she leaped and sung,
 Rent all her robe, and wrung
 Her hands in lamentable haste,
 And beat her breast.
 Her locks streamed like the torch 500
 Borne by a racer at full speed,
 Or like the mane of horses in their flight,
 Or like an eagle when she stems the light
 Straight toward the sun,
 Or like a caged thing freed, 505
 Or like a flying flag when armies run

Swift fire spread through her veins, knocked at her heart,
 Met the fire smoldering there
 And overbore its lesser flame,
 She gorged on bitterness without a name —
 Ah, fool, to choose such part 511
 Of soul-consuming care!
 Sense failed in the mortal strife;
 Like the watch-tower of a town
 Which an earthquake shatters down, 515
 Like a lightning-stricken mast,
 Like a wind-uprooted tree
 Spun about,
 Like a foam-topped waterspout
 Cast down headlong in the sea, 520
 She fell at last;
 Pleasure past and anguish past,
 Is it death or is it life?

Life out of death.
 That night long Lizzie watched by her, 525
 Counted her pulse's flagging stir,
 Felt for her breath,
 Held water to her lips, and cooled her face
 With tears and fanning leaves.
 But when the first birds chirped about their eaves, 530
 And early reapers plodded to the place
 Of golden sheaves,
 And dew-wet grass
 Bowed in the morning winds so brisk to pass,
 And new buds with new day 535

Opened of cup-like lilies on the stream,
 Laura awoke as from a dream,
 Laughed in the innocent old way,
 Hugged Lizzie but not twice or thrice;
 Her gleaming locks showed not one thread of
 gray, 540
 Her breath was sweet as May,
 And light danced in her eyes.

Days, weeks, months, years
 Afterwards, when both were wives
 With children of their own, 545
 Their mother-hearts beset with fears,
 Their lives bound up in tender lives;
 Laura would call the little ones
 And tell them of her early prime,
 Those pleasant days long gone 550
 Of not-returning time;
 Would talk about the haunted glen,
 The wicked quaint fruit-merchant men,
 Their fruits like honey to the throat
 But poison in the blood 555
 (Men sell not such in any town),
 Would tell them how her sister stood
 In deadly peril to do her good,
 And win the fiery antidote,
 Then joining hands to little hands 560
 Would bid them cling together —
 "For there is no friend like a sister
 In calm or stormy weather;
 To cheer one on the tedious way,
 To fetch one if one goes astray, 565
 To lift one if one totters down,
 To strengthen whilst one stands"
 (1859; 1862)

AMOR MUNDI

"Oh, where are you going with your lovelocks flowing,
 On the west wind blowing along this valley track?"
 "The downhill path is easy, come with me an
 it please ye,
 We shall escape the uphill by never turning back."
 So they two went together in glowing August weather, 5
 The honey-breathing heather lay to their left and right;
 And dear she was to doat on, her swift feet seemed to float on
 The air like soft twin pigeons too sportive to alight.

"Oh, what is that in heaven where gray cloudflakes are seven,

Amor Mundi The title means Love of the World
 3 an, if

Where blackest clouds hang riven just at the rainy skirt?" 10
 "Oh, that's a meteor sent us, a message
 dumb, portentous,
 An undeciphered solemn signal of help or hurt."

"Oh, what is that glides quickly where velvet
 flowers grow thickly,
 Their scent comes rich and sickly?" "A scaled and hooded worm."
 "Oh, what's that in the hollow, so pale I quake to follow?" 15
 "Oh, that's a thin dead body which waits
 the eternal term"

"Turn again, O my sweetest — turn again,
 false and fleetest;
 This beaten way thou beatest, I fear, is hell's own track."
 "Nay, too steep for hill mounting, nay, too late for cost counting,
 This downhill path is easy, but there's no turning back" (1865, 1865)

From THE PRINCE'S PROGRESS

TOO LATE FOR LOVE

Too late for love, too late for joy,
 Too late, too late!
 You loitered on the road too long,
 You trifled at the gate
 The enchanted dove upon her branch 5
 Died without a mate;
 The enchanted princess in her tower
 Slept, died, behind the grate,
 Her heart was starving all this while
 You made it wait. 10

Ten years ago, five years ago,
 One year ago,
 Even then you had arrived in time,
 Though somewhat slow;
 Then you had known her living face 15
 Which now you cannot know
 The frozen fountain would have leaped,
 The buds gone on to blow,
 The warm south wind would have awaked
 To melt the snow. 20

Is she fair now as she lies?
 Once she was fair;

16 the . term, the day of judgment
The Prince's Progress In the complete poem the Prince, a handsome, lazy fellow, sets out late on his pilgrimage, but he loiters on the way, is decoyed by bad company and idle hopes, and when he reaches his destined bride, he finds her dead. The song given here was the nucleus of the poem
 It was originally entitled The Prince Who Arrived Too Late
 Miss Rossetti expanded the dirge into a long narrative poem at the suggestion of her brother, Dante Gabriel Rossetti
 Cf. Browning's In A Balcony, page 245

Meet queen for any kingly king,
 With gold-dust on her hair.
 Now these are poppies in her locks, 25
 White poppies she must wear,
 Must wear a veil to shroud her face
 And the want graven there,
 Or is the hunger fed at length,
 Cast off the care? 30

We never saw her with a smile
 Or with a frown;
 Her bed seemed never soft to her,
 Though tossed of down;
 She little heeded what she wore, 35
 Kirtle, or wreath, or gown;
 We think her white brows often ached
 Beneath her crown,
 Till silvery hairs showed in her locks
 That used to be so brown. 40

We never heard her speak in haste;
 Her tones were sweet,
 And modulated just so much
 As it was meet;
 Her heart sat silent through the noise 45
 And concourse of the street.
 There was no hurry in her hands,
 No hurry in her feet;
 There was no bliss drew nigh to her,
 That she might run to greet 50

You should have wept her yesterday,
 Wasting upon her bed,
 But wherefore should you weep today
 That she is dead?
 Lo we who love weep not today, 55
 But crown her royal head
 Let be these poppies that we strew,
 Your roses are too red;
 Let be these poppies, not for you 59
 Cut down and spread. (1861; 1866)

"TODAY FOR ME"

She sitteth still who used to dance,
 She weepeth sore and more and more —
 Let us sit with thee weeping sore,
 O fair France.

She trembleth as the days advance 5
 Who used to be so light of heart —
 We in thy trembling bear a part,
 Sister France

Her eyes shine tearful as they glance;
 "Who shall give back my slaughtered sons? 10

"Today For Me" Dante Gabriel Rossetti regarded this poem as the greatest of all his sister's poems. It was written during the agonized suspense of the German-French campaign of 1870-71

"Bind up," she saith, "my wounded ones." —
 Alas, France!

She struggles in a deathly trance,
 As in a dream her pulses stir,
 She hears the nations calling her, 15
 "France, France, France!"

Thou people of the lifted lance,
 Forbear her tears, forbear her blood,
 Roll back, roll back, thy whelming flood,
 Back from France. 20

Eye not her loveliness askance,
 Forge not for her a galling chain;
 Leave her at peace to bloom again,
 Vine-clad France

A time there is for change and chance, 25
 A time for passing of the cup;
 And One abides can yet bind up Broken France.

A time there is for change and chance,
 Who next shall drink the trembling cup, 30
 Wring out its dregs and suck them up
 After France? (1871)

From SING-SONG

"If I were a queen,
 What would I do?
 I'd make you king,
 And I'd wait on you."

"If I were a king, 5
 What would I do?
 I'd make you queen,
 For I'd marry you."

Mother shake the cherry-tree,
 Susan catch a cherry,
 Oh, how funny that will be —
 Let's be merry!

One for brother, one for sister, 5
 Two for mother more,
 Six for father, hot and tired,
 Knocking at the door.

The wind has such a rainy sound
 Moaning through the town,
 The sea has such a windy sound —
 Will the ships go down?

17 people lance, people of Germany
Sing-Song. This is a happy title given by Miss Rossetti to a collection of lyrics, some of which are suggestive of Mother Goose Cf Stevenson's poems beginning on page 802

De Profundis The title means From the Depths

For something never felt but still desired;
 Sunshine and song,
 Song where the choirs of sunny heaven stand choired. 15

SLEEPING AT LAST

Sleeping at last, the trouble and tumult over,
 Sleeping at last, the struggle and horror
 past,
 Cold and white, out of sight of friend and of lover,
 Sleeping at last.

No more a tired heart downcast or overcast, 5
 No more pangs that wring or shifting fears that hover,
 Sleeping at last in a dreamless sleep locked
 fast.
 Fast asleep. Singing birds in their leafy cover Cannot wake her, nor shake her the gusty blast
 Under the purple thyme and the purple clover
 Sleeping at last 11

COVENTRY PATMORE (1823-1896)

From THE ANGEL IN THE HOUSE

THE IMPOSSIBILITY

Lo, Love's obeyed by all. 'Tis right
 That all should know what they obey,
 Lest erring conscience damp delight,
 And folly laugh our joys away.
 Thou Primal Love, who grantest wings 5
 And voices to the woodland birds,
 Grant me the power of saying things
 Too simple and too sweet for words! (1854)

LOVE'S REALITY

I walk, I trust, with open eyes;
 I've traveled half my worldly course;
 And in the way behind me lies
 Much vanity and some remorse;

Sleeping at Last W M Rossetti regarded this poem as the last one written by his sister. He found it after her death.

The Angel in the House In the Prologue to this poem, Patmore introduces Vaughan, a poet who seeks fame largely to please his wife. He therefore decides to write a poem with his wife Honoria and love as the theme, The Angel in the House is the result. The poem is made up of a number of brief episodes, each prefaced by several short preludes.
 The selections given here are all preludes except "The Wedding Sermon," which is a section of The Wedding, one of the narratives. Honoria, the "Angel of the House," is the daughter of the Dean of Salisbury Cathedral.

I've lived to feel how pride may part 5
 Spirits, though matched like hand and glove;
 I've blushed for love's abode, the heart;
 But have not disbelieved in love,
 Nor unto love, sole mortal thing
 Of worth immortal, done the wrong 10
 To count it, with the rest that sing,
 Unworthy of a serious song;
 And love is my reward, for now,
 When most of dead'ning time complain,
 The myrtle blooms upon my brow, 15
 Its odor quickens all my brain. (1854)

LOVE AT LARGE

Whene'er I come where ladies are,
 How sad soever I was before,
 Though like a ship frost-bound and far
 Withheld in ice from the ocean's roar,
 Third-wintered in that dreadful dock, 5
 With stiffened cordage, sails decayed,
 And crew that care for calm and shock
 Alike, too dull to be dismayed,
 Yet, if I come where ladies are,
 How sad soever I was before, 10
 Then is my sadness banished far,
 And I am like that ship no more;
 Or like that ship if the ice-field splits,
 Burst by the sudden polar spring,
 And all thank God with their warming wits,
 And kiss each other and dance and sing, 16
 And hoist fresh sails, that make the breeze
 Blow them along the liquid sea,
 Out of the North, where life did freeze,
 Into the haven where they would be. 20
(1854)

THE LOVER

He meets, by heavenly chance express,
 The destined maid, some hidden hand
 Unveils to him that loveliness
 Which others cannot understand. 5
 His merits in her presence grow,
 To match the promise in her eyes,
 And round her happy footsteps blow
 The authentic airs of paradise.
 For joy of her he cannot sleep;
 Her beauty haunts him all the night, 10
 It melts his heart, it makes him weep
 For wonder, worship, and delight
 Oh, paradox of love, he longs,
 Most humble when he most aspires,
 To suffer scorn and cruel wrongs 15
 From her he honors and desires.
 Her graces make him rich, and ask
 No guerdon; this imperial style
 Affronts him; he disdains to bask,
 The pensioner of her priceless smile 20

Love's Reality 15 myrtle . . brow In ancient times poets were often crowned with myrtle.

He prays for some hard thing to do,
 Some work of fame and labor immense,
 To stretch the languid bulk and thew
 Of love's fresh-born magnipotence.
 No smallest boon were bought too dear, 25
 Though bartered for his love-sick life;
 Yet trusts he, with undoubted cheer,
 To vanquish heaven, and call her wife.
 He notes how queens of sweetness still Neglect their crowns, and stoop to mate; 30
 How, self-consigned with lavish will,
 They ask but love proportionate;
 How swift pursuit by small degrees,
 Love's tactic, works like miracle;
 How valor, clothed in courtesies, 35
 Brings down the haughtiest citadel;
 And therefore, though he merits not
 To kiss the braid upon her skirt,
 His hope, discouraged ne'er a jot, 39
 Out-soars all possible desert. (1854)

THE WEDDING SERMON

"Now, while she's changing," said the Dean,
 "Her bridal for her traveling dress,
 I'll preach allegiance to your queen!
 Preaching's the thing which I profess,
 And one more minute's mine! You know 5
 I've paid my girl a father's debt,
 And this last charge is all I owe.
 She's yours; but I love more than yet
 You can; such fondness only wakes
 When time has raised the heart above 10
 The prejudice of youth, which makes Beauty conditional to love.
 Prepare to meet the weak alarms
 Of novel nearness; recollect
 The eye which magnifies her charms 15
 Is microscopic for defect.
 Fear comes at first; but soon, rejoiced,
 You'll find your strong and tender loves,
 Like holy rocks by Druids poised,
 The least force shakes, but none removes
 Her strength is your esteem; beware 21
 Of finding fault; her will's unnerved
 By blame; from you 'twould be despair,
 But praise that's not quite deserved
 Will all her noble nature move 25
 To make your utmost wishes true
 Yet think, while mending thus your Love,
 Of matching her ideal too!
 The death of nuptial joy is sloth;
 To keep your mistress in your wife, 30
 Keep to the very height your oath,
 And honor her with arduous life.
 Lastly, no personal reverence doff.

24 magnipotence, great power

The Wedding Sermon 19 Druids, members of a religious order among the ancient Celts. Their places of worship were circles of rocks like those at Stonehenge, near Salisbury, England.

Life's all externals unto those
 Who pluck the blushing petals off, 35
 To find the secret of the rose. —
 How long she's tarrying! Green's Hotel
 I'm sure you'll like. The charge is fair,
 The wines good. I remember well
 I stayed once, with her mother, there. 40
 A tender conscience of her vow
 That mother had! She's so like her!"
 But Mrs. Fife, much flurried, now
 Whispered, "Miss Honor's ready, sir" 45
 (1854)

THE MARRIED LOVER

Why, having won her, do I woo?
 Because her spirit's vestal grace
 Provokes me always to pursue,
 But, spirit-like, eludes embrace;
 Because her womanhood is such 5
 That, as on court-days subjects kiss
 The Queen's hand, yet so near a touch
 Affirms no mean familiarity,
 Nay, rather marks more fair the height
 Which can with safety so neglect 10
 To dread, as lower ladies might,
 That grace could meet with disrespect;
 Thus she with happy favor feeds
 Allegiance from a love so high
 That thence no false conceit proceeds 15
 Of difference bridged, or state put by;
 Because, although in act and word
 As lowly as a wife can be,
 Her manners, when they call me lord,
 Remind me 'tis by courtesy; 20
 Not with her least consent of will,
 Which would my proud affection hurt,
 But by the noble style that still Imputes an unattained desert;
 Because her gay and lofty brows, 25
 When all is won which hope can ask,
 Reflect a light of hopeless snows
 That bright in virgin ether bask;
 Because, though free of the outer court
 I am, this Temple keeps its shrine 30
 Sacred to heaven, because, in short,
 She's not and never can be mine. (1854)

PROPHETS WHO CANNOT SING

Ponder, ye Just, the scoffs that frequent go
 From forth the foe:
 "The holders of the Truth in Verity

The Married Lover. 2 vestal, chaste 29-31 though free . . . heaven He thinks of his lover as a temple, like that at Jerusalem with its outer court and a sacred inaccessible inner shrine. The shrine is that part of the wife's personality which the husband cannot approach. Cf. Browning's Two in the Campagna, page 231.

Prophets Who Cannot Sing. This ode and the three that follow are taken from the volume of Odes published in 1868. They were later incorporated in The Unknown Eros (1877).

Are people of a harsh and stammering tongue!
 The hedge-flower hath its song, 5
 Meadow and wandering cloud
 Find Seers who see,
 And, with convincing music clear and loud,
 Startle the adder-deafness of the crowd
 By tones, O Love, from thee 10
 Views of the unveiled heavens alone forth bring
 Prophets who cannot sing,
 Praise that in chiming numbers will not run,
 At least, from David until Dante, none,
 And none since him. 15
 Fish, and not swim?
 They think they somehow should, and so they try,
 But (haply 'tis they screw the pitch too high)
 'Tis still their fates
 To warble tunes that nails might draw from slates. 20
 Poor Seraphim!
 They mean to spoil our sleep, and do, but all their gains
 Are curses for their pains!"

Now who but knows
 That truth to learn from foes 25
 Is wisdom ripe?
 Therefore no longer let us stretch our throats
 Till hoarse as frogs
 With straining after notes
 Which but to touch would burst an organ-pipe. 30
 Far better be dumb dogs.

(1868)

"FAINT YET PURSUING"

Heroic Good, target for which the young Dream in their dreams that every bow is strung,
 And, missing, sigh
 Unfruitful, or as disbelievers die,
 Thee having missed, I will not so revolt, 5
 But lowlier shoot my bolt,
 And lowlier still, if still I may not reach,
 And my proud stomach teach
 That less than highest is good, and may be high.
 An even walk in life's uneven way, 10
 Though to have dreamt of flight and not to fly
 Be strange and sad,
 Is not a boon that's given to all who pray.
 If this I had
 I'd envy none! 15
 Nay, trod I straight for one

Year, month, or week,
 Should Heaven withdraw, and Satan me
 amerce
 Of power and joy, still would I seek Another victory with a like reverse; 20
 Because the god of victory does not die,
 As dies the failure's curse,
 And what we have to gain
 Is, not one battle, but a weary life's campaign.
 Yet meaner lot being sent 25
 Should more than me content;
 Yea, if I lie
 Among vile shards, though born for silver
 wings,
 In the strong flight and feathers gold
 Of whatsoever heavenward mounts and sings 30
 I must by admiration so comply
 That there I should my own delight behold
 Yea, though I sin each day times seven,
 And dare not lift the fearfullest eyes to Heaven,
 Thanks must I give 35
 Because that seven times are not eight or nine,
 And that my darkness is all mine,
 And that I live
 Within this oak-shade one more minute even,
 Hearing the winds their Maker magnify 40

THE TWO DESERTS

Not greatly moved with awe am I
 To learn that we may spy
 Five thousand firmaments beyond our own
 The best that's known
 Of the heavenly bodies does them credit 5
 small.
 Viewed close, the Moon's fair ball
 Is of ill objects worst,
 A corpse in Night's highway, naked, fire-scarred, accurst;
 And now they tell
 That the Sun is plainly seen to boil and burst 10
 Too horribly for hell.
 So, judging from these two,
 As we must do,
 The Universe, outside our living Earth,
 Was all conceived in the Creator's mirth, 15
 Forecasting at the time Man's spirit deep,
 To make dirt cheap.
 Put by the Telescope!
 Better without it man may see,
 Stretched awful in the hushed midnight, 20
 The ghost of his eternity.

18 amerce, punish.

Give me the nobler glass that swells to the eye
 The things which near us lie,
 Till Science rapturously hails,
 In the minutest water-drop, 25
 A torment of innumerable tails.
 These at the least do live.
 But rather give
 A mind not much to pry
 Beyond our royal-fair estate 30
 Betwixt these deserts blank of small and great.
 Wonder and beauty our own courtiers are,
 Pressing to catch our gaze,
 And out of obvious ways
 Ne'er wandering far. 35

DELICIAE SAPIENTIAE DE AMORE

Love, light for me
 Thy ruddiest blazing torch,
 That I, albeit a beggar by the Porch
 Of the glad Palace of Virginity,
 May gaze within, and sing the pomp I see; 5
 For, crowned with roses all,
 'Tis there, O Love, they keep thy festival!
 But first warn off the beatific spot
 Those wretched who have not Even afar beheld the shining wall, 10
 And those who, once beholding, have forgot,
 And those, most vile, who dress
 The charnel specter drear
 Of utterly dishallowed nothingness
 In that refulgent fame, 15
 And cry Lo, here!
 And name
 The Lady whose smiles inflame
 The sphere.
 Bring, Love, anear, 20
 And bid be not afraid
 Young Lover true, and love-foreboding Maid,
 And wedded Spouse, if virginal of thought,
 For I will sing of naught
 Less sweet to hear 25
 Than seems
 A music in their half-remembered dreams.

The magnet calls the steel:
 Answers the iron to the magnet's breath;
 What do they feel 30
 But death!
 The clouds of summer kiss in flame and rain,
 And are not found again;
 But the heavens themselves eternal are with fire
 Of unapproached desire, 35

By the aching heart of Love, which cannot rest,
 In blissfullest pathos so indeed possessed.
 Oh, spousals high;
 Oh, doctrine blest,
 Unutterable in even the happiest sigh, 40
 This know ye all
 Who can recall
 With what a welling of indignant tears
 Love's simpleness first hears
 The meaning of his mortal covenant, 45
 And from what pride comes down
 To wear the crown
 Of which 'twas very heaven to feel the want
 How envies he the ways
 Of yonder hopeless star, 50
 And so would laugh and yearn
 With trembling lids eterne,
 Ineffably content from infinitely far
 Only to gaze
 On his bright Mistress's responding rays, 55
 That never know eclipse;
 And, once in his long year,
 With præternuptial ecstasy and fear,
 By the delicious law of that ellipse
 Wherein all citizens of ether move, 60
 With hastening pace to come Nearer, though never near,
 His Love
 And always inaccessible sweet Home,
 There on his path doubly to burn. 65
 Kissed by her doubled light
 That whispers of its source,
 The ardent secret ever clothed with Night,
 Then go forth in new force
 Toward a new return, 70
 Rejoicing as a Bridegroom on his course!
 This know ye all,
 Therefore gaze bold,
 That so in you be joyful hope increased,
 Thorough the Palace portals, and behold 75
 The dainty and unsating Marriage-Feast.
 Oh, hear
 Them singing clear
 "Cor meum et caro mea" round the "I Am,"
 The Husband of the Heavens, and the Lamb 80
 Whom they forever follow there that kept,
 Or losing, never slept
 Till they reconquered had in mortal fight
 The standard white.
 Oh, hear 85
 From the harps they bore from Earth, five-strung, what music springs,
 While the glad Spirits chide
 The wondering strings!
 And how the shining sacrificial Choirs,
 Offering for aye their dearest hearts' desires, 90

Which to their hearts come back beatified,
 Hymn, the bright aisles along,
 The nuptial song,
 Song ever new to us and them, that saith,
 "Hail Virgin in Virginitie a Spouse!" 95
 Heard first below
 Within the little house
 At Nazareth,
 Heard yet in many a cell where brides of Christ
 Lie hid, emparadised, 100
 And where, although
 By the hour 'tis night,
 There's light,
 The Day still lingering in the lap of snow.
 Gaze and be not afraid, 105
 Ye wedded few that honor, in sweet thought
 And glittering will,
 So freshly from the garden gather still
 The lily sacrificed,
 For ye, though self-suspected here for naught, 110
 Are highly styled
 With the thousands twelve times twelve of undefiled
 Gaze and be not afraid,
 Young Lover true and love-foreboding Maid
 The full noon of deific vision bright 115
 Abashes nor abates
 No spark minute of Nature's keen delight.
 'Tis there your Hymen waits!
 There where in courts afar, all unconfused,
 they crowd,
 As fumes the starlight soft 120
 In gulfs of cloud,
 And each to the other, well-content,
 Sighs oft,
 " 'Twas this we meant! "
 Gaze without blame 125
 Ye in whom living Love yet blushes for dead
 shame
 There of pure Virgins none
 Is fairer seen,
 Save One,
 Than Mary Magdalene, 130
 Gaze without doubt or fear,
 Ye to whom generous Love, by any name, is
 dear.
 Love makes the life to be
 A fount perpetual of virginity;
 For, lo, the Elect 135
 Of generous Love, how named soe'er, affect Nothing but God,
 Or mediate or direct,
 Nothing but God,
 The Husband of the Heavens: 140

And who Him love, in potency great or small,
 Are, one and all,
 Heirs of the Palace glad,
 And inly clad
 With the bridal robes of ardor virginal. 145

From THE UNKNOWN EROS

A FAREWELL

With all my will, but much against my heart,
 We two now part.
 My Very Dear,
 Our solace is, the sad road lies so clear.
 It needs no art, 5
 With faint, averted feet
 And many a tear,
 In our opposed paths to persevere.
 Go thou to East, I West.
 We will not say 10
 There's any hope, it is so far away.
 But, O my Best!
 When the one darling of our widowhead,
 The nursling Grief,
 Is dead, 15
 And no dew blur our eyes
 To see the peach-bloom come in evening skies,
 Perchance we may,
 Where now this night is day,
 And even through faith of still averted feet, 20
 Making full circle of our banishment,
 Amazed meet;
 The bitter journey to the bourne so sweet
 Seasoning the termless feast of our content
 With tears of recognition never dry. 25

THE TOYS

My little son, who looked from thoughtful
 eyes,
 And moved and spoke in quiet grown-up wise,
 Having my law the seventh time disobeyed,
 I struck him, and dismissed
 With hard words and unkissed, 5
 His mother, who was patient, being dead.
 Then, fearing lest his grief should hinder
 sleep,
 I visited his bed,
 But found him slumbering deep,
 With darkened eyelids, and their lashes yet
 From his late sobbing wet. 11
 And I, with moan,

Kissing away his tears, left others of my own,
 For, on a table drawn beside his head,
 He had put, within his reach, 15
 A box of counters and a red-veined stone,
 A piece of glass abraded by the beach
 And six or seven shells,
 A bottle with bluebells
 And two French copper coins, ranged there with careful art, 20
 To comfort his sad heart.
 So when that night I prayed
 To God, I wept, and said:
 "Ah, when at last we lie with tranced breath,
 Not vexing Thee in death, 25
 And Thou rememberest of what toys
 We made our joys,
 How weakly understood,
 Thy great commanded good,
 Then, fatherly not less 30
 Than I whom Thou hast molded from the clay,
 Thou'lt leave Thy wrath, and say,
 'I will be sorry for their childishness.' "

MAGNA EST VERITAS

Here, in this little bay,
 Full of tumultuous life and great repose,
 Where, twice a day,
 The purposeless, glad ocean comes and goes,
 Under high cliffs, and far from the huge town,
 I sit me down. 6
 For want of me the world's course will not fail —
 When all its work is done, the lie shall rot;
 The truth is great, and shall prevail
 When none cares whether it prevail or not 10

DEPARTURE

It was not like your great and gracious ways!
 Do you, that have naught other to lament,
 Never, my love, repent
 Of how, that July afternoon,
 You went, 5
 With sudden, unintelligible phrase,
 And frightened eye,
 Upon your journey of so many days,
 Without a single kiss or a good-by?
 I knew, indeed, that you were parting soon;
 And so we sate, within the low sun's rays, 11
 You whispering to me, for your voice was weak,
 Your harrowing praise.

17 abraded . . . beach, worn down by the waves and the sand

Magna Est Veritas The title means Great Is Truth It is taken from the Apocryphal Book of 1 Esdras, 4 41 — "Great is truth and strong above all things"

Well, it was well, my wife,
 To hear you such things speak, 15
 And see your love
 Make of your eyes a growing gloom of life,
 As a warm south-wind sombers a March
 grove.
 And it was like your great and gracious ways
 To turn your talk on daily things, my dear,
 Lifting the luminous, pathetic lash 21
 To let the laughter flash,
 Whilst I drew near,
 Because you spoke so low that I could scarcely hear.
 But all at once to leave me at the last, 25
 More at the wonder than the loss agast,
 With huddled, unintelligible phrase,
 And frightened eye,
 And go your journey of all days
 With not one kiss or a good-by, 30
 And the only loveless look the look with which you passed,
 'Twas all unlike your great and gracious ways.

THE AZALEA

There, where the sun shines first Against our room,
 She trained the gold azalea, whose perfume
 She, spring-like, from her breathing grace dispersed.
 Last night the delicate crests of saffron bloom,
 For this their dainty likeness watched and nurst, 6
 Were just at point to burst.
 At dawn I dreamed, O God, that she was
 dead,
 And groaned aloud upon my wretched bed,
 And waked, ah, God, and did not waken her,
 But lay, with eyes still closed, 11
 Perfectly blessed in the delicious sphere
 By which I knew so well that she was near,
 My heart to speechless thankfulness composed.
 Till 'gan to stir 15
 A dizzy somewhat in my troubled head —
 It was the azalea's breath, and she was dead!
 The warm night had the lingering buds disclosed;
 And I had fall'n asleep with to my breast
 A chance-found letter pressed 20
 In which she said,
 "So, till tomorrow eve, my own, adieu!
 Parting's well-paid with soon again to meet,
 Soon in your arms to feel so small and sweet,
 Sweet to myself that am so sweet to you!" 25

REGINA CÆLI

Say, did his sisters wonder what could Joseph
see

In a mild, silent little maid like thee?
And was it awful, in that narrow house,
With God for Babe and Spouse?
Nay, like thy simple, female sort, each one 5
Apt to find Him in Husband and in Son,
Nothing to thee came strange in this.
Thy wonder was but wondrous bliss:
Wondrous, for, though
True Virgin lives not but does know 10
(Howbeit none ever yet confessed),
That God lies really in her breast,
Of thine He made His special nest!
And so
All mothers worship little feet, 15
And kiss the very ground they've trod;
But, ah, thy little Baby sweet
Who was indeed thy God! (1878)

JAMES THOMSON (1834-1882)

ONCE IN A SAINTLY PASSION

Once in a saintly passion
I cried with desperate grief,
"O Lord, my heart is black with guile,
Of sinners I am chief " 5
Then stooped my guardian angel
And whispered from behind,
"Vanity, my little man,
You're nothing of the kind."

FOR I MUST SING OF ALL
I FEEL AND KNOW

For I must sing of all I feel and know, Waiting with Memnon passive near the palms,
Until the heavenly light doth dawn and grow
And thrill my silence into mystic psalms,
From unknown realms the wind streams sad or gay, 5
The trees give voice responsive to its sway
For I must sing, of mountains, deserts, seas,
Of rivers ever flowing, ever flowing,
Of beasts and birds, of grass and flowers and trees
Forever fading and forever growing; 10

Regina Cæli The title means Queen of Heaven
For I Must Sing of All I Feel and Know 2. Memnon, a colossal statue near Thebes, Egypt, which was supposed to give forth a musical sound at daybreak

Of calm and storm, of night and eve and noon,
Of boundless space, and sun and stars and
moon;

And of the secret sympathies that bind
All beings to their wondrous dwelling-place,
And of the perfect Unity enshrined 15
In omnipresence throughout time and space,
Alike informing with its full control
The dust, the stars, the worm, the human soul;

And most supremely of my human kin —
Their thoughts and deeds, their valors and their fears, 20
Their griefs and joys, their virtue and their sin,
Their feasts and wars, their cradles and their biers,
Their temples, prisons, homes and ships and marts,
The subtlest windings of their brains and hearts.

So rich and sweet is Life. And what is
Death? — 25
The tranquil slumbers dear and strange and boon
That feed at whiles our waking being's breath,
The solemn midnight of this glorious noon,
With countless distant stars, and each a sun,
Revealed harmonious with our daily one. 30

TWO SONNETS

I

"Why are your songs all wild and bitter sad
As funeral dirges with the orphans' cries?
Each night since first the world was made hath had
A sequent day to laugh it down the skies.
Chant us a glee to make our hearts rejoice, 5
Or seal in silence this unmanly moan."
My friend, I have no power to rule my voice —
A spirit lifts me where I lie alone,
And thrills me into song by its own laws,
That which I feel, but seldom know, indeed
Tempering the melody it could not cause. 11
The bleeding heart cannot forever bleed
Inwardly solely, on the wan lips, too,
Dark blood will bubble ghastly into view

2

Striving to sing glad songs, I but attain Wild discords sadder than Grief's saddest
tune;

17 informing, animating, giving form to

As if an owl with his harsh screech should strain
 To over-gratulate a thrush of June.
 The nightingale upon its thorny spray 5
 Finds inspiration in the sullen dark;
 The kindling dawn, the world-wide joyous day
 Are inspiration to the soaring lark;
 The seas are silent in the sunny calm,
 Their anthem surges in the tempest boom; 10
 The skies outroll no solemn thunder psalm Till they have clothed themselves with clouds of gloom.
 My mirth can laugh and talk, but cannot sing,
 My grief finds harmonies in everything. (1860)

"AS WE RUSH, AS WE RUSH IN THE TRAIN"

As we rush, as we rush in the train,
 The trees and the houses go wheeling back,
 But the starry heavens above the plain
 Come flying on our track.

All the beautiful stars of the sky, 5
 The silver doves of the forest of Night,
 Over the dull earth swarm and fly,
 Companions of our flight.

We will rush ever on without fear;
 Let the goal be far, the flight be fleet! 10
 For we carry the Heavens with us, Dear,
 While the Earth slips from our feet! (1863; 1865)

THE FIRE THAT FILLED MY HEART OF OLD

The fire that filled my heart of old
 Gave luster while it burned;
 Now only ashes gray and cold
 Are in its silence urned.
 Ah! better was the furious flame, 5
 The splendor with the smart;
 I never cared for the singer's fame,
 But, oh! for the singer's heart
 Once more —
 The burning fulgent heart! 10

No love, no hate, no hope, no fear,
 No anguish and no mirth;
 Thus life extends from year to year,
 A flat of sullen dearth.
 Ah! life's blood creepeth cold and tame, 15
 Life's thought plays no new part,

I never cared for the singer's fame,
 But, oh! for the singer's heart
 Once more —
 The bleeding passionate heart! 20

From ART

"What precious thing are you making fast
 In all these silken lines?
 And where and to whom will it go at last?
 Such subtle knots and twines!"

"I am tying up all my love in this, 5
 With all its hopes and fears,
 With all its anguish and all its bliss,
 And its hours as heavy as years.

"I am going to send it afar, afar, 10
 To I know not where above;
 To that sphere beyond the highest star
 Where dwells the soul of my Love.

"But in vain, in vain, would I make it fast
 With countless subtle twines,
 Forever its fire breaks out at last, 15
 And shrivels all the lines." (1865)

From SUNDAY UP THE RIVER

I

I looked out into the morning,
 I looked out into the west.
 The soft blue eye of the quiet sky
 Still drooped in dreamy rest;

The trees were still like clouds there, 5
 The clouds like mountains dim;
 The broad mist lay, a silver bay
 Whose tide was at the brim.

I looked out into the morning,
 I looked out into the east 10
 The flood of light upon the night
 Had silently increased,

The sky was pale with fervor,
 The distant trees were gray,
 The hill-lines drawn like waves of dawn 15
 Dissolving in the day.

I looked out into the morning,
 Looked east, looked west, with glee,
 O richest day of happy May,
 My love will spend with me! 20

"Oh, what are you waiting for here, young
 man?
 What are you looking for over the bridge?"

4 over-gratulate, surpass in expressing a feeling of joy
 5 nightingale spray The nightingale was supposed to sing more sweetly when a thorn was at its breast

A little straw hat with the streaming blue ribbons
Is soon to come dancing over the bridge

Her heart beats the measure that keeps her feet dancing, 5
Dancing along like a wave o' the sea;
Her heart pours the sunshine with which her eyes glancing
Light up strange faces in looking for me.

The strange faces brighten in meeting her glances,
The strangers all bless her, pure, lovely,
and free 10
She fancies she walks, but her walk skips and dances,
Her heart makes such music in coming to
me

Oh, thousands and thousands of happy young maidens
Are tripping this morning their sweethearts
to see,
But none whose heart beats to a sweeter
love-cadence 15
Than hers who will brighten the sunshine for me.

"Oh, what are you waiting for here, young
man?
What are you looking for over the bridge?"
A little straw hat with the streaming blue
ribbons, 19
— And here it comes dancing over the bridge!

15

Give a man a horse he can ride,
Give a man a boat he can sail;
And his rank and wealth, his strength and health,
On sea nor shore shall fail

Give a man a pipe he can smoke, 5
Give a man a book he can read,
And his home is bright with a calm delight,
Though the room be poor indeed

Give a man a girl he can love,
As I, O my Love, love thee, 10
And his heart is great with the pulse of Fate,
At home, on land, on sea

17

Let my voice ring out and over the earth,
Through all the grief and strife,
With a golden joy in a silver mirth.
Thank God for Life!

Let my voice swell out through the great abyss 5

To the azure dome above,
With a chord of faith in the harp of bliss.
Thank God for Love!

Let my voice thrill out beneath and above,
The whole world through: 10
O my Love and Life, O my Life and Love,
Thank God for you!

18

The wine of Love is music,
And the feast of Love is song;
And when Love sits down to the banquet,
Love sits long;

Sits long and ariseth drunken, 5
But not with the feast and the wine,
He reeleth with his own heart,
That great rich Vine. (1865; 1869)

WILLIAM BLAKE

He came to the desert of London town
Gray miles long,
He wandered up and he wandered down,
Singing a quiet song

He came to the desert of London town, 5
Mirk miles broad,
He wandered up and he wandered down,
Ever alone with God.

There were thousands and thousands of human kind
In this desert of brick and stone, 10
But some were deaf and some were blind,
And he was there alone

At length the good hour came; he died
As he had lived, alone.
He was not missed from the desert wide, 15
Perhaps he was found at the Throne (1866)

L' ANCIEN RÉGIME

OR, THE GOOD OLD RULE

Who has a thing to bring
For a gift to our lord the king,
Our king all kings above?
A young girl brought him love;
And he dowered her with shame, 5
With a sort of infamous fame,
And then with lonely years
Of penance and bitter tears —
Love is scarcely the thing
To bring as a gift for our king. 10

William Blake. Cf Rossetti's William Blake, page 542.

Who has a thing to bring For a gift to our lord the king? A statesman brought him planned Justice for all the land; And he in recompense got Fierce struggle with brigade and plot, Then a fall from lofty place Into exile and disgrace — Justice is never the thing To bring as a gift for our king.	15 20	A harlot brought him her flesh, Her lusts, and the manifold mesh Of her wives interwolved with caprice; And he gave her his realm to fleece, To corrupt, to ruin, and gave Himself for her toy and her slave — Harlotry's just the thing To bring as a gift for our king.	65 70
Who has a thing to bring For a gift to our lord the king? A writer brought him truth, And first he imprisoned the youth, And then he bestowed a free pyre That the works might have plenty of fire, And also to cure the pain Of the headache called thought in the brain — Truth is a very bad thing To bring as a gift for our king.	25 30	Who has a thing to bring For a gift to our lord the king, Our king who fears to die? A priest brought him a lie, The blackness of hell uprolled In heaven's shining gold; And he got as guerdon for that A see and a cardinal's hat — A lie is an excellent thing To bring as a gift for our king	75 80
Who has a thing to bring For a gift to our lord the king? The people brought their sure Loyalty fervid and pure; And he gave them bountiful spoil Of taxes and hunger and toil, Ignorance, brutish plight, And wholesale slaughter in fight — Loyalty's quite the worst thing To bring as a gift for our king.	35 40	Has any one yet a thing For a gift to our lord the king? The country gave him a tomb, A magnificent sleeping-room; And for this it obtained some rest, Clear riddance of many a pest, And a hope which it much enjoyed That the throne would continue void — A tomb is the very best thing For a gift to our lord the king	85 (1867)
Who has a thing to bring For a gift to our lord the king? A courtier brought to his feet Servility graceful and sweet, With an ever ready smile And an ever supple guile; And he got in reward the place Of the statesman in disgrace — Servility's always a thing To bring as a gift for our king.	45 50	THE CITY OF DREADFUL NIGHT PROEM Lo, thus, as prostrate, "In the dust I write My heart's deep languor and my soul's sad tears" Yet why evoke the specters of black night To blot the sunshine of exultant years? Why disinter dead faith from moldering hidden? Why break the seals of mute despair un- bidden, And wail life's discords into careless ears?	5 5
Who has a thing to bring For a gift to our lord the king? A soldier brought him war, La gloire, la victoire , Ravage and carnage and groans, For the pious Te Deum tones; And he got in return for himself Rank and honors and pelf — War is a very fine thing To bring as a gift for our king.	55 60	Because a cold rage seizes one at whiles To show the bitter old and wrinkled truth Stripped naked of all vesture that beguiles, 10 False dreams, false hopes, false masks and modes of youth; Because it gives some sense of power and passion

For a gift to our lord the king?

16 brigade, intrigue 54 La gloire, la victoire, the glory, the victory 56 Te Deum, the name of an ancient and famous Christian hymn beginning "Te Deum laudamus" ("We praise thee, O God")

The City of Dreadful Night Many of the images and ideas of this poem pressed themselves upon Thomson as he wandered about the streets of London during periods of insomnia. What he presents, however, is a city of modern society, conceived as the result of a vast single process without objective aim. It thus becomes an imaginary City of Despair. Although the poem is suggestive of a philosophic and religious theorem, it is not to be loaded with ethical significance.

In helpless impotence to try to fashion
Our woe in living words howe'er uncouth

Surely I write not for the hopeful young, 15
Or those who deem their happiness of worth,

Or such as pasture and grow fat among
The shows of life and feel nor doubt nor dearth,

Or pious spirits with a God above them
To sanctify and glorify and love them, 20
Or sages who foresee a heaven on earth.

For none of these I write, and none of these Could read the writing if they deigned to try,

So may they flourish, in their due degrees,
On our sweet earth and in their unplaced sky. 25

If any cares for the weak words here written,
It must be someone desolate, Fate-smitten,
Whose faith and hope are dead, and who would die.

Yes, here and there some weary wanderer
In that same city of tremendous night, 30
Will understand the speech, and feel a stir

Of fellowship in all-disastrous fight,
"I suffer mute and lonely, yet another
Uplifts his voice to let me know a brother
Travels the same wild paths though out of sight" 35

O sad Fraternity, do I unfold

Your dolorous mysteries shrouded from of yore?

Nay, be assured — no secret can be told

To any who divined it not before;

None uninitiate by many a presage 40

Will comprehend the language of the message,
Although proclaimed aloud for evermore.

I

The City is of Night; perchance of Death,
But certainly of Night; for never there
Can come the lucid morning's fragrant breath
After the dewy dawning's cold gray air; 46
The moon and stars may shine with scorn or pity;

The sun has never visited that city,
For it dissolveth in the daylight fair,

Dissolveth like a dream of night away, 50
Though present in distempered gloom of thought

And deadly weariness of heart all day

But when a dream night after night is brought

Throughout a week, and such weeks few or many

Recur each year for several years, can any 55
Discern that dream from real life in aught?

For life is but a dream whose shapes return,
Some frequently, some seldom, some by night

And some by day, some night and day, we learn,

The while all change and many vanish quite, 60

In their recurrence with recurrent changes
A certain seeming order, where this ranges
We count things real, such is memory's might.

A river girds the city west and south, 64
The main north channel of a broad lagoon,

Regurging with the salt tides from the mouth,
Waste marshes shine and glister to the moon

For leagues, then moorland black, then stony ridges,

Great piers and causeways, many noble bridges,

Connect the town and islet suburbs strewn

Upon an easy slope it lies at large, 71
And scarcely overlaps the long curved crest
Which swells out two leagues from the river marge.

A trackless wilderness rolls north and west,
Savannahs, savage woods, enormous mountains, 75

Bleak uplands, black ravines with torrent fountains,

And eastward rolls the shipless sea's unrest

The city is not ruinous, although Great ruins of an unremembered past,
With others of a few short years ago, 80
More sad, are found within its precincts vast.

The street-lamps always burn, but scarce a casement

In house or palace front from roof to basement

Doth glow or gleam athwart the mirk air cast.

The street-lamps burn amidst the baleful glooms, 85

Amidst the soundless solitudes immense
Of ranged mansions dark and still as tombs.
The silence which benumbs or strains the sense

Fulfills with awe the soul's despair unweeping,
Myriads of habitants are ever sleeping, 90
Or dead, or fled from nameless pestilence!

Yet, as in some necropolis you find

Perchance one mourner to a thousand dead,
So there: worn faces that look deaf and blind

66 Regurging, surging back 75 Savannahs, open, level regions 92 necropolis, a city of the dead

Like tragic masks of stone. With weary tread, 95
Each wrapped in his own doom, they wander, wander,
Or sit foredone and desolately ponder
Through sleepless hours with heavy drooping head.

Mature men chiefly, few in age or youth,
A woman rarely, now and then a child —
A child! If here the heart turns sick with
ruth 101
To see a little one from birth defiled,
Or lame or blind, as preordained to languish Through youthless life, think how it bleeds with anguish 104
To meet one erring in that homeless wild

They often murmur to themselves, they speak
To one another seldom, for their woe Broods maddening inwardly and scorns to wreak
Itself abroad, and if at whiles it grow
To frenzy which must rave, none heeds the clamor, 110
Unless there waits some victim of like glamour,
To rave in turn, who lends attentive show

The City is of Night, but not of Sleep,
There sweet sleep is not for the weary brain,
The pitiless hours like years and ages creep,
A night seems termless hell This dreadful strain 116
Of thought and consciousness, which never ceases,
Or which some moments' stupor but increases,
This, worse than woe, makes wretches there insane. 119

They leave all hope behind who enter there,
One certitude while sane they cannot leave,
One anodyne for torture and despair —
The certitude of Death, which no reprieve
Can put off long; and which, divinely tender,
But waits the outstretched hand to promptly render 125
That draft whose slumber nothing can bereave.

2

Because he seemed to walk with an intent
I followed him; who, shadowlike and frail,
Unswervingly though slowly onward went, 129
Regardless, wrapped in thought as in a veil.
Thus step for step with lonely sounding feet
We traveled many a long dim silent street.

105 erring, wandering 120 They there Cf
the description over the portal to hell in Dante's Inferno—
"Leave all hope, ye that enter "

At length he paused — a black mass in the
gloom,
A tower that merged into the heavy sky,
Around, the huddled stones of grave and tomb — 135
Some old God's-acre now corruption's sty.
He murmured to himself with dull despair,
"Here Faith died, poisoned by this charnel
air."

Then, turning to the right, went on once more,
And traveled weary roads without suspense; 140
And reached at last a low wall's open door,
Whose villa gleamed beyond the foliage dense.
He gazed, and muttered with a hard despair,
"Here Love died, stabbed by its own worshipped pair."

Then, turning to the right, resumed his march, 145
And traveled streets and lanes with wondrous strength,
Until on stooping through a narrow arch
We stood before a squalid house at length.
He gazed, and whispered with a cold despair,
"Here Hope died, starved out in its utmost lair " 150

When he had spoken thus, before he stirred,
I spoke, perplexed by something in the signs
Of desolation I had seen and heard
In this drear pilgrimage to ruined shrines
"When Faith and Love and Hope are dead
indeed, 155
Can Life still live? By what doth it proceed?"

As whom his one intense thought overpowers,
He answered coldly, "Take a watch, erase
The signs and figures of the circling hours,
Detach the hands, remove the dial-face, 160
The works proceed until run down, although Bereft of purpose, void of use, still go "

Then, turning to the right, paced on again,
And traversed squares and traveled streets whose glooms
Seemed more and more familiar to my ken,
And reached that sullen temple of the tombs; 166
And paused to murmur with the old despair,
"Here Faith died, poisoned by this charnel
air."

I ceased to follow, for the knot of doubt
Was severed sharply with a cruel knife, 170

He circled thus forever tracing out
 The series of the fraction left of Life;
 Perpetual recurrence in the scope
 Of but three terms, dead Faith, dead Love, dead Hope 174

3

Although lamps burn along the silent streets,
 Even when moonlight silvers empty squares,
 The dark holds countless lanes and close retreats,
 But when the night its sphereless mantle
 wears,
 The open spaces yawn with gloom abysmal,
 The somber mansions loom immense and dismal, 180
 The lanes are black as subterranean lairs

And soon the eye a strange new vision learns
 The night remains for it as dark and dense.
 Yet clearly in this darkness it discerns 184
 As in the daylight with its natural sense,
 Percives a shade in shadow not obscurely,
 Pursues a stir of black in blackness surely,
 Sees specters also in the gloom intense

The ear, too, with the silence vast and deep
 Becomes familiar though unreconciled, 190
 Hears breathings as of hidden life asleep,
 And muffled throbs as of pent passions
 wild,
 Far murmurs, speech of pity or derision,
 But all more dubious than the things of vision,
 So that it knows not when it is beguiled. 195

No time abates the first despair and awe,
 But wonder ceases soon, the weirdest thing
 Is felt least strange beneath the lawless law
 Where Death-in-Life is the eternal king,
 Crushed impotent beneath this reign of terror,
 Dazed with such mysteries of woe and error,
 The soul is too outworn for wondering 202

4

He stood alone within the spacious square,
 Declaiming from the central grassy mound,
 With head uncovered and with streaming
 hair, 205
 As if large multitudes were gathered round—
 A stalwart shape, the gestures full of might,
 The glances burning with unnatural light.

"As I came through the desert thus it was,
 As I came through the desert All was black,
 In heaven no single star, on earth no track,
 A brooding hush without a stir or note, 212
 The air so thick it clotted in my throat,
 And thus for hours, then some enormous
 things

Swooped past with savage cries and clanking
 wings 215
 But I strode on austere;
 No hope could have no fear

"As I came through the desert thus it was,
 As I came through the desert. Eyes of fire 219
 Glared at me throbbing with a starved desire,
 The hoarse and heavy and carnivorous breath
 Was hot upon me from deep jaws of death,
 Sharp claws, swift talons, fleshless fingers cold
 Plucked at me from the bushes, tried to hold.
 But I strode on austere; 225
 No hope could have no fear

"As I came through the desert thus it was,
 As I came through the desert Lo you, there,
 That hillock burning with a brazen glare;
 Those myriad dusky flames with points a-glow
 Which writhed and lussed and darted to and fro, 231
 A Sabbath of the Serpents, heaped pell-mell
 For Devil's roll-call and some fête of hell
 Yet I strode on austere,
 No hope could have no fear 235

"As I came through the desert thus it was,
 As I came through the desert Meteors ran
 And crossed their javelins on the black sky-
 span,
 The zenith opened to a gulf of flame,
 The dreadful thunderbolts jarred earth's fixed frame; 240
 The ground all heaved in waves of fire that surged
 And weltered round me sole there unsub-merged.
 Yet I strode on austere;
 No hope could have no fear

"As I came through the desert thus it was, 245
 As I came through the desert Air once more,
 And I was close upon a wild seashore,
 Enormous cliffs arose on either hand,
 The deep tide thundered up a league-broad
 strand;
 White foambelts seethed there, wan spray swept and flew, 250
 The sky broke, moon and stars and clouds and blue
 And I strode on austere,
 No hope could have no fear

"As I came through the desert thus it was,
 As I came through the desert On the left 255
 The sun arose and crowned a broad cragcleft,

232 Sabbath of the Serpents, a midnight meeting supposed to be held annually by demons, witches, etc., under the leadership of Satan, for the purpose of celebrating their orgies

There stopped and burned out black, except a rim,
 A bleeding, eyeless socket, red and dim;
 Whereon the moon fell suddenly southwest,
 And stood above the right-hand cliffs at rest.
 Still I strode on austere; 261
 No hope could have no fear.

"As I came through the desert thus it was,
 As I came through the desert: From the right
 A shape came slowly with a ruddy light; 265
 A woman with a red lamp in her hand,
 Bareheaded and barefooted on that strand;
 O desolation moving with such grace!
 O anguish with such beauty in thy face!
 I fell as on my bier, 270
 Hope travailed with such fear.

"As I came through the desert thus it was,
 As I came through the desert: I was twain,
 Two selves distinct that cannot join again;
 One stood apart and knew but could not stir,
 And watched the other stark in swoon and
 her; 276
 And she came on, and never turned aside,
 Between such sun and moon and roaring tide.
 And as she came more near
 My soul grew mad with fear. 280

"As I came through the desert thus it was,
 As I came through the desert: Hell is mild
 And piteous matched with that accursed wild,
 A large black sign was on her breast that bowed,
 A broad black band ran down her snow-white shroud; 285
 That lamp she held was her own burning
 heart,
 Whose blood-drops trickled step by step apart.
 The mystery was clear,
 Mad rage had swallowed fear.

"As I came through the desert thus it was, 290
 As I came through the desert. By the sea
 She knelt and bent above that senseless me,
 Those lamp-drops fell upon my white brow
 there,
 She tried to cleanse them with her tears and
 hair;
 She murmured words of pity, love, and woe,
 She heeded not the level rushing flow. 296
 And mad with rage and fear,
 I stood stonebound so near.

"As I came through the desert thus it was, 299
 As I came through the desert. When the tide
 Swept up to her there kneeling by my side,
 She clasped that corpse-like me, and they were borne
 Away, and this vile me was left forlorn;

I know the whole sea cannot quench that
 heart,
 Or cleanse that brow, or wash those two
 apart. 305
 They love; their doom is drear,
 Yet they nor hope nor fear;
 But I, what do I here?"

5
 How he arrives there none can clearly know,
 Athwart the mountains and immense wild tracts, 310
 Or flung a waif upon that vast sea-flow,
 Or down the river's boiling cataracts.
 To reach it is as dying fever-stricken;
 To leave it, slow faint birth intense pangs
 quicken,
 And memory swoons in both the tragic acts. 315

But being there one feels a citizen;
 Escape seems hopeless to the heart forlorn—
 Can Death-in-Life be brought to life again?
 And yet release does come; there comes a morn
 When he awakes from slumbering so sweetly
 That all the world is changed for him completely, 321
 And he is verily as if new-born

He scarcely can believe the blissful change,
 He weeps perchance who wept not while accurst,
 Never again will he approach the range 325
 Infected by that evil spell now burst
 Poor wretch! who once hath paced that dolent city
 Shall pace it often, doomed beyond all pity,
 With horror ever deepening from the first.

Though he possess sweet babes and loving wife, 330
 A home of peace by loyal friendships
 cheered,
 And love them more than death or happy
 life,
 They shall avail not; he must dree his weird,
 Renounce all blessings for that imprecation,
 Steal forth and haunt that builded desolation,
 Of woe and terrors and thick darkness
 reared. 336

6

I sat forlornly by the river-side,
 And watched the bridge-lamps glow like golden stars
 Above the blackness of the swelling tide,

327 dolent, sorrowful 333 dree his weird, endure his fate

Down which they struck rough gold in ruddier bars; 340
And heard the heave and splashing of the
flow
Against the wall a dozen feet below.

Large elm-trees stood along that river-walk,
And under one, a few steps from my seat,
I heard strange voices join in stranger talk,
Although I had not heard approaching
feet, 346
These bodiless voices in my waking dream
Flowed dark words blending with the somber
stream.

"And you have after all come back; come back.
I was about to follow on your track. 350
And you have failed; our spark of hope is black."

"That I have failed is proved by my return,
The spark is quenched, nor ever more will burn
But listen, and the story you shall learn

"I reached the portal common spirits fear, 355
And read the words above it, dark yet clear,
'Leave hope behind, all ye who enter here';

"And would have passed in, gratified to gain
That positive eternity of pain,
Instead of this insufferable inane. 360

"A demon warder clutched me, 'Not so fast;
First leave your hopes behind!' — 'But years have passed
Since I left all behind me, to the last.

"You cannot count for hope, with all your wit,
This bleak despair that drives me to the Pit,
How could I seek to enter void of it?' 366

"He snarled, 'What thing is this which apes
a soul,
And would find entrance to our gulf of dole
Without the payment of the settled toll?'"

"Outside the gate he showed an open chest
'Here pay their entrance fees the souls unblest, 371
Cast in some hope, you enter with the rest

"This is Pandora's box, whose lid shall shut,

373 Pandora's box Pandora, a beautiful woman created to punish mankind because Prometheus had stolen fire from heaven, opened a box containing all human ills, which escaped over the earth. A later tradition had the blessings of the gods escape from the box, with the exception of hope, which was saved for the human race

And Hell-gate too, when hopes have filled it;
but
They are so thin that it will never glut.' 375

"I stood a few steps backwards, desolate;
And watched the spirits pass me to their fate,
And fling off hope, and enter at the gate

"When one casts off a load he springs upright,
Squares back his shoulders, breathes with all his might, 380
And briskly paces forward strong and light,

"But these, as if they took some burden,
bowed,
The whole frame sank; however strong and proud
Before, they crept in quite infirm and cowed

"And as they passed me, earnestly from each
A morsel of his hope I did beseech, 386
To pay my entrance; but all mocked my speech.

"Not one would cede a tittle of his store,
Though knowing that in instants three or four
He must resign the whole for evermore. 390

"So I returned. Our destiny is fell,
For in this Limbo we must ever dwell, Shut out alike from heaven and earth and hell "

The other sighed back, "Yea, but if we grope
With care through all this Limbo's dreary
scope, 395
We yet may pick up some minute lost hope,

"And, sharing it between us, entrance win,
In spite of fiends so jealous for gross sin.
Let us without delay our search begin."

7

Some say that phantoms haunt those shadowy streets, 400

And mingle freely there with sparse mankind,
And tell of ancient woes and black defeats,
And murmur mysteries in the grave enshrined.

But others think them visions of illusion,
Or even men gone far in self-confusion, 405
No man there being wholly sane in mind.

391 fell, cruel 392 Limbo, a region supposed to lie on the border of hell as the abode of the just who died before Christ's coming

And yet a man who raves, however mad,
 Who bares his heart and tells of his own
 fall,
 Reserves some inmost secret good or bad,
 The phantoms have no reticence at all— 410
 The nudity of flesh will blush though tame-
 less,
 The extreme nudity of bone grins shameless,
 The unsexed skeleton mocks shroud and pall

I have seen phantoms there that were as men
 And men that were as phantoms flit and roam, 415
 Marked shapes that were not living to my ken,
 Caught breathings acrid as with Dead Sea
 foam
 The City rests for man so weird and awful,
 That his intrusion there might seem unlawful,
 And phantoms there may have their proper
 home. 420

8

While I still lingered on that river-walk,
 And watched the tide as black as our black
 doom,
 I heard another couple join in talk,
 And saw them to the left hand in the gloom
 Seated against an elm bole on the ground, 425
 Their eyes intent upon the stream profound

"I never knew another man on earth
 But had some joy and solace in his life,
 Some chance of triumph in the dreadful
 strife,
 My doom has been unmitigated dearth." 430

"We gaze upon the river, and we note
 The various vessels large and small that float,
 Ignoring every wrecked and sunken boat "

"And yet I asked no splendid dower, no spoil
 Of sway or fame or rank or even wealth, 435
 But homely love with common food and
 health,
 And nightly sleep to balance daily toil "

"This all-too humble soul would arrogate
 Unto itself some signalizing hate
 From the supreme indifference of Fate!" 440

"Who is most wretched in this dolorous place?
 I think myself, yet I would rather be My miserable self than He, than He Who formed such creatures to His own disgrace.

"The vilest thing must be less vile than Thou
 From whom it had its being, God and
 Lord! 446

Creator of all woe and sin! abhorred,
 Malignant and implacable! I vow

"That not for all Thy power furled and unfurled,
 For all the temples to Thy glory built, 450
 Would I assume the ignominious guilt
 Of having made such men in such a world "

"As if a Being, God or Fiend, could reign,
 At once so wicked, foolish, and insane,
 As to produce men when He might refrain! 455

"The world rolls round forever like a mill;
 It grinds out death and life and good and ill,
 It has no purpose, heart or mind or will

"While air of Space and Time's full river flow
 The mill must blindly whirl unresting so, 460
 It may be wearing out, but who can know?"

"Man might know one thing were his sight
 less dim,
 That it whirls not to suit his petty whim,
 That it is quite indifferent to him

"Nay, does it treat him harshly as he saith?
 It grinds him some slow years of bitter
 breath, 466
 Then grinds him back into eternal death "

9

It is full strange to him who hears and feels,
 When wandering there in some deserted
 street, 469
 The booming and the jar of ponderous wheels,
 The trampling clash of heavy ironshod feet
 Who in this Venice of the Black Sea rideth?
 Who in this city of the stars abideth?
 To buy or sell as those in daylight sweet?

The rolling thunder seems to fill the sky 475
 As it comes on, the horses snort and strain,
 The harness jungles, as it passes by;
 The hugeness of an overburthened wain —
 A man sits nodding on the shaft or trudges,
 Three parts asleep beside his fellow-drudges,
 And so it rolls into the night again 481

What merchandise? whence, whither, and for whom?

Perchance it is a Fate-appointed hearse,
 Bearing away to some mysterious tomb
 Or Lumbo of the scornful universe 485
 The joy, the peace, the life-hope, the abortions

Of all things good which should have been our portions,
 But have been strangled by that City's curse.

10

The mansion stood apart in its own ground,
In front thereof a fragrant garden-lawn, 490
High trees about it, and the whole walled round

The massive iron gates were both withdrawn,
And every window of its front shed light,
Portentous in that City of the Night

But though thus lighted, it was deadly still
As all the countless bulks of solid gloom, 496
Perchance a congregation to fulfill
Solemnities of silence in this doom,
Mysterious rites of dolor and despair
Permitting not a breath of chant or prayer?

Broad steps ascended to a terrace broad 501
Whereon lay still light from the open door,
The hall was noble, and its aspect awed,
Hung round with heavy black from dome
to floor,
And ample stairways rose to left and right 505
Whose balustrades were also draped with
night

I paced from room to room, from hall to hall,
Nor any life throughout the maze discerned;
But each was hung with its funereal pall,
And held a shrine, around which tapers
burned, 510
With picture or with statue or with bust,
All copied from the same fair form of dust —

A woman very young and very fair;
Beloved by bounteous life and joy and
youth,
And loving these sweet lovers, so that care 515
And age and death seemed not for her in sooth
Alike as stars, all beautiful and bright,
These shapes lit up that mausolean night.

At length I heard a murmur as of lips,
And reached an open oratory hung 520
With heaviest blackness of the whole eclipse;
Beneath the dome a fuming censer swung;
And one lay there upon a low white bed,
With tapers burning at the foot and head —

The Lady of the images. Supine, 525 Deathstill, lifesweet, with folded palms she
lay;
And kneeling there, as at a sacred shrine,
A young man wan and worn who seemed to pray;
A crucifix of dim and ghostly white
Surmounted the large altar left in night — 530

520 oratory, a room or chapel set apart for private devotions

"The chambers of the mansion of my heart,
In every one whereof thine image dwells,
Are black with grief eternal for thy sake.

"The inmost oratory of my soul,
Wherein thou ever dwellest quick or dead, 535
Is black with grief eternal for thy sake.

"I kneel beside thee and I clasp the cross
With eyes forever fixed upon that face,
So beautiful and dreadful in its calm.

"I kneel here patient as thou liest there; 540
As patient as a statue carved in stone,
Of adoration and eternal grief

"Whilst thou dost not awake I cannot move,
And something tells me thou wilt never wake
And I alive feel turning into stone. 545

"Most beautiful were Death to end my grief.
Most hateful to destroy the sight of thee,
Dear vision better than all death or life

"But I renounce all choice of life or death,
For either shall be ever at thy side, 550
And thus in bliss or woe be ever well."

He murmured thus and thus in monotone,
Intent upon that uncorrupted face,
Entranced except his moving lips alone
I glided with hushed footsteps from the
place 555
This was the festival that filled with light
That palace in the City of the Night.

11

What men are they who haunt these fatal
glooms,
And fill their living mouths with dust of
death,
And make their habitations in the tombs, 560
And breathe eternal sighs with mortal
breath,
And pierce life's pleasant veil of various error
To reach that void of darkness and old terror Wherein expire the lamps of hope and faith?

They have much wisdom, yet they are not wise, 565
They have much goodness, yet they do not well
(The fools we know have their own paradise,
The wicked also have their proper hell),
They have much strength, but still their doom is stronger,
Much patience, but their time endureth longer, 570
Much valor, but life mocks it with some spell

They are most rational and yet insane —
 An outward madness, not to be controlled,
 A perfect reason in the central brain,
 Which has no power, but sitteth wan and cold, 575
 And sees the madness, and foresees as plainly
 The ruin in its path, and trieth vainly
 To cheat itself refusing to behold.

And some are great in rank and wealth and
 power,
 And some renowned for genius and for worth, 580
 And some are poor and mean, who brood and cower
 And shrink from notice, and accept all dearth
 Of body, heart and soul, and leave to others
 All boons of life, yet these and those are brothers, 584
 The saddest and the weariest men on earth.

12

Our isolated units could be brought
 To act together for some common end?
 For one by one, each silent with his thought,
 I marked a long loose line approach and wend
 Athwart the great cathedral's cloistered square, 590
 And slowly vanish from the moonlit air
 Then I would follow in among the last;
 And in the porch a shrouded figure stood,
 Who challenged each one pausing ere he
 passed,
 With deep eyes burning through a blank
 white hood: 595
 "Whence come you in the world of life and
 light
 To this our City of Tremendous Night?"

"From pleading in a senate of rich lords
 For some scant justice to our countless hordes
 Who toil half-starved with scarce a human right — 600
 I wake from daydreams to this real night"

"From wandering through many a solemn scene
 Of opium visions, with a heart serene
 And intellect miraculously bright —
 I wake from daydreams to this real night."

"From making hundreds laugh and roar with glee 606
 By my transcendent feats of mimicry,
 And humor wanton as an elfish sprite —
 I wake from daydreams to this real night."

"From prayer and fasting in a lonely cell, 610
 Which brought an ecstasy ineffable
 Of love and adoration and delight —
 I wake from daydreams to this real night."

"From ruling on a splendid kingly throne 614
 A nation which beneath my rule has grown Year after year in wealth and arts and might —
 I wake from daydreams to this real night."

"From preaching to an audience fired with faith
 The Lamb who died to save our souls from
 death,
 Whose blood hath washed our scarlet sins
 wool-white — 620
 I wake from daydreams to this real night."

"From drinking fiery poison in a den
 Crowded with tawdry girls and squalid men,
 Who hoarsely laugh and curse and brawl and fight — 624
 I wake from daydreams to this real night"

"From picturing with all beauty and all grace
 First Eden and the parents of our race,
 A luminous rapture unto all men's sight —
 I wake from daydreams to this real night."

"From writing a great work with patient plan
 To justify the ways of God to man, 631
 And show how ill must fade and perish quite —
 I wake from daydreams to this real night"

"From desperate fighting with a little band
 Against the powerful tyrants of our land, 635
 To free our brethren in their own despite —
 I wake from daydreams to this real night."

Thus, challenged by that warder sad and stern,
 Each one responded with his countersign,
 Then entered the cathedral; and in turn 640
 I entered also, having given mine,
 But lingered near until I heard no more,
 And marked the closing of the massive door.

13

Of all things human which are strange and wild
 This is perchance the wildest and most strange, 645

620 blood . . . wool-white From Isaiah, 1 18 —
 "Though your sins be . . . red like crimson, they shall be as wool" 631 justify . . . man Milton thus states his purpose in writing Paradise Lost —
 "That to the height of this great argument
 I may assert eternal Providence,
 And justify the ways of God to man" (l, 24-26)

And showeth man most utterly beguiled,
 To those who haunt that sunless City's range —
 That he bemoans himself for aye, repeating
 How time is deadly swift, how life is fleeting,
 How naught is constant on the earth but
 change 650

The hours are heavy on him and the days,
 The burden of the months he scarce can bear;
 And often in his secret soul he prays
 To sleep through barren periods unaware,
 Arousing at some longed-for date of pleasure,
 Which having passed and yielded him small treasure, 656
 He would outsleep another term of care.

Yet in his marvelous fancy he must make Quick wings for Time, and see it fly from us —
 This Time which crawleth like a monstrous snake, 660
 Wounded and slow and very venomous;
 Which creeps blindwormlike round the earth
 and ocean,
 Distilling poison at each painful motion,
 And seems condemned to circle ever thus.

And since he cannot spend and use aright 665
 The little time here given him in trust,
 But wasteth it in weary undelight
 Of foolish toil and trouble, strife and lust,
 He naturally claimeth to inherit
 The everlasting Future, that his merit 670
 May have full scope—as surely is most just.

O length of the intolerable hours,
 O nights that are as æons of slow pain,
 O Time, too ample for our vital powers,
 O Life, whose woeful vanities remain 675
 Immutable for all of all our legions Through all the centuries and in all the regions,
 Not of your speed and variance we complain.

We do not ask a longer term of strife,
 Weakness and weariness and nameless woes; 680
 We do not claim renewed and endless life
 When this which is our torment here shall
 close,
 An everlasting conscious inanition!
 We yearn for speedy death in full fruition,
 Dateless oblivion and divine repose. 685

14

Large glooms were gathered in the mighty fane,
 With tinted moongleams slanting here and
 there,

And all was hush — no swelling organ-strain,
 No chant, no voice or murmuring of prayer,
 No priests came forth, no tinkling censers
 fumed, 690
 And the high altar space was unillumed

Around the pillars and against the walls Leaned men and shadows, others seemed to brood,
 Bent or recumbent, in secluded stalls.
 Perchance they were not a great multitude
 Save in that city of so lonely streets 696
 Where one may count up every face he meets.

All patiently awaited the event
 Without a stir or sound, as if no less
 Self-occupied, doomstricken, while attent 700
 And then we heard a voice of solemn stress
 From the dark pulpit, and our gaze there met
 Two eyes which burned as never eyes burned
 yet —

Two steadfast and intolerable eyes
 Burning beneath a broad and rugged brow;
 The head behind it of enormous size 706
 And as black fir-groves in a large wind bow,
 Our rooted congregation, gloom-arrayed,
 By that great sad voice deep and full were swayed:

"O melancholy Brothers, dark, dark, dark! 710
 O battling in black floods without an ark!
 O spectral wanderers of unholy Night!
 My soul hath bled for you these sunless years,
 With bitter blood-drops running down like
 tears;
 Oh, dark, dark, dark, withdrawn from joy and light! 715

"My heart is sick with anguish for your bale,
 Your woe hath been my anguish, yea, I quail
 And perish in your perishing unblest
 And I have searched the heights and depths,
 the scope
 Of all our universe, with desperate hope 720
 To find some solace for your wild unrest

"And now at last authentic word I bring,
 Witnessed by every dead and living thing,
 Good tidings of great joy for you, for all,
 There is no God, no Fiend with names divine
 Made us and tortures us, if we must pine, 726
 It is to satiate no Being's gall.

"It was the dark delusion of a dream,
 That living Person conscious and supreme,
 Whom we must curse for cursing us with
 life; 730
 Whom we must curse because the life He gave

Could not be buried in the quiet grave,
 Could not be killed by poison or by knife.

"This little life is all we must endure,
 The grave's most holy peace is ever sure, 735
 We fall asleep and never wake again,
 Nothing is of us but the moldering flesh,
 Whose elements dissolve and merge afresh
 In earth, air, water, plants, and other men.

"We finish thus, and all our wretched race
 Shall finish with its cycle, and give place 741
 To other beings, with their own time-doom;
 Infinite æons ere our kind began;
 Infinite æons after the last man
 Has joined the mammoth in earth's tomb and womb 745

"We bow down to the universal laws,
 Which never had for man a special clause
 Of cruelty or kindness, love or hate;
 If toads and vultures are obscene to sight,
 If tigers burn with beauty and with might, 750
 Is it by favor or by wrath of fate?

"All substance lives and struggles evermore
 Through countless shapes continually at war,
 By countless interactions interknit,
 If one is born a certain day on earth, 755
 All times and forces tended to that birth,
 Not all the world could change or hinder it

"I find no hint throughout the Universe
 Of good or ill, of blessing or of curse,
 I find alone Necessity Supreme, 760
 With infinite Mystery, abysmal, dark,
 Unlighted ever by the faintest spark
 For us the flitting shadows of a dream.

"O Brothers of sad lives! they are so brief;
 A few short years must bring us all relief —
 Can we not bear these years of laboring
 breath? 766
 But if you would not this poor life fulfill,
 Lo, you are free to end it when you will,
 Without the fear of waking after death."

The organ-like vibrations of his voice 770 Thrilled through the vaulted aisles and died
 away;
 The yearning of the tones which bade rejoice
 Was sad and tender as a requiem lay;
 Our shadowy congregation rested still
 As brooding on that "End it when you will."

15

Wherever men are gathered, all the air 776
 Is charged with human feeling, human
 thought;

Each shout and cry and laugh, each curse
 and prayer,
 Are into its vibrations surely wrought;
 Unspoken passion, wordless meditation, 780
 Are breathed into it with our respiration,
 It is with our life fraught and overfraught.

So that no man there breathes earth's simple
 breath,
 As if alone on mountains or wide seas;
 But nourishes warm life or hastens death 785
 With joys and sorrows, health and foul disease,
 Wisdom and folly, good and evil labors,
 Incessant of his multitudinous neighbors,
 He in his turn affecting all of these

That City's atmosphere is dark and dense, 790
 Although not many exiles wander there,
 With many a potent evil influence,
 Each adding poison to the poisoned air,
 Infections of unutterable sadness,
 Infections of incalculable madness, 795
 Infections of incurable despair.

16

Our shadowy congregation rested still,
 As musing on that message we had heard
 And brooding on that "End it when you will",
 Perchance awaiting yet some other word,
 When keen as lightning through a muffled
 sky 801
 Sprang forth a shrill and lamentable cry —

"The man speaks sooth, alas! the man speaks
 sooth,
 We have no personal life beyond the grave,
 There is no God, Fate knows nor wrath nor
 ruth 805
 Can I find here the comfort which I crave?

"In all eternity I had one chance,
 One few years' term of gracious human life
 The splendors of the intellect's advance,
 The sweetness of the home with babes and
 wife, 810

"The social pleasures with their genial wit,
 The fascination of the worlds of art;
 The glories of the worlds of nature, lit
 By large imagination's glowing heart,

"The rapture of mere being, full of health; 815
 The careless childhood and the ardent
 youth,
 The strenuous manhood winning various wealth,
 The reverend age serene with life's long truth —

"All the sublime prerogatives of Man,
The storied memories of the times of old,
The patient tracking of the world's great plan 821
Through sequences and changes myriad-fold

"This chance was never offered me before;
For me the infinite Past is blank and dumb
This chance recurrerth never, nevermore, 825
Blank, blank for me the infinite To-come

"And this sole chance was frustrate from my
birth,
A mockery, a delusion, and my breath
Of noble human life upon this earth
So racks me that I sigh for senseless death.

"My wine of life is poison mixed with gall, 831
My noonday passes in a nightmare dream,
I worse than lose the years which are my all;
What can console me for the loss supreme?

"Speak not of comfort where no comfort is,
Speak not at all, can words make foul things fair? 836
Our life's a cheat, our death a black abyss,
Hush and be mute, envisaging despair "

This vehement voice came from the northern aisle,
Rapid and shrill to its abrupt harsh close;
And none gave answer for a certain while, 841
For words must shrink from these most wordless woes;
At last the pulpit speaker simply said,
With humid eyes and thoughtful drooping
head:

"My brother, my poor brothers, it is thus:
This life itself holds nothing good for us, 846
But it ends soon and nevermore can be;
And we knew nothing of it ere our birth,
And shall know nothing when consigned to earth
I ponder these thoughts, and they comfort
me " 850

17

How the moon triumphs through the endless nights!
How the stars throb and glitter as they wheel
Their thick processions of supernal lights
Around the blue vault obdurate as steel!
And men regard with passionate awe and yearning 855
The mighty marching and the golden burning,
And think the heavens respond to what they feel.

Boats gliding like dark shadows of a dream,
Are glorified from vision as they pass
The quivering moonbridge on the deep black
stream, 860
Cold windows kindle their dead glooms of glass
To restless crystals; cornice, dome, and column
Emerge from chaos in the splendor solemn,
Like faery lakes gleam lawns of dewy grass.

With such a living light these dead eyes shine,
These eyes of sightless heaven, that as we gaze 866
We read a pity, tremulous, divine,
Or cold majestic scorn in their pure rays
Fond man! they are not haughty, are not tender;
There is no heart or mind in all their splendor,
They thread mere puppets all their marvelous maze 871

If we could near them with the flight unflown,
We should but find them worlds as sad as
this,
Or suns all self-consuming like our own
Enrined by planet worlds as much amiss.
They wax and wane through fusion and confusion, 876
The spheres eternal are a grand illusion,
The empyréan is a void abyss.

18

I wandered in a suburb of the north,
And reached a spot whence three close lanes led down, 880
Beneath thick trees and hedgerows winding forth
Like deep brook channels, deep and dark and low
The air above was wan with misty light;
The dull gray south showed one vague blur of white

I took the left-hand lane and slowly trod
Its earthen footpath, brushing as I went
The humid leafage, and my feet were shod
With heavy languor, and my frame down-
bent,
With infinite sleepless weariness outworn,
So many nights I thus had paced forlorn. 890

After a hundred steps I grew aware
Of something crawling in the lane below;
It seemed a wounded creature prostrate there
That sobbed with pangs in making progress
slow,
The hind limbs stretched to push, the fore
limbs then 895
To drag, for it would die in its own den

But coming level with it I discerned

That it had been a man; for at my tread
It stopped in its sore travail and half turned,
Leaning upon its right, and raised its head,
And with the left hand twitched back as in ire 901
Long gray unreverend locks befouled with mire —

A haggard filthy face with bloodshot eyes,

An infamy for manhood to behold
He gasped all trembling, "What, you want my prize? 905

You leave, to rob me, wine and lust and
gold

And all that men go mad upon, since you
Have traced my sacred secret of the clue?

"You think that I am weak and must submit;
Yet I but scratch you with this poisoned blade, 910

And you are dead as if I clove with it
That false fierce greedy heart. Betrayed!
betrayed!

I fling this phial if you seek to pass,
And you are forthwith shriveled up like
grass."

And then with sudden change, "Take thought!
take thought! 915

Have pity on me! it is mine alone
If you could find, it would avail you naught, Seek elsewhere on the pathway of your own.

For who of mortal or immortal race
The lifetrack of another can retrace? 920

"Did you but know my agony and toil!
Two lanes diverge up yonder from this lane;

My thin blood marks the long length of their soil;

Such clue I left, who sought my clue in vain

My hands and knees are worn both flesh and bone; 925

I cannot move but with continual moan.

"But I am in the very way at last

To find the long-lost broken golden thread
Which reunites my present with my past,

If you but go your own way." And I said,
"I will retire as soon as you have told 931
Whereunto leadeth this lost thread of gold"

"And so you know it not!" he hissed with scorn;

"I feared you, imbecile! It leads me back
From this accursed night without a morn, 935
And through the deserts which have else
no track,

And through vast wastes of horror-haunted
time,

To Eden innocence in Eden's clime;

"And I become a nursling soft and pure,
An infant cradled on its mother's knee, 940
Without a past, love-cherished and secure,
Which if it saw this loathsome present Me,
Would plunge its face into the pillowing
breast,
And scream abhorrence hard to lull to rest."

He turned to grope, and I, retiring, brushed
Thin shreds of gossamer from off my face,
And mused, His life would grow, the germ
uncrushed; 947

He should to antenatal night retrace,
And hide his elements in that large womb
Beyond the reach of man-evolving Doom 950

And even thus, what weary way were planned,
To seek oblivion through the far-off gate
Of birth, when that of death is close at hand!
For this is law, if law there be in Fate:
What never has been, yet may have its when,
The thing which has been, never is again 956

19

The mighty river flowing dark and deep,
With ebb and flood from the remote seatides

Vague-sounding through the City's sleepless
sleep,

Is named the River of the Suicides; 960
For night by night some lorn wretch over-wary,

And shuddering from the future yet more dreary,
Within its cold secure oblivion hides.

One plunges from a bridge's parapet, 964
As by some blind and sudden frenzy hurled,
Another wades in slow with purpose set
Until the waters are above him furled;
Another in a boat with dreamlike motion
Glides drifting down into the desert ocean,
To starve or sink from out the desert
world 970

They perish from their suffering surely thus,
For none beholding them attempts to save,
The while each thinks how soon, solicitous,
He may seek refuge in the selfsame wave;
Some hour when tired of ever-vain endurance
Impatience will forerun the sweet assurance
Of perfect peace eventual in the grave. 977

When this poor tragic-farce has palled us long,
Why actors and spectators do we stay? —
To fill our so-short rôles out right or wrong,

To see what shifts are yet in the dull play
For our illusion; to refrain from grieving 982
Dear foolish friends by our untimely leaving—
But those asleep at home, how blest are they!

Yet it is but for one night after all, 985
What matters one brief night of dreary
pain?

When after it the weary eyelids fall
Upon the weary eyes and wasted brain;
And all sad scenes and thoughts and feelings vanish

In that sweet sleep no power can ever banish,
That one best sleep which never wakes
again. 991

20

I sat me weary on a pillar's base,
And leaned against the shaft; for broad moonlight

O'erflowed the peacefulness of cloistered
space,

A shore of shadow slanting from the right
The great cathedral's western front stood
there, 996

A wave-worn rock in that calm sea of air.

Before it, opposite my place of rest,
Two figures faced each other, large, austere; 999

A couchant sphinx in shadow to the breast,
An angel standing in the moonlight clear,
So mighty by magnificence of form,
They were not dwarfed beneath that mass
enorm

Upon the cross-hilt of a naked sword
The angel's hands, as prompt to smite, were held; 1005

His vigilant, intense regard was poured
Upon the creature placidly unquelled,
Whose front was set at level gaze which took
No heed of aught, a solemn trance-like look

And as I pondered these opposéd shapes 1010
My eyelids sank in stupor, that dull swoon
Which drugs and with a leaden mantle drapes
The outworn to worse weariness. But soon
A sharp and clashing noise the stillness broke,
And from the evil lethargy I woke. 1015

The angel's wings had fallen, stone on stone,
And lay there shattered, hence the sudden
sound

A warrior leaning on his sword alone
Now watched the sphinx with that regard profound,

The sphinx unchanged looked forthright, as aware 1020

Of nothing in the vast abyss of air.

Again I sank in that repose unsweet,
Again a clashing noise my slumber rent,
The warrior's sword lay broken at his feet,
An unarmed man with raised hands impotent 1025
Now stood before the sphinx, which ever kept
Such mien as if with open eyes it slept.

My eyelids sank in spite of wonder grown,
A louder crash upstartled me in dread—
The man had fallen forward, stone on stone.
And lay there shattered, with his trunkless
head 1031

Between the monster's large quiescent paws,
Beneath its grand front changeless as life's laws

The moon had circled westward full and bright,

And made the temple-front a mystic dream,
And bathed the whole enclosure with its light,
The sworded angel's wrecks, the sphinx
supreme 1037

I pondered long that cold majestic face
Whose vision seemed of infinite void space.

21

Anear the center of that northern crest 1040
Stands out a level upland bleak and bare,
From which the city east and south and west

Sinks gently in long waves; and throned
there

An Image sits, stupendous, superhuman,
The bronze colossus of a wingéd Woman, 1045
Upon a graded granite base foursquare.

Low-seated she leans forward massively,
With cheek on clenched left hand, the fore-arm's might

Erect, its elbow on her rounded knee;
Across a clasped book in her lap the right
Upholds a pair of compasses, she gazes 1051
With full set eyes, but wandering in thick mazes

Of somber thought beholds no outward sight.

Words cannot picture her; but all men know
That solemn sketch the pure sad artist
wrought 1055

Three centuries and threescore years ago,
With phantasies of his peculiar thought:
The instruments of carpentry and science
Scattered about her feet, in strange alliance
With the keen wolf-hound sleeping undistraught, 1060

1055 sad artist, Albrecht Dürer (1471-1528), a famous German painter and engraver. His Melancholia is one of his most noted engravings.

Scales, hour-glass, bell, and magic-square
above,

The grave and solid infant perched beside,
With open winglets that might bear a dove,
Intent upon its tablets, heavy-eyed;
Her folded wings as of a mighty eagle, 1065
But all too impotent to lift the regal Robustness of her earth-born strength and pride;

And with those wings, and that light wreath which seems

To mock her grand head and the knotted frown
Of forehead charged with baleful thoughts and dreams, 1070

The household bunch of keys, the housewife's gown
Voluminous, indented, and yet rigid
As if a shell of burnished metal frigid,
The feet thick-shod to tread all weakness
down, 1074

The comet hanging o'er the waste dark seas,
The massy rainbow curved in front of it,
Beyond the village with the masts and trees;
The snaky imp, dog-headed, from the Pit,
Bearing upon its batlike leathern pinions 1079
Her name unfolded in the sun's dominions,
The "MELENCOLIA" that transcends all
wit

Thus has the artist copied her, and thus
Surrounded to expound her form sublime,
Her fate heroic and calamitous, 1084
Fronting the dreadful mysteries of Time,
Unvanquished in defeat and desolation,
Undaunted in the hopeless conflagration
Of the day setting on her baffled prime.

Baffled and beaten back she works on still,
Weary and sick of soul she works the more,
Sustained by her indomitable will; 1091
The hands shall fashion and the brain shall pore,
And all her sorrow shall be turned to labor,
Till Death, the friend-foe, piercing with his saber
That mighty heart of hearts, ends bitter
war. 1095

But as if blacker night could dawn on night,
With tenfold gloom on moonless night
unstarred,
A sense more tragic than defeat and blight,

1061 bell, and magic-square The bell, a symbol of faith, summons people to prayer The magic-square, a symbol of equality, is a square diagram consisting of a number of small squares each containing a number The numbers are so arranged that the sum of those in each of the various rows is the same

More desperate than strife with hope debarred,
More fatal than the adamantine Never 1100
Encompassing her passionate endeavor,
Dawns glooming in her tenebrous regard —

The sense that every struggle brings defeat
Because Fate holds no prize to crown success;

That all the oracles are dumb or cheat 1105
Because they have no secret to express,
That none can pierce the vast black veil uncertain

Because there is no light beyond the curtain,
That all is vanity and nothingness. 1109

Titanic from her high throne in the north,
That City's somber Patroness and Queen,
In bronze sublimity she gazes forth
Over her Capital of teen and threne,
Over the river with its isles and bridges,
The marsh and moorland, to the stern rock-ridges, 1115
Confronting them with a coeval mien

The moving moon and stars from east to west

Circle before her in the sea of air,
Shadows and gleams glide round her solemn rest

Her subjects often gaze up to her there
The strong to drink new strength of iron endurance, 1121

The weak new terrors, all, renewed assurance
And confirmation of the old despair.

GEORGE MEREDITH (1828-1909)

JUGGLING JERRY

Pitch here the tent, while the old horse grazes;
By the old hedge-side we'll halt a stage
It's nigh my last above the daisies,
My next leaf'll be man's blank page.
Yes, my old girl! and it's no use crying, 5
Juggler, constable, king, must bow
One that outjuggles all's been spying
Long to have me, and has me now.

We've traveled times to this old common;
Often we've hung our pots in the gorse. 10
We've had a stirring life, old woman!
You, and I, and the old gray horse
Races, and fairs, and royal occasions,

1102 tenebrous regard, dusky look 1113 teen and threne, sorrow and lamentation
Juggling Jerry 10. gorse, furze, a kind of spiny ever-green shrub

Found us coming to their call,
Now they'll miss us at our stations — 15
There's a juggler outjuggles all!

Up goes the lark, as if all were jolly!
Over the duck-pond the willow shakes,
It's easy to think that grieving's folly,
When the hand's firm as driven stakes! 20
Aye, when we're strong, and braced, and manful,
Life's a sweet fiddle, but we're a batch
Born to become the Great Juggler's han'ful
Balls he shies up, and is safe to catch

Here's where the lads of the village cricket—
I was a lad not wide from here, 26
Couldn't I juggle the bale off the wicket?
Like an old world those days appear!
Donkey, sheep, geese and thatched alehouse
— I know them!

They are old friends of my halts, and seem,
Somehow, as if kind thanks I owe them, 31
Juggling don't hinder the heart's esteem.

Juggling's no sin, for we must have victual,
Nature allows us to bait for the fool
Holding one's own makes us juggle no little,
But, to increase it, hard juggling's the rule
You that are sneering at my profession, 37
Haven't you juggled a vast amount?
There's the Prime Minister, in one Session,
Juggles more games than my sins'll count.

I've murdered insects with mock thunder; 41
Conscience, for that, in men don't quail
I've made bread from the bump of wonder,
That's my business, and there's my tale
Fashion and rank all praised the professor, 45
Aye! and I've had my smile from the Queen —
Bravo, Jerry! she meant, God bless her!
Ain't this a sermon on that scene?

I've studied men from my topsy-turvy
Close, and, I reckon, rather true 50
Some are fine fellows, some, right scurvy;
Most, a dash between the two.
But it's a woman, old girl, that makes me
Think more kindly of the race,
And it's a woman, old girl, that shakes me 55
When the Great Juggler I must face.

We two were married, due and legal;
Honest we've lived since we've been one.
Lord! I could then jump like an eagle;
You danced bright as a bit o' the sun 60

Birds in a May-bush we were! right merry!
All night we kissed, we juggled all day
Joy was the heart of juggling Jerry!
Now from his old girl he's juggled away.

It's past parsons to console us; 65
No, nor no doctor fetch for me —
I can die without my bolus,
Two of a trade, lass, never agree!
Parson and Doctor — don't they love rarely,
Fighting the devil in other men's fields! 70
Stand up yourself and match him fairly;
Then see how the rascal yields!

I, lass, have lived no gypsy, flaunting
Finery while his poor helpmate grubs; 74
Com I've stored, and you won't be wanting —
You shan't beg from the troughs and tubs Nobly you've stuck to me, though in his kitchen
Many a marquis would hail you cook!
Palaces you could have ruled and grown rich in,
But your old Jerry you never forsook 80

Hand up the chirper! ripe ale winks in it;
Let's have comfort and be at peace,
Once a stout draft made me light as a linnet
Cheer up! the Lord must have his lease. 84
May be — for none see in that black hollow —
It's just a place where we're held in pawn,
And, when the Great Juggler makes as to swallow,
It's just the sword-trick — I ain't quite
gone.

Yonder came smells of the gorse, so nutty,
Gold-like and warm; it's the prime of May Better than mortar, brick, and putty, 91
Is God's house on a blowing day.
Lean me more up the mound, now I feel
it,
All the old heath-smells! Ain't it strange?
There's the world laughing, as if to conceal it!
But He's by us, juggling the change. 96

I mind it well, by the sea-beach lying,
Once — it's long gone — when two gulls
we beheld,
Which, as the moon got up, were flying
Down a big wave that sparked and swelled
Crack went a gun one fell; the second 101 Wheeled round him twice, and was off for new luck;
There in the dark her white wing beckoned—
Drop me a kiss — I'm the bird dead-struck!

THE OLD CHARTIST

Whate'er I be, old England is my dam!
 So there's my answer to the judges, clear
 I'm nothing of a fox, nor of a lamb;
 I don't know how to cheat, nor how to leer;
 I'm for the nation!
 That's why you see me by the wayside here,
 Returning home from transportation.

It's Summer in her bath this morn, I think
 I'm fresh as dew, and chirpy as the birds,
 And just for joy to see old England wink
 Through leaves again, I could harangue the herds;

Isn't it something
 To speak out like a man when you've got words,

And prove you're not a stupid dumb thing?

They shipped me off for it; I'm here again
 Old England is my dam, whate'er I be Says I, I'll tramp it home, and see the grain —
 If you see well, you're king of what you see,
 Eyesight is having,
 If you're not given, I said, to gluttony
 Such talk to ignorance sounds as raving

You dear old brook, that from his Grace's park
 Come bounding! on you run near my old town.

My lord can't lock the water, nor the lark,
 Unless he kills him, can my lord keep down
 Up, is the song-note!

I've tried it, too — for comfort and renown,
 I rather pitched upon the wrong note

I'm not ashamed — not beaten's still my boast;

Again I'll rouse the people up to strike
 But home's where different politics jar most.
 Respectability the women like

This form, or that form —
 The Government may be hungry pike,
 But don't you mount a Chartist platform!

Well, well! Not beaten — spite of them, I shout,

And my estate is suffering for the cause —
 Now, what is yon brown water-rat about,
 Who washes his old poll with busy paws?
 What does he mean by 't?

It's like defying all our natural laws,
 For him to hope he'll get clean by 't.

His seat is on a mud-bank, and his trade
 Is dirt — he's quite contemptible; and yet
 The fellow's all as anxious as a maid
 To show a decent dress, and dry the wet.
 Now it's his whisker,
 And now his nose, and ear, he seems to get
 Each moment at the motion brisker!

To see him squat like little chaps at school, so I could let fly a laugh with all my might.
 He peers, hangs both his forepaws; bless that fool,

He's bobbing at his frill now! what a sight!
 Licking the dish up,
 As if he thought to pass from black to white,
 Like parson into lawny bishop.

The elms and yellow reed-flags in the sun
 Look on quite grave — the sunlight flecks
 his side;

And links of bindweed-flowers round him run,
 And shine up doubled with him in the tide.
 I'm nearly splitting,
 But nature seems like seconding his pride,
 And thinks that his behavior's fitting

That isle o' mud looks baking dry with gold
 His needle-muzzle still works out and in
 It really is a wonder to behold,
 And makes me feel the bristles of my chin
 Judged by appearance,
 I fancy of the two I'm nearer sin,
 And might as well commence a clearance

And that's what my fine daughter said — she meant
 Pray hold your tongue, and wear a Sunday
 face.

Her husband, the young linendraper, spent Much argument thereon — I'm their disgrace
 Bother the couple!

I feel superior to a chap whose place
 Commands him to be neat and supple.

But if I go and say to my old hen,
 I'll mend the gentry's boots, and keep discreet,

Until they grow too violent — why, then,
 A warmer welcome I might chance to meet —

Warmer and better.
 And if she fancies her old cock is beat,
 And drops upon her knees — so let her!

She suffered for me — women, you'll observe,
 Don't suffer for a Cause, but for a man. so
 When I was in the dock she showed her nerve
 I saw beneath her shawl my old tea-can Trembling . . . she brought it

The Old Chartist The Chartists were ardent political reformers of 1836-48 who aimed at relieving the social and industrial conditions of the working classes in England. They took their name from their official document, the People's Charter, which contained their complete platform. The document was drafted in the form of a charter or act of Parliament and was published in 1838.

To screw me for my work; she loathed my plan, 90
And therefore doubly kind I thought it.

I've never lost the taste of that same tea —
That liquor on my logic floats like oil,
When I state facts, and fellows disagree,
For human creatures all are in a coil; 95
All may want pardon

I see a day when every pot will boil
Harmonious in one great tea-garden!

We wait the setting of the dandy's day,
Before that time! — He's furbishing his dress — 100

He will be ready for it! — and I say
That yon old dandy rat amid the cress —
Thanks to hard labor! —

If cleanliness is next to godliness,
The old fat fellow's heaven's neighbor! 105

You teach me a fine lesson, my old boy!
I've looked on my superiors far too long;
And small has been my profit as my joy.

You've done the right while I've denounced the wrong.

Prosper me later! 110
Like you I will despise the sniggering throng
And please myself and my Creator.

I'll bring the linendraper and his wife
Some day to see you — taking off my hat.
Should they ask why, I'll answer: in my life
I never found so true a democrat. 116
Base occupation

Can't rob you of your own esteem, old rat!
I'll preach you to the British nation (1862)

From MODERN LOVE

I

By this he knew she wept with waking eyes:
That, at his hand's light quiver by her head,
The strange low sobs that shook their common bed

Were called into her with a sharp surprise,
And strangled mute, like little gaping snakes,
Dreadfully venomous to him. She lay 6
Stone-still, and the long darkness flowed away
With muffled pulses. Then, as midnight makes

Her giant heart of Memory and Tears
Drink the pale drug of silence, and so beat 10

104 cleanliness . . . godliness This expression has been credited to John Wesley (1703-91), who used it in a sermon on dress

Modern Love This is a series of 16-line poems recording the thoughts and feelings of a husband and a wife ("he" and "she" of the poems) who loved each other once, but whose love has long been dying. The husband sometimes speaks in his own person as "I"

Sleep's heavy measure, they from head to feet
Were moveless, looking through their dead
black years,

By vain regret scrawled over the blank wall
Like sculptured effigies they might be seen Upon their marriage-tomb, the sword between; 15
Each wishing for the sword that severs all.

13

"I play for Seasons, not Eternities!"
Says Nature, laughing on her way. "So must All those whose stake is nothing more than dust!"

And lo, she wins, and of her harmonies
She is full sure! Upon her dying rose 5
She drops a look of fondness, and goes by,
Scarce any retrospection in her eye,
For she the laws of growth most deeply knows,
Whose hands bear, here, a seed-bag — there,
an urn.

Pledged she herself to aught, 'twould mark her end! 10

This lesson of our only visible friend
Can we not teach our foolish hearts to learn?
Yes! yes! — but, oh, our human rose is fair
Surpassingly! Lose calmly Love's great bliss,
When the renewed forever of a kiss 15
Whirls life within the shower of loosened hair!

16

In our old shipwrecked days there was an hour,

When in the firelight steadily aglow,
Joined slackly, we beheld the red chasm grow
Among the clicking coals. Our library-bower
That eve was left to us; and hushed we sat 5
As lovers to whom Time is whispering.
From sudden-opened doors we heard them
sing;

The nodding elders mixed good wine with chat.

Well knew we that Life's greatest treasure lay
With us, and of it was our talk. "Ah, yes! 10
Love dies!" I said (I never thought it less).
She yearned to me that sentence to unsay.
Then when the fire domed blackening, I found
Her cheek was salt against my kiss, and swift
Up the sharp scale of sobs her breast did lift. — 15

Now am I haunted by that taste! that sound!

17

At dinner, she is hostess, I am host.
Went the feast ever cheerfuller? She keeps
The Topic over intellectual deeps

Poem 1. 15 the sword between The sword, as a symbol of honor, frequently functions in this way in the medieval romances. See Of the Passing Away of Brynhild, lines 141-143, page 644

In buoyancy afloat. They see no ghost.
 With sparkling surface-eyes we ply the ball; 5
 It is in truth a most contagious game —
 HIDING THE SKELETON shall be its name
 Such play as this the devils might appall!
 But here's the greater wonder in that we,
 Enamored of an acting naught can tire, 10
 Each other, like true hypocrites, admire;
 Warm-lighted looks, Love's ephemeridæ,
 Shoot gayly o'er the dishes and the wine.
 We waken envy of our happy lot
 Fast, sweet, and golden, shows the marriage-knot 15
 Dear guests, you now have seen Love's corpse-light shine

29

Am I failing? For no longer can I cast
 A glory round about this head of gold
 Glory she wears, but springing from the mold,
 Not like the consecration of the Past!
 Is my soul beggared? Something more than 5
 earth
 I cry for still; I cannot be at peace
 In having Love upon a mortal lease.
 I cannot take the woman at her worth!
 Where is the ancient wealth wherewith I clothed
 Our human nakedness, and could endow 10
 With spiritual splendor a white brow
 That else had grinned at me the fact I loathed?
 A kiss is but a kiss now! and no wave
 Of a great flood that whirls me to the sea
 But, as you will! we'll sit contentedly, 15
 And eat our pot of honey on the grave

43

Mark where the pressing wind shoots javelin-like
 Its skeleton shadow on the broad-backed wave!
 Here is a fitting spot to dig Love's grave —
 Here where the ponderous breakers plunge and strike,
 And dart their hissing tongues high up the
 sand; 5
 In hearing of the ocean, and in sight
 Of those ribbed wind-streaks running into white.
 If I the death of Love had deeply planned,
 I never could have made it half so sure,
 As by the unblest kisses which upbraid 10
 The full-waked sense, or failing that, degrade!

Poem 17 7 Hiding the Skeleton. They not only do not love each other, but each has another attraction—the wife, a man mentioned in Number 3; the husband, a lady with golden hair mentioned in Number 13 and Number 29. 12 ephemeridæ, delicate insects that live only a few hours or days. 16 corpse-light, a luminous appearance, resembling the flame of a candle, sometimes seen in graveyards and damp places, it is thought to portend death.

'Tis morning, but no morning can restore
 What we have forfeited. I see no sin;
 The wrong is mixed In tragic life, God wot,
 No villain need be! Passions spin the plot; 15
 We are betrayed by what is false within 44

They say that Pity in Love's service dwells,
 A porter at the rosy temple's gate
 I missed him going — but it is my fate
 To come upon him now beside his wells;
 Whereby I know that I Love's temple leave, 5
 And that the purple doors have closed behind.
 Poor soul! if, in those early days unkind,
 Thy power to sting had been but power to grieve,
 We now might with an equal spirit meet,
 And not be matched like innocence and vice
 She for the Temple's worship has paid price, 11
 And takes the coin of Pity as a cheat.
 She sees through simulation to the bone.
 What's best in her impels her to the worst,
 Never, she cries, shall Pity soothe Love's thirst, 15
 Or foul hypocrisy for truth atone

47

We saw the swallows gathering in the sky,
 And in the osier-isle we heard them noise.
 We had not to look back on summer joys,
 Or forward to a summer of bright dyc,
 But in the largeness of the evening earth 5
 Our spirits grew as we went side by side
 The hour became her husband and my bride
 Love, that had robbed us so, thus blessed our dearth!
 The pilgrims of the year waxed very loud
 In multitudinous chatterings, as the flood 10
 Full brown came from the West, and like pale blood
 Expanded to the upper crimson cloud
 Love, that had robbed us of immortal things,
 This little moment mercifully gave,
 Where I have seen across the twilight wave 15
 The swan sail with her young beneath her
 wings.

48

Their sense is with their senses all mixed in,
 Destroyed by subtleties these women are!
 More brain, O Lord, more brain! or we shall mar
 Utterly this fair garden we might win.
 Behold! I looked for peace, and thought it near 5
 Our inmost hearts had opened, each to each
 We drank the pure daylight of honest speech.
 Alas! that was the fatal draft, I fear.

Poem 43 14 wot, knows
Poem 47, 2 osier-isle, willow-isle.

For when of my lost Lady came the word,
 This woman, O this agony of flesh! 10
 Jealous devotion bade her break the mesh,
 That I might seek that other like a bird
 I do adore the nobleness! despise
 The act! She has gone forth, I know not where
 Will the hard world my sentence of her share?
 I feel the truth; so let the world surmise. 16

50

Thus piteously Love closed what he begat
 The union of this ever-diverse pair!
 These two were rapid falcons in a snare,
 Condemned to do the flitting of the bat.
 Lovers beneath the singing sky of May, 5
 They wandered once, clear as the dew on flowers.
 But they fed not on the advancing hours;
 Their hearts held cravings for the buried day
 Then each applied to each that fatal knife,
 Deep questioning, which probes to endless dole 10
 Ah, what a dusty answer gets the soul
 When hot for certainties in this our life!—
 In tragic hints here see what evermore
 Moves dark as yonder midnight ocean's force, Thundering like ramping hosts of warrior horse, 15
 To throw that faint thin line upon the shore!
 (1862)

DIRGE IN WOODS

A wind sways the pines,
 And below
 Not a breath of wild air—
 Still as the mosses that glow
 On the flooring and over the lines 5
 Of the roots here and there.
 The pine-tree drops its dead,
 They are quiet, as under the sea.
 Overhead, overhead
 Rushes life in a race, 10
 As the clouds the clouds chase;
 And we go,
 And we drop like the fruits of the tree,
 Even we,
 Even so. (1870)

A BALLAD OF PAST MERIDIAN

Last night returning from my twilight walk
 I met the gray mist Death, whose eyeless
 brow
 Was bent on me, and from his hand of chalk

*Poem 48 9 lost Lady See note on Poem 17 10 This woman, his wife
 A Ballad of Past Meridian Past meridian is afternoon*

He reached me flowers as from a withered
 bough
 O Death, what bitter nosegays givest thou! 5

Death said, "I gather," and pursued his way.
 Another stood by me, a shape in stone,
 Sword-hacked and iron-stained, with breasts
 of clay,
 And metal veins that sometimes fiery shone 9
 O Life, how naked and how hard when known!

Life said, "As thou hast carved me, such am
 I"

Then Memory, like the nightjar on the pine,
 And sightless Hope, a woodlark in night sky, Joined notes of Death and Life till night's decline. 14
 Of Death, of Life, those inwound notes are mine (1876)

LOVE IN THE VALLEY

Under yonder beech-tree single on the green-
 sward,
 Couched with her arms behind her golden
 head,
 Knees and tresses folded to slip and ripple
 idly,
 Lies my young love sleeping in the shade
 Had I the heart to slide an arm beneath her,
 Press her parting lips as her waist I gather
 slow, 6
 Waking in amazement she could not but embrace me,
 Then would she hold me and never let me go?

Shy as the squirrel and wayward as the swallow,
 Swift as the swallow along the river's light Circling the surface to meet his mirrored winglets, 11
 Fleeter she seems in her stay than in her flight
 Shy as the squirrel that leaps among the pine-tops,
 Wayward as the swallow overhead at set of sun,
 She whom I love is hard to catch and conquer, 15
 Hard, but O the glory of the winning were she won!

When her mother tends her before the laughing mirror,
 Tying up her laces, looping up her hair,
 Often she thinks, were this wild thing wedded,

12 nightjar, the European goatsucker, a night bird similar to the whippoorwill

More love should I have, and much less care. 20
When her mother tends her before the lighted mirror,
Loosening her laces, combing down her curls,
Often she thinks, were this wild thing wedded,
I should miss but one for many boys and girls

Heartless she is as the shadow in the meadows
Flying to the hills on a blue and breezy noon. 26
No, she is athirst and drinking up her wonder, Earth to her is young as the slip of the new moon
Deals she an unkindness, 'tis but her rapid measure,
Even as in a dance, and her smile can heal
no less; 30
Like the swinging May-cloud that pelts the flowers with hailstones
Off a sunny border, she was made to bruise and bless.

Lovely are the curves of the white owl sweeping
Wavy in the dusk lit by one large star.
Lone on the fir-branch, his rattle-note unvaried, 35
Brooding o'er the gloom, spins the brown
evejar
Darker grows the valley, more and more forgetting,
So were it with me if forgetting could be willed
Tell the grassy hollow that holds the bubbling well-spring,
Tell it to forget the source that keeps it
filled. 40

Stepping down the hill with her fair companions,
Arm in arm, all against the raying West, Boldly she sings, to the merry tune she marches,
Brave is her shape, and sweeter unpossessed.
Sweeter, for she is what my heart first awaking 45
Whispered the world was, morning light is she.
Love that so desires would fain keep her changeless;
Fain would fling the net, and fain have her
free.

Happy, happy time, when the white star hovers

Low over dim fields fresh with bloomy dew,
Near the face of dawn, that draws athwart
the darkness, 51
Threading it with color, like yewberries the yew.

Thicker crowd the shades as the grave East deepens
Glowing, and with crimson a long cloud swells.

Maiden still the morn is; and strange she is,
and secret; 55
Strange her eyes; her cheeks are cold as cold sea-shells.

Sunrays, leaning on our southern hills and lighting

Wild cloud-mountains that drag the hills along,
Oft ends the day of your shifting brilliant laughter

Chill as a dull face frowning on a song 60
Aye, but shows the Southwest a ripple-feathered bosom

Blown to silver while the clouds are shaken
and ascend,
Scaling the mid-heavens as they stream—there comes a sunset
Rich, deep like love in beauty without end.

When at dawn she sighs, and like an infant to the window 65

Turns grave eyes craving light, released from dreams,
Beautiful she looks, like a white water-lily Bursting out of bud in havens of the streams.

When from bed she rises clothed from neck
to ankle

In her long nightgown sweet as boughs of
May, 70

Beautiful she looks, like a tall garden lily Pure from the night, and splendid for the
day.

Mother of the dews, dark eye-lashed twilight,
Low-lidded twilight, o'er the valley's brim,
Rounding on thy breast sings the dew-delighted skylark, 75
Clear as though the dewdrops had their voice in him.

Hidden where the rose-flush drinks the ray-less planet,

Fountain-full he pours the spraying fountain-showers.

Let me hear her laughter, I would have her ever
Cool as dew in twilight, the lark above the
flowers. 80

All the girls are out with their baskets for
the primrose;
Up lanes, woods through, they troop in joyful bands
My sweet leads, she knows not why, but now
she loiters,
Eyes the bent anemones, and hangs her
hands
Such a look will tell that the violets are peeping, 85
Coming the rose; and unaware a cry Springs in her bosom for odors and for color,
Covert and the nightingale — she knows not why.

Kerchiefed head and chin she darts between her tulips,
Streaming like a willow gray in arrowy
rain 90
Some bend beaten cheek to gravel, and their angel
She will be; she lifts them, and on she speeds again.
Black the driving raincloud breasts the iron gateway;
She is forth to cheer a neighbor lacking
mirth.
So when sky and grass met rolling dumb for thunder 95
Saw I once a white dove, sole light of earth

Prim little scholars are the flowers of her garden,
Trained to stand in rows, and asking if they please.
I might love them well but for loving more the wild ones —
O my wild ones! they tell me more than these 100
You, my wild one, you tell of honeyed field-
rose,
Violet, blushing eglantine in life, and even as they,
They by the wayside are earnest of your goodness,
You are of life's, on the banks that line
the way.

Peering at her chamber the white crowns the red rose, 105
Jasmine winds the porch with stars two and three.

Parted is the window, she sleeps; the starry
jasmine
Breathes a falling breath that carries thoughts of me.
Sweeter unpossessed, have I said of her my sweetest?
Not while she sleeps — while she sleeps the jasmine breathes, 110
Luring her to love; she sleeps, the starry
jasmine
Bears me to her pillow under white rose-wreaths.

Yellow with birdfoot-trefoil are the grass-glades;
Yellow with cinquefoil of the dew-gray
leaf;
Yellow with stonecrop, the moss-mounds are yellow; 115
Blue-necked the wheat sways, yellowing to the sheaf.
Green-yellow bursts from the copse the laughing yaffle;
Sharp as a sickle is the edge of shade and
shine.
Earth in her heart laughs looking at the heavens,
Thinking of the harvest I look and think of mine. 120

This I may know her dressing and undress-
ing
Such a change of light shows as when the skies in sport
Shift from cloud to moonlight, or edging over
thunder
Slips a ray of sun; or sweeping into port
White sails furl, or on the ocean borders 125
White sails lean along the waves leaping
green.
Visions of her shower before me, but from eyesight
Guarded she would be like the sun were she seen.

Front door and back of the mossed old farmhouse
Open with the morn; and in a breezy link
Freshly sparkles garden to stripe-shadowed orchard, 131
Green across a rill where on sand the minnows wink.
Busy in the grass the early sun of summer
Swarms, and the blackbird's mellow fluting notes

113 birdfoot-trefoil, a three-lobed flower or leaf resembling the foot of a bird 114 cinquefoil, a plant having leaves with five leaflets 117 yaffle, the green woodpecker
130 link, a part of a winding stream and its adjacent land

Call my darling up with round and roguish challenge — 135

Quaintest, richest carol of all the singing throats!

Cool was the woodside; cool as her white dairy

Keeping sweet the cream-pan, and there the boys from school,

Cricketing below, rushed brown and red with sunshine,

O the dark translucence of the deep-eyed
cool! 140

Spying from the farm, herself she fetched a pitcher

Full of milk, and tilted for each in turn the beak

Then a little fellow, mouth up and on tiptoe,
Said, "I will kiss you", she laughed and leaned her cheek

Doves of the fir-wood walling high our red
roof 145

Through the long noon coo, crooning
through the coo

Loose droop the leaves, and down the sleepy roadway

Sometimes pipes a chaffinch, loose droops
the blue

Cows flap a slow tail knee-deep in the river, Breathless, given up to sun and gnat and
fly 150

Nowhere is she seen, and if I see her nowhere, Lightning may come, straight rains and tiger sky.

O the golden sheaf, the rustling treasure-armfull

O the nutbrown tresses nodding interlaced!

O the treasure-tresses one another over 155 Nodding! O the girdle slack about the waist!

Slain are the poppies that shot their random scarlet

Quick amid the wheatears, wound about
the waist,

Gathered, see these brides of Earth one blush of ripeness!

O the nutbrown tresses nodding interlaced!

Large and smoky red the sun's cold disk drops, 161

Clipped by naked hills, on violet shaded
snow;

Eastward large and still lights up a bower of
moonrise,

Whence at her leisure steps the moon
aglow.

Nightlong on black print-branches our beech-
tree 165

Gazes in this whiteness, nightlong could I.
Here may life on death or death on life be painted.

Let me clasp her soul to know she cannot
die!

Gossips count her faults, they scour a narrow chamber

Where there is no window, read not heaven or her 170

"When she was a tiny," one aged woman
quavers,

Plucks at my heart and leads me by the ear

Faults she had once as she learned to run and tumbled,

Faults of feature some see, beauty not complete

Yet, good gossips, beauty that makes holy Earth and air, may have faults from head to feet 176

Hither she comes, she comes to me, she lingers,

Deepens her brown eyebrows, while in new surprise

High rise the lashes in wonder of a stranger,
Yet am I the light and living of her eyes

Something friends have told her fills her heart to brumming, 181

Nets her in her blushes, and wounds her,
and tames —

Sure of her haven, O like a dove alighting, Arms up, she dropped, our souls were in our names

Soon will she lie like a white-frost sunrise
Yellow oats and brown wheat, barley pale

as rye, 186

Long since your sheaves have yielded to the thresher,

Felt the girdle loosened, seen the tresses
fly.

Soon will she lie like a blood-red sunset
Swift with the tomorrow, green-winged

Spring! 190

Sing from the Southwest, bring her back the truants,

Nightingale and swallow, song and dipping
wing.

Soft new beech-leaves, up to beamy April Spreading bough on bough a primrose mountain, you

165 print-branches, shadows of the branches of the beech-tree

Lucid in the moon, raise lilies to the sky-fields, 195
Youngest green transfused in silver shining
through —
Fairer than the lily, than the wild white cherry,
Fair as in image my seraph love appears Borne to me by dreams when dawn is at my eyelids,
Fair as in the flesh she swims to me on
tears. 200

Could I find a place to be alone with heaven,
I would speak my heart out; heaven is my need
Every woodland tree is flushing like the dogwood,
Flashing like the whitebeam, swaying like the reed —
Flushing like the dogwood crimson in October, 205
Streaming like the flag-reed Southwest blown,
Flashing as in gusts the sudden-lighted white-
beam.
All seem to know what is for heaven alone

THE LARK ASCENDING

He rises and begins to round,
He drops the silver chain of sound,
Of many links without a break,
In chirrup, whistle, slur, and shake —
All interwoven and spreading wide, 5
Like water-dimples down a tide
Where ripple ripple overcurls
And eddy into eddy whirls;
A press of hurried notes that run
So fleet they scarce are more than one, 10
Yet changingly the trills repeat
And linger ringing while they fleet —
Sweet to the quick o' the ear, and dear
To her beyond the handmaid ear,
Who sits beside our inner springs, 15
Too often dry for this he brings,
Which seems the very jet of earth
At sight of sun, her music's mirth,
As up he wings the spiral stair,
A song of light, and pierces air 20
With fountain ardor, fountain play,
To reach the shining tops of day,
And drink in everything discerned,
An ecstasy to music turned —
Impelled by what his happy bill 25
Disperses, drinking, showering still,

204 whitebeam, a small tree with leaves white on the underside
The Lark Ascending 14 her, the spirit of earth or nature within us

Unthinking save that he may give
His voice the outlet, there to live
Renewed in endless notes of glee,
So thirsty of his voice is he, 30
For all to hear and all to know
That he is joy, awake, aglow —
The tumult of the heart to hear
Through pureness filtered crystal-clear—
And know the pleasure sprinkled bright 35
By simple singing of delight,
Shrill, irreflective, unrestrained,
Rapt, ringing, on the jet sustained
Without a break, without a fall,
Sweet-silvery, sheer lyrical, 40
Perennial, quavering up the chord
Like myriad dews of sunny sward
That trembling into fullness shine,
And sparkle dropping argentine;
Such wooing as the ear receives 45
From zephyr caught in choric leaves
Of aspens when their chattering net
Is flushed to white with shivers wet,
And such the water-spirit's chime
On mountain heights in mornings prime, 50
Too freshly sweet to seem excess,
Too animate to need a stress,
But wider over many heads
The starry voice ascending spreads,
Awakening, as it waxes thin, 55
The best in us to him akin;
And every face to watch him raised
Puts on the light of children praised —
So rich our human pleasure ripes
When sweetness on sincerity pipes, 60
Though naught be promised from the seas—
But only a soft-ruffling breeze
Sweep glittering on a still content,
Serenity in rapturement

For singing till his heaven fills, 65
'Tis love of earth that he instills,
And ever winging up and up,
Our valley is his golden cup,
And he the wine which overflows
To lift us with him as he goes — 70
But not from earth is he divorced,
He joyfully to fly enforced.
The woods and brooks, the sheep and kine,
He is, the hills, the human line,
The meadows green, the fallows brown, 75
The dreams of labor in the town,
He sings the sap, the quickened veins,
The wedding song of sun and rains
He is, the dance of children, thanks
Of sowers, shout of primrose-banks, 80
And eye of violets while they breathe,
All these the circling song will breathe,
And you shall hear the herb and tree,

44 argentine, silver-like substance

The better heart of men shall see,
Shall feel celestially — as long
As you crave nothing save the song.

85

Was never voice of ours could say
Our inmost in the sweetest way,
Like yonder voice aloft, and link
All hearers in the song they drink.
Our wisdom speaks from failing blood,
Our passion is too full in flood;
We want the key of his wild note
Of truthful in a tuneful throat,
The song seraphically free
Of taint of personality —
So pure that it salutes the suns,
The voice of one for millions,
In whom the millions rejoice
For giving their one spirit voice.

Yet men have we, whom we revere,
Now names — and men still housing here —
Whose lives, by many a battle-dint
Defaced, and grinding wheels on flint,
Yield substance, though they sing not, sweet
For song our highest heaven to greet;
Whom heavenly singing gives us new,
Ensppheres them brilliant in our blue,
From firmest base to farthest leap,
Because their love of Earth is deep,
And they are warriors in accord
With life to serve, and pass reward —
So touching purest and so heard
In the brain's reflex of yon bird.
Wherefore their soul in me — or mine,
Through self-forgetfulness divine,
In them — that song aloft maintains,
To fill the sky and thrill the plains
With showerings drawn from human stores,
As he to silence nearer soars,
Extends the world at wings and dome,
More spacious making more our home,
Till lost on his aerial rings
In light — and then the fancy sings

LUCIFER IN STARLIGHT

On a starred night Prince Lucifer uprose
Tired of his dark dominion, swung the fiend
Above the rolling ball, in cloud part screened,
Where sinners hugged their specter of repose.

Poor prey to his hot fit of pride were those. 5
And now upon his western wing he leaned,
Now his huge bulk o'er Afric's sands careened,
Now the black planet shadowed Arctic snows

96 taint of personality, egotism 112 pass, do without 114 brain's reflex, mind's reflection or interpretation 122 More home, extending our habitat
Lucifer in Starlight 2 his dark dominion, hell

Soaring through wider zones that pricked his scars
With memory of the old revolt from Awe, 10
He reached a middle height, and at the stars,
Which are the brain of heaven, he looked,
and sank.

Around the ancient track marched, rank on rank,
The army of unalterable law.

SENSE AND SPIRIT

The senses loving Earth or well or ill,
Ravel yet more the riddle of our lot.
The mind is in their trammels, and lights not
By trimming fear-bred tales, nor does the will
To find in nature things which less may chill
An ardor that desires, unknowing what. 6
Till we conceive her living we go distraught,
At best but circle-windsails of a mill.
Seeing she lives, and of her joy of life
Creatively has given us blood and breath 10
For endless war and never wound unhealed,
The gloomy Wherefore of our battlefield
Solves in the Spirit, wrought of her through
strife

To read her own and trust her down to death

THE SPIRIT OF SHAKESPEARE

Thy greatest knew thee, Mother Earth, unsoured

He knew thy sons. He probed from hell to hell

Of human passions, but of love deflowered
His wisdom was not, for he knew thee well
Thence came the honeyed corner at his lips, 5
The conquering smile wherein his spirit sails Calm as the god who the white sea-wave
whips,

Yet full of speech and intershifting tales,
Close mirrors of us. Thence had he the laugh
We feel is thine — broad as ten thousand beeves 10

At pasture! Thence thy songs, that winnow chaff

From grain, bid sick Philosophy's last leaves
Whirl, if they have no response — they enforced

To fatten Earth when from her soul divorced

How smiles he at a generation ranked
 In gloomy noddings over life! They pass.
 Not he to feed upon a breast unthanked,
 Or eye a beauteous face in a cracked glass.
 But he can spy that little twist of brain ⁵
 Which moved some weighty leader of the blind—

Unwitting 'twas the goad of personal pain—
 To view in curst eclipse our Mother's mind,
 And show us of some rigid harridan
 The wretched bondmen till the end of time
 O lived the Master now to paint us Man, ¹¹
 That little twist of brain would ring a chime
 Of whence it came and what it caused, to start

Thunders of laughter, clearing air and heart.

EARTH'S SECRET

Not solitarly in fields we find Earth's secret open, though one page is
 there—

Her plainest, such as children spell, and share With bird and beast—raised letters for the blind.

Not where the troubled passions toss the mind, ⁵

In turbid cities, can the key be bare.
 It hangs for those who luther thither fare,
 Close interthreading nature with our kind.
 They, hearing History speak, of what men
 were,

And have become, are wise The gain is great
 In vision and solidity; it lives. ¹¹
 Yet at a thought of life apart from her,
 Solidity and vision lose their state,
 For Earth, that gives the milk, the spirit gives

MELAMPUS

With love exceeding a simple love of the
 things

That glide in grasses and rubble of woody
 wreck;

Or change their perch on a beat of quivering
 wings

From branch to branch, only restful to pipe
 and peck;

The Spirit of Shakespeare—Continued 3-4 Not he . . .
glass He is not the one to receive benefits ungratefully from the world, or to present a distorted view of humankind Melampus. In Greek mythology Melampus was a physician who obtained the power of understanding the language of birds and other animals after his ears had been licked by some young serpents which he had saved from
 death

Or, bristled, curl at a touch their snouts in a ball, ⁵

Or cast their web between bramble and thorny hook—

The good physician Melampus, loving them
 all,

Among them walked, as a scholar who reads a book.

For him the woods were a home and gave him the key

Of knowledge, thirst for their treasures
 in herbs and flowers, ¹⁰

The secrets held by the creatures nearer than
 we

To earth he sought, and the link of their life with ours:

And where alike we are, unlike where, and the veined

Division, veined parallel, of a blood that flows

In them, in us, from the source by man un-attained ¹⁵

Save marks he well what the mystical woods disclose.

And thus he deemed might be boon of love to a breast

Embracing tenderly each little motive shape,

The prone, the flitting, who seek their food
 whither best

Their wits direct, whither best from their foes escape; ²⁰

For closer drawn to our mother's natural milk,

As babes they learn where her motherly help is great

They know the juice for the honey, juice for the silk,

And, need they medical antidotes, find them straight.

Of earth and sun they are wise, they nourish
 their broods, ²⁵

Weave, build, hive, burrow, and battle, take joy and pain

Like swimmers varying billows. Never in woods

Runs white insanity fleeing itself, all sane
 The woods revolve: as the tree its shadowing limns

To some resemblance in motion, the rooted life ³⁰

Restrains disorder; you hear the primitive hymns

Of earth in woods issue wild of the web of
 strife.

Now sleeping once on a day of marvelous
fire,
A brood of snakes he has cherished in grave regret
That death his people had dealt their dam and their sire, 35
Through savage dread of them, crept to his neck, and set
Their tongues to lick him The swift affectionate tongue
Of each ran licking the slumberer, then his ears
A forked red tongue tickled shrewdly, sudden upsprung,
He heard a voice piping: Aye, for he has no fears! 40
A bird said that, in the notes of birds, and the speech
Of men, it seemed, and another renewed
He moves
To learn and not to pursue, he gathers to teach,
He feeds his young as do we, and as we love loves
No fears have I of a man who goes with his
head 45
To earth, chance looking aloft at us, kind
of hand
I feel to him as to earth of whom we are fed,
I pipe him much for his good could he understand
Melampus touched at his ears, laid finger on wrist;
He was not dreaming, he sensibly felt and
heard. 50
Above, through leaves, where the tree-twigs thick intertwist,
He spied the birds and the bill of the speaking bird.
His cushion mosses in shades of various green,
The lumped, the antlered, he pressed, while the sunny snake
Slipped under; drafts he had drunk of clear
Hippocrene, 55
It seemed, and sat with a gift of the gods
awake.
Divinely thrilled was the man, exultingly full,
As quick well-waters that come of the heart
of earth,
Ere yet they dart in a brook are one bubble-pool
To light and sound, wedding both at the leap of birth. 60
The soul of light vivid shone, a stream within
stream;

55 Hippocrene, a fountain on Mt Helicon, in Boeotia, Greece. Its waters were supposed to impart poetic inspiration

The soul of sound from a musical shell out-flew,
Where others hear but a hum and see but a beam,
The tongue and eye of the fountain of life
he knew.
He knew the Hours: they were round him,
laden with seed 65
Of hours bestrewn upon vapor, and one by
one
They winged as ripened in fruit the burden decreed
For each to scatter; they flushed like the buds in sun,
Bequeathing seed to successive similar rings,
Their sisters, bearers to men of what men have earned 70
He knew them, talked with the yet unred-
dened; the stings,
The sweets, they warmed at their bosoms
divined, discerned.
Not unsolicited, sought by diligent feet,
By riddling fingers expanded, oft watched in growth
With brooding deep as the noon-ray's quickening wheat, 75
Ere touched, the pendulous flower of the plants of sloth,
The plants of rigidity, answered question
and squeeze,
Revealing wherefore it bloomed uninviting,
bent,
Yet making harmony breathe of life and
disease,
The deeper chord of a wonderful instrument. 80
So passed he luminous-eyed for earth and the fates
We arm to bruise or caress us; his ears were charged
With tones of love in a whirl of voluble hates,
With music wrought of distraction his ear enlarged
Celestial-shining, though mortal, singer, though mute, 85
He drew the Master of harmonies, voiced or stilled,
To seek him; heard at the silent medicine-root
A song, beheld in fulfillment the unfulfilled Him Phœbus, lending to darkness color and form
Of light's excess, many lessons and counsels
gave; 90

65 Hours, the Horæ (Hours), goddesses of the seasons and of day and night 86 Master of harmonies, Phœbus Apollo, god of music, of poetry, and of the sun

Showed Wisdom lord of the human intricate swarm,
 And whence prophetic it looks on the hives
 that rave,
 And how acquired, of the zeal of love to acquire,
 And where it stands, in the center of life a
 sphere,
 And Measure, mood of the lyre, the rapturous
 lyre, ⁹⁵
 He said was Wisdom, and struck him the notes to hear.

Sweet, sweet 'twas glory of vision, honey,
 the breeze
 In heat, the run of the river on root and
 stone,
 All senses joined, as the sister Pierides
 Are one, uplifting their chorus, the Nine,
 his own. ¹⁰⁰
 In stately order, evolved of sound into sight,
 From sight to sound intershifting, the man
 descried
 The growths of earth, his adored, like day
 out of night,
 Ascend in song, seeing nature and song
 allied. ⁵

And there vitality, there, there solely in song,
 Resides, where earth and her uses to men,
 their needs, ¹⁰⁶
 Their forceful cravings, the theme are. there is it strong,
 The Master said. and the studious eye that reads (Yea, even as earth to the crown of gods on the mount),
 In links divine with the lyrical tongue is bound ¹¹⁰
 Pursue thy craft it is music drawn of a fount
 To spring perennial, well-spring is common ground.

Melampus dwelt among men physician and sage,
 He served them, loving them, healing them;
 sick or maimed
 Or them that frenzied in some delirious rage
 Outran the measure, his juice of the woods reclaimed ¹¹⁶
 He played on men, as his master, Phœbus, on strings
 Melodious; as the god did he drive and check,
 Through love exceeding a simple love of the
 things
 That glide in grasses and rubble of woody wreck (1883)

ON THE DANGER OF WAR

Avert, High Wisdom, never vainly wooed,
 This threat of War, that shows a land brain-sick
 When nations gain the pitch where rhetoric
 Seems reason they are ripe for cannon's food
 Dark looms the issue though the cause be good, ⁵
 But with the doubt 'tis our old devil's trick
 O now the down-slope of the lunatic
 Illumine lest we redden of that brood.
 For not since man in his first view of thee
 Ascended to the heavens giving sign ¹⁰
 Within him of deep sky and sounded sea,
 Did he unforfeiting thy laws transgress,
 In peril of his blood his ears incline
 To drums whose loudness is their emptiness (1885)

HARD WEATHER

Bursts from a rending East in flaws
 The young green leaflet's harrier, sworn
 To strew the garden, strip the shaws,
 And show our spring with banner torn.
 Was ever such virago morn? ⁵
 The wind has teeth, the wind has claws
 All the wind's wolves through woods are loose,
 The wild wind's falconry aloft
 Shrill underfoot the grassblade shrews,
 At gallop, clumped, and down the croft ¹⁰
 Bestrid by shadows, beaten, tossed,
 It seems a scythe, it seems a rod.
 The howl is up at the howl's accost;
 The shivers greet and the shivers nod.

Is the land ship? we are rolled, we drive ¹⁵
 Tritonly, cleaving hiss and hum;
 Whirl with the dead, or mount or dive,
 Or down in dregs, or on in scum.
 And drums the distant, pipes the near,
 And vale and hill are gray in gray, ²⁰
 As when the surge is crumbling sheer,
 And sea-mews wing the haze of spray.
 Clouds — are they bony witches? — swarms,
 Darting swift on the robber's flight,
 Hurry an infant sky in arms. ²⁵
 It peeps, it becks; 'tis day, 'tis night.
 Black while over the loop of blue
 The swathe is closed, like shroud on corse.
 Lo, as if swift the Furies flew,
 The Fates at hell at a cry to horse! ³⁰

Interpret me the savage whirr:
 And is it Nature scourged, or she,

Hard Weather 3 shaws, woods 9 shrews, curses 10 croft, pasture 16 Tritonly, like Triton, a god of the sea who raised or calmed the waves by blowing upon his trumpet 24 the flight, the sweep of the wind 29
 Furies, three avenging deities, attendants of Proserpina, queen of Hades 30 Fates, three goddesses whose office it was to spin the thread of human destiny

Her offspring's executioner,
 Reducing land to barren sea?
 But is there meaning in a day 35
 When this fierce angel of the air,
 Intent to throw, and haply slay,
 Can, for what breath of life we bear
 Exact the wrestle? Call to mind
 The many meanings glistening up 40
 When Nature to her nurslings kind,
 Hands them the fruitage and the cup!
 And seek we rich significance
 Not elsewhere than with those tides
 Of pleasure on the sunned expanse, 45
 Whose flow deludes, whose ebb derides?

Look in the face of men who fare
 Lock-mouthed, a match in lungs and thews
 For this fierce angel of the air,
 To twist with him and take his bruise. 50
 That is the face beloved of old
 Of Earth, young mother of her brood
 Nor broken for us shows the mold
 When muscle is in mind renewed
 Though farther from her nature rude, 55
 Yet nearer to her spirit's hold;
 And though of gentler mood serene,
 Still forceful of her fountain-jet
 So shall her blows be shrewdly met,
 Be luminously read the scene 60
 Where Life is at her grindstone set,
 That she may give us edging keen,
 String us for battle, till as play
 The common strokes of fortune shower
 Such meaning in a dagger-day 65
 Our wits may clasp to wax in power —
 Yea, feel us warmer at her breast,
 By spin of blood in lusty drill,
 Than when her honeyed hands caressed,
 And Pleasure, sapping, seemed to fill. 70

Behold the life at ease; it drifts.
 The sharpened life commands its course.
 She winnows, winnows roughly; sifts,
 To dip her chosen in her source.
 Contention is the vital force, 75
 Whence pluck they brain, her prize of gifts,
 Sky of the senses! on which height,
 Not disconnected, yet released,
 They see how spirit comes to light,
 Through conquest of the inner beast, 80
 Which Measure tames to movement sane,
 In harmony with what is fair.
 Never is Earth misread by brain:
 That is the welling of her, there
 The mirror — with one step beyond, 85
 For likewise is it voice; and more:
 Benignest kinship bids respond,
 When wail the weak, and then restore

Whom days as fell as this may rive,
 While Earth sits ebon in her gloom, 90
 Us atomies of life alive
 Unheeding, bent on life to come.
 Her children of the laboring brain,
 These are the champions of the race,
 True parents, and the sole humane, 95
 With understanding for their base
 Earth yields the milk, but all her mind
 Is vowed to thresh for stouter stock.
 Her passion for old giantkind,
 That scaled the mount, uphurled the rock, 100
 Devolves on them who read aright
 Her meaning and devoutly serve;
 Nor in her starlessness of night
 Peruse her with the craven nerve:
 But even as she from grass to corn, 105
 To eagle high from grubbing mole,
 Prove in strong brain her noblest born,
 The station for the flight of soul (1888)

OUTER AND INNER

From twig to twig the spider weaves
 At noon his webbing fine
 So near to mute the zephyrs flute
 That only leaflets dance.
 The sun draws out of hazel leaves 5
 A smell of woodland wine
 I wake a swarm to sudden storm
 At any step's advance

Along my path is bugloss blue,
 The star with fruit in moss, 10
 The foxgloves drop from throat to top
 A daily lesser bell.
 The blackest shadow, nurse of dew,
 Has orange skeins across,
 And keenly red is one thin thread 15
 That flashing seems to swell.

My world I note ere fancy comes,
 Minutest hushed observe:
 What busy bits of motioned wits
 Through antlered mosswork strive. 20
 But now so low the stillness hums,
 My springs of seeing swerve,
 For half a wink to thrill and think
 The woods with nymphs alive.

I neighbor the invisible 25

Accept, she says, it is not hard
In woods, but she in towns
Repeats, accept, and have we wept, 35
And have we quailed with fears,
Or shrunk with horrors, sure reward
We have whom knowledge crowns;

The soul through blood and tears. 40

NATURE AND LIFE

Leave the uproar! At a leap
Thou shalt strike a woodland path,
Enter silence, not of sleep,
Under shadows, not of wrath;
Breath which is the spirit's bath, 5
In the old Beginnings find,
And endow them with a mind,
Seed for seedling, swathe for swathe.
That gives Nature to us, this
Give we her, and so we kiss 10

Fruitful is it so — but hear
How within the shell thou art,
Music sounds; nor other near
Can to such a tremor start.
Of the waves our life is part; 15
They our running harvests bear —
Back to them for manful air,
Laden with the woodland's heart!
That gives Battle to us, this Give we it, and good the kiss. (1888)

HYMN TO COLOR

With Life and Death I walked when Love appeared,
And made them on each side a shadow seem Through wooded vales the land of dawn we neared,
Where down smooth rapids whirls the helm-less dream
To fall on daylight, and night puts away 5
Her darker veil for gray.

In that gray veil green grassblades brushed we by;
We came where woods breathed, sharp, and overhead
Rocks raised clear horns on a transforming
sky

Hymn to Color In this poem Light, Darkness, and Color symbolize respectively Life, Death, and Love

Around, save for those shapes, with him who led 10
And linked them, desert varied by no sign
Of other life than mine.

By this the dark-winged planet, raying wide,
From the mild pearl-glow to the rose up-borne,
Drew in his fires, less faint than far descried,
Pure-fronted on a stronger wave of morn, 16
And those two shapes the splendor inter-weaved
Hung web-like, sank, and heaved.

Love took my hand when hidden stood the
sun
To fling his robe on shoulder-heights of snow, Then said: There lie they, Life and Death in
one 21
Whichever is, the other is; but know,
It is thy craving self that thou dost see,
Not in them seeing me.

Shall man into the mystery of breath 25
From his quick beating pulse a pathway spy?
Or learn the secret of the shrouded death,
By lifting up the lid of a white eye?
Cleave thou thy way with fathering desire
Of fire to reach to fire 30

Look now where Color, the soul's bridegroom,
makes
The house of heaven splendid for the bride
To him as leaps a fountain she awakes,
In knotting arms, yet boundless; him beside,
She holds the flower to heaven, and by his power 35
Brings heaven to the flower.

He gives her homeliness in desert air,
And sovereignty in spaciousness; he leads Through widening chambers of surprise to where
Throbs rapture near an end that aye recedes,
Because his touch is infinite and lends 41
A yonder to all ends

Death begs of Life his blush; Life Death persuades
To keep long day with his caresses graced
He is the heart of light, the wing of shades, 45
The crown of beauty. Never soul embraced
Of him can harbor unfaith; soul of him
Possessed walks never dim.

13 dark-winged planet, the morning star 17 two shapes, Life and Death, of line 1. Supply that after shapes 43-45 Death . . . shades. Under the influence of Love (Color, line 31), Death becomes less hideous and Life seems prolonged Love (He, of line 45) causes shades, or shadows, to depart

Love eyed his rosy memories, he sang:
 O bloom of dawn, breathed up from the gold sheaf 50
 Held springing beneath Orient! that dost hang
 The space of dewdrops running over leaf,
 Thy fleetingness is bigger in the ghost
 Than Time with all his host!

Of thee to say behold, has said adieu — 55
 But love remembers how the sky was green,
 And how the grasses glimmered lightest blue,
 How saint-like gray took fervor; how the screen

Of cloud grew violet; how thy moment came
 Between a blush and flame 60

Love saw the emissary eglantine
 Break wave round thy white feet above the
 gloom,
 Lay finger on thy star, thy raiment line
 With cherub wing and limb, wed thy soft bloom,
 Gold-quivering like sunrays in thistledown,
 Earth under rolling brown 66

They do not look through love to look on
 thee,
 Great heavenliness! nor know they joy of
 sight,
 Who deem the wave of rapt desire must be
 Its wrecking and last issue of delight 70
 Dead seasons quicken in one petal-spot
 Of color unforgotten.

This way have men come out of brutishness
 To spell the letters of the sky and read
 A reflex upon earth else meaningless 75
 With thee, O fount of the Untimed! to lead,
 Drink they of thee, thee eyeing, they unaged
 Shall on through brave wars waged

More gardens will they win than any lost —
 The vile plucked out of them, the unlovely slain, 80
 Not forfeiting the beast with which they are crossed,
 To stature of the gods will they attain.
 They shall uplift their Earth to meet her
 Lord,
 Themselves the attuning chord!

The song had ceased, my vision with the
 song. 85
 Then of those Shadows, which one made descent
 Beside me I knew not. But Life ere long
 Came on me in the public ways and bent
 Eyes deeper than of old; Death met I too,
 And saw the dawn glow through. 90

MEDITATION UNDER STARS

What links are ours with orbs that are
 So resolutely far? —
 The solitary asks, and they Give radiance as from a shield:
 Still at the death of day, 5
 The seen, the unrevealed.
 Implacable they shine
 To us who would of Life obtain
 An answer for the life we strain,
 To nourish with one sign. 10
 Nor can imagination throw
 The penetrative shaft: we pass
 The breath of thought, who would divine
 If haply they may grow
 As Earth; have our desire to know, 15
 If life comes there to grain from grass,
 And flowers like ours of toil and pain,
 Has passion to beat bar,
 Win space from cleaving brain;
 The mystic link attain, 20
 Whereby star holds on star.

Those visible immortals beam
 Allurement to the dream:
 Ireful at human hungers brook
 No question in the look. 25
 Forever virgin to our sense,
 Remote they wane to gaze intense:
 Prolong it, and in ruthlessness they smite
 The beating heart behind the ball of sight.
 Till we conceive their heavens hoar, 30
 Those lights they raise but sparkles frore,
 And Earth, our blood-warm Earth, a shuddering prey
 To that frigidity of brainless ray.
 Yet space is given for breath of thought
 Beyond our bounds when musing: more 35
 When to that musing love is brought,
 And love is asked of love's wherefore
 'Tis Earth's, her gift; else have we naught.
 Her gift, her secret, here our tie.
 And not with her and yonder sky? 40
 Bethink you: were it Earth alone
 Breeds love, would not her region be
 The sole delight and throne
 Of generous Deity?

To deeper than this ball of sight 45
 Appeal the lustrous people of the night
 Fronting yon shoreless, sown with fiery sails,
 It is our ravenous that quails,
 Flesh by its craven thirsts and fears distraught.
 The spirit leaps alight, 50
 Doubts not in them is he,

31 frore, frozen 48 our ravenous, the ravenous part of us, egoism.

The binder of his sheaves, the same, the
right.
Of magnitude to magnitude is wrought,
To feel it large of the great life they hold.
In them to come, or vaster interwolved, 55
The issues known in us, our unsolved solved
That there with toil Life climbs the selfsame
Tree,
Whose roots enrichment have from ripeness dropped

So may we read and little find them cold.
Let it but be the lord of Mind to guide 60
Our eyes; no branch of Reason's growing lopped,
Nor dreaming on a dream; but fortified
By day to penetrate black midnight, see,
Hear, feel, outside the senses, even that we,
The specks of dust upon a mound of mold, 65
We who reflect those rays, though low our
place,
To them are lastingly allied.

So may we read, and little find them cold:
Not frosty lamps illuming dead space,
Not distant aliens, not senseless Powers 70
The fire is in them whereof we are born,
The music of their motion may be ours Spirit shall deem them beckoning Earth and voiced
Sisterly to her, in her beams rejoiced.
Of love, the grand impulsion, we behold 75
The love that lends her grace
Among the starry fold.
Then at new flood of customary morn,
Look at her through her showers,
Her mists, her streaming gold, 80
A wonder edges the familiar face:
She wears no more that robe of printed hours;
Half strange seems Earth, and sweeter than her flowers. (1888)

ON HEARING THE NEWS FROM VENICE

(The Death of Robert Browning)

Now dumb is he who waked the world to
speak,
And voiceless hangs the world beside his bier.
Our words are sobs, our cry of praise a tear,
We are the smitten mortal, we the weak.
We see a spirit on Earth's loftiest peak 5
Shine, and wing hence the way he makes more
clear;
See a great Tree of Life that never sear Dropped leaf for aught that age or storms might wreak.

72 music . . . ours See note on The Blessed Damsel, line 54, page 501.

Such ending is not Death, such living shows
What wide illumination brightness sheds 10
From one big heart, to conquer man's old foes —
The coward, and the tyrant, and the force
Of all those weedy monsters raising heads
When Song is murk from springs of turbid source (1889)

WIND ON THE LYRE

That was the chirp of Ariel
You heard, as overhead it flew,
The farther going more to dwell,
And wing our green to wed our blue;
But whether note of joy or knell, 5
Not his own Father-singer knew;
Nor yet can any mortal tell,
Save only how it shivers through;
The breast of us a sounded shell,
The blood of us a lighted dew. 10
(1892)

SONG IN THE SONGLESS

They have no song, the sedges dry,
And still they sing.
It is within my breast they sing,
As I pass by.
Within my breast they touch a string, 5
They wake a sigh.
There is but sound of sedges dry;
In me they sing. (1900)

"ATKINS"

Yonder's the man with his life in his hand,
Legs on the march for whatever the land,
Or to the slaughter, or to the maiming,
Getting the dole of a dog for pay.
Laurels he clasps in the words "duty done,"
England his heart under every sun — 6
Exquisite humor! that gives him a naming Base to the ear as an ass's bray.
(1901)

YOUTH IN AGE

Once I was part of the music I heard
On the boughs or sweet between earth and
sky;
For joy of the beating of wings on high
My heart shot into the breast of the bird.

Wind on the Lyre 1 Ariel, a fairy spirit in Shakespeare's
The Tempest. 4 green . . . blue, earth . . . heaven. 6.
Father-singer, Shakespeare
"Atkins" Tommy Atkins is the conventional name of a soldier of the British army See Kipling's Tommy, p. 880.

I hear it now and I see it fly, 5
 And a life in wrinkles again is stirred,
 My heart shoots into the breast of the bird,
 As it will for sheer love till the last long sigh.

WILLIAM MORRIS (1 34-1896)

THE CHAPEL IN LYONESS

SIR OZANA LE CURE HARDY, SIR GALAHAD, SIR
 BORS DE GANYNS

Sir Ozana. All day long and every day,
 From Christmas-Eve to Whit-Sunday,
 Within that Chapel-aisle I lay,
 And no man came a-near.

Naked to the waist was I, 5
 And deep within my breast did lie,
 Though no man any blood could spy,
 The truncheon of a spear.

No meat did ever pass my lips
 Those days Alas! the sunlight slips 10
 From off the gilded parclose, dips,
 And night comes on apace

My arms lay back behind my head,
 Over my raised-up knees was spread
 A samite cloth of white and red, 15
 A rose lay on my face.

Many a time I tried to shout;
 But as in dream of battle-rout,
 My frozen speech would not well out;
 I could not even weep. 20

With inward sigh I see the sun
 Fade off the pillars one by one,
 My heart faints when the day is done,
 Because I cannot sleep

Sometimes strange thoughts pass through my
 head; 25

Not like a tomb is this my bed —
 Yet oft I think that I am dead,
 That round my tomb is writ,

The Chapel in Lyonesse Lyonesse was a mythical region, now submerged, lying off the coast of Cornwall. It was the land from which King Arthur came and the scene of his "last great battle of the West." Sir Ozana of the Bold Heart was one of the knights with Queen Guenevere when she was carried off by Meliagrance as related in Malory's Le Morte Darthur, 19, 1-2. Sir Galahad and Sir Bors accompanied Percivale on the quest for the Holy Grail. See The Holy Grail, page 137
 2. Whit-Sunday, the seventh Sunday after Easter 11
parclose, a screen or railing in a church dividing the chapel from the main body 15 samite, a kind of heavy silk

"Ozana of the hardy heart,
 Knight of the Table Round, 30
 Pray for his soul, lords, of your part;
 A true knight he was found"

Ah! me, I cannot fathom it. [He sleeps

Sir Gawahad. All day long and every day,
 Till his madness passed away, 35
 I watched Ozana as he lay
 Within the gilded screen.

All my singing moved him not;
 As I sung my heart grew hot,
 With the thought of Launcelot, 40
 Far away, I ween.

So I went a little space
 From out the chapel, bathed my face
 In the stream that runs apace
 By the churchyard wall 45

There I plucked a faint wild rose,
 Hard by where the linden grows,
 Sighing over silver rows
 Of the lilies tall.

I laid the flower across his mouth, 50
 The sparkling drops seemed good for drouth,
 He smiled, turned round toward the south,
 Held up a golden tress

The light smote on it from the west,
 He drew the covering from his breast, 55
 Against his heart that hair he pressed;
 Death him soon will bless

Sir Bors I entered by the western door,
 I saw a knight's helm lying there;
 I raised my eyes from off the floor, 60
 And caught the gleaming of his hair.

I stepped full softly up to him,
 I laid my chin upon his head,
 I felt him smile, my eyes did swim,
 I was so glad he was not dead. 65

I heard Ozana murmur low,
 "There comes no sleep nor any love"
 But Galahad stooped and kissed his brow —
 He shivered; I saw his pale lips move

Sir Ozana There comes no sleep nor any
 love, 70

Ah me! I shiver with delight
 I am so weak I cannot move,
 God move me to thee, dear, tonight!
 Christ help! I have but little wit
 My life went wrong; I see it writ, 75

40 Launcelot, the lover of Guenevere See Lancelot and Elaine, page 120

"Ozana of the hardy heart,
Knight of the Table Round,
Pray for his soul, lords, on your part;
A good knight he was found"

Now I begin to fathom it [He dies. 80

Sir Bors. Galahad sits dreamily:
What strange things may his eyes see,
Great blue eyes fixed full on me?
On his soul, Lord, have mercy.

Sir Galahad. Ozana, shall I pray for thee? 85
Her cheek is laid to thine,
No long time hence, also I see
Thy wasted fingers twine

Within the tresses of her hair
That shineth gloriously, 90
Thinly outspread in the clear air
Against the jasper sea. (1856)

THE DEFENCE OF GUENEVERE

But, knowing now that they would have her
speak,
She threw her wet hair backward from her
brow,
Her hand close to her mouth touching her
cheek,

As though she had had there a shameful
blow,
And feeling it shameful to feel aught but
shame 5
All through her heart, yet felt her cheek burned so,

She must a little touch it; like one lame
She walked away from Gauwaine, with her
head
Still lifted up, and on her cheek of flame

The tears dried quick, she stopped at last and said 10
"O knights and lords, it seems but little skill
To talk of well-known things past now and
dead.

"God wot I ought to say, I have done ill,
And pray you all forgiveness heartily!
Because you must be right, such great lords,
still 15

"Listen — suppose your time were come to
die,
And you were quite alone and very weak,
Yea, laid a-dying, while very mightily

"The wind was ruffling up the narrow streak
Of river through your broad lands running
well; 20
Suppose a hush should come, then someone
speak:

"One of these cloths is heaven, and one is
hell;
Now choose one cloth forever—which they be,
I will not tell you; you must somehow tell

"Of your own strength and mightiness; here,
see! 25
Yea, yea, my lord, and you to ope your eyes,
At foot of your familiar bed to see

"A great God's angel standing, with such dyes,
Not known on earth, on his great wings, and
hands,
Held out two ways, light from the inner skies

"Showing him well, and making his commands 31
Seem to be God's commands, moreover, too,
Holding within his hands the cloths on wands;

"And one of these strange choosing cloths
was blue,
Wavy and long, and one cut short and red;
No man could tell the better of the two. 36

"After a shivering half-hour you said.
'God help! heaven's color, the blue', and he said, 'hell'
Perhaps you would then roll upon your bed,

"And cry to all good men that loved you
well, 40
'Ah, Christ! if only I had known, known,
known',
Launcelot went away, then I could tell,

"Like wisest man how all things would be,
moan,
And roll and hurt myself, and long to die,
And yet fear much to die for what was sown

"Nevertheless, you, O Sir Gauwaine, lie; 46
Whatever may have happened through these
years,
God knows I speak truth, saying that you
lie."

Her voice was low at first, being full of tears,
But as it cleared, it grew full loud and shrill,
Growing a windy shriek in all men's ears, 51

A ringing in their startled brains, until She said that Gauwaine lied, then her voice sunk,
 And her great eyes began again to fill,

Though still she stood right up, and never shrunk, 55
 But spoke on bravely, glorious lady fair!
 Whatever tears her full lips may have drunk,

She stood, and seemed to think, and wrung
 her hair,
 Spoke out at last with no more trace of
 shame,
 With passionate twisting of her body there. 60

"It chanced upon a day that Launcelot came To dwell at Arthur's court — at Christmas-
 time
 This happened, when the heralds sung his
 name,

"Son of King Ban of Benwick, seemed to chime
 Along with all the bells that rang that day, 65
 O'er the white roofs, with little change of rime.

"Christmas and whitened winter passed away,
 And over me the April sunshine came,
 Made very awful with black hail-clouds,
 yea,

"And in the summer I grew white with flame,
 And bowed my head down, autumn, and the
 sick 71
 Sure knowledge things would never be the
 same,

"However often spring might be most thick
 Of blossoms and buds, smote on me, and I grew Careless of most things, let the clock tick, tick, 75

"To my unhappy pulse, that beat right
 through
 My eager body; while I laughed out loud,
 And let my lips curl up at false or true,

"Seemed cold and shallow without any cloud.
 Behold, my judges, then the cloths were brought; 80
 While I was dizzied thus, old thoughts would crowd,

"Belonging to the time ere I was bought
 By Arthur's great name and his little love;
 Must I give up forever then, I thought,

"That which I deemed would ever round me move 85
 Glorifying all things, for a little word, Scarce ever meant at all, must I now prove

"Stone-cold forever? Pray you, does the Lord Will that all folks should be quite happy and good?
 I love God now a little, if this cord 90

"Were broken, once for all what striving could Make me love anything in earth or heaven?
 So day by day it grew, as if one should

"Slip slowly down some path worn smooth and even,
 Down to a cool sea on a summer day, 95
 Yet still in slipping there was some small leaven

"Of stretched hands catching small stones by
 the way,
 Until one surely reached the sea at last,
 And felt strange new joy as the worn head
 lay

"Back, with the hair like sea-weed, yea, all past 100
 Sweat of the forehead, dryness of the lips,
 Washed utterly out by the dear waves o'er-
 cast,

"In the lone sea, far off from any ships!
 Do I not know now of a day in spring?
 No minute of that wild day ever slips 105

"From out my memory, I hear thrushes sing,
 And wheresoever I may be, straightway
 Thoughts of it all come up with most fresh sting

"I was half mad with beauty on that day,
 And went, without my ladies, all alone, 110
 In a quiet garden walled round every way,

"I was right joyful of that wall of stone,
 That shut the flowers and trees up with the
 sky,
 And trebled all the beauty; to the bone —

"Yea, right through to my heart, grown very shy 115
 With wary thoughts — it pierced, and made me glad,
 Exceedingly glad, and I knew verily,

"A little thing just then had made me mad;
 I dared not think, as I was wont to do,
 Sometimes, upon my beauty, if I had 120

"Held out my long hand up against the blue,

And, looking on the tenderly darkened fingers, Thought that by rights one ought to see quite
through,

"There, see you, where the soft still light yet
lingers. 124
Round by the edges, what should I have done,
If this had joined with yellow spotted singers,

"And startling green drawn upward by the
sun?
But shouting, loosed out, see now! all my
hair,
And trancedly stood watching the west wind
run

"With faintest half-heard breathing sound —
why there 130
I lose my head e'en now in doing this.
But shortly listen In that garden fair

"Came Launcelot walking, this is true, the
kiss
Wherewith we kissed in meeting that spring
day,
I scarce dare talk of the remembered bliss, 135

"When both our mouths went wandering in one way,
And aching sorely, met among the leaves;
Our hands, being left behind, strained far
away

"Never within a yard of my bright sleeves
Had Launcelot come before — and now so nigh! 140
After that day why is it Guenevere grieves?

"Nevertheless, you, O Sir Gauwayne, he, Whatever happened on through all those
years —
God knows I speak truth, saying that you
lie. 144

"Being such a lady, could I weep these tears
If this were true? A great queen such as I, Having sinned this way, straight her conscience sears,

"And afterwards she liveth hatefully,
Slaying and poisoning — certes never weeps,
Gauwayne, be friends now, speak me lovingly 150

"Do I not see how God's dear pity creeps
All through your frame, and trembles in your mouth?
Remember in what grave your mother sleeps,

"Buried in some place far down in the south,
Men are forgetting as I speak to you; 155
By her head, severed in that awful drouth

"Of pity that drew Agravaïne's fell blow,
I pray your pity! let me not scream out
Forever after, when the shrill winds blow

"Through half your castle-locks! let me not shout 160
Forever after in the winter night
When you ride out alone! in battle-rout

"Let not my rusting tears make your sword
light!
Ah! God of mercy, how he turns away!
So, ever must I dress me to the fight, 165

"So — let God's justice work! Gauwayne, I
say,
See me hew down your proofs; yea, all men
know,
Even as you said, how Mellyagraunce one
day,

"One bitter day in la Fausse Garde, for so
All good knights held it after, saw — 170
Yea, sirs, by cursed unknighly outrage, though

"You, Gauwayne, held his word without a flaw,
This Mellyagraunce saw blood upon my bed —
Whose blood then pray you? is there any law

"To make a queen say why some spots of red 175
Lie on her coverlet? or will you say,
'Your hands are white, lady, as when you wed,

" 'Where did you bleed?' and must I stammer out — 'Nay,
I blush indeed, fair lord, only to rend
My sleeve up to my shoulder, where there
lay 180

" 'A knife-point last night': so must I defend
The honor of the Lady Guenevere?
Not so, fair lords, even if the world should
end

"This very day, and you were judges here
Instead of God Did you see Mellyagraunce

126 yellow spotted singers, thrushes (line 106) 153
your mother According to Malory she was Morgawse, Arthur's sister She was slain by her son Sir Gaheris (not

Lot, in Orkney (Le Morte Darthur, 10, 24)

"My knight said, 'Rise you, sir, who are so fleet
At catching ladies, half-armed will I fight, 200
My left side all uncovered!' Then, I weet,

"Up sprang Sir Mellyagraunce with great
delight
Upon his knave's face, not until just then Did I quite hate him, as I saw my knight

"Along the lists look to my stake and pen 205
With such a joyous smile, it made me sigh
From agony beneath my waist-chain, when

"The fight began, and to me they drew nigh,
Ever Sir Launcelot kept him on the right,
And traversed warily, and ever high 210

"And fast leapt caitiff's sword, until my knight
Sudden threw up his sword to his left hand, Caught it, and swung it; that was all the

"Except a spout of blood on the hot land,
For it was hottest summer; and I know 215
I wondered how the fire, while I should stand,

Get thinking overmuch of times gone by,
When I was young, and green hope was in
sight; 255

"For no man cares now to know why I
sigh,

And no man comes to sing me pleasant songs,
Nor any brings me the sweet flowers that lie

"So thick in the gardens, therefore one so
long

To see you, Launcelot, that we may be 260
Like children once again, free from all wrongs

"Just for one night.' Did he not come to
me?

What thing could keep true Launcelot away
If I said, 'Come'? There was one less than three

"In my quiet room that night, and we were gay; 265

Till sudden I rose up, weak, pale, and sick,
Because a bawling broke our dream up, yea,

"I looked at Launcelot's face and could not
speak,

For he looked helpless, too, for a little while,
Then I remember how I tried to shriek, 270

"And could not, but fell down, from tile to tile

The stones they threw up rattled o'er my
head

And made me dizzier, till within a while

"My maids were all about me, and my head
On Launcelot's breast was being soothed
away 275

From its white chattering, until Launcelot
said . . .

"By God! I will not tell you more today—
Judge any way you will; what matters it?
You know quite well the story of that fray,

"How Launcelot stilled their bawling, the mad fit 280

That caught up Gauwaine, all, all, verily,
But just that which would save me, these things fit.

"Nevertheless, you, O Sir Gauwaine, lie;
Whatever may have happened these long
years,

God knows I speak truth, saying that you
lie! 285

280 mad fit Gauwaine was not present See Critical
Note on title 282 that me, her innocence

"All I have said is truth, by Christ's dear
tears "

She would not speak another word, but stood Turned sideways, listening, like a man who hears

His brother's trumpet sounding through the
wood

Of his foes' lances She leaned eagerly, 290
And gave a slight spring sometimes, as she could

At last hear something really; joyfully
Her cheek grew crimson, as the headlong speed

Of the roan charger drew all men to see, 294
The knight who came was Launcelot at good need. (1858)

RAPUNZEL

The Prince (being in the wood near the tower in the evening)

I could not even think
What made me weep that day
When out of the council-hall
The courtiers passed away—

The Witch

Rapunzel, Rapunzel,
Let down your hair! 5

Rapunzel

Is is not true that every day
She climbeth up the same strange way,
Her scarlet cloak spread broad and gay,
Over my golden hair? 10

The Prince

And left me there alone,
To think on what they said
"Thou art a king's own son,
'Tis fit that thou should'st wed."

The Witch

Rapunzel, Rapunzel, 15
Let down your hair!

Rapunzel

When I undo the knotted mass,
Fathoms below the shadows pass
Over my hair along the grass.
O my golden hair! 20

kinsmen rescued the Queen from the fire

as told in Grimms' Fairy Tales See Critical Notes

The Prince

I put my armor on,
Thinking on what they said:
"Thou art a king's own son,
'Tis fit that thou should'st wed."

The Witch

Rapunzel, Rapunzel, 25
Let down your hair!

Rapunzel

See on the marble parapet
I lean my brow, strive to forget
That fathoms below my hair grows wet
With the dew, my golden hair. 30

The Prince

I rode throughout the town,
Men did not bow the head,
Though I was the king's own son;
"He rides to dream," they said.

The Witch

Rapunzel, Rapunzel, 35
Wind up your hair!

Rapunzel

See, on the marble parapet
The faint red stains with tears are wet,
The long years pass, no help comes yet
To free my golden hair. 40

The Prince

For leagues and leagues I rode,
Till hot my armor grew,
Till underneath the leaves
I felt the evening dew.

The Witch

Rapunzel, Rapunzel, 45
Weep through your hair!

Rapunzel

And yet—but I am growing old,
For want of love my heart is cold,
Years pass, the while I loose and fold
The fathoms of my hair 50

The Prince (in the morning)

I have heard tales of men, who in the night Saw paths of stars let down to earth from
heaven,
Who followed them until they reached the
light
Wherein they dwell, whose sins are all forgiven;

But who went backward when they saw the gate 55
Of diamond, nor dared to enter in,
All their life long they were content to wait,
Purging them patiently of every sin.

I must have had a dream of some such thing,
And now am just awaking from that
dream; 60
For even in gray dawn those strange words ring
Through heart and brain, and still I see that gleam.

For in my dream at sunset-time I lay
Beneath these beeches, mail and helmet off,
Right full of joy that I had come away 65
From court; for I was patient of the scoff

That met me always there from day to day,
From any knave or coward of them all,
I was content to live that wretched way,
For truly till I left the council-hall, 70

And rode forth armed beneath the burning
sun,
My gleams of happiness were faint and few,
But then I saw my real life had begun,
And that I should be strong, quite well I knew.

For I was riding out to look for love, 75
Therefore the birds within the thickets
sung;
Even in hot noontide, as I passed, above
The elms o'erswayed with longing toward me hung.

Now some few fathoms from the place where I
Lay in the beech-wood, was a tower fair, 80
The marble corners faint against the sky,
And dreamily I wondered what lived there,

Because it seemed a dwelling for a queen,
No belfry for the swinging of great bells,
No bolt or stone had ever crushed the green Shafts, amber and rose walls, no soot that tells 86

Of the Norse torches burning up the roofs,
On the flower-carven marble could I see,
But rather on all sides I saw the proofs
Of a great loneliness that sickened me, 90

55-56 gate Of diamond In Revelation, 21, John sees the New Jerusalem with twelve gates of pearl, and the walls with twelve foundations "garnished with all manner of precious stones" 87 Norse torches, a reference to the burning of houses in the early raids of the Norsemen

Making me feel a doubt that was not fear,
 Whether my whole life long had been a
 dream,
 And I should wake up soon in some place,
 where
 The piled-up arms of the fighting angels
 gleam,

Not born as yet, but going to be born, 95
 No naked baby as I was at first,
 But an arméd knight, whom fire, hate, and scorn
 Could turn from nothing, my heart almost burst

Beneath the beeches, as I lay a-dreaming,
 I tried so hard to read this riddle through,
 To catch some golden cord that I saw gleam-
 ing 101
 Like gossamer against the autumn blue.

But while I pondered these things, from the
 wood
 There came a black-haired woman, tall and
 bold,
 Who strode straight up to where the tower
 stood, 105
 And cried out shrilly words, whereon behold—

The Witch (from the tower)

Rapunzel, Rapunzel,
 Let down your hair!

The Prince

Ah, Christ! it was no dream then, but there
 stood 109
 (She comes again) a maiden passing fair,
 Against the roof, with face turned to the wood,
 Bearing within her arms waves of her yellow hair

I read my riddle when I saw her stand,
 Poor love! her face quite pale against her
 hair,
 Praying to all the leagues of empty land 115
 To save her from the woe she suffered there.

To think! they trod upon her golden hair
 In the witches' sabbaths, it was a delight
 For these foul things, while she, with thin feet bare,
 Stood on the roof upon the winter night, 120

To plait her dear hair into many plaits,
 And then, while God's eye looked upon the
 thing,

118 witches' sabbaths, nocturnal gatherings of witches and demons to concoct mischief. They participated in various orgies under the leadership of Satan

In the very likenesses of Devil's bats,
 Upon the ends of her long hair to swing

And now she stood above the parapet, 125
 And, spreading out her arms, let her hair
 flow,
 Beneath that veil her smooth white forehead
 set
 Upon the marble; more I do not know,

Because before my eyes a film of gold 129
 Floated, as now it floats. O unknown love,
 Would that I could thy yellow stair behold,
 If still thou standest with lead roof above!

The Witch (as she passes)

Is there any who will dare
 To climb up the yellow stair,
 Glorious Rapunzel's golden hair? 135

The Prince

If it would please God make you sing again,
 I think that I might very sweetly die,
 My soul somehow reach heaven in joyous
 pain,
 My heavy body on the beech-nuts lie.

Now I remember, what a most strange year,
 Most strange and awful, in the beechen
 wood 141
 I have passed now; I still have a faint fear
 It is a kind of dream not understood.

I have seen no one in this wood except
 The witch and her; have heard no human tones, 145
 But when the witches' revelry has crept
 Between the very jointing of my bones

Ah! I know now, I could not go away,
 But needs must stop to hear her sing that
 song
 She always sings at dawning of the day. 150
 I am not happy here, for I am strong.

And every morning do I whet my sword,
 Yet Rapunzel still weeps within the tower.
 And still God ties me down to the green
 sward,
 Because I cannot see the gold stair floating lower. 155

Rapunzel (sings from the tower)

My mother taught me prayers
 To say when I had need;
 I have so many cares,
 That I can take no heed
 Of many words in them, 160
 But I remember this:
Christ, bring me to thy bliss.

*Mary, maid withouten wem,
Keep me! I am lone, I wis,
Yet besides I have made this* 165
*By myself: Give me a kiss,
Dear God, dwelling up in heaven!
Also: Send me a true knight,
Lord Christ, with a steel sword, bright,
Broad and trenchant; yea, and seven* 170
*Spans from hill to point, O Lord!
And let the handle of his sword
Be gold on silver, Lord in heaven!
Such a sword as I see gleam
Sometimes, when they let me dream.* 175

Yea, besides, I have made this:
*Lord, give Mary a dear kiss,
And let gold Michael, who looked down,
When I was there, on Rouen town
From the spire, bring me that kiss* 180
On a lily! Lord, do this!

These prayers on the dreadful nights
When the witches plait my hair,
And the fearfulest of sights
On the earth and in the air, 185
Will not let me close my eyes,
I murmur often, mixed with sighs,
That my weak heart will not hold
At some things that I behold
Nay, not sighs, but quiet groans,
That swell out the little bones 190
Of my bosom, till a trance
God sends in middle of that dance,
And I behold the countenance
Of Michael, and can feel no more 195
The bitter east wind biting sore
My naked feet, can see no more
The crayfish on the leaden floor,
That mock with feeler and grum claw.

Yea, often in that happy trance, 200
Beside the blessed countenance
Of golden Michael, on the spire
Glowing all crimson in the fire
Of sunset, I behold a face,
Which sometime, if God give me grace, 205
May kiss me in this very place

(Evening in the tower)
Rapunzel

It grows half way between the dark and
light;
Love, we have been six hours here alone,
I fear that she will come before the night,
And if she finds us thus we are undone. 210

163 withouten wem, without blemish 164 wis, know 178 gold Michael, a statue of the archangel Michael (Revelation, 12 7) on the spire of the cathedral in Rouen, a city in northern France

The Prince

Nay, draw a little nearer, that your breath
May touch my lips, let my cheek feel your arm;
Now tell me, did you ever see a death,
Or ever see a man take mortal harm!

Rapunzel

Once came two knights and fought with swords below, 215
And while they fought I scarce could look at all,
My head swam so, after a moaning low
Drew my eyes down, I saw against the wall
One knight lean dead, bleeding from head and breast,
Yet seemed it like a line of poppies red 220
In the golden twilight, as he took his rest,
In the dusky time he scarcely seemed dead.

But the other, on his face six paces off,
Lay moaning, and the old familiar name
He muttered through the grass, seemed like 225
a scoff
Of some lost soul remembering his past fame

His helm all dinted lay beside him there,
The visor-bars were twisted toward the
face,
The crest, which was a lady very fair,
Wrought wonderfully, was shifted from its
place 230

The showered mail-rings on the speed-walk
lay,
Perhaps my eyes were dazzled with the
light
That blazed in the west, yet surely on that
day
Some crimson thing had changed the grass from bright

Pure green I love so. But the knight who died 235
Lay there for days after the other went;
Until one day I heard a voice that cried,
"Fair knight, I see Sir Robert we were sent "To carry dead or living to the king"

So the knights came and bore him straight
away 240
On their lance truncheons, such a battered
thing,
His mother had not known him on that
day,

241 lance truncheons, shafts of spears

But for his helm-crest, a gold lady fair
Wrought wonderfully.

The Prince

Ah, they were brothers then,
And often rode together, doubtless where 245
The swords were thickest, and were loyal
men,

Until they fell in these same evil dreams.

Rapunzel

Yea, love, but shall we not depart from hence?
The white moon groweth golden fast, and gleams
Between the aspen stems; I fear—and yet 250
a sense

Of fluttering victory comes over me,
That will not let me fear aright, my heart—
Feel how it beats, love, strives to get to
thee—

I breathe so fast that my lips need must
part;

Your breath swims round my mouth, but let us go 255

The Prince

I, Sebald, also, pluck from off the staff
The crimson banner, let it lie below,
Above it in the wind let grasses laugh.

Now let us go, love, down the winding stair,
With fingers intertwined; aye, feel my sword! 260

I wrought it long ago, with golden hair
Flowing about the hilts, because a word,

Sung by a minstrel old, had set me dreaming
Of a sweet bowed-down face with yellow
hair,
Betwixt green leaves I used to see it gleam-
ing, 265
A half smile on the lips, though lines of
care

Had sunk the cheeks, and made the great eyes hollow,

What other work in all the world had I,
But through all turns of fate that face to follow?

But wars and business kept me there to
die. 270

O child, I should have slain my brother, too,
My brother, Love, lain moaning in the grass,

Had I not ridden out to look for you,
When I had watched the gilded courtiers
pass

From the golden hall But it is strange your
name 275

Is not the same the minstrel sung of yore,
You called it Rapunzel, 'tis not the name.

See, love, the stems shine through the open
door.

(Morning in the woods)

Rapunzel

O Love! me and my unknown name you have well won;

The witch's name was Rapunzel; eh! not
so sweet? 280

No!—but is this real grass, love, that I tread
upon?

What call they these blue flowers that lean across my feet?

The Prince

Dip down your dear face in the dewy grass,
O love!

And ever let the sweet slim harebells,
tenderly hung,

Kiss both your parted lips; and I will hang
above, 285

And try to sing that song the dreamy
harper sung.

He sings

'Twixt the sunlight and the shade
Float up memories of my maid,
God, remember Guendolen!

Gold or gems she did not wear, 290
But her yellow rippled hair,
Like a veil, hid Guendolen!

'Twixt the sunlight and the shade,
My rough hands so strangely made,
Folded Golden Guendolen, 295

Hands used to grip the sword-hilt hard,
Framed her face, while on the sward,
Tears fell down from Guendolen.

Guendolen now speaks no word,
Hands fold around about the sword, 300
Now no more of Guendolen.

Only 'twixt the light and shade
Floating memories of my maid
Make me pray for Guendolen

287 'Twixt the sunlight, etc. This song was first published in 1856 under the title of Hands

Guendolen

I kiss thee, new-found name, but I will never go; 305
Your hands need never grip the hammered sword again
But all my golden hair shall ever round you
flow,
Between the light and shade from Golden
Guendolen

(Afterwards, in the Palace)King Sebald

I took my armor off,
Put on king's robes of gold, 310
Over her kirtle green
The gold fell fold on fold

The Witch (out of hell)
Guendolen! Guendolen!
One lock of hair!

Guendolen

I am so glad, for every day 315
He kisses me much the same way
As in the tower, under the sway
Of all my golden hair.

King Sebald

We rode throughout the town,
A gold crown on my head, 320
Through all the gold-hung streets,
"Praise God!" the people said

The Witch

Guendolen! Guendolen!
Lend me your hair!

Guendolen

Verily, I seem like one 325
Who, when day is almost done,
Through a thick wood meets the sun
That blazes in her hair

King Sebald

Yea, at the palace gates,
"Praise God!" the great knights said, 330
"For Sebald the high king,
And the lady's golden head"

The Witch

Woe is me! Guendolen
Sweeps back her hair.

Guendolen

Nothing wretched now, no screams; 335
I was unhappy once in dreams,
And even now a harsh voice seems
To hang about my hair

The Witch

WOE! THAT ANY MAN COULD DARE
TO CLIMB UP THE YELLOW STAIR, 340
GLORIOUS GUENDOLEN'S GOLDEN HAIR
(1858)

CONCERNING GEFFRAY TESTE
NOIRE

And if you meet the Canon of Chimay,
As going to Ortaise you well may do,
Greet him from John of Castel Neuf, and say
All that I tell you, for all this is true

This Geffray Teste Noire was a Gascon thief, 5
Who, under shadow of the English name Pilled all such towns and countries as were hef
To King Charles and St Dennis, thought it blame

If anything escaped him, so my lord,
The Duke of Berry, sent Sir John Bonne
Lance, 10
And other knights, good players with the
sword,
To check this thief, and give the land a chance

Therefore we set out bastides round the tower
That Geffray held, the strong thief! like a king, 14
High perched upon the rock of Ventadour, Hopelessly strong by Christ! It was mid
spring

When first I joined the little army there
With ten good spears Auvergne is hot,
each day
We sweated, armed before the barrier;
Good feats of arms were done there often
—eh? 20

Concerning Geffray Teste Noire Geffray with the Black Head was a freebooter from the province of Gascony, in southern France, during the period of 1375-88. His stronghold was Ventadour (line 15), a castle in the province of Auvergne. The poem is addressed to a man named Alleyne (line 27) by John of Newcastle (line 3), who, with Sir John of the Good Lance (line 10), Aldovrand (line 90), and other warriors, too part in the attack upon Geffray's band. Geffray appears in the Chronicles of Jean Froissart (1337-1410?), the famous French historian and poet, Volume 1, Chapter 345, Volume 2, Chapters 147-148.

1 Canon of Chimay, Froissart. Chimay is a town in Belgium near the French border. 2 Ortaise, the name of the house of the Earl of Foiz and Béarn, a favorite gathering place of knights, in the province of Béarn, in southern France. 7 Pilled, pillaged, plundered. 8 hef, dear. 8 King Charles, Charles V of France (1337-80). 9 St Dennis, the first bishop of Paris and the patron saint of France (3d century). 10 Duke of Berry, Jean de France (1340-1416), Count of Poitiers. He was the son of John II, king of France (1350-64), and the King's lieutenant in southern France. 13 bastides, temporary huts or towers erected for besieging purposes.

Your brother was slain there? I mind me
now,
A right good man-at-arms, God pardon
him!
I think 'twas Geffray smote him on the
brow
With some spiked ax, and while he tottered, dim
About the eyes, the spear of Alleyne Roux 25 Slipped through his camaille and his throat, well, well!
Alleyne is paid now, your name Alleyne too?
Mary! how strange—but this tale I would tell—
For spite of all our bastides, damned Black-
head
Would ride abroad whene'er he chose to ride— 30
We could not stop him, many a burgher
bled
Dear gold all around his girdle, far and wide
The villaynes dwelt in utter misery
'Twixt us and thief Sir Geffray, hauled this
way
By Sir Bonne Lance at one time, he gone 35
Down comes this Teste Noire on another
day.
And therefore they dig up the stone, grind
corn,
Hew wood, draw water—yea, they lived, in short,
As I said just now, utterly forlorn,
Till this our knave and Blackhead was out-fought 40
So Bonne Lance fretted, thinking of some trap
Day after day, till on a time he said
"John of Newcastle, if we have good hap,
We catch our thief in two days" "How?"
I said
"Why, sir, today he rideth out again, 45
Hoping to take well certain sumpter mules
From Carcassonne, going with little train, Because, forsooth, he thinketh us mere fools,
"But if we set an ambush in some wood,
He is but dead, so, sir, take thirty spears 50

To Verville forest, if it seem you good"
Then felt I like the horse in Job, who hears
The dancing trumpet sound, and we went
forth,
And my red lion on the spear-head flapped,
As faster than the cool wind we rode north, 55
Toward the wood of Verville, thus it happd
We rode a soft space on that day while spies
Got news about Sir Geffray, the red wine
Under the roadside bush was clear; the flies,
The dragon-flies I mind me most, did
shine 60
In brighter arms than ever I put on;
So—"Geffray," said our spies, "would pass that way
Next day at sundown", then he must be won;
And so we entered Verville wood next day,
In the afternoon, through it the highway runs, 65
'Twixt copses of green hazel, very thick,
And underneath, with glimmering of suns,
The primroses are happy, the dews lick
The soft green moss "Put cloths about your arms
Lest they should glitter, surely they will
go 70
In a long thin line, watchful for alarms,
With all their carriages of booty, so—
"Lay down my pennon in the grass—Lord
God!
What have we lying here? will they be cold,
I wonder, being so bare, above the sod, 75
Instead of under? This was a knight, too,
fold
"Lying on fold of ancient rusted mail;
No plate at all, gold rowels to the spurs,
And see the quiet gleam of turquoise pale Along the ceinture; but the long time blurs 80
"Even the tinder of his coat to naught,
Except these scraps of leather, see how
white
The skull is, loose within the coif! He fought
A good fight, maybe, ere he was slain quite pennon, banner 80 ceinture, girdle, belt 81 tinder of

"No armor on the legs, too; strange in faith—
A little skeleton for a knight though—ah! 86
This one is bigger; truly without scathe
His enemies escaped not—ribs driven out far—

"That must have reached the heart, I doubt
—how now,
What say you, Aldovrand—a woman?
why?" 90

"Under the coif a gold wreath on the brow,
Yea, see the hair not gone to powder, lie,

"Golden, no doubt, once—yea, and very small—

This for a knight, but for a dame, my lord,
These loose-hung bones seem shapely still,
and tall— 95
Didst ever see a woman's bones, my lord?"

Often, God help me! I remember when I was a simple boy, fifteen years old,
The Jacquerie froze up the blood of men
With their fell deeds, not fit now to be told. 100

God help again! we entered Beauvais town, Slaying them fast, whereto I helped, mere boy

As I was then; we gentles cut them down,
These burners and defilers, with great joy.

Reason for that, too, in the great church
there 105
These fiends had lit a fire, that soon went
out,

The church at Beauvais being so great and
fair—

My father, who was by me, gave a shout

Between a beast's howl and a woman's scream,

Then, panting, chuckled to me: "John,
look! look!" 110

Count the dames' skeletons!" From some bad dream

Like a man just awaked, my father shook,

And I, being faint with smelling the burnt bones,

And very hot with fighting down the street,
And sick of such a life, fell down; with groans 115

My head went weakly nodding to my
feet—

—An arrow had gone through her tender
throat,

And her right wrist was broken, then I saw
The reason why she had on that warcoat—
Their story came out clear without a
flaw; 120

For when he knew that they were being waylaid,

He threw it over her, yea, hood and all,
Whereby he was much hacked, while they were stayed

By those their murderers; many an one did fall

Beneath his arm, no doubt, so that he cleared
Their circle, bore his death-wound out of
it; 126

But as they rode, some archer least afear'd Drew a strong bow, and thereby she was hit.

Still as he rode he knew not she was dead—
Thought her but fainted from her broken
wrist, 130

He bound with his great leathern belt—she bled?

Who knows! he bled too; neither was there missed

The beating of her heart, his heart beat well
For both of them, till here, within this
wood,

He died scarce sorry, easy this to tell, 135
After these years the flowers forget their
blood.—

How could it be? Never before that day,
However much a soldier I might be,
Could I look on a skeleton and say 139
I care not for it, shudder not—now see,

Over those bones I sat and pored for hours,
And thought, and dreamed, and still I scarce could see

The small white bones that lay upon the
flowers,

But evermore I saw the lady; she

With her dear gentle walking leading in, 145
By a chain of silver twined about her wrists,

Her loving knight, mounted and armed to win
Great honor for her, fighting in the lists.

O most pale face, that brings such joy and sorrow

Into men's hearts—yea, too, so piercing sharp 150

That joy is, that it marcheth nigh to sorrow
Forever—like an overwinded harp.

Your face must hurt me always; pray you
now,

99 The Jacquerie, a revolt of the French peasants against the nobles in 1358. 101 Beauvais, an important city in northern France. 117. An arrow, etc. This line connects with line 96

Doth it not hurt you too? seemeth some
 pain
 To hold you always, pain to hold your
 brow 155
 So smooth, unwrinkled ever, yea, again,

Your long eyes where the lids seem like to drop,
 Would you not, lady, were they shut fast feel Far merrier? There so high they will not stop,
 They are most sly to glide forth and to steal 160

Into my heart; *I kiss their soft lids there,
 And in green garden scarce can stop my lips
 From wandering on your face, but that your
 hair
 Falls down and tangles me, back my face slips.*

Or say your mouth—I saw you drink red
 wine 165
 Once at a feast, how slowly it sank in,
 As though you feared that some wild fate might twine
 Within that cup, and slay you for a sin.

And when you talk your lips do arch and
 move 169
 In such wise that a language new I know Besides their sound, they quiver, too, with
 love
 When you are standing silent; know this,
 too,

I saw you kissing once, like a curved sword
 That bites with all its edge, did your lips
 lie,
 Curled gently, slowly, long time could afford
 For caught-up breathings, like a dying
 sigh 176

They gathered up their lines and went away,
 And still kept twitching with a sort of
 smile,
 As likely to be weeping presently —
 Your hands, too — how I watched them all the while! 180

“Cry out St Peter now,” quoth Aldovrand, I cried, “St Peter,” broke out from the
 wood
 With all my spears, we met them hand to
 hand,
 And shortly slew them, natheless, by the rood,

We caught not Blackhead then, or any day,
 Months after that he died at last in bed, 186

From a wound picked up at a barrier-fray;
 That same year's end a steel bolt in the
 head,

And much bad living killed Teste Noire at
 last; 189
 John Froissart knoweth he is dead by now,
 No doubt, but knoweth not this tale just past, Perchance then you can tell him what I
 show.

In my new castle, down beside the Eure,
 There is a little chapel of squared stone,
 Painted inside and out, in green nook pure 195
 There did I lay them, every wearied bone,

And over it they lay, with stone-white hand
 Clasped fast together, hair made bright with gold

This Jaques Picard, known through many lands,

Wrought cunningly, he's dead now — I am
 old. 200

THE GILLYFLOWER OF GOLD

A golden gillyflower today
 I wore upon my helm alway,
 And won the prize of this tourney.
Hahl hahl la belle jaune giroflée.

However well Sir Giles might sit, 5
 His sun was weak to wither it;
 Lord Miles's blood was dew on it.
Hahl hahl la belle jaune giroflée.

Although my spear in splinters flew,
 From John's steel-coat, my eye was true; 10
 I wheeled about, and cried for you,
Hahl hahl la belle jaune giroflée.

Yea, do not doubt my heart was good,
 Though my sword flew like rotten wood,
 To shout, although I scarcely stood, 15
Hahl hahl la belle jaune giroflée

My hand was steady too, to take
 My ax from round my neck, and break
 John's steel-coat up for my love's sake
Hahl hahl la belle jaune giroflée — 20

When I stood in my tent again,
 Arming afresh, I felt a pain
 Take hold of me, I was so fain —
Hahl hahl la belle jaune giroflée —

193 the Eure, a river in northern France, it empties into the Seine 199 Jaques Picard, an imaginary sculptor
The Gillyflower of Gold 4 la belle jaune giroflée, the beautiful yellow gillyflower

To hear Honneur aux fils des preux! 25
 Right in my ears again, and shew
 The gillyflower blossomed new.
Hahl hahl la belle jaune giroflée.

The Sieur Guillaume against me came,
 His tabard bore three points of flame 30
 From a red heart; with little blame —
Hahl hahl la belle jaune giroflée —

Our tough spears crackled up like straw;
 He was the first to turn and draw
 His sword, that had nor speck nor flaw; 35
Hahl hahl la belle jaune giroflée.

But I felt weaker than a maid,
 And my brain, dizzied and afraid,
 Within my helm a fierce tune played, 40
Hahl hahl la belle jaune giroflée,

Until I thought of your dear head,
 Bowed to the gillyflower bed,
 The yellow flowers stained with red;
Hahl hahl la belle jaune giroflée.

Crash! how the swords met — giroflée! 45
 The fierce tune in my helm would play,
La belle! la belle! jaune giroflée!
Hahl hahl la belle jaune giroflée

Once more the great swords met again;
 “La belle! la belle!” but who fell then? 50
 Le Sieur Guillaume, who struck down ten,
Hahl hahl la belle jaune giroflée.

And as with mazed and unarmed face
 Toward my own crown and the Queen's place,
 They led me at a gentle pace — 55
Hahl hahl la belle jaune giroflée —

I almost saw your quiet head
 Bowed o'er the gillyflower bed,
 The yellow flowers stained with red.
Hahl hahl la belle jaune giroflée. 60

SHAMEFUL DEATH

There were four of us about that bed:
 The mass-priest knelt at the side,
 I and his mother stood at the head,
 Over his feet lay the bride;
 We were quite sure that he was dead, 5
 Though his eyes were open wide.

25 Honneur . preux, honor to the sons of valiant knights 30 tabard, a kind of cloak or mantle worn by knights 31 blame, damage

Shameful Death 2 mass-priest, a priest whose special duty was to say mass for the dead

He did not die in the night,
 He did not die in the day,
 But in the morning twilight
 His spirit passed away, 10
 When neither sun nor moon was bright,
 And the trees were merely gray.

He was not slain with the sword,
 Knight's ax, or the knightly spear,
 Yet spoke he never a word 15
 After he came in here;
 I cut away the cord
 From the neck of my brother dear.

He did not strike one blow,
 For the recreants came behind, 20
 In a place where the hornbeams grow,
 A path right hard to find,
 For the hornbeam boughs swing so
 That the twilight makes it blind.

They lighted a great torch then, 25
 When his arms were pinioned fast,
 Sir John the knight of the Fen,
 Sir Guy of the Dolorous Blast,
 With knights threescore and ten,
 Hung brave Lord Hugh at last. 30

I am threescore and ten,
 And my hair is all turned gray,
 But I met Sir John of the Fen,
 Long ago on a summer day,
 And am glad to think of the moment when 35
 I took his life away.

I am threescore and ten,
 And my strength is mostly passed,
 But long ago I and my men,
 When the sky was overcast, 40
 And the smoke rolled over the reeds of the fen,
 Slew Guy of the Dolorous Blast

And now, knights all of you,
 I pray you pray for Sir Hugh,
 A good knight and a true, 45
 And for Alice, his wife, pray too. (1858)

THE EVE OF CRÉCY

Gold on her head, and gold on her feet,
 And gold where the hems of her kirtle meet,
 And a golden girdle round my sweet,
Ahl qu'elle est belle La Marguerite

21 hornbeams, trees with smooth gray bark and leaves resembling those of the beech

The Eve of Crécy Crécy is a village in northern France, the scene of a famous battle won by the English over the French in 1346. The poem is spoken by a French knight (Sir Lambert of the Wood, line 18), as he muses before the battle on what the chance of victory may bring him

4 qu'elle est belle La Marguerite, how beautiful is Marguerite

Margaret's maids are fair to see, 5
 Freshly dressed and pleasantly;
 Margaret's hair falls down to her knee;
Ahl qu'elle est belle La Marguerite.

If I were rich I would kiss her feet,
 I would kiss the place where the gold hems
 meet, 10
 And the golden kirtle round my sweet —
Ahl qu'elle est belle La Marguerite

Ah me! I have never touched her hand;
 When the arrière-ban goes through the land,
 Six basnets under my pennon stand; 15
Ahl qu'elle est belle La Marguerite.

And many an one grins under his hood:
 Sir Lambert du Bois, with all his men good,
 Has neither food nor firewood, 20
Ahl qu'elle est belle La Marguerite.

If I were rich I would kiss her feet,
 And the golden girdle of my sweet,
 And thereabouts where the gold hems meet;
Ahl qu'elle est belle La Marguerite.

Yet even now it is good to think, 25
 While my poor varlets grumble and drink
 In my desolate hall, where the fires sink —
Ahl qu'elle est belle La Marguerite —

Of Margaret sitting glorious there,
 In glory of gold and glory of hair, 30
 And glory of glorious face most fair;
Ahl qu'elle est belle La Marguerite.

Likewise tonight I make good cheer,
 Because this battle draweth near;
 For what have I to lose or fear? 35
Ahl qu'elle est belle La Marguerite.

For, look you, my horse is good to prance
 A right fair measure in this war-dance
 Before the eyes of Philip of France,
Ahl qu'elle est belle La Marguerite. 40

And sometime it may hap, perdie, While my new towers stand up three and
 three,
 And my hall gets painted fair to see —
Ahl qu'elle est belle La Marguerite —

That folks may say. Times change, by the rood, 45
 For Lambert, banneret of the wood,

Has heaps of food and firewood;
Ahl qu'elle est belle La Marguerite.

And wonderful eyes, too, under the hood
 Of a damsel of right noble blood. 50
 St. Ives, for Lambert of the Wood!
Ahl qu'elle est belle La Marguerite. (1858)

THE SAILING OF THE SWORD

Across the empty garden-beds,
When the Sword went out to sea,
 I scarcely saw my sisters' heads
 Bowed each beside a tree.
 I could not see the castle-leads, 5
When the Sword went out to sea.

Alicia wore a scarlet gown,
When the Sword went out to sea,
 But Ursula's was russet brown,
 For the mist we could not see 10
 The scarlet roofs of the good town,
When the Sword went out to sea.

Green holly in Alicia's hand,
When the Sword went out to sea;
 With sear oak-leaves did Ursula stand; 15
 O! yet alas for me!
 I did but bear a peeled white wand,
When the Sword went out to sea.

Oh, russet brown and scarlet bright,
When the Sword went out to sea, 20
 My sisters wore, I wore but white.
 Red, brown, and white are three;
 Three damozels, each had a knight,
When the Sword went out to sea.

Sir Robert shouted loud, and said, 25
When the Sword went out to sea,
 "Alicia, while I see thy head,
 What shall I bring for thee?"
 "Oh, my sweet lord, a ruby red —"
The Sword went out to sea. 30

Sir Miles said, while the sails hung down,
When the Sword went out to sea,
 "Oh, Ursula! while I see the town,
 What shall I bring for thee?"
 "Dear knight, bring back a falcon brown" —
The Sword went out to sea. 36

But my Roland, no word he said
When the Sword went out to sea,
 But only turned away his head —

14 arrière-ban, a proclamation calling men to arms, also, a body of vassals called to arms 15 basnets, light steel helmets pennon, banner 39 Philip of France, Philip VI, king of France (1328-50) 41 perdie, a French oath, par Dieu, meaning by God 46 banneret, a knight who could lead vassals into the field under his own banner

51 St Ives, the patron saint of lawyers (died 1303) The name is used here as an oath
The Sailing of the Sword. 5 castle-leads, leaden roofs of the castle

A quick shriek came from me. 40
 "Come back, dear lord, to your white maid"—
The Sword went out to sea.

The hot sun bit the garden-beds,
When the Sword came back from sea;
 Beneath an apple-tree our heads 45
 Stretched out toward the sea;
 Gray gleamed the thirsty castle-leads,
When the Sword came back from sea.

Lord Robert brought a ruby red,
When the Sword came back from sea; 50
 He kissed Alicia on the head—
 "I am come back to thee;
 'Tis time, sweet love, that we were wed,
Now the Sword is back from sea!"

Sir Miles he bore a falcon brown, 55
When the Sword came back from sea;
 His arms went round tall Ursula's gown—
 "What joy, O love, but thee?
 Let us be wed in the good town,
Now the Sword is back from sea!" 60

My heart grew sick, no more afraid,
When the Sword came back from sea;
 Upon the deck a tall white maid
 Sat on Lord Roland's knee;
 His chin was pressed upon her head, 65
When the Sword came back from sea! (1858)

THE WIND

Ah! no, no, it is nothing, surely nothing at all,
 Only the wild-going wind round by the garden-wall,
 For the dawn just now is breaking, the wind
 beginning to fall
Wind, wind! thou art sad, art thou kind?
Wind, wind, unhappy! thou art blind, 5
Yet still thou wanderest the lily-seed to find

So I will sit, and think and think of the days gone by,
 Never moving my chair for fear the dogs
 should cry,
 Making no noise at all while the flambeau
 burns awry.
 For my chair is heavy and carved, and with sweeping green behind 10
 It is hung, and the dragons thereon grin out in the gusts of the wind;
 On its folds an orange lies, with a deep gash cut in the rind.

The Wind This poem is spoken by a Norse knight who is haunted by visions of the past. Apparently crazed by unrequited love, he had killed his sweetheart. The carvings on the chair and the decorations on the hangings are meant to be indefinitely symbolical.

9 flambeau, a flaming torch.

Wind, wind! thou art sad, art thou kind?
Wind, wind, unhappy! thou art blind,
Yet still thou wanderest the lily-seed to find

If I move my chair it will scream, and the orange will roll out far, 16
 And the faint yellow juice ooze out like blood
 from a wizard's jar;
 And the dogs will howl for those who went last month to the war.

Wind, wind! thou art sad, art thou kind?
Wind, wind, unhappy! thou art blind, 20
Yet still thou wanderest the lily-seed to find

So I will sit and think of love that is over and past,
 O! so long ago—yes, I will be quiet at last,
 Whether I like it or not, a grim half-slumber is cast

Over my worn old brains, that touches the roots of my heart, 25
 And above my half-shut eyes the blue roof
 'gins to part,
 And show the blue spring sky, till I am ready to start

From out of the green-hung chair; but something keeps me still,
 And I fall in a dream that I walked with her on the side of a hill,
 Dotted—for was it not spring?—with tufts of the daffodil 30

Wind, wind! thou art sad, art thou kind?
Wind, wind, unhappy! thou art blind,
Yet still thou wanderest the lily-seed to find

And Margaret, as she walked, held a painted book in her hand,
 Her finger kept the place; I caught her, we both did stand 35
 Face to face, on the top of the highest hill in the land.

Wind, wind! thou art sad, art thou kind?
Wind, wind, unhappy! thou art blind,
Yet still thou wanderest the lily-seed to find

I held to her long bare arms, but she shuddered away from me, 40
 While the flush went out of her face as her head fell back on a tree,
 And a spasm caught her mouth, fearful for me to see;

And still I held to her arms till her shoulder
 touched my mail;
 Weeping, she tottered forward, so glad that I should prevail,
 And her hair went over my robe, like a gold flag over a sail. 45

Wind, wind! thou art sad, art thou kind?
Wind, wind, unhappy! thou art blind,
Yet still thou wanderest the lily-seed to find.

I kissed her hard by the ear, and she kissed me on the brow,
And then lay down on the grass, where the mark on the moss is now, 50
And spread her arms out wide while I went down below.

*Wind, wind! thou art sad, art thou kind?
Wind, wind, unhappy! thou art blind,
Yet still thou wanderest the lily-seed to find.*

And then I walked for a space to and fro on the side of the hill, 55
Till I gathered and held in my arms great sheaves of the daffodil,
And when I came again my Margaret lay there still

I piled them high and high above her heaving
breast —
How they were caught and held in her loose
ungirded vest!
But one beneath her arm died, happy so to be prest! 60

*Wind, wind! thou art sad, art thou kind?
Wind, wind, unhappy! thou art blind,
Yet still thou wanderest the lily-seed to find.*

Again I turned my back and went away for an hour;
She said no word when I came again, so,
flower by flower, 65
I counted the daffodils over, and cast them
languidly lower

*Wind, wind! thou art sad, art thou kind?
Wind, wind, unhappy! thou art blind,
Yet still thou wanderest the lily-seed to find*

My dry hands shook and shook as the green gown showed again, 70
Cleared from the yellow flowers, and I grew hollow with pain,
And on to us both there fell from the sun-shower drops of rain

*Wind, wind! thou art sad, art thou kind?
Wind, wind, unhappy! thou art blind,
Yet still thou wanderest the lily-seed to find.*

Alas! alas! there was blood on the very quiet
breast, 76
Blood lay in the many folds of the loose
ungirded vest,
Blood lay upon her arm where the flower had been prest.

I shrieked and leapt from my chair, and the orange rolled out far,
The faint yellow juice oozed out like blood
from a wizard's jar; 80

79 I shrieked, etc The memory of the experience is so vivid that he shrieks

And then in marched the ghosts of those that had gone to the war.

I knew them by the arms that I was used to paint

Upon their long thin shields; but the colors
were all grown faint,

And faint upon their banner was Olaf, king and saint.

*Wind, wind! thou art sad, art thou kind? 85
Wind, wind, unhappy! thou art blind,
Yet still thou wanderest the lily-seed to find.

THE BLUE CLOSET

The Damoels

Lady Alice, Lady Louise,
Between the wash of the tumbling seas
We are ready to sing, if so ye please,
So lay your long hands on the keys,
Sing, "Laudate pueri" 5

*And ever the great bell overhead
Boomed in the wind a knell for the dead,
Though no one tolled it, a knell for the dead.*

Lady Louise

Sister, let the measure swell
Not too loud, for you sing not well 10
If you drown the faint boom of the bell;
He is weary, so am I

*And ever the chevron overhead
Flapped on the banner of the dead;
(Was he asleep, or was he dead?) 15*

Lady Alice

Alice the Queen, and Louise the Queen,
Two damozels wearing purple and green
Four lone ladies dwelling here
From day to day and year to year;
And there is none to let us go, 20
To break the locks of the doors below,
Or shovel away the heaped-up snow;
And when we die no man will know
That we are dead; but they give us leave,
Once every year on Christmas-eve, 25
To sing in the Closet Blue one song;
And we should be so long, so long,
If we dared, in singing; for dream on dream,

84 Olaf, Olaf II (995-1030), king and patron saint of Norway

The Blue Closet This poem was written for a picture by Rossetti. It presents the story of Lady Louise, whose lover Arthur (line 66) had gone away wearing her token. He never returned except in the Lady's dreams when she and Lady Alice, with their two Damozels, were gathered in the Blue Closet once a year, on Christmas Eve. See Critical Notes

5 Laudate pueri, Let the children praise. These are the opening words of a version of the famous church hymn Te Deum used in Ireland; it is found in the Bangor Antiphonary, dated 680-691. 13 chevron, a device of honor on a banner
Arthur's banner had been left in the Blue Closet

I am unhappy now,
 I cannot tell you why;
 If you go, the priests and I in a row
 Will pray that you may not die
"Listen!" said fair Yoland of the flowers, 35
"This is the tune of Seven Towers."

If you will go for me now,
 I will kiss your mouth at last;
 [She sayeth inwardly]
(The graves stand gray in a row), 40
 Oliver, hold me fast!
"Therefore," said fair Yoland of the flowers,
"This is the tune of Seven Towers" (1858)

THE HAYSTACK IN THE FLOODS

Had she come all the way for this,
 To part at last without a kiss?
 Yea, had she borne the dirt and rain
 That her own eyes might see him slain
 Beside the haystack in the floods? 5

Along the dripping, leafless woods,
 The stirrup touching either shoe,
 She rode astride as troopers do;
 With kirtle kilted to her knee,
 To which the mud splashed wretchedly; 10
 And the wet dripped from every tree
 Upon her head and heavy hair,
 And on her eyelids broad and fair;
 The tears and rain ran down her face.

By fits and starts they rode apace, 15
 And very often was his place
 Far off from her, he had to ride
 Ahead, to see what might betide
 When the roads crossed, and sometimes, when
 There rose a murmuring from his men, 20
 Had to turn back with promises.
 Ah me! she had but little ease;
 And often for pure doubt and dread
 She sobbed, made giddy in the head
 By the swift riding, while, for cold, 25
 Her slender fingers scarce could hold
 The wet reins, yea, and scarcely, too,
 She felt the foot within her shoe
 Against the stirrup; all for this,
 To part at last without a kiss 30
 Beside the haystack in the floods

For when they neared that old soaked hay,
 They saw across the only way
 That Judas Godmar, and the three

The Haystack in the Floods In this poem Sir Robert de Marny, an English knight who had fought at Poitiers (1356), is riding through France with Jehane, his mistress, and a small company. They are confronted by Godmar, a traitorous French knight, who was waiting to slay Robert and carry off Jehane

9 kirtle kilted, skirt tucked up

Red running lions dismally 35
 Grinned from his pennon, under which
 In one straight line along the ditch,
 They counted thirty heads.

So then
 While Robert turned round to his men,
 She saw at once the wretched end, 40
 And, stooping down, tried hard to rend
 Her coif the wrong way from her head,
 And hid her eyes; while Robert said,
 "Nay, love, 'tis scarcely two to one,
 At Poitiers where we made them run 45
 So fast — why, sweet my love, good cheer,
 The Gascon frontier is so near,
 Naught after us."

But "O!" she said,
 "My God! my God! I have to tread
 The long way back without you; then 50
 The court at Paris; those six men,
 The gratings of the Chatelet;
 The swift Seine on some rainy day
 Like this, and people standing by,
 And laughing, while my weak hands try 55
 To recollect how strong men swim.
 All this, or else a life with him,
 For which I should be damned at last;
 Would God that this next hour were past!"

He answered not, but cried his cry, 60
 "St George for Marny!" cheerily,
 And laid his hand upon her rein.
 Alas! no man of all his train
 Gave back that cheery cry again;
 And, while for rage his thumb beat fast 65
 Upon his sword-hilt, someone cast
 About his neck a kerchief long,
 And bound him.

Then they went along
 To Godmar, who said. "Now, Jehane,
 Your lover's life is on the wane 70
 So fast, that, if this very hour
 You yield not as my paramour,
 He will not see the rain leave off,
 Nay, keep your tongue from gibe and scoff,
 Sir Robert, or I slay you now." 75

She laid her hand upon her brow,
 Then gazed upon the palm, as though

She thought her forehead bled, and "No!"
 She said, and turned her head away,
 As there was nothing else to say, 80
 And everything was settled; red
 Grew Godmar's face from chin to head —
 "Jehane, on yonder hill there stands
 My castle, guarding well my lands;
 What hinders me from taking you, 85
 And doing that I list to do
 To your fair willful body, while
 Your knight lies dead?"

A wicked smile
 Wrinkled her face, her lips grew thin,
 A long way out she thrust her chin: 90
 "You know that I should strangle you
 While you were sleeping, or bite through Your throat, by God's help; ah!" she said,
 "Lord Jesus, pity your poor maid!
 For in such wise they hem me in, 95
 I cannot choose but sin and sin,
 Whatever happens, yet I think
 They could not make me eat or drink,
 And so should I just reach my rest."

"Nay, if you do not my behest, 100
 O Jehane! though I love you well,"
 Said Godmar, "would I fail to tell
 All that I know?" "Foul lies," she said
 "Eh? lies, my Jehane? by God's head,
 At Paris folks would deem them true! 105
 Do you know, Jehane, they cry for you
 'Jehane the brown! Jehane the brown!
 Give us Jehane to burn or drown!
 Eh! — gag me Robert! — sweet my friend,
 This were indeed a piteous end 110
 For those long fingers, and long feet,
 And long neck, and smooth shoulders sweet,
 An end that few men would forget
 That saw it. So, an hour yet —
 Consider, Jehane, which to take 115
 Of life or death!"

So, scarce awake,
 Dismounting, did she leave that place,
 And totter some yards; with her face
 Turned upward to the sky she lay,
 Her head on a wet heap of hay, 120
 And fell asleep; and while she slept,
 And did not dream, the minutes crept
 Round to the twelve again, but she,
 Being waked at last, sighed quietly,
 And strangely childlike came, and said 125
 "I will not." Straightway Godmar's head,
 As though it hung on strong wires, turned
 Most sharply round, and his face burned

For Robert, both his eyes were dry —
 He could not weep—but gloomily 130
 He seemed to watch the rain; yea, too,

His lips were firm; he tried once more
 To touch her lips, she reached out, sore
 And vain desire so tortured them,
 The poor gray lips, and now the hem 135
 Of his sleeve brushed them.

With a start
 Up Godmar rose, thrust them apart;
 From Robert's throat he loosed the bands
 Of silk and mail; with empty hands
 Held out, she stood and gazed, and saw, 140
 The long bright blade without a flaw
 Glide out from Godmar's sheath, his hand
 In Robert's hair; she saw him bend
 Back Robert's head, she saw him send
 The thin steel down; the blow told well — 145
 Right backward the knight Robert fell,
 And moaned as dogs do, being half dead,
 Unwitting, as I deem; so then
 Godmar turned grinning to his men,
 Who ran, some five or six, and beat 150
 His head to pieces at their feet

Then Godmar turned again and said:
 "So, Jehane, the first fitte is read!
 Take note, my lady, that your way
 Lies backward to the Chatelet!" 155
 She shook her head and gazed awhile
 At her cold hands with a rueful smile,
 As though this thing had made her mad

This was the parting that they had
 Beside the haystack in the floods 160

TWO RED ROSES ACROSS THE MOON

There was a lady lived in a hall,
 Large of her eyes and slim and tall,
 And ever she sung from noon to noon,
Two red roses across the moon.

There was a knight came riding by 5
 In early spring, when the roads were dry,
 And he heard that lady sing at the noon,
Two red roses across the moon

Yet none the more he stopped at all,
 But he rode a-gallop past the hall; 10
 And left that lady singing at noon,
Two red roses across the moon.

Because, forsooth, the battle was set,
 And the scarlet and blue had got to be met,
 He rode on the spur till the next warm
 noon, 15
Two red roses across the moon

153 fitte, a division of a poem, song, or story.

But the battle was scattered from hill to hill,
From the windmill to the watermill;
And he said to himself, as it neared the noon,
Two red roses across the moon. 20

You scarce could see for the scarlet and blue,
A golden helm or a golden shoe,
So he cried, as the fight grew thick at the
noon,
Two red roses across the moon!

Verily then the gold bore through 25
The huddled spears of the scarlet and blue,
And they cried, as they cut them down at the
noon,
Two red roses across the moon!

I trow he stopped when he rode again
By the hall, though draggled sore with the
rain; 30
And his lips were pinched to kiss at the noon
Two red roses across the moon.

Under the may she stooped to the crown,
All was gold, there was nothing of brown,
And the horns blew up in the hall at noon, 35
Two red roses across the moon. (1858)

SIR GILES'S WAR-SONG

*Ho! is there any will ride with me,
Sir Giles, le bon des barrières?*

The clink of arms is good to hear,
The flap of pennons fair to see;
Ho! is there any will ride with me, 5
Sir Giles, le bon des barrières?

The leopards and lilies are fair to see;
St George Guienne! right good to hear;
Ho! is there any will ride with me; 10
Sir Giles, le bon des barrières?

I stood by the barrier,
My coat being blazoned fair to see;
Ho! is there any will ride with me,
Sir Giles, le bon des barrières?

Clisson put out his head to see, 15
And lifted his basnet up to hear,
I pulled him through the bars to ME,
Sir Giles, le bon des barrières. (1858)

NEAR AVALON

A ship with shields before the sun,
Six maidens round the mast,
A red-gold crown on every one,
A green gown on the last.

The fluttering green banners there 5
Are wrought with ladies' heads most fair,
And a portraiture of Guenevere
The middle of each sail doth bear.

A ship which sails before the wind,
And round the helm six knights, 10
Their heaumes are on, whereby, half blind,
They pass by many sights.

The tattered scarlet banners there,
Right soon will leave the spear-heads bare,
Those six knights sorrowfully bear, 15
In all their heaumes some yellow hair (1858)

PRAISE OF MY LADY

My lady seems of ivory
Forehead, straight nose, and cheeks that be Hollowed a little mournfully
Beata mea Domina!

Her forehead, overshadowed much 5
By bows of hair, has a wave such
As God was good to make for me
Beata mea Domina!

Not greatly long my lady's hair,
Nor yet with yellow color fair, 10
But thick and crisped wonderfully;
Beata mea Domina!

Heavy to make the pale face sad,
And dark, but dead as though it had Been forged by God most wonderfully 15
— Beata mea Domina! —

Of some strange metal, thread by thread,
To stand out from my lady's head,
Not moving much to tangle me.
Beata mea Domina! 20

Beneath her brows the lids fall slow,
The lashes a clear shadow throw

Near Avalon In medieval romance, Avalon was an ocean island, the earthly paradise, where, according to legend, Arthur is waiting to return The poem symbolizes the hopeless love of knights for gay maidens

11 heaumes, helmets 16 yellow hair, a love token
Most ladies of romance had golden hair

Praise of My Lady The details in this poem fit almost exactly Rossetti's portrait of Jane Burden, whom Morris married in 1859 Morris and Rossetti had met her at Oxford
in 1856

4 Beata mea Domina, my blessed lady 11 crispéd, curled

Where I would wish my lips to be
Beata mea Domina!

Her great eyes, standing far apart, 25
 Draw up some memory from her heart,
 And gaze out very mournfully
 — Beata mea Domina! —

So beautiful and kind they are, 30
 But most times looking out afar,
 Waiting for something, not for me
Beata mea Domina!

I wonder if the lashes long
 Are those that do her bright eyes wrong,
 For always half tears seem to be 35
 — Beata mea Domina! —

Lurking below the underlid,
 Darkening the place where they lie hid —
 If they should rise and flow for me!
Beata mea Domina! 40

Her full lips being made to kiss,
 Curled up and pensive each one is,
 This makes me faint to stand and see.
Beata mea Domina!

Her lips are not contented now, 45
 Because the hours pass so slow
 Toward a sweet time (pray for me),
 — Beata mea Domina! —

Nay, hold thy peace! for who can tell,
 But this at least I know full well, 50
 Her lips are parted longingly,
 — Beata mea Domina! —

So passionate and swift to move,
 To pluck at any flying love,
 That I grow faint to stand and see. 55
Beata mea Domina!

Yea! there beneath them is her chin,
 So fine and round, it were a sin
 To feel no weaker when I see
 — Beata mea Domina! — 60

God's dealings; for with so much care
 And troublous, faint lines wrought in there,
 He finishes her face for me
Beata mea Domina!

Of her long neck what shall I say? 65
 What things about her body's sway,
 Like a knight's pennon or slim tree
 — Beata mea Domina! —

Set gently waving in the wind,
 Or her long hands that I may find 70
 On some day sweet to move o'er me?
Beata mea Domina!

God pity me though, if I missed
 The telling, how along her wrist
 The veins creep, dying languidly 75
 — Beata mea Domina! —

Inside her tender palm and thin,
 Now give me pardon, dear, wherein
 My voice is weak and vexes thee. 80
Beata mea Domina!

All men that see her any time,
 I charge you straightly in this rime,
 What, and wherever you may be,
 — Beata mea Domina! —

To kneel before her, as for me, 85
 I choke and grow quite faint to see
 My lady moving graciously
Beata mea Domina! (1857; 1858)

IN PRISON

Wearily, drearily,
 Half the day long,
 Flap the great banners
 High over the stone;
 Strangely and eerily 5
 Sounds the wind's song,
 Bending the banner-poles

While, all alone,
 Watching the loophole's spark,
 Lie I, with life all dark, 10
 Feet tethered, hands fettered
 Fast to the stone,
 The grim wall, square lettered
 With prisoned men's groan

Still strain the banner-poles 15
 Through the wind's song
 Westward the banner roll
 Over my wrong.

From THE LIFE AND DEATH OF JASON

O BITTER SEA

O bitter sea, tumultuous sea,
 Full many an ill is wrought by thee! —
 Unto the wasters of the land
 Thou holdest out thy wrinkled hand,
 And when they leave the conquered town, 5
 Whose black smoke makes thy surges brown,
 Driven betwixt thee and the sun,

The Life and Death of Jason See Critical Notes
O Bitter Sea This lyric, in Book 4, is sung by Orpheus, the famous musician, as the ship Argos moves out into the sea on its journey from the shore of Thessaly, Greece

As the long day of blood is done,
From many a league of glittering waves
Thou smilest on them and their slaves.

The thin bright-eyed Phœnician
Thou drawest to thy waters wan;
With ruddy eve and golden morn
Thou temptest him, until, forlorn,
Unburied, under alien skies
Cast up ashore his body lies.

Yea, whoso sees thee from his door,
Must ever long for more and more,
Nor will the beechen bowl suffice,
Or homespun robe of little price,
Or hood well-woven of the fleece
Undyed, or unspiced wine of Greece;
So sore his heart is set upon
Purple, and gold, and cinnamon;
For as thou cravest, so he craves,
Until he rolls beneath thy waves.
Nor in some landlocked, unknown bay,
Can satiate thee for one day

Now, therefore, O thou bitter sea,
With no long words we pray to thee,
But ask thee, hast thou felt before
Such strokes of the long ashén oar?
And hast thou yet seen such a prow
Thy rich and niggard waters plow?

Nor yet, O sea, shalt thou be cursed,
If at thy hands we gain the worst,
And, wrapped in water, roll about
Blind-eyed, unheeding song or shout,
Within thine eddies far from shore,
Warmed by no sunlight any more

Therefore, indeed, we joy in thee,
And praise thy greatness, and will we Take at thy hands both good and ill,
Yea, what thou wilt, and praise thee still,
Enduring not to sit at home,
And wait until the last days come,
When we no more may care to hold
White bosoms under crowns of gold,
And our dulled hearts no longer are Stirred by the clangorous noise of war,
And hope within our souls is dead,
And no joy is remembered.

So, if thou hast a mind to slay,
Fair prize thou hast of us today,
And if thou hast a mind to save,
Great praise and honor shalt thou have;
But whatso thou wilt do with us,
Our end shall not be piteous,
Because our memories shall live
When folk forget the way to drive
The black keel through the heaped-up sea,
And half dried up thy waters be.

A GARDEN BY THE SEA

I know a little garden close
Set thick with lily and red rose,
Where I would wander if I might
From dewy dawn to dewy night,
And have one with me wandering.

And though within it no birds sing,
And though no pillared house is there,
And though the apple boughs are bare
Of fruit and blossom, would to God,
Her feet upon the green grass trod,
And I beheld them as before

There comes a murmur from the shore,
And in the close two fair streams are,
Drawn from the purple hills afar,
Drawn down unto the restless sea:
Dark hills whose heath-bloom feeds no bee,
Dark shore no ship has ever seen,
Still beaten by the billows green,
Whose murmur comes unceasingly
Unto the place for which I cry.

For which I cry both day and night,
For which I let slip all delight,
That maketh me both deaf and blind,
Careless to win, unskilled to find,
And quck to lose what all men seek.

Yet tottering as I am, and weak,
Still have I left a little breath
To seek within the jaws of death
An entrance to that happy place,
To seek the unforgotten face
Once seen, once kissed, once reft from me
Angh the murmuring of the sea (1867)

O DEATH, THAT MAKETH LIFE SO SWEET

O death, that makest life so sweet,
O fear, with mirth before thy feet,
What have ye yet in store for us,
The conquerors, the glorious?
Men say: "For fear that thou shouldst die
Tomorrow, let today pass by Flower-crowned and singing", yet have we Passed our today upon the sea,
Or in a poisonous unknown land,
With fear and death on either hand,
And listless when the day was done

A Garden by the Sea This lyric, in Book 4, is the "sweet song sung not yet to any man" by the water-nymph as she lulls to sleep the Theban youth Hylas. He had wandered away from his companions who had landed on the shore of Mysia, Asia Minor, in search of fresh water. Hylas was left behind by his companions

O Death, That Maketh Life So Sweet This song, in Book 12, is sung by Orpheus to inspire his comrades on their homeward voyage after a hard winter passed on the shore of a northern river, they are tossing upon the Atlantic near the Pillars of Hercules (Strait of Gibraltar)

11 Phœnician, a native of Phœnicia, along the coast of Asia Minor. The Phœnicians were noted for their commerce

Have scarcely hoped to see the sun
Dawn on the morrow of the earth,
Nor in our hearts have thought of mirth
And while the world lasts, scarce again 15
Shall any sons of men bear pain
Like we have borne, yet be alive.

So surely not in vain we strive
Like other men for our reward;
Sweet peace and deep, the checkered sward
Beneath the ancient mulberry trees, 21
The smooth-paved gilded palaces,
Where the shy thin-clad damsels sweet
Make music with their gold-tinged feet,
The fountain court amidst of it, 25
Where the short-haired slave-maidens sit,
While on the veined pavement lie
The honeyed things and spicery
Their arms have borne from out the town
The dancers on the thymy down 30
In summer twilight, when the earth
Is still of all things but their mirth,
And echoes borne upon the wind
Of others in like way entwined.

The merchant-town's fair market-place, 35
Where over many a changing face
The pigeons of the temple flit,
And still the outland merchants sit
Like kings above their merchandise,
Lying to foolish men and wise. 40

Ah! if they heard that we were come
Into the bay, and bringing home
That which all men have talked about,
Some men with rage, and some with doubt,
Some with desire, and some with praise, 45
Then would the people throng the ways,
Nor heed the outland merchandise,
Nor any talk, from fools or wise,
But tales of our accomplished quest.

What soul within the house shall rest 50
When we come home? The wily king
Shall leave his throne to see the thing,
No man shall keep the landward gate,
The hurried traveler shall wait
Until our bulwarks graze the quay; 55
Unslain the milk-white bull shall be
Beside the quivering altar-flame;
Scarce shall the maiden clasp for shame
Over her breast the raiment thin,
The morn that Argo cometh in. 60

Then cometh happy life again
That payeth well our toil and pain
In that sweet hour, when all our woe
But as a pensive tale we know,
Nor yet remember deadly fear; 65
For surely now if death be near,
Unthought-of is it, and unseen
When sweet is, that hath bitter been

From THE EARTHLY PARADISE

AN APOLOGY

Of Heaven or Hell I have no power to sing,
I cannot ease the burden of your fears,
Or make quick-coming death a little thing,
Or bring again the pleasure of past years,
Nor for my words shall ye forget your tears,
Or hope again for aught that I can say — 6
The idle singer of an empty day.

But rather, when aware of your mirth,
From full hearts still unsatisfied ye sigh,
And, feeling kindly unto all the earth, 10
Grudge every minute as it passes by,
Made the more mindful that the sweet days
die —
Remember me a little then, I pray,
The idle singer of an empty day.

The heavy trouble, the bewildering care 15
That weighs us down who live and earn our bread,
These idle verses have no power to bear,
So let me sing of names remembered,
Because they, living not, can ne'er be dead,
Or long time take their memory quite away
From us poor singers of an empty day 21

Dreamer of dreams, born out of my due time,
Why should I strive to set the crooked
straight?
Let it suffice me that my murmuring rime,
Beats with light wing against the ivory gate,
Telling a tale not too importunate 26
To those who in the sleepy region stay,
Lulled by the singer of an empty day.

Folk say, a wizard to a northern king
At Christmas-tide such wondrous things did
show, 30
That through one window men beheld the
spring,
And through another saw the summer glow,
And through a third the fruited vines a-row,
While still, unheard, but in its wonted way,
Piped the drear wind of that December day.

So with this Earthly Paradise it is, 36
If ye will read aright, and pardon me,
Who strive to build a shadowy isle of bliss
Midmost the beating of the steely sea,
Where tossed about all hearts of men must
be;

An Apology 1 Of Heaven or Hell Morris disclaims equality with earlier poets who used these themes—Virgil, Dante, Milton 25 the ivory gate The house of Morpheus, god of sleep, had two gates through which dreams issued True dreams passed through a gate of horn, false dreams, through a gate of ivory

43 That . about, the Golden Fleece 60 Argo, the name of their ship, from which they were called Argonauts

Whose ravening monsters mighty men shall slay — 41
Not the poor singer of an empty day.

JUNE

O June, O June, that we desired so,
Wilt thou not make us happy on this day?
Across the river thy soft breezes blow,
Sweet with the scent of beanfields far away;
Above our heads rustle the aspens gray; 5
Calm is the sky with harmless clouds beset —
No thought of storm the morning vexes yet.

See, we have left our hopes and fears behind
To give our very hearts up unto thee;
What better place than this, then, could we find 10
By this sweet stream that knows not of the
sea,
That guesses not the city's misery —
This little stream whose hamlets scarce have names,
This far-off, lonely mother of the Thames?

Here then, O June, thy kindness will we take;
And if indeed but pensive men we seem, 16
What should we do? Thou wouldst not have us wake
From out the arms of this rare happy dream
And wish to leave the murmur of the stream,
The rustling boughs, the twitter of the birds,
And all thy thousand peaceful happy words. 21

THE LADY OF THE LAND

Argument. A certain man, having landed on an island in the Greek Sea, found there a beautiful damsel, whom he fain would have delivered from a strange and dreadful doom, but failing herein, he died soon afterwards.

It happened once, some men of Italy
Midst the Greek Islands went a sea-roving,
And much good fortune had they on the sea:
Of many a man they had the ransoming, 4
And many a chain they gat, and goodly thing;
And midst their voyage to an isle they came,
Whereof my story keepeth not the name.

Now though but little was there left to gain,
Because the richer folk had gone away,
Yet since, by this, of water they were fain, 10
They came to anchor in a land-locked bay,

The Lady of the Land. This is the eighth story of the cycle. Cf. Browning's Muckle-Mouth Meg, page 355. The source of the poem is found in Book 4 of John Maundeville's Voyage and Travails. See Critical Notes

Whence in a while some went ashore to play,
Going but lightly armed in twos or threes,
For midst that folk they feared no enemies.

And of these fellows that thus went ashore, 15
One was there who left all his friends behind,
Who going inland ever more and more,
And being left quite alone, at last did find
A lonely valley sheltered from the wind,
Wherein, amidst an ancient cypress wood, 20
A long-deserted ruined castle stood.

The wood, once ordered in fair grove and glade,
With gardens overlooked by terraces,
And marble-paved pools for pleasure made,
Was tangled now, and choked with fallen
trees; 25
And he who went there, with but little ease
Must stumble by the stream's side, once made meet
For tender women's dainty wandering feet.

The raven's croak, the low wind choked
and drear,
The baffled stream, the gray wolf's doleful
cry, 30
Were all the sounds that mariner could hear,
As through the wood he wandered painfully;
But as unto the house he drew anigh,
The pillars of a ruined shrine he saw,
The once fair temple of a fallen law. 35

No image was there left behind to tell Before whose face the knees of men had
bowed;
An altar of black stone, of old wrought well,
Alone beneath a ruined roof now showed
The goal whereto the folk were wont to crowd, 40
Seeking for things forgotten long ago,
Praying for heads long ages laid a-low.

Close to the temple was the castle-gate,
Doorless and crumbling; there our fellow turned,
Trembling indeed at what might chance to wait 45
The prey entrapped, yet with a heart that burned
To know the most of what might there be learned,
And hoping somewhat too, amid his fear,
To light on such things as all men hold dear.

Noble the house was, nor seemed built for war, 50
But rather like the work of other days,

When men, in better peace than now they are,
Had leisure on the world around to gaze,
And noted well the past times' changing ways,
And fair with sculptured stories it was
wrought, 55
By lapse of time unto dim ruin brought

Now as he looked about on all these things,
And strove to read the moldering histories,
Above the door an image with wise wings,
Whose unclad limbs a serpent seemed to seize, 60
He dimly saw, although the western breeze,
And years of biting frost and washing rain,
Had made the carver's labor wellnigh vain

But this, though perished sore, and worn
away,
He noted well, because it seemed to be, 65
After the fashion of another day,
Some great man's badge of war, or armory,
And round it a carved wreath he seemed to
see;
But taking note of these things, at the last
The mariner beneath the gateway passed 70

And there a lovely cloistered court he found,
A fountain in the midst, o'erthrown and dry,
And in the cloister briars twining round
The slender shafts, the wondrous imagery
Outworn by more than many years gone
by,
Because the country people, in their fear 76
Of wizardry, had wrought destruction here,

And piteously these fair things had been maimed —
There stood great Jove, lacking his head of
might,
Here was the archer, swift Apollo, lamed; 80
The shapely limbs of Venus hid from sight
By weeds and shards; Diana's ankles light
Bound with the cable of some coasting ship,
And rusty nails through Helen's maddening lip.

Therefrom unto the chambers did he pass,
And found them fair still, midst of their decay, 86
Though in them now no sign of man there
was,
And everything but stone had passed away
That made them lovely in that vanished day;

79 Jove, ruler of the gods 80 Apollo, god of manly youth and beauty, of poetry and music His attributes were the bow and the lyre 81 Venus, goddess of love 82 Diana, goddess of the moon and of the chase 84 Helen, Helen of Troy (see note on A Dream of Fair Women, line 85, page 32)

Nay, the mere walls themselves would soon be gone 90
And naught be left but heaps of moldering
stone

But he, when all the place he had gone o'er,
And with much trouble clomb the broken
stair,
And from the topmost turret seen the shore
And his good ship drawn up at anchor there, Came down again, and found a crypt most
fair, 96
Built wonderfully beneath the greatest hall;
And there he saw a door within the wall,

Well-hinged, close-shut, nor was there in that place
Another on its hinges — therefore he 100
Stood there and pondered for a little space,
And thought, "Perchance some marvel I shall
see,
For surely here some dweller there must be,
Because this door seems whole, and new, and
sound,
While naught but ruin I can see around " 105

So with that word, moved by a strong
desire,
He tried the hasp, that yielded to his hand,
And in a strange place, lit as by a fire
Unseen but near, he presently did stand,
And by an odorous breeze his face was fanned,
As though in some Arabian plain he stood, 111
Amid the border of a spice-tree wood

He moved not for a while, but looking
round,
He wondered much to see the place so fair,
Because, unlike the castle above ground, 115
No pillager or wrecker had been there,
It seemed that time had passed on other-
where,
Nor laid a finger on this hidden place,
Rich with the wealth of some forgotten race

With hangings, fresh as when they left the loom, 120
The walls were hung a space above the head,
Slim ivory chairs were set about the room,
And in one corner was a dainty bed,
That seemed for some fair queen appareléd,
And marble was the worst stone of the floor,
That with rich Indian webs was covered o'er

The wanderer trembled when he saw all
this,
Because he deemed by magic it was wrought;
Yet in his heart a longing for some bliss,
Whereof the hard and changing world knows
naught, 130

Arose and urged him on, and dimmed the thought
That there perchance some devil lurked to slay
The heedless wanderer from the light of day

Over against him was another door
Set in the wall, so, casting fear aside, 135
With hurried steps he crossed the varied floor,
And there again the silver latch he tried,
And with no pain the door he opened wide,
And entering the new chamber cautiously
The glory of great heaps of gold could see 140

Upon the floor uncounted medals lay,
Like things of little value; here and there
Stood golden caldrons, that might well outweigh
The biggest midst an emperor's copper-ware,
And golden cups were set on tables fair, 145
Themselves of gold; and in all hollow things
Were stored great gems, worthy the crowns of kings.

The walls and roof with gold were overlaid,
And precious raiment from the wall hung down;
The fall of kings that treasure might have stayed, 150
Or gained some longing conqueror great renown,
Or built again some god-destroyed old town,
What wonder, if this plunderer of the sea
Stood gazing at it long and dizzily?

But at the last his troubled eyes and dazed
He lifted from the glory of that gold, 156
And then the image, that, wellnigh erased,
Over the castle-gate he did behold,
Above a door well wrought in colored gold
Again he saw — a naked girl with wings 160
Enfolded in a serpent's scaly rings.

And even as his eyes were fixed on it
A woman's voice came from the other side,
And through his heart strange hopes began to flit
That in some wondrous land he might abide
Not dying, master of a deathless bride; 166
So o'er the gold he scarcely now could see
He went, and passed this last door eagerly.

Then in a room he stood wherein there was
A marble bath, whose brimming water yet 170
Was scarcely still; a vessel of green glass
Half full of odorous ointment was there set
Upon the topmost step that still was wet,
And jeweled shoes and women's dainty gear,
Lay cast upon the varied pavement near 175

In one quick glance these things his eyes did see,
But speedily they turned round to behold
Another sight, for throned on ivory
There sat a girl, whose dripping tresses rolled
On to the floor in waves of gleaming gold, 180
Cast back from such a form as, erewhile shown
To one poor shepherd, lighted up Troy town

Naked she was; the kisses of her feet
Upon the floor a dying path had made
From the full bath unto her ivory seat; 185
In her right hand, upon her bosom laid,
She held a golden comb; a mirror weighed
Her left hand down; aback her fair head lay,
Dreaming, awake, of some long vanished day.

Her eyes were shut, but she seemed not to sleep; 190
Her lips were murmuring things unheard and low,
Or sometimes twitched as though she needs must weep
Though from her eyes the tears refused to flow;
And oft with heavenly red her cheek did glow,
As if remembrance of some half-sweet shame
Across the web of many memories came. 196

There stood the man, scarce daring to draw breath
For fear the lovely sight should fade away;
Forgetting heaven, forgetting life and death,
Trembling for fear lest something he should say 200
Unwitting, lest some sob should yet betray
His presence there, for to his eager eyes
Already did the tears begin to rise.

But as he gazed, she moved, and with a sigh
Bent forward, dropping down her golden head, 205
"Alas, alas! another day gone by,
Another day and no soul come," she said;
"Another year, and still I am not dead!"
And with that word once more her head she raised,
And on the trembling man with great eyes gazed. 210

Then he imploring hands to her did reach,
And toward her very slowly 'gan to move
And with wet eyes her pity did beseech,
And seeing her about to speak, he strove

From trembling lips to utter words of love, 215
And with a look she stayed his doubtful feet,
And made sweet music as their eyes did meet.

For now she spoke in gentle voice and clear,
Using the Greek tongue that he knew full well
"What man art thou, that thus hast wanderdered here, 220
And found this lonely chamber where I dwell?
Beware, beware! for I have many a spell,
If greed of power and gold have led thee on,
Not lightly shall this untold wealth be won.

"But if thou com'st here, knowing of my tale, 225
In hope to bear away my body fair,
Stout must thine heart be, nor shall that avail
If thou a wicked heart in thee dost bear,
So once again I bid thee to beware,
Because no base man things like this may see,
And live thereafter long and happily." 231

"Lady," he said, "in Florence is my home,
And in my city noble is my name,
Neither on peddling voyage am I come,
But, like my fathers, bent to gather fame, 235
And though thy face has set my heart a-flame,
Yet of thy story nothing do I know,
But here have wandered heedlessly enow.

"But since the sight of thee mine eyes did bless,
What can I be but thine? what wouldst thou have? 240
From those thy words, I deem from some distress
By deeds of mine thy dear life I might save,
Oh, then, delay not! if one ever gave
His life to any, mine I give to thee;
Come, tell me what the price of love must
be? — 245

"Swift death, to be with thee a day and
night
And with the earliest dawning to be slain?
Or better, a long year of great delight,
And many years of misery and pain?
Or worse, and this poor hour for all my gain?
A sorry merchant am I on this day, 251
E'en as thou wilt, so must I obey."

She said, "What brave words! Naught divine am I,
But an unhappy and unheard-of maid,
Compelled by evil fate and destiny 255
To live, who long ago should have been laid
Under the earth within the cypress shade

Hearken awhile, and quickly shalt thou know
What deed I pray thee to accomplish now

"God grant indeed thy words are not for naught! 260
Then shalt thou save me, since for many a
day
To such a dreadful life I have been brought.
Nor will I spare with all my heart to pay
What man soever takes my grief away,
Ah! I will love thee, if thou lovest me 265
But well enough my savior now to be.

"My father lived a many years ago,
Lord of this land, master of all cunning,
Who ruddy gold could draw from out gray
stone,
And gather wealth from many an uncouth
thing, 270
He made the wilderness rejoice and sing,
And such a leech he was that none could say
Without his word what soul should pass away

"Unto Diana such a gift he gave,
Goddess above, below, and on the earth, 275
That I should be her virgin and her slave
From the first hour of my most wretched
birth,
Therefore my life had known but little mirth
When I had come unto my twentieth year
And the last time of hallowing drew anear 280

"So in her temple had I lived and died
And all would long ago have passed away,
But ere that time came, did strange things
betide,
Whereby I am alive unto this day;
Alas, the bitter words that I must say! 285
Ah! can I bring my wretched tongue to tell
How I was brought unto this fearful hell?

"A queen I was, what gods I knew I loved,
And nothing evil was there in my thought,
And yet by love my wretched heart was moved 290
Until to utter ruin I was brought!
Alas! thou sayest our gods were vain and
naught,
Wait, wait, till thou hast heard this tale of
mine —
Then shalt thou think them devilish or divine

"Hearken! in spite of father and of vow,
I loved a man, but for that sin I think 295
Men had forgiven me — yea, yea, even thou,
But from the gods the full cup must I drink
And into misery unheard of sink,
Tormented, when their own names are forgot,
And men must doubt e'er if they lived or
not 301

"Glorious my lover was unto my sight,
Most beautiful — of love we grew so fain
That we at last agreed that on a night
We should be happy, but that he were slain 308
Or shut in hold; and neither joy nor pain
Should else forbid that hoped-for time to be,
So came the night that made a wretch of me

"Ah! well do I remember all that night,
When through the window shone the orb of June, 310
And by the bed flickered the taper's light,
Whereby I trembled, gazing at the moon;
Ah me! the meeting that we had, when soon
Into his strong, well-trusted arms I fell,
And many a sorrow we began to tell. 315

"Ah me! what parting on that night we had!
I think the story of my great despair
A little while might merry folk make sad,
For, as he swept away my yellow hair
To make my shoulder and my bosom bare,
I raised mine eyes, and shuddering could behold 321
A shadow cast upon the bed of gold;

"Then suddenly was quenched my hot
desire,
And he untwined his arms, the moon, so pale
A while ago, seemed changed to blood and
fire, 325
And yet my limbs beneath me did not fail,
And neither had I strength to cry or wail,
But stood there helpless, bare, and shivering,
With staring eyes still fixed upon the thing

"Because the shade that on the bed of gold
The changed and dreadful moon was throwing down 331
Was of Diana, whom I did behold,
With knotted hair, and shining girt-up gown,
And on the high white brow, a deadly frown
Bent upon us, who stood scarce drawing
breath, 335
Striving to meet the horrible sure death,

"No word at all the dreadful goddess said,
But soon across my feet my lover lay,
And well indeed I knew that he was dead;
And would that I had died on that same day!
For in a while the image turned away, 341
And without words my doom I understood,
And felt a horror change my human blood

"And there I fell, and on the floor I lay
By the dead man, till daylight came on me, 345
And not a word thenceforward could I say
For three years; till of grief and misery,
The lingering pest, the cruel enemy,

My father and his folk were dead and gone,
And in this castle I was left alone 350

"And then the doom foreseen upon me fell,
For Queen Diana did my body change
Into a fork-tongued dragon flesh and fell,
And through the island nightly do I range,
Or in the green sea mate with monsters
strange, 355
When in the middle of the moonlit night
The sleepy mariner I do affright

"But all day long upon this gold I lie,
Within this place, where never mason's hand
Smote trowel on the marble noisily; 360
Drowsy I lie, no folk at my command,
Who once was called the Lady of the Land,
Who might have bought a kingdom with a
kiss,
Yea, half the world with such a sight as this "

And therewithal, with rosy fingers light, 365
Backward her heavy-hanging hair she threw,
To give her naked beauty more to sight;
But when, forgetting all the things he knew,
Maddened with love unto the prize he drew,
She cried, "Nay, wait! for wherefore wilt thou
die, 370
Why should we not be happy, thou and I?"

"Wilt thou not save me? Once in every year
This rightful form of mine that thou dost see
By favor of the goddess have I here
From sunrise unto sunset given me, 375
That some brave man may end my misery
And thou — art thou not brave? can thy heart fail,
Whose eyes e'en now are weeping at my tale?"

"Then listen! when this day is overpast,
A fearful monster shall I be again, 380
And thou mayst be my savior at the last — Unless, once more, thy words are naught and
vain.
If thou of love and sovereignty art fain,
Come thou next morn, and when thou sees
here
A hideous dragon, have thereof no fear 385

"But take the loathsome head up in thine
hands,
And kiss it, and be master presently
Of twice the wealth that is in all the lands,
From Cathay to the head of Italy;
And master also, if it pleaseth thee, 390
Of all thou praisest as so fresh and bright,
Of what thou callest crown of all delight

353 flesh and fell, body and skin 389 Cathay, a poetic name for China, used vaguely during the Middle Ages for regions in the Far East

"Ah! with what joy then shall I see again
The sunlight on the green grass and the trees,
And hear the clatter of the summer rain, 395
And see the joyous folk beyond the seas;
Ah, me! to hold my child upon my knees,
After the weeping of unkindly tears,
And all the wrongs of these four hundred
years.

"Go now, go quick! leave this gray heap of
stone, 400
And from thy glad heart think upon thy
way,
How I shall love thee — yea, love thee alone,
That bringest me from dark death unto
day;
For this shall be thy wages and thy pay; 404
Unheard-of wealth, unheard-of love is near,
If thou hast heart a little dread to bear."

Therewith she turned to go, but he cried
out,
"Ah! wilt thou leave me then without one
kiss,
To slay the very seeds of fear and doubt,
That glad tomorrow may bring certain bliss?
Hast thou forgotten how love lives by this, 411
The memory of some hopeful close embrace,
Low whispered words within some lonely
place?"

But she, when his bright glittering eyes she saw,
And burning cheeks, cried out, "Alas, alas! 415
Must I be quite undone, and wilt thou draw
A worse fate on me than the first one was?
Oh, haste thee from this fatal place to pass!
Yet, ere thou goest, take this, lest thou shouldst deem Thou hast been fooled by some strange midday dream." 420

So saying, blushing like a new-kissed maid,
From off her neck a little gem she drew,
That, 'twixt those snowy rose-tinged hillocks
laid,
The secrets of her glorious beauty knew; 424
And ere he well perceived what she would do,
She touched his hand, the gem within it lay,
And, turning, from his sight she fled away.

Then at the doorway where her rosy heel
Had glanced and vanished, he awhile did stare, 429
And still upon his hand he seemed to feel
The varying kisses of her fingers fair,
Then turned he toward the dreary crypt and bare,
And dizzily throughout the castle passed,
Till by the ruined fane he stood at last.

Then weighing still the gem within his
hand, 434
He stumbled backward though the cypress
wood,
Thinking the while of some strange lovely
land,
Where all his life should be most fair and
good
Till on the valley's wall of hills he stood, 439
And slowly thence passed down unto the bay
Red with the death of that bewildering
day.

The next day came, and he, who all the
night
Had ceaselessly been turning in his bed,
Arose and clad himself in armor bright,
And many a danger he remembered — 445
Storming of towns, lone sieges full of dread,
That with renown his heart had borne him
through —
And this thing seemed a little thing to do.

So on he went, and on the way he thought
Of all the glorious things of yesterday, 450
Naught of the price whereat they must be bought,
But ever to himself did softly say,
"No roaming now, my wars are passed away,
No long dull days devoid of happiness,
When such a love my yearning heart shall bless." 455

Thus to the castle did he come at last,
But when unto the gateway he drew near,
And underneath its ruined archway passed
Into the court, a strange noise did he hear,
And through his heart there shot a pang of fear; 460
Trembling, he gat his sword into his hand,
And midmost of the cloisters took his stand.

But for a while that unknown noise increased,
A rattling, that with strident roars did blend,
And whining moans; but suddenly it ceased—
A fearful thing stood at the cloister's end, 466
And eyed him for a while, then 'gan to wend
Adown the cloisters, and began again
That rattling, and the moan like fiends in
pain.

And as it came on toward him, with its teeth 470
The body of a slain goat did it tear,
The blood whereof in its hot jaws did seethe,
And on its tongue he saw the smoking hair;
Then his heart sank, and standing trembling
there,

Throughout his mind wild thoughts and fearful ran, 475
"Some fiend she was," he said, "the bane of
man"

Yet he abode her still, although his blood Curdled within him The thing dropped the goat,
And creeping on, came close to where he stood,
And raised its head to him, and wrinkled
throat, 480
Then he cried out and wildly at her smote, Shutting his eyes, and turned and from the
place
Ran swiftly, with a white and ghastly face

But little things rough stones and tree-trunks seemed,
And if he fell, he rose and ran on still 485
No more he felt his hurts than if he dreamed,
He made no stay for valley or steep hill;
Heedless, he dashed through many a foaming
rill,
Until he came unto the ship at last,
And with no word into the deep hold passed

Meanwhile the dragon, seeing him clean
gone, 491
Followed him not, but crying horribly,
Caught up within her jaws a block of stone
And ground it into powder, then turned she,
With cries that folk could hear far out at
sea,
And reached the treasure set apart of old, 496
To brood above the hidden heaps of gold.

Yet was she seen again on many a day
By some half-waking mariner, or heard,
Playing amid the ripples of the bay, 500
Or on the hills making all things afraid,
Or in the wood, that did that castle gird,
But never any man again durst go
To seek her woman's form, and end her woe

As for the man, who knows what things he bore? 505
What mournful faces peopled the sad night,
What wailings vexed him with reproaches
sore,
What images of that nigh-gained delight!
What dreamed caresses from soft hands and
white,
Turning to horrors ere they reached the best!
What struggles vain, what shame, what huge unrest! 511

No man he knew, three days he lay and raved,
And cried for death, until a lethargy

Fell on him, and his fellows thought him saved;
But on the third night he awoke to die; 515
And at Byzantium doth his body lie
Between two blossoming pomegranate trees,
Within the churchyard of the Genoese (1868)

SONG from OGIER THE DANE

Hæc

In the white-flowered hawthorn brake,
Love, be merry for my sake;
Twine the blossoms in my hair,
Kiss me where I am most fair --
Kiss me, love! for who knoweth 5
What thing cometh after death?

Ille

Nay, the garlanded gold hair
Hides thee where thou art most fair;
Hides the rose-tinged hills of snow --
Ah, sweet love, I have thee now! 10
Kiss me, love! for who knoweth
What thing cometh after death?

Hæc

Shall we weep for a dead day,
Or set Sorrow in our way?
Hidden by my golden hair, 15
Wilt thou weep that sweet days wear?
Kiss me, love! for who knoweth
What thing cometh after death?

Ille

Weep, O love, the days that flit,
Now, while I can feel thy breath, 20
Then may I remember it
Sad and old, and near my death.
Kiss me, love! for who knoweth
What thing cometh after death? (1868)

SONG from THE HILL OF VENUS

Before our lady came on earth
Little there was of joy or mirth,
About the borders of the sea
The sea-folk wandered heavily;
About the wintry river side 5
The weary fishers would abide.

516 Byzantium, an ancient Greek city on the site of Constantinople. It contained a cemetery for natives of Genoa who had moved there.

Song from Ogier the Dane Ogier was a Danish prince, a hero of medieval French romances. The song given here was heard by Ogier as it was sung by two young voices early in the morning, it seemed to him to be the farewell of the Queen of France, whom he loved. Hæc and Ille are She and He.

Song from The Hill of Venus See note on Laus Veneris, line 25, page 665. The song given here was heard by a knight as he awoke from a swoon. It was sung by a group of young men and maidens deeply in love.

Alone within the weaving-room
 The girls would sit before the loom,
 And sing no song, and play no play;
 Alone from dawn to hot mid-day, 10
 From mid-day unto evening,
 The men afield would work, nor sing,
 'Mid weary thoughts of man and God,
 Before thy feet the wet ways trod.

Unkissed, the merchant bore his care; 15
 Unkissed, the knights went out to war,
 Unkissed, the mariner came home;
 Unkissed, the minstrel men did roam.

Or in the stream the maids would stare,
 Nor know why they were made so fair, 20
 Their yellow locks, their bosoms white,
 Their limbs well wrought for all delight,
 Seemed foolish things that waited death,
 As hopeless as the flowers beneath
 The weariness of unkissed feet. 25
 No life was bitter then, or sweet.

Therefore, O Venus, well may we Praise the green ridges of the sea
 O'er which, upon a happy day,
 Thou cam'st to take our shame away. 30
 Well may we praise the curdling foam
 Amidst the which thy feet did bloom,
 Flowers of the gods; the yellow sand
 They kissed atwixt the sea and land,
 The bee-beset, ripe-seeded grass, 35
 Through which thy fine limbs first did pass,
 The purple-dusted butterfly,
 First blown against thy quivering thigh;
 The first red rose that touched thy side,
 And over-blown and fainting died; 40
 The flickering of the orange shade,
 Where first in sleep thy limbs were laid;
 The happy day's sweet life and death,
 Whose air first caught thy balmy breath —
 Yea, all these things well praised may be, 45
 But with what words shall we praise thee —
 O Venus, O thou love alive,
 Born to give peace to souls that strive?

(1870)

L'ENVOI

Here are we for the last time face to face,
 Thou and I, Book, before I bid thee speed
 Upon thy perilous journey to that place
 For which I have done on thee pilgrim's weed,
 Striving to get thee all things for thy need — 6
 I love thee, whatso time or men may say
 Of the poor singer of an empty day.

Good reason why I love thee, e'en if thou
 Be mocked or clean forgot as time wears on;

L'Envoi 4 done . . . weed, put on thee the garments of a pilgrim preparatory to a journey—i.e., got you printed

For ever as thy fashioning did grow, 10
 Kind word and praise because of thee I won
 From those without whom were my world all
 gone,
 My hope fallen dead, my singing cast away,
 And I set soothly in an empty day.

I love thee; yet this last time must it be 15
 That thou must hold thy peace and I must
 speak,
 Lest if thou babble I begin to see Thy gear too thin, thy limbs and heart too
 weak,
 To find the land thou goest forth to seek —
 Though what harm if thou die upon the way,
 Thou idle singer of an empty day? 21

But though this land desired thou never reach,
 Yet folk who know it mayst thou meet, or
 death;
 Therefore a word unto thee would I teach
 To answer these, who, noting thy weak
 breath, 25
 Thy wandering eyes, thy heart of little faith,
 May make thy fond desire a sport and play
 Mocking the singer of an empty day.

That land's name, say'st thou? and the road thereto?
 Nay, Book, thou mockest, saying thou know'st it not; 30
 Surely no book of verse I ever knew
 But ever was the heart within him hot
 To gain the Land of Matters Unforgot —
 There, now we both laugh — as the whole world may,
 At us poor singers of an empty day. 35

Nay, let it pass, and harken! Hast thou heard
 That therein I believe I have a friend,
 Of whom for love I may not be afear'd?
 It is to him indeed I bid thee wend;
 Yea, he perchance may meet thee ere thou
 end, 40
 Dying so far off from the hedge of bay,
 Thou idle singer of an empty day!

Well, think of him, I bid thee, on the road,
 And if it hap that midst of thy defeat,
 Fainting beneath thy follies' heavy load, 45
 My Master, GEOFFREY CHAUCER, thou do
 meet,
 Then shalt thou win a space of rest full sweet;
 Then be thou bold, and speak the words I say,
 The idle singer of an empty day!

41 bay, laurel In ancient times poets were crowned with wreaths of laurel or myrtle 46 Geoffrey Chaucer The framework of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales is similar to that of The Earthly Paradise

"O Master, O thou great of heart and tongue,
Thou well mayst ask me why I wander here,
In raiment rent of stories oft besung! 52
But of thy gentleness draw thou anear,
And then the heart of one who held thee dear
Mayst thou behold! So near as that I lay 55
Unto the singer of an empty day.

"For this he ever said, who sent me forth
To seek a place amid thy company:
That howsoever little was my worth,
Yet was he worth e'en just so much as I; 60
He said that rime hath little skill to lie;
Nor feigned to cast his worsen part away:
In idle singing for an empty day.

"I have beheld him tremble oft enough
At things he could not choose but trust to me, Although he knew the world was wise and rough; 66
And never did he fail to let me see
His love — his folly and faithlessness, maybe,
And still in turn I gave him voice to pray
Such prayers as cling about an empty day 70

"Thou, keen-eyed, reading me, mayst read him through,
For surely little is there left behind,
No power great deeds unnameable to do;
No knowledge for which words he may not
find,
No love of things as vague as autumn wind —
Earth of the earth lies hidden by my clay, 76
The idle singer of an empty day!

"Children we twain are, saith he, late made
wise
In love, but in all else most childish still,
And seeking still the pleasure of our eyes, 80
And what our ears with sweetest sounds may fill,
Not fearing Love, lest these things he should kill;
Howe'er his pain by pleasure doth he lay,
Making a strange tale of an empty day

"Death have we hated, knowing not what it meant; 85
Life had we loved, through green leaf and through sere,
Though still the less we knew of its intent,
The Earth and Heaven through countless year on year,
Slow changing, were to us but curtains fair,
Hung round about a little room, where play 90
Weeping and laughter of man's empty day

"O Master, if thine heart could love us yet,
Spite of things left undone, and wrongly done,
Some place in loving hearts then should we get,

For thou, sweet-souled, didst never stand
alone, 95
But knew'st the joy and woe of many an
one —
By lovers dead, who live through thee, we
pray,
Help thou us singers of an empty day!"

Fearest thou, Book, what answer thou mayst
gain
Lest he should scorn thee, and thereof thou
die? 100
Nay, it shall not be. — Thou mayst toil in
vain,
And never draw the House of Fame anigh;
Yet he and his shall know whereof we cry,
Shall call it not ill done to strive to lay
The ghosts that crowd about life's empty day.

Then let the others go! and if indeed 106
In some old garden thou and I have wrought,
And made fresh flowers spring up from hoarded seed,
And fragrance of old days and deeds have brought Back to folk weary, all was not for naught
— No little part it was for me to play — 111
The idle singer of an empty day. (1870)

From THE STORY OF SIGURD THE VOLSUNG

OF THE PASSING AWAY OF BRYNHILD

Once more on the morrow-morning fair shineth the glorious sun,
And the Niblung children labor on a deed that shall be done.
For out in the people's meadows they raise a bale on high,
The oak and the ash together, and thereon
shall the Mighty lie, Nor gold nor steel shall be lacking, nor savor of sweet spice, 5
Nor cloths in the Southlands woven, nor webs
of untold price.
The work grows, toil is as nothing; long blasts of the mighty horn
From the topmost tower out-wailing o'er the woeful world are borne.

But Brynhild lay in her chamber, and her women went and came,
And they feared and trembled before her, and none spake Sigurd's name; 10

102 House of Fame, a punning reference to Chaucer's
House of Fame
The Story of Sigurd the Volsung See Critical Notes
Of the Passing Away of Brynhild 3 bale, funeral pyre for Sigurd, the Mighty

But whiles they deemed her weeping, and whiles they deemed indeed
That she spake, if they might but hearken,
but no words their ears might heed;
Till at last she spake out clearly.

"I know not what ye would,
For ye come and go in my chamber, and ye seem of wavering mood
To thrust me on, or to stay me; to help my heart in woe, 15
Or to bid my days of sorrow midst nameless folly go "

None answered the word of Brynhild, none
knew of her intent,
But she spake: "Bid hither Gunnar, lest the sun sink o'er the bent,
And leave the words unspoken I yet have will to speak "

Then her maidens go from before her, and that lord of war they seek, 20
And he stands by the bed of Brynhild and strives to entreat and beseech,
But her eyes gaze awfully on him, and his lips may learn no speech.
And she saith:

"I slept in the morning, or I dreamed in the waking-hour,
And my dream was of thee, O Gunnar, and the bed in thy kingly bower,
And the house that I blessed in my sorrow,
and cursed in my sorrow and shame, 25
The gates of an ancient people, the towers of a mighty name
King, cold was the hall I have dwelt in, and no brand burned on the hearth, Dead-cold was thy bed, O Gunnar, and thy land was parched with dearth;

"But I saw a great king riding, and a master of the harp,
And he rode amidst of the foemen, and the swords were bitter-sharp, 30
But his hand in the hand-gyves smote not,
and his feet in the fetters were fast,
While many a word of mocking at his speechless face was cast.

Then I heard a voice in the world: 'O woe
for the broken troth,
And the heavy Need of the Niblungs, and the Sorrow of Odin the Goth!

Then I saw the halls of the strangers, and the hills, and the dark-blue sea, 35
Nor knew of their names and their nations,
for earth was afar from me,
But brother rose up against brother, and blood swam over the board,

And women smote and spared not, and the fire was master and lord
Then, then was the moonless mid-mirk, and
I woke to the day and the deed,
The deed that earth shall name not, the day of its bitterest need. 40
Many words have I said in my life-days, and little more shall I say.
Ye have heard the dream of a woman — deal with it as ye may,
For meseems the world-ways sunder, and the dusk and the dark is mine,
Till I come to the hall of Freyia, where the deeds of the mighty shall shine."

So hearkened Gunnar the Niblung, that her words he understood, 45
And he knew she was set on the death-stroke, and he deemed it nothing good
But he said: "I have hearkened, and heeded thy death and mine in thy words,
I have done the deed and abide it, and my face shall laugh on the swords.
But thee, woman, I bid thee abide here till thy grief of soul abate;
Meseems naught lowly nor shameful shall be the Niblung fate, 50
And here shalt thou rule and be mighty, and be queen of the measureless Gold,
And abase the kings and upraise them, and anew shall thy fame be told,
And as far shall thy glory blossom as the fresh fields under the spring "

Then he casteth his arms about her, and hot is the heart of the King
For the glory of Queen Brynhild and the hope of her days of gain, 55
And he clean forgetteth Sigurd and the foster-brother slain;
But she shrank aback from before him, and cried: "Woe worth the while For the thoughts ye drive back on me, and the memory of your guile!
The Kings of Earth were gathered, the wise
of men were met;
On the death of a woman's pleasure their glorious hearts were set, 60
And I was alone amidst them — ah, hold thy peace hereof!
Lest the thought of the bitterest hours this little hour should move."

He rose abashed from before her, and yet he lingered there,

39 mid-mirk, mid-gloom, deepest gloom the deed, her suicide 44 Freyia, the goddess who presides over the regions of the dead 48 the deed, his part in deceiving Brynhild (See Critical Note on title) 56 foster-brother slain, Gutorm

Then she said: "O King of the Niblungs, what noise do I hearken and hear?

Why ring the axes and hammers, while feet of men go past, 65

And shields from the wall are shaken, and swords on the pavement cast,

And the door of the treasure is open, and the horn cries loud and long,

And the feet of the Niblung children to the people's meadows throng?"

His face was troubled before her, and again
she spake and said:

"Meseemeth this is the hour when men array
the dead, 70

Wilt thou tell me tidings, Gunnar, that the children of thy folk

Pile up the bale for Guttorm, and the hand that smote the stroke?"

He said: "It is not so, Brynhild, for that Giuki's son was burned

When the moon of the middle heaven last night toward dawning turned."

They looked on each other and spake not; but Gunnar gat him gone, 75

And came to his brother Hogni, the wise-heart Giuki's son,

And spake: "Thou art wise, O Hogni, go in to Brynhild the queen,

And stay her swift departing; or the last of her days hath she seen "

"It is naught, thy word," said Hogni, "wilt thou bring dead men aback,

Or the souls of kings departed midst the battle and the wrack? 80

Yet this shall be easier to thee than the turning Brynhild's heart;

She came to dwell among us, but in us she had no part,

Let her go her ways from the Niblungs with her hand in Sigurd's hand

Will the grass grow up henceforward where her feet have trodden the land?"

"O evil day," said Gunnar, "when my queen must perish and die!" 85

"Such oft betide," saith Hogni, "as the lives of men flit by,

But the evil day is a day, and on each day
groweth a deed,

And a thing that never dieth; and the fateful tale shall speed

Lo now, let us harden our hearts and set our brows as the brass,

Lest men say it, 'They loathed the evil, and they brought the evil to pass ' " 90

So they spake, and their hearts were heavy,
and they longed for the morrow morn,
And the morrow of tomorrow, and the new day yet to be born

But Brynhild cried to her maidens: "Now
open ark and chest,

And draw forth queenly raiment of the loveliest and the best,

Red rings that the Dwarf-lords fashioned, fair cloths that queens have sewed 95

To array the bride for the mighty, and the traveler for the road."

They wept as they wrought her bidding and did on her goodliest gear,

But she laughed mid the dainty linen, and the gold-rings fashioned fair;

She arose from the bed of the Niblungs, and her face no more was wan,

As a star in the dawn-tide heavens, mid the dusky house she shone. 100

And they that stood about her, their hearts were raised aloft

Amid their fear and wonder; then she spake them kind and soft:

"Now give me my sword, O maidens, wherewith I sheared the wind

When the Kings of Earth were gathered to know the Chooser's mind."

All sheathed the maidens brought it, and feared the hidden blade, 105

But the naked blue-white edges across her knees she laid,

And spake: "The heaped-up riches, the gear
my fathers left,

All dear-bought woven wonders, all rings
from battle reft,

All goods of men desired, now strew them on the floor,

And so share among you, maidens, the gifts of Brynhild's store " 110

They brought them mid their weeping, but none put forth a hand

To take that wealth desired, the spoils of many a land.

There they stand and weep before her, and some are moved to speech,

And they cast their arms about her and strive with her, and beseech

That she look on her loved-ones' sorrow and the glory of the day. 115

97 did on gear, put on her best raiment 103-104 sword mind Brynhild was one of the Old Norse Valkyries (the Choosers of the Slain), twelve nymphs who, mounted on swift horses and holding drawn swords, rushed into the thick of the battle and chose those destined to death 107 gear, property

It was naught, she scarce might see them,
and she put their hands away,
And she said: "Peace, ye that love me! and take the gifts and the gold
In remembrance of my fathers and the faithful deeds of old "

Then she spake: "Where now is Gunnar, that I may speak with him?
For new things are mine eyes beholding and the Niblung house grows dim, 120
And new sounds gather about me, that may hinder me to speak
When the breath is near to fitting, and the voice is waxen weak "

Then upright by the bed of the Niblungs for a moment doth she stand,
And the blade flasheth bright in the chamber,
but no more they hinder her hand
Than if a god were smiting to rend the world in two; 125
Then dulled are the glittering edges, and the bitter point cleaves through The breast of the all-wise Brynhild, and her feet from the pavement fall,
And the sigh of her heart is hearkened mid the hush of the maidens' wail.
Chill, deep is the fear upon them, but they bring her aback to the bed,
And her hand is yet on the hilts, and sidelong
droopeth her head 130

Then there cometh a cry from withoutward, and Gunnar's hurrying feet
Are swift on the kingly threshold, and Brynhild's blood they meet.
Low down o'er the bed, he hangeth and heark-eneth for her word,
And her heavy lids are opened to look on the Niblung lord,
And she saith:

"I pray thee a prayer, the last word
in the world I speak, 135
That ye bear me forth to Sigurd, and the hand my hand would seek,
The bale for the dead is builded, it is wrought
full wide on the plain,
It is raised for Earth's best Helper, and thereon is room for twain
Ye have hung the shields about it, and the Southland hangings spread;
There lay me adown by Sigurd and my head beside his head; 140
But ere ye leave us sleeping, draw his Wrath
from out the sheath,
And lay that Light of the Branstock, and the blade that frightened death

Betwixt my side and Sigurd's, as it lay that while agone,
When once in one bed together we twain were laid alone.
How then when the flames flare upward may
I be left behind? 145
How then may the road he wendeth be hard for my feet to find?
How then in the gates of Valhall may the door of the gleaming ring Clash to on the heel of Sigurd, as I follow on my king?"

Then she raised herself on her elbow, but again her eyelids sank,
And the wound by the sword-edge whispered,
as her heart from the iron shrank, 150
And she moaned: "O lives of man-folk, for unrest all overlong
By the Father were ye fashioned; and what hope amendeth wrong?
Now at last, O my beloved, all is gone, none else is near
Through the ages of all ages, never sundered, shall we wear "

Scarce more than a sigh was the word, as back on the bed she fell, 155
Nor was there need in the chamber of the passing of Brynhild to tell,
And no more their lamentation might the maidens hold aback,
But the sound of their bitter mourning was as if red-handed wrack Ran wild in the Burg of the Niblungs, and the fire were master of all.

Then the voice of Gunnar the war-king cried out o'er the weeping hall: 160
"Wail on, O women forsaken, for the mightiest woman born!
Now the hearth is cold and joyless, and the waste bed lieth forlorn
Wail on, but amid your weeping lay hand to the glorious dead,
That not alone for an hour may lie Queen
Brynhild's head,
For here have been heavy tidings, and the Mightiest under shield 165
Is laid on the bale high-builded in the Nib-lungs' hallowed field
Fare forth! for he abideth, and we do Allfather wrong,
If the shining Valhall's pavement await their feet o'erlong."

Then they took the body of Brynhild in the raiment that she wore,

141 Wrath, the name of Sigurd's sword. 142. Light of the Branstock, the bright sword that Sigmund, son of Vol-sung, drew from Branstock, the great oak tree about which the Hall of the Volsungs had been built.

143 lay . . . agone. See Critical Note on title 147
Valhall, Valhalla—in Norse mythology the hall of Odin, father of the gods. With him dwelt all warriors slain in battle 165 under shield, that ever bore shield 167 All-father,
Odin, the Father of All

And out through the gate of the Niblungs
the holy corpse they bore, 170
And thence forth to the mead of the people and the high-built shielded bale;
Then afresh in the open meadows breaks forth the women's wail
When they see the bed of Sigurd and the glittering of his gear;
And fresh is the wail of the people as Bryn-hild draweth anear,
And the tidings go before her that for twain
the bale is built, 175
That for twain is the oak-wood shielded and the pleasant odors spilt.

There is peace on the bale of Sigurd, and the gods look down from on high,
And they see the lids of the Volsung close shut against the sky,
As he lies with his shield beside him in the Hauberk all of gold,
That has not its like in the heavens, nor has earth of its fellow told, 180
And forth from the Helm of Aweing are the sunbeams flashing wide,
And the sheathéd Wrath of Sigurd lies still by his mighty side.
Then cometh an elder of days, a man of the ancient times,
Who is long past sorrow and joy, and the steep of the bale he climbs;
And he kneeleth down by Sigurd, and bareth
the Wrath to the sun 185
That the beams are gathered about it, and from hilt to blood-point run,
And wide o'er the plain of the Niblungs doth
the Light of the Branstock glare, Till the wondering mountain-shepherds on that star of noontide stare,
And fear for many an evil; but the ancient man stands still
With the war-flame on his shoulder, nor thinks of good or of ill, 190
Till the feet of Brynhild's bearers on the topmost bale are laid,
And her bed is dight by Sigurd's; then he sinks the pale white blade
And lays it 'twixt the sleepers, and leaves them there alone —
He, the last that shall ever behold them —
and his days are wellnigh done.

There is silence over the plain; in the noon shine the torches pale, 195
As the best of the Niblung Earl-folk bear fire to the buided bale;

Then a wind in the west ariseth, and the white flames leap on high,
And with one voice crieth the people a great and mighty cry,
And men cast up hands to the Heavens, and pray without a word,
As they that have seen God's visage, and the face of the Father have heard. 200

They are gone — the lovely, the mighty, the hope of the ancient Earth;
It shall labor and bear the burden as before that day of their birth;
It shall groan in its blind abiding for the day
that Sigurd hath sped,
And the hour that Brynhild hath hastened,
and the dawn that waketh the dead
It shall yearn, and be oft-times holpen, and forget their deeds no more, 205
Till the new sun beams on Baldur, and the happy sealess shore.

GUNNAR IN THE PIT OF ADDERS

Then was Gunnar silent a little, and the shout
in the hall had died,
And he spoke as a man awakening, and turned on Atli's pride
"Thou all-rich King of the Eastlands, e'en
such a man might I be
That I might utter a word, and the heart
should be glad in thee,
And I should live and be sorry; for I, I only am left 5
To tell of the ransom of Odin, and the wealth from the toiler left Lo, once it lay in the water, hid, deep adown
it lay,
Till the gods were grieved and lacking, and men saw it and the day;
Let it lie in the water once more, let the gods be rich and in peace!
But I at least in the world from the words and the babble shall cease." 10

So he spake and Atli beheld him, and before his eyes he shrank,
Still deep of the cup of desire the mighty
Atli drank,
And to overcome seemed little if the Gold he might not have,
And his hard heart craved for a while to hold the King for a slave,
A bondman blind and guarded in his glorious house and great. 15
But he thought of the overbold, and of kings
who have dallied with fate,

206 Baldur, son of Odin, and the Norse god of light and peace
Gunnar in the Pit of Adders See Critical Note on title

And died bemocked and smitten, and he deemed it worse than well
 While the last of the sons of Guiki hangeth back from his journey to Hell;
 So he turneth away from the stranger, and beholdeth Gudrun his wife,
 Not glad nor sorry by seeming, no stirrer nor stayer of strife. 20
 Then he looked at his living earl-folk, and thought of his groves of war,
 And his realm and the kindred nations, and his measureless guarded store
 And he thought: Shall Atli perish, shall his name be cast to the dead,
 Though the feeble folk go wailing? Then he cried aloud and said:

"Why tarry ye, Sons of the Morning? The wain for the bondman is dight, 25
 And the folk that are waiting his body have need of no sunshine to smite.
 Go forth 'neath the stars and night-wind; go forth by the cloud and the moon,
 And come back with the word in the dawning,
 that my house may be merry at noon!"

Then the sword-folk rise round Gunnar, round
 the fettered and bound they throng,
 As men in the bitter battle round the God-kin over-strong; 30
 They bore him away to the doorway, and the winds were awake in the night,
 And the wood of the thorns of battle in the moon shone sharp and bright,
 But Gunnar looked to the heavens, and blessed the promise of rain,
 And the windy drift of the clouds, and the dew on the builded wain,
 And the sword-folk tarried a little, and the sons of the wise were there, 35
 And beheld his face o'er the war-helms, and the wavy night of his hair.
 Then they feared for the weal of Atli, and the Niblung's harp they brought,
 And they dealt with the thralls of the sword,
 and commanded and besought,
 Till men loosened the gyves of Gunnar, and laid the harp by his side.
 Then the yoke-beasts lowed in the forecourt,
 and the wheels of the wagon cried, 40
 And the war-thorns clashed in the night, and the men went dark on their way,
 And the city was silent before them; on the roofs the white moon lay.

20 by seeming, in appearance 21 groves of war,

 28 the word, that Gunnar is dead 32 thorns of battle, spears Such a metaphor is known as a kenning. It is a convention of poetic diction in Norse and early Teutonic literature 38 dealt . . . sword The "sons of the wise," the chieftains, gave orders to the "sword-folk," who held back from the task 41 war-thorns, spears

Now they left the gate and the highway, and came to a lonely place,
 Where the sun all day had been shining on the desert's empty face,
 Then the moon ran forth from a cloud, the gray light shone and showed 45
 The pit of King Atli's adders in the land
 without a road,
 Digged deep adown in the desert with shining walls and smooth
 For the Serpent's habitation, and folk that know not ruth.
 Therein they thrust King Gunnar, and he bare of his kingly weed,
 But they gave his harp to the Niblung, and his hands of the gyves they freed, 50
 They stood around in their war-gear to note
 what next should befall
 For the comfort of King Atli, and the glee of the Eastland hall.

Still hot was that close with the sun, and thronged with the coiling folk,
 And about the feet of Gunnar their hissing mouths awoke;
 But he heeded them not nor beheld them,
 and his hands in the harp-strings ran, 55
 As he sat him down in the midst on a sun-
 scorched rock and wan;
 And he sighed as one who resteth on a flowery bank by the way
 When the wind is in the blossoms at the even-tide of day
 But his harp was murmuring low, and he mused: Am I come to the death,
 And I, who was Gunnar the Niblung? Nay, nay, how I draw my breath, 60
 And love my life as the living! and so I ever shall do,
 Though wrack be loosed in the heavens and the world be fashioned anew

But the worms were beholding their prey,
 and they drew around and nigher,
 Smooth coil, and flickering tongue, and eyes
 as the gold in the fire;
 And he looked and beheld them and spake,
 nor stilled his harp meanwhile. 65
 "What will ye, O thralls of Ath, O images of guile?"

Then he rose at once to his feet, and smote
 the harp with his hand,
 And it rang as if with a cry in the dream of a lonely land;
 Then he fondled its wail as it faded, and orderly over the strings

Went the marvelous sound of its sweetness, like the march of Odin's kings 70
 New-risen for play in the morning when o'er meadows of God-home they wend,
 And hero playeth with hero, that their hands
 may be deft in the end.
 But the crests of the worms were uplifted, though coil on coil was stayed,
 And they moved but as dark-green rushes by the summer river swayed.
 Then uprose the Song of Gunnar, and sang o'er his crafty hands, 75
 And told of the World of Aforetime, unshapen, void of lands,
 Yet it wrought, for its memory bideth, and it died and abode its doom,
 It shaped, and the Upper-Heavens, and the hope came forth from its womb.

Great then grew the voice of Gunnar, and his speech was sweet on the wild,
 And the moon on his harp was shining, and the hands of the Niblung child: 80

"So perished the Gap of the Gaping, and the cold sea swayed and sang
 And the wind came down on the waters, and the beaten rock-walls rang,
 Then the Sun from the south came shining,
 and the Starry Host stood round,
 And the wandering Moon of the heavens his habitation found;
 And they knew not why they were gathered,
 nor the deeds of their shaping they knew But lo, Mid-Earth the Noble 'neath their might and their glory grew, 86
 And the grass spread over its face, and the Night and the Day were born,
 And it cried on the Death in the even, and it cried on the Life in the morn, Yet it waxed and waxed, and knew not, and it lived and had not learned;
 And where were the Framers that framed,
 and the Soul and the Might that had
 yearned? 90

"On the Thrones are the Powers that fashioned, and they name the Night and the
 Day,
 And the tide of the Moon's increasing, and
 the tide of his waning away;
 And they name the years for the story, and the Lands they change and change,

70 march of Odin's kings Odin was the father of the gods of Norse mythology. When he and his heroes in Valhalla were not feasting, they amused themselves with fighting. Every day they rode out into the field and fought until they cut each other to pieces, but they soon recovered from their wounds and returned to feast in Valhalla. 81 Gap of the Gaping, Ginnungagap, the bottomless deep of the Norse story of creation, which is the theme of Gunnar's song, lines 81-106, 123-144. The abode of man was Midgard, or Mid-Earth (line 86).

The great and the mean and the little, that this unto that may be strange They met, and they fashioned dwellings, and the House of Glory they built; 95
 They met, and they fashioned the Dwarf-kind, and the Gold and the Gifts and the Gult.

"There were twain, and they went upon earth,
 and were speechless unmighty and wan,
 They were hopeless, deathless, lifeless, and the Mighty named them Man.
 Then they gave them speech and power, and they gave them color and breath;
 And deeds and the hope they gave them, and they gave them Life and Death — 100
 Yea, hope, as the hope of the Framers, yea, might, as the Fashioners had,
 Till they wrought, and rejoiced in their bodies,
 and saw their sons and were glad;
 And they changed their lives and departed,
 and came back as the leaves of the trees
 Come back and increase in the summer —
 and I, I, I am of these;
 And I know of Them that have fashioned, and the deeds that have blossomed and grow, 105
 But naught of the gods' repentance, or the gods' undoing I know."

Then falleth the speech of Gunnar, and his lips the word forget,
 But his crafty hands are busy, and the harp is murmuring yet.

And the crests of the worms have fallen, and their flickering tongues are still,
 The Roller and the Coiler, and Grayback, lord of ill, 110
 Grave-groper and Death-swaddler, the Slumberer of the Heath,
 Gold-wallower, Venom-smiter, lie still, forgetting death,
 And loose are coils of Long-back, yea, all as soft are laid
 As the kine in midmost summer about the elmy glade —
 All save the Gray and Ancient, that holds his crest aloft, 115
 Light-wavering as the flame-tongue when the evening wind is soft;
 For he comes of the kin of the Serpent once wrought all wrong to nurse,
 The bond of earthly evil, and Midworld's ancient curse.

106 gods' undoing, the period of Ragnarok, the Twilight of the Gods, when the world was destroyed. 118 Midworld's . . . curse, the Midgard Serpent, the child of Loki, who is described in Norse mythology as the calumniator of the gods and the contriver of all evil.

But Gunnar looked and considered, and wise and wary he grew,
And the dark of night was waning and chill
in the dawning it grew; 120
But his hands were strong and mighty and the fainting harp he woke,
And cried in the deadly desert, and the song
from his soul out-broke:

"O Harken, Kindreds and Nations, and all
Kings of the plenteous earth, Heed, ye that shall come hereafter, and are far and far from the birth!
I have dwelt in the world aforetime, and I called it the garden of God; 125
I have stayed my heart with its sweetness, and fair on its freshness I trod;
I have seen its tempest and wondered, I have covered adown from its rain,
And desired the brightening sunshine, and seen it and been fain,
I have waked, time was, in its dawning; its noon and its even I wore,
I have slept unafraid of its darkness, and the days have been many and more. 130
I have dwelt with the deeds of the mighty, I have woven the web of the sword,
I have borne up the guilt nor repented, I have sorrowed nor spoken the word,
And I fought and was glad in the morning,
and I sing in the night and the end,
So let him stand forth, the Accuser, and do
on the death-shoon to wend;
For not here on the earth shall I hearken, nor on earth for the dooming shall stay, 135
Nor stretch out mine hand for the pleading, for I see the spring of the day
Round the doors of the golden Valhall, and I see the mighty arise,
And I hearken the voice of Odin, and his mouth on Gunnar cries,
And he nameth the Son of Giuki, and cries on deeds long done,
And the fathers of my fathers, and the sons of yore agone. 140

"O Odin, I see, and I hearken; but, lo thou,
the bonds on my feet,
And the walls of the wilderness round me, ere the light of thy land I meet!
I crave and I weary, Allfather, and long and dark is the road;
And the feet of the mighty are weakened, and the back is bent with the load "

Then fainted the song of Gunnar, and the harp from his hand fell down, 145
And he cried: "Ah, what hath betided? for cold the world hath grown,

And cold is the heart within me, and my hand
is heavy and strange,
What voice is the voice I hearken in the chill
and the dusk and the change?
Where art thou, God of the war-fain? for this is the death indeed;
And I unsworded, unshielded, in the Day of the Niblungs' Need!" 150

He fell to the earth as he spake, and life left Gunnar the King,
For his heart was chilled forever by the sleepless serpent's sting,
The gray Worm, Great and Ancient — and day in the East began,
And the moon was low in the heavens, and the light clouds over him ran

THE DAY IS COMING

Come hither, lads, and harken, for a tale
there is to tell,
Of the wonderful days a-coming, when all shall be better than well.

And the tale shall be told of a country, a land in the midst of the sea,
And folk shall call it England in the days that are going to be

There more than one in a thousand in the days that are yet to come, 5 Shall have some hope of the morrow, some joy of the ancient home

For then — laugh not, but listen to this strange tale of mine —
All folk that are in England shall be better lodged than swine

Then a man shall work and bethink him, and rejoice in the deeds of his hand,
Nor yet come home in the even too faint and weary to stand 10

Men in that time a-coming shall work and have no fear
For tomorrow's lack of earning and the hunger-wolf anear.

I tell you this for a wonder, that no man then shall be glad
Of his fellow's fall and mishap to snatch at the work he had,

The Day Is Coming Late in the seventies Morris became interested in politics and joined the Socialist Party. Virtually all his time in 1883-85 was given to the cause. This poem, together with others that follow, expresses his interest in the welfare of the lower classes. It was published with The Voice of Toil, No Master, Down among the Dead Men, and other poems in a pamphlet entitled Chants for Socialists.

134 do . wend, put on the death shoes that I may go.
135 dooming, judging

For that which the worker winneth shall then be his indeed, 15
 Nor shall half be reaped for nothing by him
 that sowed no seed

O strange new wonderful justice! But for whom shall we gather the gain?
 For ourselves and for each of our fellows, and no hand shall labor in vain.

Then all Mine and all Thine shall be Ours,
 and no more shall any man crave
 For riches that serve for nothing but to fetter
 a friend for a slave 20

And what wealth then shall be left us when none shall gather gold
 To buy his friend in the market, and pinch and pine the sold?

Nay, what save the lovely city, and the little house on the hill,
 And the wastes and the woodland beauty,
 and the happy fields we till;

And the homes of ancient stories, the tombs of the mighty dead; 25
 And the wise men seeking out marvels, and
 the poet's teeming head,

And the painter's hand of wonder; and the marvelous fiddle-bow,
 And the banded choirs of music — all those that do and know.

For all these shall be ours and all men's, nor shall any lack a share
 Of the toil and the gain of living in the days when the world grows fair 30

Ah! such are the days that shall be! But what are the deeds of today,
 In the days of the years we dwell in, that wear our lives away?

Why, then, and for what are we waiting?
 There are three words to speak —
 WE WILL IT — and what is the foeman but the dream-strong wakened and weak?

O why and for what are we waiting? while our brothers droop and die, 35
 And on every wind of the heavens a wasted life goes by.

How long shall they reproach us where crowd
 on crowd they dwell,
 Poor ghosts of the wicked city, the gold-crushed, hungry hell?

Through squalid life they labored, in sordid
 grief they died,

Those sons of a mighty mother, those props of England's pride. 40

They are gone, there is none can undo it, nor save our souls from the curse;
 But many a million cometh, and shall they be better or worse?

It is we must answer and hasten, and open wide the door
 For the rich man's hurrying terror, and the slow-foot hope of the poor.

Yea, the voiceless wrath of the wretched, and their unlearned discontent, 45
 We must give it voice and wisdom till the waiting-tide be spent.

Come, then, since all things call us, the living and the dead,
 And o'er the weltering tangle a glimmering
 light is shed

Come, then, let us cast off fooling, and put
 by ease and rest,
 For the Cause alone is worthy till the good days bring the best. 50

Come, join in the only battle wherein no man can fail,
 Where whoso fadeth and dieth, yet his deed shall still prevail.

Ah! come, cast off all fooling, for this, at least, we know
 That the Dawn and the Day is coming, and forth the Banners go

(1884)

THE VOICE OF TOIL

I heard men saying, Leave hope and praying,
 All days shall be as all have been;
 Today and tomorrow bring fear and sorrow,
 The never ending toil between.

When Earth was younger mid toil and hunger,
 In hope we strove, and our hands were strong,
 Then great men led us, with words they fed us,
 And bade us right the earthly wrong

Go read in story their deeds and glory,
 Their names amidst the nameless dead; 10
 Turn then from lying to us slow-dying
 In that good world to which they led;

Where fast and faster our iron master,
 The thing we made, forever drives,
 Bids us grind treasure and fashion pleasure 15
 For other hopes and other lives.

Where home is a hovel and dull we grovel,
 Forgetting that the world is fair,
 Where no babe we cherish, lest its very soul perish;

Where mirth is crime, and love a snare 20

Who now shall lead us, what god shall heed us
 As we lie in the hell our hands have won?
 For us are no rulers but fools and befoolers,
 The great are fallen, the wise men gone

I heard men saying, Leave tears and praying,
 The sharp knife heedeth not the sheep, 26
 Are we not stronger than the rich and the wronger,
 When day breaks over dreams and sleep?

Come, shoulder to shoulder, ere the world
 grows older!

Help lies in naught but thee and me, 30
 I hope is before us, the long years that bore us
 Bore leaders more than men may be.

Let dead hearts tarry and trade and marry
 And trembling nurse their dreams of mirth.
 While we the living our lives are giving 35
 To bring the bright new world to birth

Come, shoulder to shoulder, ere earth grows older!

The cause spreads over land and sea,
 Now the world shaketh, and fear awaketh,
 And joy at last for thee and me 40
 (1884)

NO MASTER

Saith man to man, We've heard and known
 That we no master need

To live upon this earth our own,
 In fair and manly deed

The grief of slaves long passed away 5
 For us hath forged the chain,
 Till now each worker's patient day
 Builds up the House of Pain.

And we, shall we too, crouch and quail,
 Ashamed, afraid of strife, 10

And lest our lives untimely fail
 Embrace the Death in Life?

Nay, cry aloud, and have no fear,
 We few against the world,
 Awake, arise! the hope we bear 15
 Against the curse is hurled

It grows and grows — are we the same,
 The feeble band, the few?

Or what are these with eyes aflame,
 And hands to deal and do? 20

This is the host that bears the word,

"NO MASTER HIGH OR LOW" —
 A lightning flame, a shearing sword,
 A storm to overthrow (1884)

DOWN AMONG THE DEAD MEN

Come, comrades, come, your glasses clink,
 Up with your hands a health to drink,
 The health of all that workers be,
 In every land, on every sea

And he that will this health deny, 5
 Down among the dead men, down among the dead men,

Down, down, down, down,
 Down among the dead men let him lie!

Well done! Now drink another toast,
 And pledge the gath'ring of the host, 10
 The people armed in brain and hand,
 To claim their rights in every land
 And he that will, etc

There's liquor left, come, let's be kind,
 And drink the rich a better mind, 15
 That when we knock upon the door,
 They may be off and say no more.
 And he that will, etc

Now, comrades, let the glass blush red,
 Drink we the unforgotten dead, 20
 That did their deeds and went away,
 Before the bright sun brought the day
 And he that will, etc

The Day? Ah, friends, late grows the night,
 Drink to the glimmering spark of light, 25
 The herald of the joy to be,
 The battle-torch of thee and me!
 And he that will, etc

Take yet another cup in hand
 And drink in hope our little band, 30
 Drink strife in hope while lasteth breath,
 And brotherhood in life and death;
 And he that will, etc.

FROM A DREAM OF JOHN BALL THE SHERIFF

The Sheriff is made a mighty lord,
 Of goodly gold he hath enow,
 And many a sergeant girt with sword,
 But forth will we and bend the bow 5
 We shall bend the bow on the lily lea
 Betwixt the thorn and the oaken tree

A Dream of John Ball See Critical Notes

With stone and lime is the burg wall built,
 And pit and prison are stark and strong,
 And many a true man there is spilt,
 And many a right man doomed by wrong
 So forth shall we and bend the bow 11
 And the king's writ never the road shall
 know

Now yeomen walk ye warily,
 And heed ye the houses where ye go,
 For as fair and as fine as they may be, 15
 Lest behind your heels the door clap to.
 Fare forth with the bow to the hly lea
 Betwixt the thorn and the oaken tree

Now bills and bows! and out a-gate!
 And turn about on the hly lea! 20
 And though their company be great
 The gray-goose wing shall set us free.
 Now bent is the bow in the green abode
 And the king's writ knoweth not the road

So over the mead and over the hithe, 25
 And away to the wild-wood wend we forth,
 There dwell we yeomen bold and blithe
 Where the Sheriff's word is naught of worth
 Bent is the bow on the hly lea
 Betwixt the thorn and the oaken tree 30

THE DAY OF DAYS

Each eve earth falleth down the dark,
 As though its hope were o'er;
 Yet lurks the sun when day is done
 Behind tomorrow's door.

Gray grows the dawn while men-folk sleep, 5
 Unseen spreads on the light,
 Till the thrush sings to the colored things,
 And earth forgets the night

No otherwise wends on our Hope —
 E'en as a tale that's told 10
 Are fair lives lost, and all the cost
 Of wise and true and bold

We've toiled and failed, we spake the word,
 None harkened, dumb we lie,
 Our Hope is dead, the seed we spread 15
 Fell o'er the earth to die

What's this? For joy our hearts stand still,
 And life is loved and dear,
 The lost and found the Cause hath crowned,
 The Day of Days is here 20

THE BURGHERS' BATTLE

Thick rise the spear-shafts o'er the land
 That erst the harvest bore,
 The sword is heavy in the hand,
And we return no more

The light wind waves the Ruddy Fox, 5
 Our banner of the war,
 And ripples in the Running Ox,
And we return no more

Across our stubble acres now
 The teams go four and four; 10
 But out-worn elders guide the plow,
And we return no more.

And now the women, heavy-eyed,
 Turn through the open door
 From gazing down the highway wide, 15
Where we return no more.

The shadows of the fruited close
 Dapple the feast-hall floor;
 There lie our dogs and dream and doze,
And we return no more. 20

Down from the minster tower today
 Fall the soft chimes of yore
 Amidst the chattering jackdaws' play,
And we return no more.

But underneath the streets are still; 25
 Noon, and the market's o'er!
 Back go the goodwives o'er the hill,
For we return no more

What merchant to our gates shall come?
 What wise man bring us lore? 30
 What abbot ride away to Rome,
Now we return no more?

What mayor shall rule the hall we built?
 Whose scarlet sweep the floor?
 What judge shall doom the robber's guilt, 35
Now we return no more?

New houses in the streets shall rise
 Where builded we before,
 Of other stone wrought otherwise; 40
For we return no more.

And crops shall cover field and hill
 Unlike what once they bore,
 And all be done without our will,
Now we return no more.

Look up! the arrows streak the sky, 45
The horns of battle roar,
The long spears lower and draw nigh,
And we return no more.

Remember how beside the wain,
We spoke the word of war, 50
And sowed this harvest of the plain,
And we return no more.

Lay spears about the Ruddy Fox!
The days of old are o'er;
Heave sword about the Running Ox! 55
For we return no more. (1891)

TO THE MUSE OF THE NORTH

O muse that swayest the sad Northern Song,
Thy right hand full of smiting and of wrong,
Thy left hand holding pity, and thy breast
Heaving with hope of that so certain rest;
Thou, with the gray eyes kind and unafraid,
The soft lips trembling not, though they have
said 6

The doom of the World and those that dwell
therein,

The lips that smile not though thy children
win

The fated Love that draws the fated Death —
O, borne adown the fresh stream of thy breath, Let some word reach my ears and touch my
heart, 11

That, if it may be, I may have a part
In that great sorrow of thy children dead
That vexed the brow, and bowed adown the
head,

Whitened the hair, made life a wondrous
dream, 15

And death the murmur of a restful stream,
But left no stain upon those souls of thine Whose greatness through the tangled world doth shine

O Mother, and Love and Sister all in one,
Come thou, for sure I am enough alone 20
That thou thine arms about my heart shouldst throw,

And wrap me in the grief of long ago. (1891)

ICELAND FIRST SEEN

Lo, from our loitering ship a new land at last
to be seen;

Toothed rocks down the side of the firth on the east guard a weary wide lea,

To the Muse of the North This poem emphasizes the important place that Fate held among the early Teutonic people. The Scandinavian Norms were the dispensers of fate in Norse mythology. The poem also stresses Morris's interest in Scandinavian material.

Iceland First Seen. Morris visited Iceland in 1871 and again in 1873

And black slope the hillsides above, striped adown with their desolate green;
And a peak rises up on the west from the meeting of cloud and of sea, Foursquare from base unto point like the building of gods that have been, 5
The last of that waste of the mountains all cloud-wreathed and snow-flecked and gray,
And bright with the dawn that began just now at the ending of day.

Ah! what came we forth for to see that our hearts are so hot with desire?

Is it enough for our rest the sight of this desolate strand,
And the mountain-waste voiceless as death
but for winds that may sleep not nor tire?

Why do we long to wend forth through the length and breadth of a land, 11 Dreadful with grinding of ice, and record of scarce hidden fire,
But that there 'mid the gray grassy dales sore scarred by the ruining streams Lives the tale of the Northland of old and the undying glory of dreams?

O land, as some cave by the sea where the treasures of old have been laid, 15
The sword it may be of a king whose name
was the turning of fight,

Or the staff of some wise of the world that many things made and unmade,
Or the ring of a woman maybe whose woe is grown wealth and delight

No wheat and no wine grows above it, no orchard for blossom and shade;
The few ships that sail by its blackness but deem it the mouth of a grave; 20
Yet sure when the world shall awaken, this too shall be mighty to save.

Or rather, O land, if a marvel it seemeth that men ever sought

Thy wastes for a field and a garden fulfilled
of all wonder and doubt,

And feasted amidst of the winter when the fight of the year had been fought,
Whose plunder all gathered together was little to babble about — 25

Cry aloud from thy wastes, O thou land, "Not for this nor for that was I wrought

Amid waning of realms and of riches and death of things worshiped and sure;

I abide here the spouse of a god, and I made and I make and endure "

O Queen of the grief without knowledge, of the courage that may not avail,

Of the longing that may not attain, or the love that shall never forget, 30

More joy than the gladness of laughter thy voice hath amidst of its wail,
More hope than of pleasure fulfilled amidst of thy blindness is set;
More glorious than gaining of all, thine unfaltering hand that shall fail;
For what is the mark on thy brow but the brand that thy Brynhild doth bear?
Lone once, and loved and undone by a love that no ages outwear. 35

Ah! when thy Balder comes back, and bears from the heart of the Sun,
Peace and the healing of pain, and the wisdom that waiteth no more;
And the lilies are laid on thy brow 'mid the crown of the deeds thou hast done;
And the roses spring up by thy feet that the rocks of the wilderness wore — Ah! when thy Balder comes back and we gather the gains he hath won, 40
Shall we not linger a little to talk of thy sweetness of old,
Yea, turn back awhile to thy travail whence the gods stood aloof to behold? (1891)

A DEATH SONG

What cometh here from west to east a-wend-
ing?
And who are these, the marchers stern and
slow?
We bear the message that the rich are sending Aback to those who bade them wake and
know
*Not one, not one, nor thousands must they slay,
But one and all if they would dusk the day.* 6

We asked them for a life of toilsome earn-
ing —
They bade us bide their leisure for our bread,
We craved to speak to tell our woeful learning —
We come back speechless, bearing back our
dead 10
*Not one, not one, nor thousands must they slay,
But one and all if they would dusk the day.*

They will not learn; they have no ears to hearken;
They turn their faces from the eyes of fate;
Their gay-lit halls shut out the skies that darken. 15
But, lo! this dead man knocking at the gate

*Not one, not one, nor thousands must they slay,
But one and all if they would dusk the day.*

Here lies the sign that we shall break our prison;
Amidst the storm he won a prisoner's rest; 20
But in the cloudy dawn the sun arisen
Brings us our day of work to win the best
*Not one, not one, nor thousands must they slay,
But one and all if they would dusk the day.*

AGNES AND THE HILL-MAN

TRANSLATED FROM THE DANISH

Agnes went through the meadows a-weeping,
Fowl are a-singing.
There stood the hill-man, heed thereof keeping.
Agnes, fair Agnes!
"Come to the hill, fair Agnes, with me; 5
The reddest of gold will I give unto thee!"

Twice went Agnes the hill round about,
Then wended within, left the fair world without

In the hillside bode Agnes, three years thrice told o'er,
For the green earth sithence fell she longing
full sore. 10

There she sat, and lullaby sang in her singing,
And she heard how the bells of England were ringing

Agnes before her true-love did stand.
"May I wend to the church of the English
Land?"

"To England's Church well mayst thou be
gone, 15
So that no hand thou lay the red gold upon.

"So that when thou art come the churchyard
anear
Thou cast not abroad thy golden hair.

"So that when thou standest the church within
To thy mother on bench thou never win. 20

"So that when thou hearest the high God's
name,
No knee unto earth thou bow to the same."

34 Brynhild See The Story of Sigurd the Volsung, page 641, and note on lines 103-104, page 643 36 Balder, son of Odin, and the Norse god of light and peace

A Death Song This poem was written to be sold as a penny pamphlet to aid the children of Morris's friend Alfred Linnell, who died from injuries received when the police attacked marchers in a great Socialist parade in London, November 13, 1887 Morris was one of the marchers

Agnes and the Hill-Man. The hill-man is a kind of dwarf or troll living in the side of a hill He belongs to the realm of folklore. Compare the poem with Arnold's The Forsaken Merman, page 428
10. sithence, afterwards 20 win, go.

Hand she laid on all gold that was there,
And cast abroad her golden hair

And when the church she stood within 25
To her mother on bench straight did she win.

And when she heard the high God's name,
Knee unto earth she bowed to the same

When all the Mass was sung to its end
Home with her mother dear did she wend 30

"Come, Agnes, into the hillside to me,
For thy seven small sons greet sorely for thee!"

"Let them greet, let them greet, as they will have to do;
For never again will I hearken thereto!"

Weird laid he on her, sore sickness he wrought,
Fowl are a-singing 36
That selfsame hour to death was she brought Agnes, fair Agnes (1891)

FOR THE BED AT KELMSCOTT

The wind's on the wold
And the night is a-cold,
And Thames runs chill
Twixt mead and hill;
But kind and dear 5
Is the old house here,
And my heart is warm
Midst winter's harm

Rest, then, and rest,
And think of the best 10
'Twixt summer and spring,
When all birds sing
In the town of the tree,
And ye lie in me
And scarce dare move, 15
Lest the earth and its love
Should fade away
Ere the full of the day.

I am old and have seen
Many things that have been — 20
Both grief and peace
And wane and increase
No tale I tell
Of ill or well,

But this I say: 25
Night treadeth on day,
And for worst or best
Right good is rest. (1893; 1893)

ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE (1837-1909)

A SONG IN TIME OF ORDER

1852

Push hard across the sand,
For the salt wind gathers breath,
Shoulder and wrist and hand,
Push hard as the push of death.

The wind is as iron that rings, 5
The foam-heads loosen and flee,
It swells and welters and swings,
The pulse of the tide of the sea

And up on the yellow cliff
The long corn flickers and shakes, 10
Push, for the wind holds stiff,
And the gunwale dips and rakes

Good hap to the fresh fierce weather,
The quiver and beat of the sea!
While three men hold together, 15
The kingdoms are less by three

Out to the sea with her there,
Out with her over the sand;
Let the kings keep the earth for their share!
We have done with the sharers of land 20

They have tied the world in a tether,
They have bought over God with a fee,
While three men hold together,
The kingdoms are less by three

We have done with the kisses that sting, 25
The thief's mouth red from the feast,
The blood on the hands of the king
And the lie at the lips of the priest

Will they tie the winds in a tether,
Put a bit in the jaws of the sea? 30
While three men hold together,
The kingdoms are less by three

Let our flag run out straight in the wind!
The old red shall be floated again 34

30 wend, go 32 greet, weep 35 Weird, fate, a spell
For the Bed at Kelmscott This poem was written for the embroidered hangings that belonged to a carved oak bedstead at Kelmscott Manor, Morris's home in Lechlade, about thirty miles above Oxford. The poem first appeared in the Catalogue of the Arts and Crafts Exhibition, 1893. The old bedstead is the speaker.

10 corn, grain, wheat 34. The old red, the flag of the Revolution

When the ranks that are thin shall be thinned,
When the names that were twenty are ten;

When the devil's riddle is mastered
And the galley-bench creaks with a pope,
We shall see Buonaparte the bastard
Kick heels with his throat in a rope. 40

While the shepherd sets wolves on his sheep
And the emperor halts his kine,
While Shame is a watchman asleep
And Faith is a keeper of swine,

Let the wind shake our flag like a feather, 45
Like the plumes of the foam of the sea!
While three men hold together,
The kingdoms are less by three.

All the world has its burdens to bear,
From Cayenne to the Austrian whips, 50
Forth, with the rain in our hair
And the salt sweet foam in our lips,

In the teeth of the hard glad weather,
In the blown wet face of the sea;
While three men hold together, 55
The kingdoms are less by three (1862)

FAUSTINE

Ave Faustina Imperatrix morituri te saluant

Lean back, and get some minutes' peace,
Let your head lean
Back to the shoulder with its fleece
Of locks, Faustine.

The shapely silver shoulder stoops, 5
Weighted over clean
With state of splendid hair that droops
Each side, Faustine.

Let me go over your good gifts
That crown you queen, 10
A queen whose kingdom ebbs and shifts
Each week, Faustine:

Bright heavy brows well gathered up—
White gloss and sheen,

38 a pope, Pius IX (1846-78), who was driven from Rome during the Italian Revolution of 1848 and who returned in 1850 by the aid of foreign arms. Swinburne wanted him sentenced to the galleys. 39 Buonaparte the bastard, Napoleon III, emperor of the French (1852-70), who is called a bastard because as president of the Republic (1848-52) he overthrew the old constitution and made a new one that gave him unlimited power. He was thus an illegitimate emperor. 50 Cayenne, the capital of French Guiana, used as a place of banishment for political prisoners. Austrian whips, a reference to the Austrian oppression of Italy during the period.

Faustine. See Critical Notes

Ave Faustina, etc. Hail, Faustina, Empress, those about to die salute thee. This is adapted from the traditional words of the Roman gladiators about to engage in mortal combat "Hail Caesar, Emperor! those about to die salute thee!"

Carved lips that make my lips a cup 15
To drink, Faustine,

Wine and rank poison, milk and blood,
Being mixed therein
Since first the devil threw dice with God
For you, Faustine 20

Your naked new-born soul, their stake,
Stood blind between;
God said, "Let him that wins her take
And keep Faustine "

But this time Satan throve, no doubt, 25
Long since, I ween,
God's part in you was battered out—
Long since, Faustine

The die rang sideways as it fell,
Rang cracked and thin,
Like a man's laughter heard in hell
Far down, Faustine 30

A shadow of laughter like a sigh,
Dead sorrow's kin,
So rang, thrown down, the devil's die 35
That won Faustine

A suckling of his breed you were,
One hard to wean;
But God, who lost you, left you fair,
We see, Faustine. 40

You have the face that suits a woman
For her soul's screen—
The sort of beauty that's called human
In hell, Faustine.

You could do all things but be good 45
Or chaste of mien;
And that you would not if you could,
We know, Faustine.

Even He who cast seven devils out
Of Magdalene 50
Could hardly do as much, I doubt,
For you, Faustine.

Did Satan make you to spite God?
Or did God mean
To scourge with scorpions for a rod 55
Our sins, Faustine?

I know what queen at first you were,
As though I had seen

50 Magdalene. See Rossetti's Mary Magdalene, p. 525. 57 what queen . . . were, a reference to Faustina (105-141 A.D.), the wife of the Roman Emperor Antoninus. She was notorious for her licentiousness. Her daughter, also named Faustina, was the wife of Marcus Aurelius, Roman emperor (161-180). She is said to have been more profligate than her mother.

Red gold and black imperious hair Twice crown Faustine.	60	Your drenched loose hands were stretched to hold	105
As if your fed sarcophagus Spared flesh and skin, You come back face to face with us, The same Faustine.		The vine's wet green, Long ere they coined in Roman gold Your face, Faustine.
She loved the games men played with death, 65 Where death must win; As though the slain man's blood and breath Revived Faustine.	65	Then after change of soaring feather And winnowing fin,	110
Nets caught the pike, pikes tore the net, Lithe limbs and lean	70	You woke in weeks of feverish weather, A new Faustine.
From drained-out pores dripped thick red sweat To soothe Faustine		A star upon your birthday burned, Whose fierce serene	115
She drank the steaming drift and dust Blown off the scene, Blood could not ease the bitter lust	75	Red pulseless planet never yearned In heaven, Faustine.
That galled Faustine.		Stray breaths of Sapphic song that blew Through Mitylene	120
All round the foul fat furrows reeked, Where blood sank in; The circus splashed and seethed and shrieked All round Faustine.	80	Shook the fierce quivering blood in you By night, Faustine.
But these are gone now, years entomb The dust and din, Yea, even the bath's fierce reek and fume That slew Faustine.		The shameless nameless love that makes Hell's iron gin Shut on you like a trap that breaks The soul, Faustine.
Was life worth living then? and now Is life worth sin?	85	And when your veins were void and dead,	125
Where are the imperial years? and how Are you Faustine?		What ghosts unclean Swarmed round the straitened barren bed That hid Faustine?
Your soul forgot her joys, forgot Her times of teen;	90	What sterile growths of sexless root Or epicene?	130
Yea, this life likewise will you not Forget, Faustine?		What flower of kisses without fruit Of love, Faustine?
For in the time we know not of Did fate begin		What adders came to shed their coats? What coiled obscene
Weaving the web of days that wore Your doom, Faustine	95	Small serpents with soft stretching throats Caressed Faustine?	135
The threads were wet with wine, and all Were smooth to spin; They wove you like a Bacchanal, The first Faustine.	100	But the time came of famished hours, Maimed loves and mean, This ghastly thin-faced time of ours, To spoil Faustine.	140
And Bacchus cast your mates and you Wild grapes to glean; Your flower-like lips were dashed with dew From his, Faustine		You seem a thing that hinges hold, A love-machine With clockwork joints of supple gold— No more, Faustine
		Not godless, for you serve one god, The Lampsacene,	145

90 teen, sorrow, grief 99 Bacchanal, a devotee of Bacchus, god of wine

117 Sapphic song, poetry of Sappho, a noted Greek poetess (c. 600 B.C.), famous for the erotic quality of her verse. She was born in the city of Mitylene, on the island of Lesbos, off the coast of Asia Minor. 122 gin, engine of torture. 130 epicene, common to both sexes. 146 Lampsacene, Priapus, the Greek god of fertility and gardens. In later times he was regarded as the chief deity of lasciviousness and obscenity. His worship began in the city of Lampsacus, in Asia Minor.

Who metes the gardens with his rod;
Your lord, Faustine.

If one should love you with real love
(Such things have been, 150
Things your fair face knows nothing of,
It seems, Faustine);

That clear hair heavily bound back,
The lights wherein
Shift from dead blue to burnt-up black; 155
Your throat, Faustine,

Strong, heavy, throwing out the face
And hard bright chin
And shameful scornful lips that grace
Their shame, Faustine, 160

Curled lips, long since half kissed away,
Still sweet and keen;
You'd give him—poison shall we say?
Or what, Faustine? (1862)

From ATALANTA IN CALYDON

INVOCATION

Maiden, and mistress of the months and stars
Now folded in the flowerless fields of heaven,
Goddess whom all gods love with threefold
heart,

Being treble in thy divided deity,
A light for dead men and dark hours, a foot 5
Swift on the hills as morning, and a hand
To all things fierce and fleet that roar and
range

Mortal, with gentler shafts than snow or
sleep—

Hear now and help and lift no violent hand,
But favorable and fair as thine eye's beam 10
Hidden and shown in heaven; for I all night
Amid the king's hounds and the hunting men
Have wrought and worshiped toward thee;
nor shall man

See goodlier hounds or deadlier edge of spears;
But for the end, that lies unreached as yet 15
Between the hands and on the knees of gods.
O fair-faced sun, killing the stars and dews
And dreams and desolation of the night¹

Rise up, shine, stretch thine hand out, with thy bow

Touch the most dimmest height of trembling
heaven, 20

And burn and break the dark about thy ways, Shot through and through with arrows; let thine hair

Lighten as flame above that flameless shell
Which was the moon, and thine eyes fill the
world

And thy lips kindle with swift beams; let
earth 25

Laugh, and the long sea fiery from thy feet
Through all the roar and ripple of streaming springs

And foam in reddening flakes and flying
flowers

Shaken from hands and blown from lips of nymphs

Whose hair or breast divides the wandering
wave 30

With salt close tresses cleaving lock to lock,
All gold, or shuddering and unfurrowed snow,
And all the winds about thee with their wings,
And fountain-heads of all the watered world,
Each horn of Achelous, and the green 35

Euenus, wedded with the straitening sea.
For in fair time thou comest; come also thou,
Twin-born with him, and virgin, Artemis,
And give our spears their spoil, the wild boar's hide,

Sent in thine anger against us for sin done 40
And bloodless altars without wine or fire.

Him now consume thou, for thy sacrifice
With sanguine-shining steam divides the dawn,

And one, the maiden rose of all thy maids,
Arcadian Atalanta, snowy-souled, 45

Fair as the snow and footed as the wind,
From Ladon and well-wooded Mænalus
Over the firm hills and the fleeting sea

Hast thou drawn hither, and many an arméd
king,

Heroes, the crown of men, like gods in fight 50
Moreover out of all the Ætolian land,

From the full-flowered Lelantian pasturage
To what of fruitful field the son of Zeus

Won from the roaring river and laboring sea
When the wild god shrank in his horn and fled 55

And foamed and lessened through his wrathful fords,

Leaving clear lands that steamed with sudden
sun,

The construction is Let earth laugh, the long sea laugh and foam, the winds laugh (line 33), etc. 32 shuddering, refers to breast (line 30) 35 Achelous, a river in western Greece 36 Euenus, a river in western Greece, it flows into the Ionian Sea where it narrows at the entrance to the Gulf of Corinth 38 Twin-born Apollo and Artemis were twin children of Zeus and Leto 45 Atalanta, a maiden of Arcadia, Greece, famous for her beauty and her fleetness of foot 47 Ladon, a river in Arcadia Mænalus, a mountain in Arcadia 51 Ætolian land, Ætolia, in western Greece, the province in which Calydon was located 52 Lelantian pasturage, a region at the mouth of the River Euenus 53 son of Zeus, etc., Hercules, who defeated the river god Achelous in a combat over Dejanira of Calydon, whom they both loved Achelous, who assumed the form of a bull, lost one of his horns in the fight.

These virgins with the lightening of the day
 Bring thee fresh wreaths and their own

 Luxurious locks and flower-like mixed with

 Divides from these things, whom do thou not

 Help and give honor, and to mine hounds

WHEN THE HOUNDS OF SPRING

When the hounds of spring are on winter's traces,

The mother of months in meadow or plain
 Fills the shadows and windy places

With lisp of leaves and ripple of rain,
 And the brown bright nightingale amorous 5
 Is half assuaged for Itylus,
 For the Thracian ships and the foreign faces,
 The tongueless vigil, and all the pain

Come with bows bent and with emptying of
 quivers,

Maiden most perfect, lady of light, 10
 With a noise of winds and many rivers,
 With a clamor of waters, and with might;

Bind on thy sandals, O thou most fleet,
 Over the splendor and speed of thy feet,
 For the faint east quickens, the wan west
 shivers, 15

Round the feet of the day and the feet of the night.

Where shall we find her, how shall we sing to
 her,

Fold our hands round her knees, and cling?
 Oh, that man's heart were as fire and could spring to her,

Fire, or the strength of the streams that
 spring! 20

For the stars and the winds are unto her
 As raiment, as songs of the harp-player,
 For the risen stars and the fallen cling to her,
 And the southwest-wind and the west-wind
 sing.

For winter's rains and ruins are over, 25
 And all the season of snows and sins;
 The days dividing lover and lover,

58 These virgins, maidens of Ætolia who form the chorus of the drama

When the Hounds of Spring This is the opening chorus of the drama, sung by a group of Ætolian maidens, it follows the Invocation.

 6 Itylus See note on Arnold's Philonela, page 470

The light that loses, the night that wins,
 And time remembered is grief forgotten,
 And frosts are slain and flowers begotten, 30
 And in green underwood and cover
 Blossom by blossom the spring begins

The full streams feed on flower of rushes,
 Ripe grasses trammel a traveling foot,
 The faint fresh flame of the young year flushes
 From leaf to flower and flower to fruit; 36
 And fruit and leaf are as gold and fire,
 And the oat is heard above the lyre,
 And the hoofed heel of a satyr crushes
 The chestnut-husk at the chestnut-root. 40

And Pan by noon and Bacchus by night,
 Fleeter of foot than the fleet-foot kid,
 Follows with dancing and fills with delight
 The Mænad and the Bassarid,
 And soft as lips that laugh and hide 45
 The laughing leaves of the trees divide,
 And screen from seeing and leave in sight
 The god pursuing, the maiden hid

The ivy falls with the Bacchanal's hair
 Over her eyebrows hiding her eyes, 50
 The wild vine slipping down leaves bare
 Her bright breast shortening into sighs,
 The wild vine slips with the weight of its
 leaves,
 But the berried ivy catches and cleaves 54
 To the limbs that glitter, the feet that scare
 The wolf that follows, the fawn that flies

BEFORE THE BEGINNING OF YEARS

Before the beginning of years
 There came to the making of man
 Time, with a gift of tears;
 Grief, with a glass that ran;
 Pleasure, with pain for leaven; 5
 Summer, with flowers that fell;
 Remembrance fallen from heaven,
 And madness risen from hell,
 Strength without hands to smite;
 Love that endures for a breath; 10
 Night, the shadow of light,
 And life, the shadow of death.

28 light. . . wins, a reference to the short days and long nights of winter 38 oat, the shepherd's pipe of oaten straw 39 satyr, a sylvan demigod, half man and half goat
 41 Pan, god of flocks and pastures Bacchus, god of wine 44 Mænad, a female worshiper of Bacchus The name is derived from a Greek word meaning to be frenzied Bassarid, a Thracian worshiper of Bacchus The celebrations of the Bassarids included licentious excesses and a sacrifice of some animal on the altar of the god The participants ate the flesh raw 47-48 screen . . . hid As the god and the

Before the Beginning of Years This song is sung by the Chorus after Althea had departed to prepare her son Meleager for the hunt, "lest love or some man's anger work him harm"

And the high gods took in hand
 Fire, and the falling of tears,
 And a measure of sliding sand 15
 From under the feet of the years;
 And froth and drift of the sea,
 And dust of the laboring earth;
 And bodies of things to be
 In the houses of death and of birth; 20
 And wrought with weeping and laughter,
 And fashioned with loathing and love,
 With life before and after
 And death beneath and above,
 For a day and a night and a morrow, 25
 That his strength might endure for a span
 With travail and heavy sorrow,
 The holy spirit of man.

From the winds of the north and the south
 They gathered as unto strife; 30
 They breathed upon his mouth,
 They filled his body with life;
 Eyesight and speech they wrought
 For the veils of the soul therein,
 A time for labor and thought, 35
 A time to serve and to sin;
 They gave him light in his ways,
 And love, and a space for delight,
 And beauty and length of days,
 And night, and sleep in the night. 40
 His speech is a burning fire;
 With his lips he travaileth;
 In his heart is a blind desire,
 In his eyes foreknowledge of death,
 He weaves, and is clothed with derision; 45
 Sows, and he shall not reap,
 His life is a watch or a vision
 Between a sleep and a sleep (1865)

WE HAVE SEEN THEE, O LOVE

We have seen thee, O Love, thou art fair,
 thou art goodly, O Love;
 Thy wings make light in the air as the wings
 of a dove
 Thy feet are as winds that divide the stream of the sea,
 Earth is thy covering to hide thee, the garment of thee
 Thou art swift and subtle and blind as a flame of fire; 5
 Before thee the laughter, behind thee the tears of desire;
 And twain go forth beside thee, a man with a maid;
 Her eyes are the eyes of a bride whom delight
 makes afraid;

We Have Seen Thee, O Love These are the opening lines of a chorus on the coming of Love in the form of Aphrodite. The first two lines are from The Song of Solomon, 4:1 — "Behold, thou art fair, my love, behold, thou art fair, thou hast doves' eyes with in thy locks."

As the breath in the buds that stir is her bridal breath,
 But Fate is the name of her; and his name is
 Death (1865)

NOT AS WITH SUNDERING OF THE EARTH

Not as with sundering of the earth,
 Nor as the cleaving of the sea,
 Nor fierce foreshadowings of a birth,
 Nor flying dreams of death to be,
 Nor loosening of the large world's girth 5
 And quickening of the body of night,
 And sound of thunder in men's ears,
 And fire of lightning in men's sight,
 Fate, mother of desires and fears,
 Bore unto men the law of tears; 10
 But sudden, an unfathered flame,
 And broken out of night, she shone,
 She, without body, without name,
 In days forgotten and foregone,
 And heaven rang round her as she came, 15
 Like smitten cymbals, and lay bare,
 Clouds and great stars, thunders and snows,
 The blue sad fields and folds of air,
 The life that breathes, the life that grows,
 All wind, all fire, that burns or blows, 20
 Even all these knew her — for she is great,
 The daughter of doom, the mother of death,
 The sister of sorrow, a lifelong weight
 That no man's finger lighteneth,
 Nor any god can lighten fate; 25
 A landmark seen across the way
 Where one race treads as the other trod,
 An evil scepter, an evil stay,
 Wrought for a staff, wrought for a rod,
 The bitter jealousy of God. 30

For death is deep as the sea,
 And fate as the waves thereof
 Shall the waves take pity on thee
 Or the south-wind offer thee love?
 Wilt thou take the night for thy day 35
 Or the darkness for light on thy way,
 Till thou say in thine heart, Enough?

Behold, thou art over-fair, thou art over-wise,
 The sweetness of spring in thine hair, and the light in thine eyes
 The light of the spring in thine eyes, and the sound in thine ears; 40
 Yet thine heart shall wax heavy with sighs and thine eyelids with tears
 Wilt thou cover thine hair with gold, and with silver thy feet?

Not As with Sundering of the Earth This song is sung by the Chorus after Althæa has determined to sacrifice her son for killing her brothers.

9 Fate According to the Greeks, fate was the necessity behind and above gods as well as men.

Hast thou taken the purple to fold thee, and made thy mouth sweet?
Behold, when thy face is made bare, he that loved thee shall hate;
Thy face shall be no more fair at the fall of thy fate 45
For thy life shall fall as a leaf and be shed as the rain;
And the veil of thine head shall be grief; and the crown shall be pain (1865)

THE DEATH OF MELEAGER

Meleager

Let your hands meet
Round the weight of my head;
Lift ye my feet
As the feet of the dead;
For the flesh of my body is molten, the limbs of it molten as lead. 5

Chorus

O thy luminous face,
Thine imperious eyes!
O the grief, O the grace,
As of day when it dies!
Who is this bending over thee, lord, with tears and suppression of sighs? 10

Meleager

Is a bride so fair?
Is a maid so meek?
With unchapleted hair,
With unfileted cheek,
Atalanta, the pure among women, whose name is as blessing to speak 15

Atalanta

I would that with feet
Unsandaled, unshod,
Overbold, overfleet,
I had swum not nor trod
From Arcadia to Calydon, northward, a blast of the envy of God. 20

Meleager

Unto each man his fate;
Unto each as he saith
In whose fingers the weight
Of the world is as breath,
Yet I would that in clamor of battle mine hands had laid hold upon death. 25

Chorus

Not with cleaving of shields
And their clash in thine ear,

The Death of Meleager This incident occurs after Althea throws the brand into the fire See Critical Note on title 11-15 bride Atalanta A bride with her chaplet or garland worn on her head, and a maiden with her fillet or band of ribbon around her forehead, are not so fair or so meek as Atalanta, who wears neither decoration

When the lord of fought fields
Breaketh spearshaft from spear,
Thou art broken, our lord, thou art broken, with travail and labor and fear. 30

Meleager

Would God he had found me
Beneath fresh boughs!
Would God he had bound me
Unawares in mine house,
With light in mine eyes, and songs in my lips,
and a crown on my brows! 35

Chorus

Whence art thou sent from us?
Whither thy goal?
How art thou rent from us,
Thou that wert whole,
As with severing of eyelids and eyes, as with sundering of body and soul! 40

Meleager

My heart is within me
As an ash in the fire,
Whosoever hath seen me,
Without lute, without lyre,
Shall sing of me grievous things, even things that were ill to desire. 45

Chorus

Who shall raise thee
From the house of the dead?
Or what man praise thee
That thy praise may be said?
Alas thy beauty! alas thy body! alas thine
head! 50

Meleager

But thou, O mother,
The dreamer of dreams,
Wilt thou bring forth another
To feel the sun's beams
When I move among shadows a shadow, and wail by impassable streams? 55

Eneus

What thing wilt thou leave me
Now this thing is done?
A man wilt thou give me,
A son for my son,
For the light of mine eyes, the desire of my life, the desirable one? 60

Chorus

Thou wert glad above others,
Yea, fair beyond word;
Thou wert glad among mothers,
For each man that heard
Of thee, praise there was added unto thee, as wings to the feet of a bird 65

Eneus

Who shall give back
 Thy face of old years
 With travail made black,
 Grown gray among fears,
 Mother of sorrow, mother of cursing, mother of tears? 70

Meleager

Though thou art as fire
 Fed with fuel in vain,
 My delight, my desire,
 Is more chaste than the rain,
 More pure than the dewfall, more holy than stars are that live without stain. 75

Atalanta

I would that as water
 My life's blood had thawed,
 Or as winter's wan daughter
 Leaves lowland and lawn
 Spring-stricken, or ever mine eyes had beheld thee made dark in thy dawn. 80

Chorus

When thou dravest the men
 Of the chosen of Thrace,
 None turned him again
 Nor endured he thy face
 Clothed round with the blush of the battle, with light from a terrible place. 85

Eneus

Thou shouldst die as he dies
 For whom none sheddeth tears,
 Filling thine eyes
 And fulfilling thine ears
 With the brilliance of battle, the bloom and the beauty, the splendor of spears. 90

Chorus

In the ears of the world
 It is sung, it is told,
 And the light thereof hurled
 And the noise thereof rolled From the Acroceranion snow to the ford of the fleece of gold. 95

Meleager

Would God ye could carry me
 Forth of all these;
 Heap sand and bury me
 By the Chersonese

Where the thundering Bosphorus answers the thunder of Pontic seas. 100

Eneus

Dost thou mock at our praise
 And the singing begun
 And the men of strange days
 Praising my son
 In the folds of the hills of home, high places of Calydon? 105

Meleager

For the dead man no home is;
 Ah, better to be
 What the flower of the foam is
 In fields of the sea,
 That the sea-waves might be as my raiment,
 the gulf-stream a garment for me. 110

Chorus

Who shall seek thee and bring
 And restore thee thy day,
 When the dove dipped her wing
 And the oars won their way
 Where the narrowing Symplegades whitened
 the straits of Propontis with spray? 115

Meleager

Will ye crown me my tomb
 Or exalt me my name,
 Now my spirits consume,
 Now my flesh is a flame?
 Let the sea slake it once, and men speak of me sleeping to praise me or shame 120

Chorus

Turn back now, turn thee,
 As who turns him to wake;
 Though the life in thee burn thee,
 Couldst thou bathe it and slake
 Where the sea-ridge of Helle hangs heavier, and east upon west waters break? 125

Meleager

Would the winds blow me back
 Or the waves hurl me home?
 Ah, to touch in the track
 Where the pine learned to roam
 Cold girdles and crowns of the sea-gods, cool blossoms of water and foam! 130

Chorus

The gods may release
 That they made fast;
 Thy soul shall have ease

In thy limbs at the last,
But what shall they give thee for life, sweet life that is overpast? 135

Meleager

Not the life of men's veins,
Not of flesh that conceives,
But the grace that remains,
The fair beauty that cleaves
To the life of the rains in the grasses, the life of the dew on the leaves. 140

Chorus

Thou wert helmsman and chief,
Wilt thou turn in an hour,
Thy limbs to the leaf,
Thy face to the flower,
Thy blood to the water, thy soul to the gods who divide and devour? 145

Meleager

The years are hungry,
They wail all their days;
The gods wax angry
And weary of praise,
And who shall bridle their lips? and who shall straighten their ways? 150

Chorus

The gods guard over us
With sword and with rod;
Weaving shadow to cover us,
Heaping the sod,
That law may fulfill herself wholly, to darken man's face before God 155

From CHASTELARD

BETWEEN THE SUNSET AND THE SEA

Between the sunset and the sea
My love laid hands and lips on me;
Of sweet came sour, of day came night,
Of long desire came brief delight.
Ah, love, and what thing came of thee 5
Between the sea-downs and the sea?

Between the sea-mark and the sea
Joy grew to grief, grief grew to me;
Love turned to tears, and tears to fire,
And dead delight to new desire; 10

155 law. God At Mt Sinai (Exodus, 19), the people were forbidden to look upon the presence of God concealed in darkness on the Mount Chastelard Chastelard is the first of a series of three tragedies on Mary, Queen of Scots. Mary Beaton, one of the Queen's ladies, in love with Chastelard, sang the lyric given here. Pierre de Boscose de Chastelard was a French poet at the court of Queen Mary, with whom he was violently in love. He had followed her to Scotland from France in 1561. His intrigue with Mary cost him his life in 1563.

Love's talk, love's touch there seemed to be Between the sea-sand and the sea.

Between the sundown and the sea
Love watched one hour of love with me;
Then down the all-golden waterways 15
His feet flew after yesterdays;
I saw them come and saw them flee
Between the sea-foam and the sea.

Between the sea-strand and the sea
Love fell on sleep, sleep fell on me; 20
The first star saw twain turn to one
Between the moonrise and the sun,
The next, that saw not love, saw me
Between the sea-banks and the sea.

A BALLAD OF LIFE

I found in dreams a place of wind and flowers,
Full of sweet trees and color of glad grass,
In midst whereof there was
A lady clothed like summer with sweet hours
Her beauty, fervent as a fiery moon, 5
Made my blood burn and swoon
Like a flame rained upon
Sorrow had filled her shaken eyelids' blue,
And her mouth's sad red heavy rose all
through
Seemed sad with glad things gone 10

She held a little cithern by the strings,
Shaped heartwise, strung with subtle-colored hair
Of some dead lute player
That in dead years had done delicious things
The seven strings were named accordingly 15
The first string charity,
The second tenderness;
The rest were pleasure, sorrow, sleep, and sin,
And loving-kindness, that is pity's kin
And is most pitiless. 20

There were three men with her, each garmented
With gold and shod with gold upon the feet,
And with plucked ears of wheat
The first man's hair was wound upon his head
His face was red, and his mouth curled and sad; 25
All his gold garment had
Pale stains of dust and rust
A riven hood was pulled across his eyes;

A Ballad of Life This poem and A Ballad of Death (page 663), with their ornateness of style and wealth of sensuous beauty, illustrate the influence of the Pre-Raphaelite movement upon the early work of Swinburne. See Critical Note on the Pre-Raphaelites (under Rossetti)

11 cithern, a kind of stringed instrument

The token of him being upon this wise
Made for a sign of Lust. 30

The next was Shame, with hollow heavy face
Colored like green wood when flame
kindles it.

He hath such feeble feet
They may not well endure in any place.
His face was full of gray old miseries, 35
And all his blood's increase
Was even increase of pain.

The last was Fear, that is akin to Death,
He is Shame's friend, and always as Shame
saith
Fear answers him again. 40

My soul said in me: This is marvelous,
Seeing the air's face is not so delicate
Nor the sun's grace so great,
If sin and she be kin or amorous.
And seeing where maidens served her on their knees, 45
I bade one crave of these
To know the cause thereof
Then Fear said: I am Pity that was dead
And Shame said: I am Sorrow comforted.
And Lust said: I am Love 50

Thereat her hands began a lute-playing
And her sweet mouth a song in a strange tongue,
And all the while she sung
There was no sound but long tears following
Long tears upon men's faces, waxen white 55
With extreme sad delight
But those three following men
Became as men raised up among the dead,
Great glad mouths open and fair cheeks made
red
With child's blood come again 60

Then I said: Now assuredly I see
My lady is perfect, and transfigureth
All sin and sorrow and death,
Making them fair as her own eyelids be,
Or lips wherein my whole soul's life abides, 65
Or as her sweet white sides
And bosom carved to kiss.
Now therefore, if her pity further me,
Doubtless for her sake all my days shall be
As righteous as she is. 70

Forth, ballad, and take roses in both arms, Even till the top rose touch thee in the
throat
Where the least thornprick harms,
And girdled in thy golden singing-coat,
Come thou before my lady and say this: 75

71 Forth, go forth.

Borgia, thy gold hair's color burns in me,
Thy mouth makes beat my blood in feverish rimes,
Therefore so many as these roses be,
Kiss me so many times.
Then it may be, seeing how sweet she is, 80
That she will stoop herself none otherwise
Than a blown vine-branch doth,
And kiss thee with soft laughter on thine eyes,
Ballad, and on thy mouth. (1866)

A BALLAD OF DEATH

Kneel down, fair Love, and fill thyself with
tears,
Girdle thyself with sighing for a girth
Upon the sides of mirth,
Cover thy lips and eyelids, let thine ears
Be filled with rumor of people sorrowing, 5
Make thee soft raiment out of woven sighs
Upon the flesh to cleave,
Set pains therein and many a grievous thing,
And many sorrows after each his wise
For armlet and for gorget and for sleeve 10

O Love's lute heard about the lands of death,
Left hanged upon the trees that were therein,
O Love and Time and Sin,
Three singing mouths that mourn now under-
breath,
Three lovers, each one evil spoken of, 15
O smitten lips wherethrough this voice of mine
Came softer with her praise;
Abide a little for our lady's love
The kisses of her mouth were more than wine,
And more than peace the passage of her days.

O Love, thou knowest if she were good to see
O Time, thou shalt not find in any land,
Till, cast out of thine hand,
The sunlight and the moonlight fail from thee,
Another woman fashioned like as this 25
O Sin, thou knowest that all thy shame in her
Was made a goodly thing,
Yea, she caught Shame and shamed him with her kiss,
With her fair kiss, and lips much lovelier
Than lips of amorous roses in late spring 30

By night there stood over against my bed Queen Venus with a hood striped gold and
black,

76 Borgia, Lucrezia di Borgia (1480-1519), daughter of Pope Alexander VI and wife of Alfonso, Duke of Ferrara. Although she was represented as a veritable monster of wickedness, as Duchess of Ferrara she was noted for her charm and beauty.
A Ballad of Death 10 gorget, a neck covering or ornament 19 kisses 20 wine From The Song of Solomon, 12 — "Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth, for thy love is better than wine." 32 Queen Venus, goddess of love According to one tradition she was born of the sea-foam (line 36)

Both sides drawn fully back
 From brows wherein the sad blood failed of
 red,
 And temples drained of purple and full of
 death 35

Her curled hair had the wave of sea-water
 And the sea's gold in it
 Her eyes were as a dove's that sickeneth.
 Strewn dust of gold she had shed over her,
 And pearl and purple and amber on her feet.

Upon her raiment of dyed sendaline 41
 Were painted all the secret ways of love
 And covered things thereof,
 That hold delight as grape-flowers hold their
 wine; 44

Red mouths of maidens and red feet of doves,
 And brides that kept within the bride-chamber

Their garment of soft shame,
 And weeping faces of the wearied loves
 That swoon in sleep and awake wearier, 49
 With heat of lips and hair shed out like flame

The tears that through her eyelids fell on
 me
 Made mine own bitter where they ran between

As blood had fallen therein,
 She saying: Arise, lift up thine eyes and see
 If any glad thing be or any good 55

Now the best thing is taken forth of us,
 Even she to whom all praise
 Was as one flower in a great multitude,
 One glorious flower of many and glorious,
 One day found gracious among many days,

Even she whose handmaiden was Love — to whom 61

At kissing times across her stateliest bed
 Kings bowed themselves and shed
 Pale wine, and honey with the honeycomb,
 And spikenard bruised for a burnt-offering;
 Even she between whose lips the kiss became
 As fire and frankincense;

Whose hair was as gold raiment on a king,
 Whose eyes were as the morning purged with
 flame, 69

Whose eyelids as sweet savor issuing thence.

Then I beheld, and lo, on the other side
 My lady's likeness crowned and robed and
 dead

Sweet still, but now not red,
 Was the shut mouth whereby men lived and
 died.

41 sendaline, a light silk fabric used in the Middle Ages
 65 spikenard, a plant from which a costly fragrant ointment was made 67. frankincense, a fragrant ointment valued by the ancients for fumigation, embalming, etc

And sweet, but emptied of the blood's blue
 shade, 75
 The great curled eyelids that withheld her
 eyes.

And sweet, but like spoilt gold,
 The weight of color in her tresses weighed
 And sweet, but as a vesture with new dyes,
 The body that was clothed with love of old. 80

Ah! that my tears filled all her woven hair
 And all the hollow bosom of her gown —
 Ah! that my tears ran down

Even to the place where many kisses were,
 Even where her parted breast-flowers have
 place, 85

Even where they are cloven apart — who knows not this?

Ah! the flowers cleave apart
 And their sweet fills the tender interspace;
 Ah! the leaves grown thereof were things to
 kiss 89

Ere their fine gold was tarnished at the heart

Ah! in the days when God did good to me,
 Each part about her was a righteous thing,
 Her mouth an almsgiving,
 The glory of her garments charity,
 The beauty of her bosom a good deed, 95
 In the good days when God kept sight of us,
 Love lay upon her eyes,
 And on that hair whereof the world takes heed,

And all her body was more virtuous
 Than souls of women fashioned otherwise 100

Now, ballad, gather poppies in thine hands
 And sheaves of briar and many rusted sheaves
 Rain-rotten in rank lands,
 Waste margold and late unhappy leaves
 And grass that fades ere any of it be mown,
 And when thy bosom is filled full thereof 106
 Seek out Death's face ere the light altereth,
 And say: "My master that was thrall to Love
 Is become thrall to Death"
 Bow down before him, ballad, sigh and groan,
 But make no sojourn in thy outgoing, 111
 For haply it may be
 That when thy feet return at evening
 Death shall come in with thee. (r866)

LAUS VENERIS

Asleep or waking is it? for her neck,
 Kissed over close, wears yet a purple speck
 Wherein the pained blood falters and goes
 out;
 Soft, and stung softly — fairer for a fleck

Laus Veneris The title means Praise of Venus Cf Hymns to Proserpine, page 676, see, also, Critical Notes

But though my lips shut sucking on the place,
There is no vein at work upon her face, 6
Her eyelids are so peaceable, no doubt Deep sleep has warmed her blood through all its ways.

Lo, this is she that was the world's delight, 9
The old gray years were parcels of her might;
The strewings of the ways wherein she trod
Were the twain seasons of the day and night.

Lo, she was thus when her clear limbs enticed
All lips that now grow sad with kissing Christ, Stained with blood fallen from the feet of
God, 15
The feet and hands whereat our souls were priced.

Alas, Lord, surely thou art great and fair.
But, lo, her wonderfully woven hair!
And thou didst heal us with thy piteous
kiss, 20
But see now, Lord, her mouth is lovelier.

She is right fair, what hath she done to thee?
Nay, fair Lord Christ, lift up thine eyes and
see;
Had now thy mother such a lip — like this?
Thou knowest how sweet a thing it is to me

Inside the Horsel here the air is hot; 25
Right little peace one hath for it, God wot;
The scented dusty daylight burns the air,
And my heart chokes me till I hear it not.

Behold, my Venus, my soul's body, lies
With my love laid upon her garment-wise, 30
Feeling my love in all her limbs and hair
And shed between her eyelids through her
eyes

She holds my heart in her sweet open hands
Hanging asleep; hard by her head there stands,
Crowned with gilt thorns and clothed with flesh like fire, 35
Love, wan as foam blown up the salt burnt sands —

Hot as the brackish waifs of yellow spume
That shift and steam — loose clots of arid fume
From the sea's panting mouth of dry desire,
There stands he, like one laboring at a loom
The warp holds fast across, and every thread
That makes the woof up has dry specks of red,

25 Horsel. Horselberg, the Mountain of Venus, in central Germany. In medieval tradition Venus was an enchantress who held her court with pagan splendor and revelry in a cavern in this mountain. This tradition is the theme of the legend of Tannhauser. See Morris's The Ill of Venus 26 wot, knows

Always the shuttle cleaves clean through,
and he
Weaves with the hair of many a ruined head.

Love is not glad nor sorry, as I deem; 45
Laboring he dreams, and labors in the dream,
Till when the spool is finished, lo, I see His web, reeled off, curls and goes out like steam.

Night falls like fire, the heavy lights run low,
And as they drop, my blood and body so 50
Shake as the flame shakes, full of days and hours
That sleep not neither weep they as they go.

Ah, yet would God, this flesh of mine might be Where air might wash and long leaves cover
me,
Where tides of grass break into foam of
flowers, 55
Or where the wind's feet shine along the sea.

Ah, yet would God that stems and roots were bred
Out of my weary body and my head,
That sleep were sealed upon me with a seal
And I were as the least of all his dead 60

Would God my blood were dew to feed the
grass,
Mine ears made deaf and mine eyes blind as
glass,
My body broken as a turning wheel,
And my mouth stricken ere it saith Alas!

Ah, God, that love were as a flower or flame,
That life were as the naming of a name, 66
That death were not more pitiful than
desire,
That these things were not one thing and the same!

Behold now, surely somewhere there is death;
For each man hath some space of years, he
saith, 70
A little space of time ere time expire,
A little day, a little way of breath.

And, lo, between the sundawn and the sun,
His day's work and his night's work are undone; 74
And, lo, between the nightfall and the light,
He is not, and none knoweth of such an one

Ah, God, that I were as all souls that be,
As any herb or leaf of any tree,
As men that toil through hours of laboring
night,
As bones of men under the deep sharp sea 80

Outside it must be winter among men,
 For at the gold bars of the gates again
 I heard all night and all the hours of it
 The wind's wet wings and fingers drip with
 rain.

Knights gather, riding sharp for cold, I know
 The ways and woods are strangled with the
 snow; 86

And with short song the maidens spin and sit

Until Christ's birthnight, hly-like, arow

The scent and shadow shed about me make
 The very soul in all my senses ache, 90
 The hot hard night is fed upon my breath,
 And sleep beholds me from afar awake

Alas, but surely where the hills grow deep,
 Or where the wild ways of the sea are steep,
 Or in strange places somewhere there is
 death, 95
 And on death's face the scattered hair of
 sleep

There lover-like with lips and limbs that meet
 They lie, they pluck sweet fruit of life and eat,
 But me the hot and hungry days devour,
 And in my mouth no fruit of theirs is sweet 100

No fruit of theirs, but fruit of my desire,
 For her love's sake whose lips through mine
 respire,

Her eyelids on her eyes like flower on flower,
 Mine eyelids on mine eyes like fire on fire

So lie we, not as sleep that lies by death, 105
 With heavy kisses and with happy breath;

Not as man lies by woman, when the bride
 Laughs low for love's sake and the words he saith

For she lies, laughing low with love, she lies
 And turns his kisses on her lips to sighs, 110

To sighing sound of lips unsatisfied,
 And the sweet tears are tender with her eyes

Ah, not as they, but as the souls that were Slain in the old time, having found her fair;

Who, sleeping with her lips upon their eyes,
 Heard sudden serpents hiss across her hair. 116

Their blood runs round the roots of time like
 rain;

She casts them forth and gathers them again;
 With nerve and bone she weaves and mul-tiplies

Exceeding pleasure out of extreme pain. 120

102 respire, breathe

Her little chambers drip with flower-like red,
 Her girdles, and the chaplets of her head,
 Her armlets and her anklets, with her feet
 She tramples all that wine-press of the dead

Her gateways smoke with fume of flowers and fires, 125

With loves burnt out and unassuaged desires;
 Between her lips the steam of them is sweet,
 The languor in her ears of many lyres.

Her beds are full of perfume and sad sound,
 Her doors are made with music, and barred
 round 130

With sighing and with laughter and with
 tears,

With tears whereby strong souls of men are bound.

There is the knight Adonis that was slain;
 With flesh and blood she chains him for a chain;

The body and the spirit in her ears 135
 Cry, for her lips divide him vein by vein.

Yea, all she slayeth; yea, every man save me,
 Me, love, thy lover that must cleave to thee
 Till the ending of the days and ways of
 earth,

The shaking of the sources of the sea. 140

Me, most forsaken of all souls that fell,

Me, satiated with things insatiable,

Me, for whose sake the extreme hell makes
 mirth,

Yea, laughter kindles at the heart of hell

Alas thy beauty! for thy mouth's sweet sake
 My soul is bitter to me, my limbs quake 146

As water, as the flesh of men that weep,
 As their heart's vein whose heart goes nigh to break.

Ah, God, that sleep with flower-sweet fingertips

Would crush the fruit of death upon my lips,
 Ah, God, that death would tread the grapes of sleep 151

And wring their juice upon me as it drips.

There is no change of cheer for many days,
 But change of chimes high up in the air, that sways

Rung by the running fingers of the wind, 155
 And singing sorrows heard on hidden ways.

122 chaplets, wreaths 133 Adonis, the beautiful youth loved by Venus, goddess of love. He was slain while hunting. Because of the great sorrow of Venus, the gods of the lower world allowed Adonis to spend half of each year with her in the upper world

Day smiteth day in twain, night sundereth
 night,
 And on mine eyes the dark sits as the light;
 Yea, Lord, thou knowest I know not, having sinned,
 If heaven be clean or unclean in thy sight. 160

Yea, as if earth were sprinkled over me,
 Such chafed harsh earth as chokes a sandy
 sea,
 Each pore doth yearn, and the dried blood thereof
 Gasps by sick fits, my heart swims heavily;

There is a feverish famine in my veins; 165
 Below her bosom, where a crushed grape stains
 The white and blue, there my lips caught and clove
 An hour since, and what mark of me remains?

I dare not always touch her, lest the kiss Leave my lips charred. Yea, Lord, a little bliss, 170

Brief bitter bliss, one hath for a great sin;
 Nathless thou knowest how sweet a thing it is.

Sin, is it sin whereby men's souls are thrust
 Into the pit? yet had I a good trust

To save my soul before it slipped therein,
 Trod under by the fire-shod feet of lust. 176

For if mine eyes fail and my soul takes breath,
 I look between the iron sides of death

Into sad hell, where all sweet love hath
 end—

All but the pain that never finisheth. 180

There are the naked faces of great kings,
 The singing folk with all their lute-playings,
 There when one cometh he shall have to
 friend

The grave that covets and the worm that clings.

There sit the knights that were so great of
 hand, 185

The ladies that were queens of fair green land, Grown gray and black now, brought unto
 the dust,

Soiled, without raiment, clad about with sand

There is one end for all of them, they sit
 Naked and sad, they drink the dregs of it, 190

Trodden as grapes in the wine-press of lust,
 Trampled and trodden by the fiery feet.

I see the marvelous mouth whereby there fell
 Cities and people whom the gods loved well,
 Yet for her sake on them the fire gat hold,
 And for their sakes on her the fire of hell. 196

And softer than the Egyptian lote-leaf is,
 The queen whose face was worth the world
 to kiss,

Wearing at breast a suckling snake of gold;
 And large pale lips of strong Semiramis, 200

Curled like a tiger's that curl back to feed,
 Red only where the last kiss made them bleed;
 Her hair most thick with many a carven
 gem,

Deep in the mane, great-chested, like a steed.

Yea, with red sin the faces of them shine; 205
 But in all these there was no sin like mine;

No, not in all the strange great sins of them
 That made the wine-press froth and foam with
 wine.

For I was of Christ's choosing, I God's knight,
 No blinkard heathen stumbling for scant light,
 I can well see, for all the dusty days 211
 Gone past, the clean great time of goodly fight.

I smell the breathing battle sharp with blows,
 With shriek of shafts and snapping short of bows;

The fair pure sword smites out in subtle
 ways, 215

Sounds and long lights are shed between the rows

Of beautiful mailed men, the edged light slips,
 Most like a snake that takes short breath and dips

Sharp from the beautifully bending head,
 With all its gracious body lithe as lips 220

That curl in touching you, right in this wise
 My sword doth, seeming fire in mine own eyes
 Leaving all colors in them brown and red
 And flecked with death, then the keen breaths
 like sighs,

The caught-up choked dry laughters following them, 225

When all the fighting face is grown a flame
 For pleasure, and the pulse that stuns the
 ears,

And the heart's gladness of the goodly game

Let me think yet a little, I do know
These things were sweet, but sweet such years ago, 230

Their savor is all turned now into tears,
Yea, ten years since, where the blue ripples
blow,

The blue curled eddies of the blowing Rhine.
I felt the sharp wind shaking grass and vine Touch my blood, too, and sting me with
delight 235
Through all this waste and weary body of
mine

That never feels clear air, right gladly then
I rode alone, a great way off my men,
And heard the chiming bridle smite and smite,

And gave each rime thereof some rime again,

Till my song shifted to that iron one, 241
Seeing there rode up between me and the sun
Some certain of my foe's men, for his three White wolves across their painted coats did
run.

The first red-bearded, with square cheeks —
alack, 245
I made my knave's blood turn his beard to
black;

The slaying of him was a joy to see Perchance, too, when at night he came not
back,

Some woman fell a-weeping, whom this thief
Would beat when he had drunken, yet small grief 250

Hath any for the ridding of such knaves,
Yea, if one wept, I doubt her teen was brief

This bitter love is sorrow in all lands,
Draining of eyelids, wringing of drenched
hands,

Sighing of hearts and filling up of graves, 255
A sign across the head of the world he stands,

As one that hath a plague-mark on his brows,
Dust and spilt blood do track him to his house Down under earth; sweet smells of lip and
cheek,

Like a sweet snake's breath made more poisonous 260

With chewing of some perfumed deadly grass,
Are shed all round his passage if he pass,
And their quenched savor leaves the whole soul weak,
Sick with keen guessing whence the perfume
was.

As one who hidden in deep sedge and reeds Smells the rare scent made where a panther feeds, 266
And tracking ever slotwise the warm smell
Is snapped upon by the sweet mouth and bleeds,

His head far down the hot sweet throat of
her — 269
So one tracks love, whose breath is deadlier,
And, lo, one springs and you are fast in hell,
Fast as the gin's grip of a wayfarer

I think now, as the heavy hours deace
One after one, and bitter thoughts increase
One upon one, of all sweet finished things
The breaking of the battle, the long peace 276

Wherein we sat clothed softly, each man's hair Crowned with green leaves beneath white hoods of vair;

The sounds of sharp spears at great tourneyings, 279
And noise of singing in the late sweet air.

I sang of love too, knowing naught thereof,
"Sweeter," I said, "the little laugh of love
Than tears out of the eyes of Magdalen,
Or any fallen feather of the Dove.

"The broken little laugh that spoils a kiss, 285
The ache of purple pulses, and the bliss
Of blinded eyelids that expand again —
Love draws them open with those lips of his,

"Lips that cling hard till the kissed face has grown

Of one same fire and color with their own, 290
Then ere one sleep, appeased with sacrifice,
Where his lips wounded, there his lips atone "

I sang these things long since and knew them
not:

"Lo, here is love, or there is love, God wot,
This man and that finds favor in his eyes,"
I said, "but I, what guerdon have I got? 296

"The dust of praise that is blown everywhere
In all men's faces with the common air,
The bay-leaf that wants chafing to be sweet
Before they wind it in a singer's hair." 300

267 slotwise, in the way one follows a slot—that is, a track or trace of an animal. 271-2 springe, gin, snares or traps for catching game. 278 vair, the skin of a species of squirrel, much used in the Middle Ages as fur for costly dresses and robes. 283 Magdalen. See Rossetti's Mary Magdalene and note, page 525. 284 the Dove Cf Matthew, 3:16-17—"And Jesus, when he was baptized, went up straightway out of the water, and, lo, the heavens were opened unto him, and he saw the Spirit of God descending like a dove, and lighting upon him. And lo a voice from heaven, saying, 'This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.'" 299 bay-leaf, laurel, often used in wreaths for crowning poets and heroes in ancient times

So that one dawn I rode forth sorrowing;
 I had no hope but of some evil thing,
 And so rode slowly past the windy wheat
 And past the vineyard and the water-spring,

Up to the Horsel A great elder-tree 305
 Held back its heaps of flowers to let me see
 The ripe tall grass, and one that walked
 therein,
 Naked, with hair shed over to the knee.

She walked between the blossom and the grass,
 I knew the beauty of her, what she was, 310
 The beauty of her body and her sin,
 And in my flesh the sin of hers, alas!

Alas! for sorrow is all the end of this.
 O sad kissed mouth, how sorrowful it is!
 O breast whereat some suckling sorrow
 clings, 315
 Red with the bitter blossom of a kiss!

Ah, with blind lips I felt for you, and found
 About my neck your hands and hair enwound,
 The hands that stifle and the hair that stings, 319
 I felt them fasten sharply without sound.

Yea, for my sin I had great store of bliss;
 Rise up, make answer for me, let thy kiss
 Seal my lips hard from speaking of my sin,
 Lest one go mad to hear how sweet it is.

Yet I waxed faint with fume of barren bowers,
 And murmuring of the heavy-headed hours,
 And let the dove's beak fret and peck within My lips in vain, and Love shed fruitless
 flowers.

So that God looked upon me when your hands
 Were hot about me; yea, God brake my bands
 To save my soul alive, and I came forth 331
 Like a man blind and naked in strange lands

That hears men laugh and weep, and knows not whence
 Nor wherefore, but is broken in his sense,
 Howbeit I met folk riding from the north Toward Rome, to purge them of their souls' offense. 336

And rode with them, and spake to none, the
 day
 Stunned me like lights upon some wizard way,
 And ate like fire mine eyes and mine eye-
 sight; 339
 So rode I, hearing all these chant and pray,

And marveled, till before us rose and fell
 White curséd hills, like outer skirts of hell

Seen where men's eyes look through the day to night,
 Like a jagged shell's lips, harsh, untunable,

Blown in between by devils' wrangling
 breath; 345
 Nathless we won well past that hell and death, Down to the sweet land where all airs are
 good,
 Even unto Rome where God's grace tarrieth.

Then came each man and worshiped at his knees
 Who in the Lord God's likeness bears the keys
 To bind or loose, and called on Christ's shed
 blood, 351
 And so the sweet-souled father gave him ease

But when I came I fell down at his feet, Saying, "Father, though the Lord's blood be right sweet, 354
 The spot it takes not off the panther's skin,
 Nor shall an Ethiop's stain be bleached with it.

"Lo, I have sinned and have spat out at God,
 Wherefore his hand is heavier and his rod
 More sharp because of mine exceeding sin,
 And all his raiment redder than bright blood

"Before mine eyes, yea, for my sake I wot 361
 The heat of hell is waxen seven times hot Through my great sin." Then spake he some sweet word,
 Giving me cheer, which thing availed me not;

Yea, scarce I wist if such indeed were said, 365
 For when I ceased — lo, as one newly dead
 Who hears a great cry out of hell, I heard
 The crying of his voice across my head.

"Until this dry shred staff, that hath no whit
 Of leaf nor bark, bear blossom and smell
 sweet, 370
 Seek thou not any mercy in God's sight,
 For so long shalt thou be cast out from it."

Yea, what if dried-up stems wax red and
 green,
 Shall that thing be which is not nor has been?
 Yea, what if sapless bark wax green and
 white, 375
 Shall any good fruit grow upon my sin?

Nay, though sweet fruit were plucked of a dry tree,

352 sweet-souled father, Pope Urban IV (1261-64), according to the legend 355-356 spot with it From Jeremiah, 13 23 — "Can the Ethiopian change his skin, or the leopard his spots?"

And though men drew sweet waters of the
 sea,
 There should not grow sweet leaves on this dead stem, 379
 This waste wan body and shaken soul of me

Yea, though God search it warily enough,
 There is not one sound thing in all thereof,
 Though he search all my veins through,
 searching them
 He shall find nothing whole therein but love.

For I came home right heavy, with small cheer, 385
 And, lo, my love, mine own soul's heart, more
 dear
 Than mine own soul, more beautiful than
 God,
 Who hath my being between the hands of
 her —

Fair still, but fair for no man saving me,
 As when she came out of the naked sea 390
 Making the foam as fire whereon she trod,
 And as the inner flower of fire was she.

Yea, she laid hold upon me, and her mouth
 Clove unto mine as soul to body doth,
 And, laughing, made her lips luxurious; 395
 Her hair had smells of all the sunburnt south,

Strange spice and flower, strange savor of crushed fruit,
 And perfume the swart kings tread underfoot
 For pleasure when their minds wax amorous,
 Charred frankincense and grated sandal-root.

And I forgot fear and all weary things, 401
 All ended prayers and perished thanksgivings,
 Feeling her face with all her eager hair
 Cleave to me, clinging as a fire that clings

To the body and to the raiment, burning
 them; 405
 As after death I know that such-like flame
 Shall cleave to me forever; yea, what care,
 Albeit I burn then, having felt the same?

Ah, love, there is no better life than this; 409
 To have known love, how bitter a thing it is,
 And afterward be cast out of God's sight, Yea, these that know not, shall they have such
 bliss

High up in barren heaven before his face
 As we twain in the heavy-hearted place,

390 when she . . . sea According to tradition Aphrodite (Venus) sprang from the foam of the sea

Remembering love and all the dead de-
 light, 415
 And all that time was sweet with for a space?

For till the thunder in the trumpet be,
 Soul may divide from body, but not we
 One from another, I hold thee with my
 hand,
 I let mine eyes have all their will of thee, 420

I seal myself upon thee with my might,
 Abiding alway out of all men's sight
 Until God loosen over sea and land
 The thunder of the trumpets of the night.
 (1866)

THE TRIUMPH OF TIME

Before our lives divide forever,
 While time is with us and hands are free
 (Time, swift to fasten and swift to sever Hand from hand, as we stand by the sea),
 I will say no word that a man might say 5
 Whose whole life's love goes down in a day,
 For this could never have been, and never — Though the gods and the years relent — shall be.

Is it worth a tear, is it worth an hour,
 To think of things that are well outworn?
 Of fruitless husk and fugitive flower, 11
 The dream foregone and the deed forborne?
 Though joy be done with and grief be vain,
 Time shall not sever us wholly in twain;
 Earth is not spoilt for a single shower; 15
 But the rain has ruined the ungrown corn.

It will grow not again, this fruit of my heart,
 Smitten with sunbeams, ruined with rain
 The singing seasons divide and depart,
 Winter and summer depart in twain. 20
 It will grow not again, it is ruined at root,
 The bloodlike blossom, the dull red fruit;
 Though the heart yet sickens, the lips yet
 smart,
 With sullen savor of poisonous pain.

I have given no man of my fruit to eat; 25
 I trod the grapes, I have drunken the wine
 Had you eaten and drunken and found it
 sweet,

This wild new growth of the corn and vine,
 This wine and bread without lees or leaven,
 We had grown as gods, as the gods in heaven,

417 thunder in the trumpet, the sound of the trumpet on the Day of Judgment.

The Triumph of Time This poem was written soon after Swinburne's rejection by a young girl whom he ardently loved

16 corn, grain, wheat.

Souls fair to look upon, goodly to greet, 31
One splendid spirit, your soul and mine.

In the change of years, in the coil of things,
In the clamor and rumor of life to be,
We, drinking love at the furthest springs, 35
Covered with love as a covering tree,
We had grown as gods, as the gods above,
Filled from the heart to the lips with love,
Held fast in his hands, clothed warm with his
wings,
O love, my love, had you loved but me! 40

We had stood as the sure stars stand, and
moved
As the moon moves, loving the world, and seen

Grief collapse as a thing disproved,
Death consume as a thing unclean;
Twain halves of a perfect heart, made fast 45
Soul to soul while the years fell past —
Had you loved me once, as you have not
loved,
Had the chance been with us that has not
been.

I have put my days and dreams out of mind,
Days that are over, dreams that are done
Though we seek life through, we shall surely
find 51

There is none of them clear to us now, not
one
But clear are these things, the grass and the
sand,
Where, sure as the eyes reach, ever at hand,
With lips wide open and face burnt blind, 55
The strong sea-daisies feast on the sun.

The low downs lean to the sea, the stream,
One loose thin pulseless tremulous vein,
Rapid and vivid and dumb as a dream,
Works downward, sick of the sun and the
rain; 60

No wind is rough with the rank rare flowers;
The sweet sea, mother of loves and hours,
Shudders and shines as the gray winds gleam,
Turning her smile to a fugitive pain.

Mother of loves that are swift to fade, 65
Mother of mutable winds and hours;
A barren mother, a mother-maid,
Cold and clean as her faint salt flowers —
I would we twain were even as she,
Lost in the night and the light of the sea, 70
Where faint sounds falter and wan beams
wade,
Break, and are broken, and shed into showers

65 Mother of loves, the sea

The loves and hours of the life of a man,
They are swift and sad, being born of the
sea:

Hours that rejoice and regret for a span, 75
Born with a man's breath, mortal as he;
Loves that are lost ere they come to birth,
Weeds of the wave, without fruit upon earth.
I lose what I long for, save what I can,
My love, my love, and no love for me! 80

It is not much that a man can save
On the sands of life, in the straits of time,
Who swims in sight of the great third wave
That never a swimmer shall cross or climb
Some waif washed up with the strays and spars 85
That ebb-tide shows to the shore and the stars;
Weed from the water, grass from a grave,
A broken blossom, a ruined rime.

There will no man do for your sake, I think,
What I would have done for the least word
said. 90

I had wrung life dry for your lips to drink,
Broken it up for your daily bread;
Body for body and blood for blood,
As the flow of the full sea risen to flood
That yearns and trembles before it sink, 95
I had given, and lain down for you, glad and dead.

Yea, hope at highest and all her fruit,
And time at fullest and all his dower,
I had given you surely, and life to boot,
Were we once made one for a single
hour 100
But now, you are twain, you are cloven apart,
Flesh of his flesh, but heart of my heart;
And deep in one is the bitter root,
And sweet for one is the lifelong flower.

To have died if you cared I should die for you, clung 105
To my life if you bade me, played my part
As it pleased you — these were the thoughts that stung,

The dreams that smote with a keener dart
Than shafts of love or arrows of death;
These were but as fire is, dust, or breath, 110
Or poisonous foam on the tender tongue
Of the little snakes that eat my heart.

I wish we were dead together today,
Lost sight of, hidden away out of sight,
Clasped and clothed in the cloven clay, 115
Out of the world's way, out of the light,
Out of the ages of worldly weather,

83 the great third wave, a reference to the belief that each third wave is bigger than the two preceding

Forgotten of all men altogether,
As the world's first dead, taken wholly away,
Made one with death, filled full of the
night. 120

How we should slumber, how we should sleep,
Far in the dark with the dreams and the dews!

And dreaming, grow to each other, and weep,
Laugh low, live softly, murmur and muse,
Yea, and it may be, struck through by the
dream, 125

Feel the dust quicken and quiver, and seem Alive as of old to the lips, and leap
Spirit to spirit as lovers use.

Sick dreams and sad of a dull delight;
For what shall it profit when men are dead
To have dreamed, to have loved with the whole soul's might, 131

To have looked for day when the day was
fled?

Let come what will, there is one thing worth:
To have had fair love in the life upon earth,
To have held love safe till the day grew night,
While skies had color and lips were red. 136

Would I lose you now? would I take you then,
If I lose you now that my heart has need?
And come what may after death to men,
What thing worth this will the dead years breed? 140

Lose life, lose all, but at least I know,
O sweet life's love, having loved you so,
Had I reached you on earth, I should lose not
again,

In death nor life, nor in dream or deed.

Yea, I know this well: were you once sealed
mine, 145

Mine in the blood's beat, mine in the breath,
Mixed into me as honey in wine,

Not time, that sayeth and gainsayeth,
Nor all strong things had severed us then;
Not wrath of gods, nor wisdom of men, 150
Nor all things earthly, nor all divine,

Nor joy nor sorrow, nor life nor death.

I had grown pure as the dawn and the dew;
You had grown strong as the sun or the sea.
But none shall triumph a whole life through;
For death is one, and the fates are three. 156
At the door of life, by the gate of breath,
There are worse things waiting for men than
death;

Death could not sever my soul and you,
As these have severed your soul from me.

156 fates are three, Clotho, who spins the thread of life, Lachesis, who determines its length, and Atropos, who cuts it off

You have chosen and clung to the chance they sent you, 161

Life sweet as perfume and pure as prayer
But will it not one day in heaven repent you?
Will they solace you wholly, the days that
were?

Will you lift up your eyes between sadness and bliss, 165

Meet mine, and see where the great love is,
And tremble and turn and be changed? Content you;

The gate is strait; I shall not be there.

But you, had you chosen, had you stretched
hand,

Had you seen good such a thing were done,
I too might have stood with the souls that
stand 171

In the sun's sight, clothed with the light of the sun;

But who now on earth need care how I live?
Have the high gods anything left to give,
Save dust and laurels and gold and sand? 175
Which gifts are goodly, but I will none.

O all fair lovers about the world,
There is none of you, none, that shall comfort me.

My thoughts are as dead things, wrecked and whirled

Round and round in a gulf of the sea; 180
And still, through the sound and the straining
stream,

Through the coil and chafe, they gleam in a
dream,

The bright fine lips so cruelly curled,
And strange swift eyes where the soul sits
free.

Free, without pity, withheld from woe, 185
Ignorant, fair as the eyes are fair.

Would I have you change now, change at a
blow,

Startled and stricken, awake and aware?
Yea, if I could, would I have you see

My very love of you filling me, 190
And know my soul to the quick, as I know

The likeness and look of your throat and
hair?

I shall not change you. Nay, though I might,
Would I change my sweet one love with a word?

I had rather your hair should change in a
night, 195

Clear now as the plume of a black bright bird;

Your face fail suddenly, cease, turn gray,
Die as a leaf that dies in a day.

I will keep my soul in a place out of sight,
Far off, where the pulse of it is not heard

Far off it walks, in a bleak blown space, 201
 Full of the sound of the sorrow of years.
 I have woven a veil for the weeping face,
 Whose lips have drunken the wine of tears;
 I have found a way for the failing feet, 205
 A place for slumber and sorrow to meet;
 There is no rumor about the place,
 Nor light, nor any that sees or hears.

I have hidden my soul out of sight and said,
 "Let none take pity upon thee, none 210
 Comfort thy crying, for, lo, thou art dead;
 Lie still now, safe out of sight of the sun.
 Have I not built thee a grave, and wrought
 Thy grave-clothes on thee of grievous thought,
 With soft spun verses and tears unshed, 215
 And sweet light visions of things undone?"

"I have given thee garments and balm and myrrh,
 And gold, and beautiful burial things
 But thou, be at peace now, make no stir,
 Is not thy grave as a royal king's? 220
 Fret not thyself though the end were sore;
 Sleep, be patient, vex me no more
 Sleep; what hast thou to do with her?
 The eyes that weep, with the mouth that sings?"

Where the dead red leaves of the years lie
 rotten, 225
 The cold old crimes and the deeds thrown
 by,
 The misconceived and the misbegotten,
 I would find a sin to do ere I die,
 Sure to dissolve and destroy me all through,
 That would set you higher in heaven, serve
 you 230
 And leave you happy, when clean forgotten,
 As a dead man out of mind, am I.

Your lithe hands draw me, your face burns
 through me,
 I am swift to follow you, keen to see;
 But love lacks might to redeem or undo me;
 As I have been, I know I shall surely be, 236
 "What should such fellows as I do?" Nay,
 My part were worse if I chose to play,
 For the worst is this, after all — if they knew
 me,
 Not a soul upon earth would pity me. 240

And I play not for pity of these, but you,
 If you saw with your soul what man am I,
 You would praise me at least that my soul all
 through
 Clove to you, loathing the lives that lie;
 The souls and lips that are bought and sold,
 The smiles of silver and kisses of gold, 246

The lapdog loves that whine as they chew,
 The little lovers that curse and cry.

There are fairer women, I hear; that may be;
 But I, that I love you and find you fair, 250
 Who are more than fair in my eyes if they be,
 Do the high gods know or the great gods
 care?
 Though the swords in my heart for one were seven,
 Should the iron hollow of doubtful heaven,
 That knows not itself whether night-time or day be, 255
 Reverberate words and a foolish prayer?

I will go back to the great sweet mother,
 Mother and lover of men, the sea.
 I will go down to her, I and none other,
 Close with her, kiss her, and mix her with
 me; 260
 Cling to her, strive with her, hold her fast.
 O fair white mother, in days long past
 Born without sister, born without brother,
 Set free my soul as thy soul is free.

O fair green-girdled mother of mine, 265
 Sea, that art clothed with the sun and the
 rain,
 Thy sweet hard kisses are strong like wine,
 Thy large embraces are keen like pain.
 Save me and hide me with all thy waves,
 Find me one grave of thy thousand graves, 270
 Those pure cold populous graves of thine Wrought without hand in a world without stain.

I shall sleep, and move with the moving ships, Change as the winds change, veer in the tide,
 My lips will feast on the foam of thy lips, 275
 I shall rise with thy rising, with thee subside;
 Sleep, and not know if she be, if she were,
 Filled full with life to the eyes and hair,
 As a rose is fulfilled to the roseleaf tips
 With splendid summer and perfume and
 pride. 280

This woven raiment of nights and days,
 Were it once cast off and unwound from me,
 Naked and glad would I walk in thy ways,
 Alive and aware of thy ways and thee,
 Clear of the whole world, hidden at home, 285
 Clothed with the green and crowned with the foam,
 A pulse of the life of thy straits and bays,
 A vein in the heart of the streams of the
 sea.

253 words . seven, a reference to the Seven Sorrows of Mary (see note on Browning's Up at a Villa—Down in the City, 52, page 222)

Fair mother, fed with the lives of men, 289
 Thou art subtle and cruel of heart, men say
 Thou hast taken, and shalt not render again,
 Thou art full of thy dead, and cold as they
 But death is the worst that comes of thee;
 Thou art fed with our dead, O mother, O sea,
 But when hast thou fed on our hearts? or when, 295
 Having given us love, hast thou taken
 away?

O tender-hearted, O perfect lover,
 Thy lips are bitter, and sweet thine heart
 The hopes that hurt and the dreams that hover,
 Shall they not vanish away and apart? 300
 But thou, thou art sure, thou art older than
 earth,
 Thou art strong for death and fruitful of
 birth,
 Thy depths conceal and thy gulfs discover,
 From the first thou wert, in the end thou
 art. 304

And grief shall endure not forever, I know
 As things that are not shall these things be,
 We shall live through seasons of sun and of
 snow,
 And none be grievous as this to me
 We shall hear, as one in a trance that hears,
 The sound of time, the rime of the years; 310
 Wrecked hope and passionate pain will grow
 As tender things of a springtide sea,

Sea-fruit that swings in the waves that hiss,
 Drowned gold and purple and royal rings
 And all time past, was it all for this? 315
 Times unforgotten, and treasures of things?
 Swift years of liking, and sweet long laughter,
 That wist not well of the years thereafter
 Till love woke, smitten at heart by a kiss,
 With lips that trembled and trailing wings?

There lived a singer in France of old 321
 By the tideless dolorous midland sea.
 In a land of sand and ruin and gold
 There shone one woman, and none but she
 And finding life for her love's sake fail, 325
 Being fain to see her, he bade set sail,
 Touched land, and saw her as life grew cold,
 And praised God, seeing; and so died he —

Died, praising God for his gift and grace;
 For she bowed down to him weeping, and
 said 330
 "Live"; and her tears were shed on his face
 Or ever the life in his face was shed.

321 singer. . . old, a reference to the story of the love of Geoffrey Rudel, a Provençal poet of the 12th century, for the Countess of Tripoli (see Browning's Rudel to the Lady of Tripoli, page 191, and Critical Note)

The sharp tears fell through her hair, and stung
 Once, and her close lips touched him and clung 334
 Once, and grew one with his lips for a space,
 And so drew back, and the man was dead.

O brother, the gods were good to you.
 Sleep, and be glad while the world endures
 Be well content as the years wear through;
 Give thanks for life, and the loves and lures,
 Give thanks for life, O brother, and death, 341
 For the sweet last sound of her feet, her
 breath,
 For gifts she gave you, gracious and few,
 Tears and kisses, that lady of yours.

Rest and be glad of the gods, but I, 345
 How shall I praise them, or how take rest?
 There is not room under all the sky
 For me that know not of worst or best,
 Dream or desire of the days before,
 Sweet things or bitterness, any more 350
 Love will not come to me now though I
 die,
 As love came close to you, breast to breast

I shall never be friends again with roses;
 I shall loathe the sweet tunes, where a note grown strong 354
 Relents and recoils, and climbs and closes,
 As a wave of the sea turned back by song
 There are sounds where the soul's delight takes fire,
 Face to face with its own desire;
 A delight that rebels, a desire that reposes,
 I shall hate sweet music my whole life long

The pulse of war and passion of wonder, 361
 The heavens that murmur, the sounds that
 shine,
 The stars that sing and the loves that thunder,
 The music burning at heart like wine,
 An armed archangel whose hands raise up 365
 All senses mixed in the spirit's cup
 Till flesh and spirit are molten in sunder —
 These things are over, and no more mine.

These were a part of the playing I heard Once, ere my love and my heart were at
 strife; 370
 Love that sings and hath wings as a bird,
 Balm of the wound and heft of the knife
 Fairer than earth is the sea, and sleep
 Than overwatching of eyes that weep,
 Now time has done with his one sweet word,
 The wine and leaven of lovely life. 376

363 stars that sing, a reference to the ancient belief that the stars made music as they revolved in their spheres

I shall go my ways, tread out my measure,
 Fill the days of my daily breath
 With fugitive things not good to treasure,
 Do as the world doth, say as it saith; 380
 But if we had loved each other — O sweet,
 Had you felt, lying under the palms of your
 feet,
 The heart of my heart, beating harder with pleasure
 To feel you tread it to dust and death —
 Ah, had I not taken my life up and given 385
 All that life gives and the years let go,
 The wine and honey, the balm and leaven,
 The dreams reared high and the hopes brought low?
 Come life, come death, not a word be said,
 Should I lose you living, and vex you
 dead? 390
 I never shall tell you on earth; and in heaven,
 If I cry to you then, will you hear or know?
 (1866)

A LEAVE-TAKING

Let us go hence, my songs, she will not hear.
 Let us go hence together without fear;
 Keep silence now, for singing-time is over,
 And over all old things and all things dear.
 She loves not you nor me as all we love her.
 Yea, though we sang as angels in her ear, 6
 She would not hear.

Let us rise up and part; she will not know.
 Let us go seaward as the great winds go,
 Full of blown sand and foam; what help is
 here? 10
 There is no help, for all these things are so,
 And all the world is bitter as a tear.
 And how these things are, though ye strove
 to show,
 She would not know. 14

Let us go home and hence; she will not weep.
 We gave love many dreams and days to keep,
 Flowers without scent, and fruits that would not grow, Saying, "If thou wilt, thrust in thy sickle and reap"
 All is reaped now; no grass is left to mow, 19
 And we that sowed, though all we fell on sleep,
 She would not weep.

Let us go hence and rest, she will not love.
 She shall not hear us if we sing hereof,
 Nor see love's ways, how sore they are and
 steep.
 Come hence, let be, lie still; it is enough 25
 Love is a barren sea, bitter and deep;
 And though she saw all heaven in flower
 above,
 She would not love.

Let us give up, go down, she will not care.
 Though all the stars made gold of all the air,
 And the sea moving saw before it move 31
 One moon-flower making all the foam-flowers
 fair;
 Though all those waves went over us, and drove
 Deep down the stifling lips and drowning hair,
 She would not care. 35

Let us go hence, go hence; she will not see.
 Sing all once more together; surely she,
 She too, remembering days and words that
 were,
 Will turn a little toward us, sighing, but we,
 We are hence, we are gone, as though we had not been there. 40
 Nay, and though all men seeing had pity on
 me,
 She would not see. (1866)

ITYLUS

Swallow, my sister, O sister swallow,
 How can thine heart be full of the spring?
 A thousand summers are over and dead
 What hast thou found in the spring to follow?
 What hast thou found in thine heart to
 sing? 5
 What wilt thou do when the summer is
 shed?

O swallow, sister, O fair swift swallow,
 Why wilt thou fly after spring to the south,
 The soft south whither thine heart is set?
 Shall not the grief of the old time follow? 10
 Shall not the song thereof cleave to thy mouth?
 Hast thou forgotten ere I forget?

Sister, my sister, O fleet sweet swallow,
 Thy way is long to the sun and the south;
 But I, fulfilled of my heart's desire, 15
 Shedding my song upon height, upon hollow,
 From tawny body and sweet small mouth
 Feed the heart of the night with fire.

I the nightingale all spring through,
 O swallow, sister, O changing swallow, 20
 All spring through till the spring be done,
 Clothed with the light of the night on the dew,
 Sing, while the hours and the wild birds
 follow,
 Take flight and follow and find the sun

Sister, my sister, O soft light swallow, 25
 Though all things feast in the spring's guest-
 chamber,

How hast thou heart to be glad thereof
yet?

For where thou fliest I shall not follow,
Till life forget and death remember,
Till thou remember and I forget. 30

Swallow, my sister, O singing swallow,
I know not how thou hast heart to sing
Hast thou the heart? is it all past over?
Thy lord the summer is good to follow,
And fair the feet of thy lover the spring, 35
But what wilt thou say to the spring, thy lover?

O swallow, sister, O fleeting swallow,
My heart in me is a molten ember,
And over my head the waves have met
But thou wouldst tarry or I would follow, 40
Could I forget or thou remember,
Couldst thou remember and I forget.

O sweet stray sister, O shifting swallow,
The heart's division divideth us.
Thy heart is light as a leaf of a tree; 45
But mine goes forth among sea-gulfs hollow
To the place of the slaying of Itylus,
The feast of Daulis, the Thracian sea.

O swallow, sister, O rapid swallow,
I pray thee sing not a little space. 50
Are not the roofs and the lintels wet?
The woven web that was plain to follow,
The small slain body, the flowerlike face,
Can I remember if thou forget?

O sister, sister, thy first-begotten! 55
The hands that cling and the feet that
follow,

The voice of the child's blood crying yet
Who hath remembered me? who hath forgotten?

Thou hast forgotten, O summer swallow,
But the world shall end when I forget 60

HYMN TO PROSERPINE

(AFTER THE PROCLAMATION IN ROME OF THE CHRISTIAN FAITH)

Vicisti, Galilæe

I have lived long enough, having seen one thing, that love hath an end, Goddess and maiden and queen, be near me
now and befriend.

48 feast of Daulis, the feast in the city of Daulis, in Phocis, Greece, at which Tereus, king of Thrace, ate the flesh of his son Itylus

Hymn to Proserpine Proserpine was the goddess and queen of the lower world. As a maiden (line 2) she was carried off from Sicily by Pluto, god of the lower world, and became his wife. The Proclamation of Christian faith may be identified with the Edict of Milan promulgated by the Roman emperors Constantine and Licinius in 313. It

Thou art more than the day or the morrow,
the seasons that laugh or that weep;
For these give joy and sorrow; but thou,
Proserpina, sleep

Sweet is the treading of wine, and sweet the feet of the dove; 5

But a goodlier gift is thine than foam of the grapes or love

Yea, is not even Apollo, with hair and harp-string of gold,

A bitter god to follow, a beautiful god to behold?

I am sick of singing; the bays burn deep and chafe. I am fain

To rest a little from praise and grievous pleasure and pain 10

For the gods we know not of, who give us our daily breath,

We know they are cruel as love or life, and lovely as death.

O gods dethroned and deceased, cast forth,
wiped out in a day!

From your wrath is the world released, redeemed from your chains, men say

New gods are crowned in the city, their flowers have broken your rods; 15

They are merciful, clothed with pity, the young compassionate gods

But for me their new device is barren, the days are bare;

Things long past over suffice, and men forgotten that were.

Time and the gods are at strife; ye dwell in the midst thereof,

Draining a little life from the barren breasts
of love. 20

I say to you, cease, take rest; yea, I say to you
all, be at peace,

Till the bitter milk of her breast and the barren bosom shall cease.

Wilt thou yet take all, Galilean? But these thou shalt not take—

The laurel, the palms, and the pæan, the breasts of the nymphs in the brake,

Breasts more soft than a dove's, that tremble with tenderer breath; 25

recognized Christianity and restored to Christians their civil and religious rights

Vicisti, Galilæe, Thou hast conquered, Galilean (line 35) These words were attributed by early Christian writers to the Roman emperor, Julian (331-63), who had renounced Christianity but who is said to have died with this confession on his lips

The poem, represented as spoken by a noble pagan who regrets the overthrow of the Greek deities, presents an essential part of Swinburne's philosophy of life. Swinburne characterized this poem and the Hymn of Man (page 699) as "the deathsong of spiritual decadence and the birthsong of spiritual renaissance"

5 Sweet . . . dove. The dove was sacred to Venus 7 Apollo, the god of the sun, of poetry, and of youth and manly beauty. His attributes were the bow and the lyre 9 bays, the poet's crown of laurel. 24 laurel, palms. These were sacred to the gods

And all the wings of the Loves, and all the joy before death;
All the feet of the hours that sound as a single lyre,
Dropped and deep in the flowers, with strings
that flicker like fire.
More than these wilt thou give, things fairer than all these things?
Nay, for a little we live, and life hath mutable
wings. 30
A little while and we die; shall life not thrive as it may?

For no man under the sky lives twice, out-living his day.
And grief is a grievous thing, and a man hath enough of his tears;
Why should he labor, and bring fresh grief to blacken his years?

Thou hast conquered, O pale Galilean; the world has grown gray from thy breath; 35
We have drunken of things Lethean, and fed on the fullness of death.

Laurel is green for a season, and love is sweet for a day;

But love grows bitter with treason, and laurel outlives not May.

Sleep, shall we sleep after all? for the world is not sweet in the end;

For the old faiths loosen and fall, the new years ruin and rend. 40

Fate is a sea without shore, and the soul is a rock that abides;

But her ears are vexed with the roar and her face with the foam of the tides.

O lips that the live blood faints in, the leavings of racks and rods!

O ghastly glories of saints, dead limbs of gibbeted gods!

Though all men abase them before you in spirit, and all knees bend, 45

I kneel not, neither adore you, but standing,
look to the end.

All delicate days and pleasant, all spirits and sorrows are cast

Far out with the foam of the present that sweeps to the surf of the past,

Where beyond the extreme sea-wall, and between the remote sea-gates,

Waste water washes, and tall ships founder,
and deep death waits; 50

Where, mighty with deepening sides, clad about with the seas as with wings,

And impelled of invisible tides, and fulfilled
of unspeakable things,

White-eyed and poisonous-finned, sharktoothed and serpentine-curved,
Rolls, under the whitening wind of the future,
the wave of the world.

The depths stand naked in sunder behind it,
the storms flee away, 55

In the hollow before it the thunder is taken and snared as a prey,

In its sides is the north-wind bound; and its salt is of all men's tears,

With light of ruin, and sound of changes, and pulse of years;

With travail of day after day, and with trouble of hour upon hour.

And bitter as blood is the spray; and the crests are as fangs that devour; 60

And its vapor and storm of its steam as the sighing of spirits to be;

And its noise as the noise in a dream; and its depths as the roots of the sea;

And the height of its heads as the height of the utmost stars of the air;

And the ends of the earth at the might thereof tremble, and time is made bare

Will ye bridle the deep sea with reins, will ye chasten the high sea with rods? 65

Will ye take her to cham her with chains, who is older than all ye gods?

All ye as a wind shall go by, as a fire shall ye pass and be past;

Ye are gods, and behold, ye shall die, and the waves be upon you at last.

In the darkness of time, in the deeps of the years, in the changes of things,

Ye shall sleep as a slain man sleeps, and the world shall forget you for kings 70

Though the feet of thine high priests tread
where thy lords and our forefathers trod,

Though these that were gods are dead, and thou being dead art a god,

Though before thee the throned Cytherean be fallen, and hidden her head,

Yet thy kingdom shall pass, Galilean, thy dead shall go down to thee dead.

Of the maiden thy mother men sing as a goddess with grace clad around; 75

Thou are throned where another was king, where another was queen she is crowned

Yea, once we had sight of another, but now
she is queen, say these

Not as thine, not as thine was our mother, a blossom of flowering seas,

Clothed round with the world's desire as with raiment, and fair as the foam,

And fleetier than kindled fire, and a goddess,
and mother of Rome. 80

36 Lethean, causing forgetfulness. Lethe was the river of forgetfulness in Hades. 43 racks and rods, a reference to the early persecution of the Christians and to their self-inflicted torture as a means of penance. 44 ghastly . . . gods, a reference to the worship of saints' relics

73 Cytherean, Aphrodite, who, according to tradition, rose from the foam of the sea and landed at Cythera, an island southeast of Greece. See lines 85-87. 80. mother of Rome, Aphrodite

For thine came pale and a maiden, and sister to sorrow, but ours,
Her deep hair heavily laden with odor and color of flowers,
White rose of the rose-white water, a silver splendor, a flame,
Bent down unto us that besought her, and earth grew sweet with her name
For thine came weeping, a slave among slaves, and rejected, but she 85
Came flushed from the full-flushed wave, and imperial, her foot on the sea.
And the wonderful waters knew her, the winds and the viewless ways,
And the roses grew rosier, and bluer the sea-
blue stream of the bays.

Ye are fallen, our lords, by what token? we wist that ye should not fall.

Ye were all so fair that are broken; and one more fair than ye all. 90

But I turn to her still, having seen she shall surely abide in the end;

Goddess and maiden and queen, be near me
now and befriend

O daughter of earth, of my mother, her crown
and blossom of birth,

I am also, I also, thy brother; I go as I came unto earth.

In the night where thine eyes are as moons are in heaven, the night where thou art, 95

Where the silence is more than all tunes, where sleep overflows from the heart,

Where the poppies are sweet as the rose in our world, and the red rose is white,

And the wind falls faint as it blows with the fume of the flowers of the night,

And the murmur of spirits that sleep in the shadow of gods from afar

Grows dim in thine ears and deep as the deep dim soul of a star, 100

In the sweet low light of thy face, under heavens untrod by the sun,

Let my soul with their souls find place, and forget what is done and undone.

Thou art more than the gods who number the days of our temporal breath;

For these give labor and slumber; but thou,
Proserpina, death.

Therefore now at thy feet I abide for a season
in silence I know 105

I shall die as my fathers died, and sleep as they sleep, even so

For the glass of the years is brittle wherein we gaze for a span.

A little soul for a little bears up this corpse which is man.

91 her, Proserpine 97 poppies, flowers of oblivion, sacred to Proserpine 108 A little soul, etc. Swinburne refers in a note to a line from Epictetus, a Greek Stoic philosopher of the 1st century A. D. — "Thou art a little soul bearing up a corpse"

So long I endure, no longer; and laugh not again, neither weep.

For there is no god found stronger than death,
and death is a sleep. 110

(1866)

ILICET

There is an end of joy and sorrow;
Peace all day long, all night, all morrow,

But never a time to laugh or weep.

The end is come of pleasant places,

The end of tender words and faces, 5

The end of all, the popped sleep.

No place for sound within their hearing,

No room to hope, no time for fearing,

No lips to laugh, no lids for tears.

The old years have run out all their measure, 10

No chance of pain, no chance of pleasure,

No fragment of the broken years.

Outside of all the worlds and ages,

There where the fool is as the sage is,

There where the slayer is clean of blood, 15

No end, no passage, no beginning,

There where the sinner leaves off sinning,

There where the good man is not good

There is not one thing with another,

But Evil saith to Good: My brother, 20

My brother, I am one with thee

They shall not strive nor cry forever,

No man shall chose between them, never Shall this thing end and that thing be

Wind wherein seas and stars are shaken 25

Shall shake them, and they shall not waken,

None that has lain down shall arise;

The stones are sealed across their places,

One shadow is shed on all their faces,

One blindness cast on all their eyes. 30

Sleep, is it sleep perchance that covers

Each face, as each face were his lover's?

Farewell, as men that sleep fare well

The grave's mouth laughs unto derision

Desire and dread and dream and vision, 35

Delight of heaven and sorrow of hell.

No soul shall tell nor lip shall number

The names and tribes of you that slumber;

No memory, no memorial.

"Thou knowest"—who shall say thou knowest?

There is none highest and none lowest; 41

An end, an end, an end of all

Good night, good sleep, good rest from sorrow

To these that shall not have good morrow;

Ilcet The title means It Is Not Permitted—that is, one is not permitted to know what follows death

6 the popped sleep. The poppy was the flower of oblivion, it was sacred to Proserpine, queen of Hades

The gods be gentle to all these. 45
 May, if death be not, how shall they be?
 Nay, is there help in heaven? it may be
 All things and lords of things shall cease

The stooped urn, filling, dips and flashes,
 The bronzed brims are deep in ashes, 50
 The pale old lips of death are fed
 Shall this dust gather flesh hereafter?
 Shall one shed tears or fall to laughter,
 At sight of all these poor old dead?

Nay, as thou wilt, these know not of it; 55
 Thine eyes' strong weeping shall not profit,
 Thy laughter shall not give thee ease,
 Cry aloud, spare not, cease not crying,
 Sigh, till thou cleave thy sides with sighing,
 Thou shalt not raise up one of these 60

Burnt spices flash, and burnt wine hisses,
 The breathing flame's mouth curls and kisses
 The small dried rows of frankincense;
 All round the sad red blossoms smolder,
 Flowers colored like the fire, but colder, 65
 In sign of sweet things taken hence;

Yea, for their sake and in death's favor
 Things of sweet shape and of sweet savor
 We yield them, spice and flower and wine,
 Yea, costlier things than wine or spices, 70
 Whereof none knoweth how great the price
 is,
 And fruit that comes not of the vine.

From boy's pierced throat and girl's pierced bosom
 Drips, reddening round the blood-red blossom,
 The slow delicious bright soft blood, 75
 Bathing the spices and the pyre,
 Bathing the flowers and fallen fire,
 Bathing the blossom by the bud.

Roses whose lips the flame has deadened
 Drink till the lapping leaves are reddened 80
 And warm wet inner petals weep;
 The flower whereof sick sleep gets leisure,
 Barren of balm and purple pleasure,
 Fumes with no native steam of sleep.

Why will ye weep? what do ye weeping? 85
 For waking folk and people sleeping,
 And sands that fill and sands that fall,
 The days rose-red, the poppied hours,
 Blood, wine, and spice and fire and flowers,
 There is one end of one and all. 90

Shall such an one lend love or borrow?
 Shall these be sorry for thy sorrow?

Shall these give thanks for words or breath?
 Their hate is as their loving-kindness,
 The frontlet of their brows is blindness, 95
 The armlet of their arms is death.

Lo, for no noise or light of thunder
 Shall these grave-clothes be rent in sunder;
 He that hath taken, shall he give?
 He hath rent them; shall he bind together? 100
 He hath bound them; shall he break the tether?
 He hath slain them, shall he bid them live?

A little sorrow, a little pleasure,
 Fate metes us from the dusty measure
 That holds the date of all of us; 105
 We are born with travail and strong crying,
 And from the birth-day to the dying
 The likeness of our life is thus.

One girds himself to serve another,
 Whose father was the dust, whose mother 110
 The little dead red worm therein;
 They find no fruit of things they cherish;
 The goodness of a man shall perish,
 It shall be one thing with his sin.

In deep wet ways by gray old gardens 115
 Fed with sharp spring the sweet fruit hardens,
 They know not what fruits wane or grow;
 Red summer burns to the utmost ember,
 They know not, neither can remember,
 The old years and flowers they used to
 know. 120

Ah, for their sakes, so trapped and taken,
 For theirs, forgotten and forsaken,
 Watch, sleep not, gird thyself with prayer
 Nay, where the heart of wrath is broken,
 Where long love ends as a thing spoken, 125
 How shall thy crying enter there?

Though the iron sides of the old world falter,
 The likeness of them shall not alter
 For all the rumor of periods,
 The stars and seasons that come after, 130
 The tears of latter men, the laughter
 Of the old unalterable gods

Far up above the years and nations,
 The high gods, clothed and crowned with patience,
 Endure through days of deathlike date, 135
 They bear the witness of things hidden;
 Before their eyes all life stands chidden,
 As they before the eyes of Fate.

Not for their love shall Fate retire,
 Nor they relent for our desire, 140
 Nor the graves open for their call.
 The end is more than joy and anguish,

Than lives that laugh and lives that languish,
The popped sleep, the end of all.

A MATCH

If love were what the rose is,
And I were like the leaf,
Our lives would grow together
In sad or singing weather,
Blown fields or flowerful closes,
Green pleasure or gray grief,
If love were what the rose is,
And I were like the leaf

If I were what the words are,
And love were like the tune,
With double sound and single Delight our lips would mingle,
With kisses glad as birds are
That get sweet rain at noon;
If I were what the words are,
And love were like the tune.

If you were life, my darling,
And I your love were death,
We'd shine and snow together
Ere March made sweet the weather
With daffodil and starling
And hours of fruitful breath,
If you were life, my darling,
And I your love were death

If you were thrall to sorrow,
And I were page to joy,
We'd play for lives and seasons
With loving looks and treasons
And tears of night and morrow
And laughs of maid and boy;
If you were thrall to sorrow,
And I were page to joy.

If you were April's lady,
And I were lord in May,
We'd throw with leaves for hours
And draw for days with flowers,
Till day like night were shady
And night were bright like day:
If you were April's lady,
And I were lord in May.

If you were queen of pleasure,
And I were king of pain,
We'd hunt down love together,
Pluck out his flying-feather,
And teach his feet a measure,
And find his mouth a rein;
If you were queen of pleasure,
And I were king of pain.

A BALLAD OF BURDENS

The burden of fair women Vain delight,
And love self-slain in some sweet shameful
way,
And sorrowful old age that comes by night
As a thief comes that has no heart by
day,
And change that finds fair cheeks and leaves
them gray,
And weariness that keeps awake for hire,
And grief that says what pleasure used to
say;
This is the end of every man's desire.

The burden of bought kisses. This is sore,
A burden without fruit in childebearing,
Between the nightfall and the dawn three-score,
Threescore between the dawn and evening
The shuddering in thy lips, the shudder-
ing
In thy sad eyelids tremulous like fire,
Makes love seem shameful and a wretched
thing
This is the end of every man's desire

The burden of sweet speeches Nay, kneel
down,
Cover thy head, and weep, for verily
These marked-men that buy thy white and brown
In the last days shall take no thought for
thee
In the last days like earth thy face shall be, Yea, like sea-marsh made thick with brine and
mire,
Sad with sick leavings of the sterile sea.
This is the end of every man's desire.

The burden of long living. Thou shalt fear
Waking, and sleeping mourn upon thy bed;
And say at night, "Would God the day were
here,"
And say at dawn, "Would God the day were
dead."
With weary days thou shalt be clothed and
fed,
And wear remorse of heart for thine attire,
Pain for thy girdle and sorrow upon thine
head;
This is the end of every man's desire.

The burden of bright colors. Thou shalt see Gold tarnished, and the gray above the
green;
And as the thing thou seest thy face shall be,
And no more as the thing beforetime seen.

A Ballad of Burdens This poem is arranged in a modified form of the French ballade. See note on A Ballad of Dream-land, page 713.

And thou shalt say of mercy, "It hath
been,"
And living, watch the old lips and loves expire,
And talking, tears shall take thy breath
between;
This is the end of every man's desire. 40

The burden of sad sayings. In that day Thou shalt tell all thy days and hours, and tell Thy times and ways and words of love, and say

How one was dear and one desirable,
And sweet was life to hear and sweet to smell, 45
But now with lights reverse the old hours retire
And the last hour is shod with fire from hell;
This is the end of every man's desire.

The burden of four seasons. Rain in spring,
White rain and wind among the tender
trees; 50

A summer of green sorrows gathering,
Rank autumn in a mist of miseries,
With sad face set toward the year, that sees
The charred ash drop out of the dropping pyre,
And winter wan with many maladies, 55
This is the end of every man's desire.

The burden of dead faces. Out of sight
And out of love, beyond the reach of hands,
Changed in the changing of the dark and light,
They walk and weep about the barren lands
Where no seed is nor any garner stands, 61
Where in short breaths the doubtful days
respire,
And time's turned glass lets through the sighing sands;
This is the end of every man's desire. 64

The burden of much gladness. Life and lust
Forsake thee, and the face of thy delight;
And underfoot the heavy hour strews dust,
And overhead strange weathers burn and bite;
And where the red was, lo, the bloodless
white,
And where truth was, the likeness of a liar, 70
And where day was, the likeness of the
night;
This is the end of every man's desire.

L'ENVOY

Princes, and ye whom pleasure quickeneth, Heed well this rime before your pleasure
tire;

For life is sweet, but after life is death. 75
This is the end of every man's desire

(1866)

RONDEL

Kissing her hair I sat against her feet,
Wove and unwove it, wound and found it
sweet,
Made fast therewith her hands, drew down
her eyes,
Deep as deep flowers and dreamy like dim
skies;
With her own tresses bound and found her
fair, 5

Kissing her hair.

Sleep were no sweeter than her face to me,
Sleep of cold sea-bloom under the cold sea;
What pain could get between my face and hers?
What new sweet thing would love not relish
worse? 10
Unless, perhaps, white death had kissed me
there,

Kissing her hair? (1866)

IN MEMORY OF WALTER SAVAGE
LANDOR

Back to the flower-town, side by side,
The bright months bring,
New-born, the bridegroom and the bride,
Freedom and spring.

The sweet land laughs from sea to sea, 5
Filled full of sun;
All things come back to her, being free;
All things but one.

In many a tender wheaten plot
Flowers that were dead 10
Live, and old suns revive, but not
That holier head.

By this white wandering waste of sea,
Far north, I hear
One face shall never turn to me 15
As once this year;

Shall never smile and turn and rest
On mine as there,
Nor one most sacred hand be prest
Upon my hair. 20

I came as one whose thoughts half linger,
Half run before,

Rondel The rondel is a French lyric form consisting of ten to fourteen lines usually running on two rimes. It contains a refrain taken from the beginning of the first line.

In Memory of Walter Savage Landor. See Critical Notes 1. Flower-town, Florence, where Landor died in September, 1864. 4. Freedom Both Landor and Swinburne were greatly interested in Italy's struggle for freedom from the rule of Austria. In 1865, about the time this poem was written, Florence was chosen as the capital of United Italy. 21. I came, etc. Swinburne had visited Landor at Florence in the spring of 1864.

The youngest to the oldest singer
That England bore

I found him whom I shall not find 25
Till all grief end,
In holiest age our mightiest mind,
Father and friend.

But thou, if anything endure,
If hope there be, 30
O spirit that man's life left pure,
Man's death set free,

Not with disdain of days that were
Look earthward now,
Let dreams revive the reverend hair, 35
The imperial brow,

Come back in sleep, for in the life
Where thou art not
We find none like thee Time and strife
And the world's lot 40

Move thee no more, but love at least
And reverent heart
May move thee, royal and released,
Soul, as thou art.

And thou, his Florence, to thy trust 45
Receive and keep,
Keep safe his dedicated dust,
His sacred sleep.

So shall thy lovers, come from far,
Mix with thy name 50
As morning-star with evening-star
His faultless fame (1866)

DOLORES

NOTRE-DAME DES SEPT DOULEURS

Cold eyelids that hide like a jewel
Hard eyes that grow soft for an hour;
The heavy white limbs, and the cruel
Red mouth like a venomous flower, 5
When these are gone by with their glories, 5
What shall rest of thee then, what remain,
O mystic and somber Dolores,
Our Lady of Pain?

Seven sorrows the priests give their Virgin,
But thy sins, which are seventy times seven,
Seven ages would fail thee to purge in, 11
And then they would haunt thee in heaven:
Fierce midnights and famishing morrows,
And the loves that complete and control
All the joys of the flesh, all the sorrows 15
That wear out the soul.

Dolores See Critical Notes
Subtile Notre-Dame, etc., Our Lady of the Seven Sorrows (See note on Browning's Up at a Villa—Down in the City, 52, page 223)

O garment not golden but gilded,
O garden where all men may dwell,
O tower not of ivory, but builded 20
By hands that reach heaven from hell, 20
O mystical rose of the mire,
O house not of gold but of gain,
O house of unquenchable fire,
Our Lady of Pain!

O lips full of lust and of laughter, 25
Curled snakes that are fed from my breast,
Bite hard, lest remembrance come after
And press with new lips where you pressed
For my heart too springs up at the pressure,
Mine eyelids too moisten and burn; 30
Ah, feed me and fill me with pleasure,
Ere pain come in turn.

In yesterday's reach and tomorrow's,
Out of sight though they lie of today,
There have been and there yet shall be 35
sorrows 35
That smite not and bite not in play.
The life and the love thou despisest,
These hurt us indeed, and in vain,
O wise among women, and wisest, 40
Our Lady of Pain. 40

Who gave thee thy wisdom? what stories
That stung thee, what visions that smote?
Wert thou pure and a maiden, Dolores,
When desire took thee first by the throat?
What bud was the shell of a blossom 45
That all men may smell to and pluck? 45
What milk fed thee first at what bosom?
What sins gave thee suck?

We shift and bedeck and bedrape us,
Thou art noble and nude and antique; 50
Libitina thy mother, Priapus
Thy father, a Tuscan and Greek.
We play with light loves in the portal,
And wince and relent and refrain,
Loves die, and we know thee immortal, 55
Our Lady of Pain.

Fruits fail and love dies and time ranges;
Thou art fed with perpetual breath,
And alive after infinite changes,
And fresh from the kisses of death; 60
Of languors rekindled and rallied,
Of barren delights and unclean,
Things monstrous and fruitless, a pallid
And poisonous queen.

Could you hurt me, sweet lips, though I hurt
you? 65

Men touch them, and change in a trice
The lilies and languors of virtue
For the raptures and roses of vice;
Those lie where thy foot on the floor is,
These crown and caress thee and chain, 70
O splendid and sterile Dolores,
Our Lady of Pain

There are sins it may be to discover,
There are deeds it may be to delight. 74
What new work wilt thou find for thy lover,
What new passions for daytime or night?
What spells that they know not a word of Whose lives are as leaves overblown?
What tortures undreamt of, unheard of,
Unwritten, unknown? 80

Ah, beautiful passionate body
That never has ached with a heart!
On thy mouth though the kisses are bloody,
Though they sting till it shudder and smart,
More kind than the love we adore is, 85
They hurt not the heart or the brain,
O bitter and tender Dolores,
Our Lady of Pain.

As our kisses relax and redouble,
From the lips and the foam and the fangs
Shall no new sin be born for men's trouble, 91
No dream of impossible pangs?
With the sweet of the sins of old ages
Wilt thou satiate thy soul as of yore?
Too sweet is the rind, say the sages, 95
Too bitter the core

Hast thou told all thy secrets the last time,
And bared all thy beauties to one?
Ah, where shall we go then for pastime,
If the worst that can be has been done? 100
But sweet as the rind was the core is;
We are fain of thee still, we are fain,
O sanguine and subtle Dolores,
Our Lady of Pain

By the hunger of change and emotion, 105
By the thirst of unbearable things,
By despair, the twin-born of devotion,
By the pleasure that winces and stings,
The delight that consumes the desire,
The desire that outruns the delight, 110
By the cruelty deaf as a fire
And blind as the night,

By the ravenous teeth that have smitten
Through the kisses that blossom and bud,

By the lips intertwined and bitten 115
Till the foam has a savor of blood,
By the pulse as it rises and falters,
By the hands as they slacken and strain,
I adjure thee, respond from thine altars,
Our Lady of Pain 120

Wilt thou smile as a woman disdain
The light fire in the veins of a boy?
But he comes to thee sad, without feigning,
Who has wearied of sorrow and joy,
Less careful of labor and glory 125
Than the elders whose hair has uncurled,
And young, but with fancies as hoary
And gray as the world.

I have passed from the outermost portal
To the shrine where a sin is a prayer; 130
What care though the service be mortal?
O our Lady of Torture, what care?
All thine the last wine that I pour is,
The last in the chalice we drain,
O fierce and luxurious Dolores, 135
Our Lady of Pain.

All thine the new wine of desire,
The fruit of four lips as they cling
Till the hair and the eyelids took fire,
The foam of a serpentine tongue, 140
The froth of the serpents of pleasure,
More salt than the foam of the sea,
Now felt as a flame, now at leisure
As wine shed for me.

Ah, thy people, thy children, thy chosen, 145
Marked cross from the womb and perverse!
They have found out the secret to cozen
The gods that constrain us and curse,
They alone, they are wise, and none other,
Give me place, even me, in their train, 150
O my sister, my spouse, and my mother,
Our Lady of Pain

For the crown of our life as it closes
Is darkness, the fruit thereof dust;
No thorns go as deep as a rose's, 155
And love is more cruel than lust.
Time turns the old days to derision,
Our loves into corpses or wives,
And marriage and death and division
Make barren our lives. 160

And pale from the past we draw nigh thee,
And satiate with comfortless hours;
And we know thee, how all men belie thee,
And we gather the fruit of thy flowers,
The passion that slays and recovers, 165
The pangs and the kisses that rain
On the lips and the limbs of thy lovers,
Our Lady of Pain.

The desire of thy furious embraces
 Is more than the wisdom of years, 170
 On the blossom though blood lie in traces,
 Though the foliage be sodden with tears
 For the lords in whose keeping the door is
 That opens on all who draw breath
 Gave the cypress to love, my Dolores, 175
 The myrtle to death.

And they laughed, changing hands in the
 measure,
 And they mixed and made peace after strife,
 Pain melted in tears, and was pleasure;
 Death tingled with blood, and was life. 180
 Like lovers they melted and tingled,
 In the dusk of thine innermost fane;
 In the darkness they murmured and mingled,
 Our Lady of Pain.

In a twilight where virtues are vices, 185
 In thy chapels, unknown of the sun,
 To a tune that enthralls and entices,
 They were wed, and the twain were as one.
 For the tune from thine altar hath sounded
 Since God bade the world's work begin, 190
 And the fume of thine incense abounded,
 To sweeten the sin.

Love listens, and paler than ashes,
 Through his curls as the crown on them
 slips,
 Lifts languid wet eyelids and lashes, 195
 And laughs with insatiable lips.
 Thou shalt hush him with heavy caresses,
 With music that scares the profane;
 Thou shalt darken his eyes with thy tresses,
 Our Lady of Pain. 200

Thou shalt blind his bright eyes though he wrestle,
 Thou shalt chain his light limbs though he strive;
 In his lips all thy serpents shall nestle,
 In his hands all thy cruelties thrive.
 In the daytime thy voice shall go through
 him, 205
 In his dreams he shall feel thee and ache,
 Thou shalt kindle by night and subdue him
 Asleep and awake.

Thou shalt touch and make redder his roses
 With juice not of fruit nor of bud; 210
 When the sense in the spint reposes, Thou shalt quicken the soul through the blood.

Thine, thine the one grace we implore is,
 Who would live and not languish or feign,

175 cypress. The cypress was an emblem of mourning, the myrtle was sacred to Venus. Swinburne reverses the traditions

O sleepless and deadly Dolores, 215
 Our Lady of Pain.

Dost thou dream, in a respite of slumber,
 In a lull of the fires of thy life,
 Of the days without name, without number,
 When thy will stung the world into strife;
 When, a goddess, the pulse of thy passion 221
 Smote kings as they reveled in Rome;
 And they hailed thee re-risen, O Thalassian,
 Foam-white, from the foam?

When thy lips had such lovers to flatter; 225
 When the city lay red from thy rods,
 And thine hands were as arrows to scatter
 The children of change and their gods,
 When the blood of thy foemen made fervent
 A sand never moist from the main, 230
 As one smote them, their lord and thy servant,
 Our Lady of Pain.

On sands by the storm never shaken,
 Nor wet from the washing of tides;
 Nor by foam of the waves overtaken, 235
 Nor winds that the thunder bestrides;
 But red from the print of thy paces,
 Made smooth for the world and its lords,
 Ringed round with a flame of fair faces,
 And splendid with swords. 240

There the gladiator, pale for thy pleasure,
 Drew bitter and perilous breath;
 There torments laid hold on the treasure
 Of limbs too delicious for death, 244
 When thy gardens were lit with live torches,
 When the world was a steed for thy rein,
 When the nations lay prone in thy porches,
 Our Lady of Pain.

When, with flame all around him aspirant,
 Stood flushed, as a harp-player stands, 250
 The implacable beautiful tyrant,
 Rose-crowned, having death in his hands,
 And a sound as the sound of loud water
 Smote far through the flight of the fires,
 And mixed with the lightning of slaughter 255
 A thunder of lyres.

Dost thou dream of what was and no more is,
 The old kingdoms of earth and the kings?
 Dost thou hunger for these things, Dolores,
 For these, in a world of new things? 260

223 Thalassian, Venus (Aphrodite). The word means born of the sea. According to tradition Aphrodite was born of the foam of the sea. 228, children of change, those who introduced the new religion of Christianity. 229 blood of thy foemen, a reference to the persecution of the Christians by the Roman Cæsars, pagan followers of Venus. 230 A sand, the arena of the Coliseum. 231 one, Nero, Roman emperor (54-68). 245 gardens. torches. Nero used burning Christians as torches in his garden. 251 beautiful tyrant, Nero, who is said to have played upon the harp while Rome burned.

But thy bosom no fasts could emaciate,
 No hunger compel to complain
 Those lips that no bloodshed could satiate,
 Our Lady of Pain.

As of old when the world's heart was lighter,
 Through thy garments the grace of thee
 glows, 266
 The white wealth of thy body made whiter
 By the blushes of amorous blows,
 And seamed with sharp lips and fierce fingers,
 And branded by kisses that bruise; 270
 When all shall be gone that now lingers,
 Ah, what shall we lose?

Thou wert fair in the fearless old fashion,
 And thy limbs are as melodies yet,
 And move to the music of passion 275
 With lithe and lascivious regret.
 What ailed us, O gods, to desert you
 For creeds that refuse and restrain?
 Come down and redeem us from virtue,
 Our Lady of Pain. 280

All shrines that were Vestal are flameless,
 But the flame has not fallen from this,
 Though obscure be the god, and though name-
 less
 The eyes and the hair that we kiss,
 Low fires that love sits by and forges 285
 Fresh heads for his arrows and thine;
 Hair loosened and soiled in mid orgies
 With kisses and wine.

Thy skin changes country and color,
 And shrivels or swells to a snake's. 290
 Let it brighten and bloat and grow duller,
 We know it, the flames and the flakes,
 Red brands on it smitten and bitten,
 Round skies where a star is a strain,
 And the leaves with their litanies written, 295
 Our Lady of Pain.

On thy bosom though many a kiss be,
 There are none such as knew it of old.
 Was it Alciphron once or Arisbe,
 Male ringlets or feminine gold, 300
 That thy lips met with under the statue,
 Whence a look shot out sharp after thieves
 From the eyes of the garden god at you
 Across the fig-leaves?

Then still, through dry seasons and moister,
 One god had a wreath to his shrine; 306

281 shrines . . . flameless It was the duty of the Vestal virgins to keep burning the sacred fire of Vesta, goddess of the hearth. 299 Alciphron, a Greek rhetorician of the 2d century A.D. He was the author of letters supposed to have been written by celebrated courtesans. Arisbe, according to Greek tradition, the wife of King Priam, of Troy 303 the garden god, Priapus See note on Faustine, 146, page 656

Then love was the pearl of his oyster,
 And Venus rose red out of wine.
 We have all done amiss, choosing rather
 Such loves as the wise gods disdain; 310
 Intercede for us thou with thy father,
 Our Lady of Pain

In spring he had crowns of his garden,
 Red corn in the heat of the year,
 Then hoary green olives that harden 315
 When the grape-blossom freezes with fear,
 And milk-budded myrtles with Venus
 And vine-leaves with Bacchus he trod,
 And ye said, "We have seen, he hath seen us,
 A visible god" 320

What broke off the garlands that girt you?
 What Sundered you spirit and clay?
 Weak sins yet alive are as virtue
 To the strength of the sins of that day.
 For dried is the blood of thy lover, 325
 Ipsithilla, contracted the vein;
 Cry aloud, "Will he rise and recover,
 Our Lady of Pain?"

Cry aloud, for the old world is broken.
 Cry out; for the Phrygian is priest, 330
 And rears not the bountiful token
 And spreads not the fatherly feast.
 From the midst of Ida, from shady
 Recesses that murmur at morn,
 They have brought and baptized her, Our Lady, 335
 A goddess new-born.

And the chaplets of old are above us,
 And the oyster-bed teems out of reach,
 Old poets outsing and outlove us,
 And Catullus makes mouths at our speech.
 Who shall kiss, in thy father's own city, 341
 With such lips as he sang with, again?
 Intercede for us all of thy pity,
 Our Lady of Pain.

Out of Dindymus heavily laden 345
 Her lions draw bound and unfed
 A mother, a mortal, a maiden,
 A queen over death and the dead.
 She is cold, and her habit is lowly,
 Her temple of branches and sods; 350
 Most fruitful and virginal, holy,
 A mother of gods.

 Minor, as the mother of the gods Swinburne explains that her devotees were more restrained than those of Venus Mt.
 Ida (line 333), in Asia Minor, was a seat of the worship of Cybele 340 Catullus, a famous Roman lyric poet (84-54
 B.C.) His love lyrics are noted for their grace and finish
 345 Dindymus, a mountain in Phrygia, sacred to Cybele
 From her shrine she traveled over the surrounding country in a chariot drawn by lions.

She hath wasted with fire thine high places,
 She hath hidden and marred and made sad
 The fair limbs of the Loves, the fair faces 355
 Of gods that were goodly and glad
 She slays, and her hands are not bloody;
 She moves as a moon in the wane,
 White-robed, and thy raiment is ruddy,
 Our Lady of Pain. 360

They shall pass and their places be taken,
 The gods and the priests that are pure.
 They shall pass, and shalt thou not be shaken?
 They shall perish, and shalt thou endure?
 Death laughs, breathing close and relent-
 less
 In the nostrils and eyelids of lust, 366
 With a pinch in his fingers of scentless
 And delicate dust.

But the worm shall revive thee with kisses,
 Thou shalt change and transmute as a god,
 As the rod to a serpent that hisses, 371
 As the serpent again to a rod Thy life shall not cease though thou doff
 it;
 Thou shalt live until evil be slain,
 And good shall die first, said thy prophet, 375
 Our Lady of Pain.

Did he lie? did he laugh? does he know it,
 Now he lies out of reach, out of breath,
 Thy prophet, thy preacher, thy poet,
 Sin's child by incestuous Death? 380
 Did he find out in fire at his waking,
 Or discern as his eyelids lost light,
 When the bands of the body were breaking
 And all came in sight?

Who has known all the evil before us, 385
 Or the tyrannous secrets of time?
 Though we match not the dead men that bore us
 At a song, at a kiss, at a crime —
 Though the heathen outface and outlive us,
 And our lives and our longings are twain —
 Ah, forgive us our virtues, forgive us, 391
 Our Lady of Pain.

Who are we that embalm and embrace thee
 With spices and savors of song?

371. rod to a serpent Cf. Exodus, 7 8-10 — "And the Lord spake unto Moses and unto Aaron, saying, 'When Pharaoh shall speak unto you, saying, Show a miracle for you, then thou shalt say unto Aaron, Take thy rod and cast it before Pharaoh, and it shall become a serpent.'" 375 good . . . first. Cf. "He whom the gods love dies young" (Plautus, Bacchides, 4, 7, 18) Cf. also Wordsworth's Excursion, 1, 500-502 — "The good die first, And they whose hearts are dry as summer dust Burn to the socket" 380 Sin's . . . Death Milton makes Death the son of Sin and Satan, and he makes Death and his mother the parents of the barking hounds of Hell (Paradise Lost, 2, 747 ff)

What is time, that his children should face
 thee? 395
 What am I, that my lips do thee wrong?
 I could hurt thee — but pain would delight
 thee,
 Or caress thee — but love would repel,
 And the lovers whose lips would excite thee
 Are serpents in hell. 400

Who now shall content thee as they did,
 Thy lovers, when temples were built
 And the hair of the sacrifice braided
 And the blood of the sacrifice spilt,
 In Lampsacus fervent with faces, 405
 In Aphaca red from thy reign,
 Who embraced thee with awful embraces,
 Our Lady of Pain?

Where are they, Cotytto or Venus,
 Astarte or Ashtaroth, where? 410
 Do their hands as we touch come between us?
 Is the breath of them hot in thy hair?
 From their lips have thy lips taken fever,
 With the blood of their bodies grown red?
 Hast thou left upon earth a believer 415
 If these men are dead?

They were purple of raiment and golden,
 Filled full of thee, fiery with wine,
 Thy lovers, in haunts unbeholden,
 In marvelous chambers of thine. 420
 They are fled, and their footprints escape us,
 Who appraise thee, adore, and abstain,
 O daughter of Death and Priapus,
 Our Lady of Pain.

What ails us to fear overmeasure, 425
 To praise thee with timorous breath,
 O mistress and mother of pleasure,
 The one thing as certain as death?
 We shall change as the things that we cherish,
 Shall fade as they faded before, 430
 As foam upon water shall perish,
 As sand upon shore

We shall know what the darkness discovers,
 If the grave-pit be shallow or deep,
 And our fathers of old, and our lovers, 435
 We shall know if they sleep not or sleep.
 We shall see whether hell be not heaven,
 Find out whether tares be not grain,
 And the joys of thee seventy times seven,
 Our Lady of Pain. 440

405 Lampsacus. See note on Faustine, 146, page 656
 406 Aphaca, a city in Asia Minor associated with the worship of Priapus and Venus 409 Cotytto, a Thracian goddess whose festivals were marked with great revelry 410. Astarte or Ashtaroth, the goddess of love and fertility, called Ishtar by the Assyrians. 438 tares be not grain, a reference to the parable of the tares sown among the wheat (Matthew, 13 25-40).

THE GARDEN OF PROSERPINE

Here, where the world is quiet;
Here, where all trouble seems
Dead winds' and spent waves' riot

In doubtful dreams of dreams,
I watch the green field growing 5
For reaping folk and sowing,
For harvest-time and mowing,
A sleepy world of streams

I am tired of tears and laughter,
And men that laugh and weep, 10
Of what may come hereafter
For men that sow to reap;
I am weary of days and hours,
Blown buds of barren flowers,
Desires and dreams and powers 15
And everything but sleep.

Here life has death for neighbor,
And far from eye or ear
Wan waves and wet winds labor,
Weak ships and spirits steer; 20
They drive adrift, and whither
They wot not who make thither;
But no such winds blow hither,
And no such things grow here.

No growth of moor or coppice, 25
No heather-flower or vine,
But bloomless buds of poppies,
Green grapes of Proserpine,
Pale beds of blowing rushes
Where no leaf blooms or blushes 30
Save this whereout she crushes
For dead men deadly wine.

Pale, without name or number,
In fruitless fields of corn,
They bow themselves and slumber 35
All night till light is born,
And like a soul belated,
In hell and heaven unmatd,
By cloud and mist abated
Comes out of darkness morn. 40

Though one were strong as seven,
He too with death shall dwell,
Nor wake with wings in heaven,

Nor weep for pains in hell,
Though one were fair as roses, 45
His beauty clouds and closes;
And well though love reposes,
In the end it is not well.

Pale, beyond porch and portal,
Crowned with calm leaves, she stands 50
Who gathers all things mortal
With cold immortal hands;
Her languid lips are sweeter
Than love's who fears to greet her
To men that mix and meet her 55
From many times and lands.

She waits for each and other,
She waits for all men born;
Forgets the earth her mother,
The life of fruits and corn; 60
And spring and seed and swallow
Take wing for her and follow
Where summer song rings hollow
And flowers are put to scorn.

There go the loves that wither, 65
The old loves with wearier wings;
And all dead years draw thither,
And all disastrous things;
Dead dreams of days forsaken, 70
Blind buds that snows have shaken,
Wild leaves that winds have taken,
Red strays of ruined springs.

We are not sure of sorrow,
And joy was never sure;
Today will die tomorrow; 75
Time stoops to no man's lure;
And love, grown faint and fretful,
With lips but half regretful
Sighs, and with eyes forgetful
Weeps that no loves endure. 80

From too much love of living,
From hope and fear set free,
We thank with brief thanksgiving
Whatever gods may be 85
That no life lives forever;
That dead men rise up never;
That even the weariest river
Winds somewhere safe to sea.

Then star nor sun shall waken,
Nor any change of light; 90
Nor sound of waters shaken,
Nor any sound or sight;
Nor wintry leaves nor vernal,
Nor days nor things diurnal,
Only the sleep eternal 95
In an eternal night (1866)

The Garden of Proserpine Proserpine was the daughter of Demeter, the mother earth (see line 59). While gathering flowers in Sicily she was carried off by Pluto, god of Hades, to his realm of darkness and death. Certain groves at the entrance to Hades were sacred to her. By action of the gods, she was allowed to return to the upper world for half of each year. The myth symbolizes the changes in the seasons. The poem is spoken by a Roman pagan. Cf. C. Rossetti's Dream Land, page 553, and Tennyson's The Lotus-Eaters, page 28.

14 Blown . . . flowers, blossoming flowers that will produce no fruit. They are used as a symbol of unfulfilled desires and dreams. 22 wot, know. 27. poppies, the flowers of oblivion, sacred to Proserpine, who was often represented with a crown of them on her head (line 50). 34 corn, grain, wheat.

83-84 thank . . . may be Cf. Henley's Invictus, page 785. 94 diurnal, belonging to the daylight.

SAPPHICS

All the night sleep came not upon my eyelids, Shed not dew, nor shook nor unclosed a feather,
Yet with lips shut close and with eyes of iron
Stood and beheld me.

Then to me so lying awake a vision 5
Came without sleep over the seas and touched
me,
Softly touched mine eyelids and lips, and I,
too,
Full of the vision

Saw the white implacable Aphrodite,
Saw the hair unbound and the feet unsandaled
Shine as fire of sunset on western waters; 11
Saw the reluctant

Feet, the straining plumes of the doves that drew her,
Looking always, looking with necks reverted,
Back to Lesbos, back to the hills whereunder
Shone Mitylene; 16

Heard the flying feet of the Loves behind her
Make a sudden thunder upon the waters,
As the thunder flung from the strong unclosing
Wings of a great wind. 20

So the goddess fled from her place, with awful Sound of feet and thunder of wings around
her;
While behind a clamor of singing women
Severed the twilight.

Ah, the singing, ah, the delight, the passion!
All the Loves wept, listening; sick with anguish, 26
Stood the crowned nine Muses about Apollo,
Fear was upon them,

While the tenth sang wonderful things they knew not.
Ah, the tenth, the Lesbian! the nine were silent, 30
None endured the sound of her song for weeping;
Laurel by laurel,

Sapphics The title is a term used to designate a verse form employed by Sappho (c 600 B.C.), a Greek poetess of the city of Mitylene, on the island of Lesbos, off the coast of Asia Minor. Each stanza consists of three lines of five feet each and a fourth line of two feet. The prevailing measure is trochaic with a dactyl in the third foot of the long lines and in the first foot of the short lines.
9 Aphrodite, goddess of love. She was often represented as drawn by doves. 27 nine Muses. See note on Clough's In the Depths, 2, page 404. Apollo was the god of poetry and music. He presided over the Muses. 29 the tenth Sappho was called the "tenth muse." 32 laurel. The laurel, used in crowning poets, was sacred to the gods.

Faded all their crowns; but about her fore-
head,
Round her woven tresses and ashen temples
White as dead snow, paler than grass in summer, 35
Ravaged with kisses,

Shone a light of fire as a crown forever.
Yea, almost the implacable Aphrodite Paused, and almost wept; such a song was that song.
Yea, by her name, too, 40

Called her, saying, "Turn to me, O my Sappho",
Yet she turned her face from the Loves, she saw not
Tears for laughter darken immortal eyelids,
Heard not about her

Fearful fitful wings of the doves departing, 45
Saw not how the bosom of Aphrodite
Shook with weeping, saw not her shaken raiment,
Saw not her hands wrung;

Saw the Lesbians kissing across their smitten
Lutes with lips more sweet than the sound of lute-strings, 50
Mouth to mouth and hand upon hand, her chosen,
Fairer than all men;

Only saw the beautiful lips and fingers,
Full of songs and kisses and little whispers,
Full of music, only beheld among them 55
Soar, as a bird soars

Newly fledged, her visible song, a marvel,
Made of perfect sound and exceeding passion,
Sweetly shapen, terrible, full of thunders,
Clothed with the wind's wings. 60

Then rejoiced she, laughing with love, and scattered
Roses, awful roses of holy blossom;
Then the Loves thronged sadly with hidden faces
Round Aphrodite,

Then the Muses, stricken at heart, were silent, 65
Yea, the gods waxed pale, such a song was
that song.

All reluctant, all with a fresh repulsion,
Fled from before her.

All withdrew long since, and the land was barren,
Full of fruitless women and music only. 70

Now perchance, when winds are assuaged at sunset,
Lulled at the dewfall,

By the gray seaside, unassuaged, unheard of,
Unbeloved, unseen in the ebb of twilight,
Ghosts of outcast women return lamenting,
Purged not in Lethe, 76

Clothed about with flame and with tears, and singing
Songs that move the heart of the shaken
heaven,
Songs that break the heart of the earth with pity,
Hearing, to hear them. 80

DEDICATION TO POEMS AND BALLADS

The sea gives her shells to the shingle,
The earth gives her streams to the sea,
They are many, but my gift is single,
My verses, the first fruits of me.
Let the wind take the green and the gray
leaf,
Cast forth without fruit upon air; 6
Take rose-leaf and vine-leaf and bay-leaf
Blown loose from the hair.

The night shakes them round me in legions,
Dawn drives them before her like dreams;
Time sheds them like snows on strange
regions, 11
Swept shoreward on infinite streams;
Leaves pallid and somber and ruddy,
Dead fruits of the fugitive years;
Some stained as with wine and made bloody,
And some as with tears. 16

Some scattered in seven years' traces,
As they fell from the boy that was then;
Long left among idle green places,
Or gathered but now among men; 20
On seas full of wonder and peril,
Blown white round the capes of the north;
Or in islands where myrtles are sterile
And loves bring not forth.

76 Purged not in Lethe, unable to secure oblivion by drinking of the water of Lethe, the river of forgetfulness in Hades

Dedication to Poems and Ballads This dedication to the first series of Swinburne's Poems and Ballads was addressed to Sir Edward Burne-Jones (1833-98), an English painter noted for highly decorative design. He was a member of the Pre-Raphaelite group of artists, a pupil of Rossetti's, and a friend of Swinburne's

1 shingle, coarse rounded stones on the seashore 7 bay-leaf, laurel-leaf, sacred to the gods 17 seven years' traces Evidently the poems in the volume were written between 1859 and 1866 23 myrtles Poets were crowned with wreaths of myrtle, sacred to the gods

O daughters of dreams and of stories 25
That life is not wearied of yet,
Faustine, Fragoletta, Dolores,
Félice and Yolande and Juliette,
Shall I find you not still, shall I miss you,
When sleep, that is true or that seems, 30
Comes back to me hopeless to kiss you,
O daughters of dreams?

They are past as a slumber that passes,
As the dew of a dawn of old time;
More frail than the shadows on glasses, 35
More fleet than a wave or a rime.
As the waves after ebb drawing seaward,
When their hollows are full of the night,
So the birds that flew singing to me-ward
Recede out of sight. 40

The songs of dead seasons, that wander
On wings of articulate words,
Lost leaves that the shore-wind may squander,
Light flocks of untameable birds,
Some sang to me dreaming in class time 45
And truant in hand as in tongue,
For the youngest were born of boy's past-time,
The eldest are young.

Is there shelter while life in them lingers,
Is there hearing for songs that recede, 50
Tunes touched from a harp with man's fingers
Or blown with boy's mouth in a reed?
Is there place in the land of your labor,
Is there room in your world of delight,
Where change has not sorrow for neighbor 55
And day has not night?

In their wings though the sea-wind yet
quivers,
Will you spare not a space for them there
Made green with the running of rivers
And gracious with temperate air; 60
In the fields and the turreted cities,
That cover from sunshine and rain
Fair passions and bountiful pities
And loves without stain?

In a land of clear colors and stories, 65
In a region of shadowless hours,
Where earth has a garment of glories
And a murmur of musical flowers;
In woods where the spring half uncovers
The flush of her amorous face, 70
By the waters that listen for lovers,
For these is there place?

27-28 Faustine . . Juliette, names of women appearing in the poems of the 1866 volume 45 in class time, while he was at Eton, 1849-53 He was at Oxford 1856-59

For the song-birds of sorrow, that muffle
 Their music as clouds do their fire,
 For the storm-birds of passion, that ruffle 75
 Wild wings in a wind of desire;
 In the stream of the storm as it settles
 Blown seaward, borne far from the sun,
 Shaken loose on the darkness like petals
 Dropped one after one? 80

Though the world of your hands be more gracious
 And lovelier in lordship of things
 Clothed round by sweet art with the spacious Warm heaven of her imminent wings,
 Let them enter, unfledged and nigh fainting,
 For the love of old loves and lost times, 86
 And receive in your palace of painting
 This revel of rimes.

Though the seasons of man full of losses
 Make empty the years full of youth, 90
 If but one thing be constant in crosses,
 Change lays not her hand upon truth;
 Hopes die, and their tombs are for token
 That the grief as the joy of them ends
 Ere time that breaks all men has broken 95
 The faith between friends.

Though the many lights dwindle to one light,
 There is help if the heaven has one;
 Though the skies be discrowned of the sun-
 light
 And the earth dispossessed of the sun, 100
 They have moonlight and sleep for repayment,
 When, refreshed as a bride and set free,
 With stars and sea-winds in her raiment,
 Night sinks on the sea. (1866)

AVE ATQUE VALE

IN MEMORY OF CHARLES BAUDELAIRE

Shall I strew on thee rose or rue or laurel,
 Brother, on this that was the veil of thee?
 Or quiet sea-flower molded by the sea,
 Or simplest growth of meadow-sweet or sorrel,
 Such as the summer-sleepy Dryads weave, Waked up by snow-soft sudden rains at eve? 6
 Or wilt thou rather, as on earth before,
 Half-faded fiery blossoms, pale with heat
 And full of bitter summer, but more sweet

81. the world . . . hands, the paintings of Burne-Jones
Ave Atque Vale See note on Tennyson's "Fraser Ave Atque Vale", page 154. Baudelaire (1821-67) was a French poet
 See Critical Notes

1 rose . . . laurel. The rose is a symbol of love, rue of remembrance; the laurel is sacred to poetry 2 veil, the body of Baudelaire 5 Dryads, wood nymphs 8-11 fiery blossoms, etc., a reference to the morbid and passionate verse of Baudelaire, and to his visit to India in 1841-42

To thee than gleanings of a northern shore 10
 Trod by no tropic feet?

For always thee the fervid languid glories
 Allured of heavier suns in mightier skies,
 Thine ears knew all the wandering watery sighs
 Where the sea sobs round Lesbian promontories, 15
 The barren kiss of piteous wave to wave
 That knows not where is that Leucadian
 grave
 Which hides too deep the supreme head of
 song.
 Ah, salt and sterile as her kisses were,
 The wild sea winds her and the green gulfs
 bear 20
 Hither and thither, and vex and work her
 wrong,
 Blind gods that cannot spare.

Thou sawest, in thine old singing season,
 brother,
 Secrets and sorrows unbeheld of us, 24
 Fierce loves, and lovely leaf-buds poisonous,
 Bare to thy subtler eye, but for none other Blowing by night in some unbreathed-in clime;
 The hidden harvest of luxurious time,
 Sin without shape, and pleasure without
 speech;
 And where strange dreams in a tumultuous
 sleep 30
 Make the shut eyes of stricken spirits weep,
 And with each face thou sawest the shadow
 on each,
 Seeing as men sow men reap.

O sleepless heart and somber soul unsleeping,
 That were athirst for sleep and no more
 life 35
 And no more love, for peace and no more
 strife!
 Now the dim gods of death have in their keeping
 Spirit and body and all the springs of song,
 Is it well now where love can do no wrong,
 Where stingless pleasure has no foam or fang
 Behind the unopening closure of her lips? 41
 Is it not well where soul from body slips
 And flesh from bone divides without a pang
 As dew from flower-bell drips?

15 Where the sea sobs, etc., a reference to the tradition that because of disdained love the Greek poetess Sappho
 (c. 600 B.C.), born on the island of Lesbos off the coast of Asia Minor, cast herself into the sea from the rocky heights of Leucas, one of the Ionian Islands, west of Greece Baudelaire refers to Sappho's death in his Lesbos 33 as men reap Cf "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap" (Galahad, 6 7)

It is enough, the end and the beginning 45
 Are one thing to thee, who art past the end.
 O hand unclasped of unbeholden friend,
 For thee no fruits to pluck, no palms for winning,
 No triumph and no labor and no lust,
 Only dead yew-leaves and a little dust. 50
 O quiet eyes wherein the light saith naught,
 Whereto the day is dumb, nor any night
 With obscure finger silences your sight,
 Nor in your speech the sudden soul speaks
 thought,
 Sleep, and have sleep for light. 55

Now all strange hours and all strange loves are over,
 Dreams and desires and somber songs and
 sweet,
 Hast thou found place at the great knees
 and feet
 Of some pale Titan-woman like a lover,
 Such as thy vision here solicited, 60
 Under the shadow of her fair vast head,
 The deep division of prodigious breasts,
 The solemn slope of mighty limbs asleep,
 The weight of awful tresses that still keep
 The savor and shade of old-world pine-forests 65
 Where the wet hill-winds weep?

Hast thou found any likeness for thy vision?
 O gardener of strange flowers, what bud,
 what bloom,
 Hast thou found sown, what gathered in the gloom?
 What of despair, of rapture, of derision, 70
 What of life is there, what of ill or good?
 Are the fruits gray like dust or bright like
 blood?
 Does the dim ground grow any seed of ours,
 The faint fields quicken any terrene root,
 In low lands where the sun and moon are mute 75
 And all the stars keep silence? Are there flowers
 At all, or any fruit?

Alas, but though my flying song flies after,
 O sweet strange elder singer, thy more fleet
 Singing, and footprints of thy fleeter feet, 80
 Some dim derision of mysterious laughter
 From the blind tongueless warders of the
 dead,
 Some glassless glumpse of Proserpine's veiled
 head,
 Some little sound of unregarded tears

Wept by effaced unprofitable eyes, 85
 And from pale mouths some cadence of dead sighs —
 These only, these the hearkening spirit hears,
 Sees only such things rise.

Thou art far too far for wings of words to
 follow,
 Far too far off for thought or any prayer.
 What ails us with thee, who art wind and
 air? 91
 What ails us gazing where all seen is hollow?
 Yet with some fancy, yet with some desire,
 Dreams pursue death as winds a flying fire,
 Our dreams pursue our dead and do not find Still, and more swift than they, the thin flame flies, 96
 The low light fails us in elusive skies,
 Still the foiled earnest ear is deaf, and blind
 Are still the eluded eyes.

Not thee, O never thee, in all time's changes,
 Not thee, but this the sound of thy sad
 soul, 101
 The shadow of thy swift spirit, this shut
 scroll
 I lay my hand on, and not death estranges
 My spirit from communion of thy song —
 These memories and these melodies that
 through 105
 Veiled porches of a Muse funereal —
 These I salute, these touch, these clasp and
 fold
 As though a hand were in my hand to hold,
 Or through mine ears a mourning musical
 Of many mourners rolled. 110

I among these, I also, in such station
 As when the pyre was charred, and piled the sods,
 And offering to the dead made, and their gods,
 The old mourners had, standing to make libation,
 I stand, and to the gods and to the dead 115
 Do reverence without prayer or praise and
 shed
 Offering to these unknown, the gods of gloom,
 And what of honey and spice my seedlands
 bear,
 And what I may of fruits in this chilled air,
 And lay, Orestes-like, across the tomb 120
 A curl of severed hair.

106 Muse funereal. See note on Clough's In the Depths, 2, page 404. 120-21 Orestes-like, etc. Orestes was the son of Agamemnon, king of Mycenæ, Greece, who led the expedition against Troy. The incident of Orestes's offering a tress of his hair as a sacrifice to the dead is found in the opening scene of the Choephori, a drama by Æschylus (525-456 B.C.), the great Greek tragic dramatist. The King (line 123) is Agamemnon. Electra (line 129) is the sister of Orestes. They meet at the bier of their father slain by his wife (Clytemnestra) and her paramour, Ægisthus.

59 Titan-woman, a reference to Baudelaire's poem La Géante (The Giantess). The Titans were giants of Greek mythology who rebelled against the gods. 74 terrene, earthly. 83 Proserpine's head. See note on The Garden of Proserpine, page 687.

But by no hand nor any treason stricken,
 Not like the low-lying head of Him, the King,
 The flame that made of Troy a ruinous
 thing,
 Thou liest, and on this dust no tears could
 quicken 125
 There fall no tears like theirs that all men
 hear
 Fall tear by sweet imperishable tear
 Down the opening leaves of holy poet's pages
 Thee not Orestes, not Electra mourns;
 But bending us-ward with memorial urns
 The most high Muses that fulfill all ages 131
 Weep, and our god's heart yearns.

For, sparing of his sacred strength, not often
 Among us darkling here the lord of light
 Makes manifest his music and his might 135
 In hearts that open and in lips that soften
 With the soft flame and heat of songs that
 shine.
 Thy lips indeed he touched with bitter
 wine,
 And nourished them indeed with bitter bread,
 Yet surely from his hand thy soul's food
 came, 140
 The fire that scarred thy spirit at his flame
 Was lighted, and thine hungering heart he fed
 Who feeds our hearts with fame.

Therefore he too now at thy soul's sunseting,
 God of all suns and songs, he too bends
 down 145
 To mix his laurel with thy cypress crown,
 And save thy dust from blame and from forgetting.
 Therefore he too, seeing all thou wert and
 art,
 Compassionate, with sad and sacred heart,
 Mourns thee of many his children the last
 dead, 150
 And hallows with strange tears and alien sighs
 Thine unmelodious mouth and sunless eyes,
 And over thine irrevocable head
 Sheds light from the under skies.

And one weeps with him in the ways Lethæan,
 And stains with tears her changing bosom
 chill — 156
 That obscure Venus of the hollow hill,

134 lord of light, Apollo, god of the sun and of poetry and music 146 cypress. The cypress is a symbol of mourning and is a common tree in graveyards See note on line 1 155 ways Lethæan, the paths of forgetfulness Lethæ was the river of forgetfulness in Hades 157 Venus . . . hill In the medieval legend of Tannhauser, Venus appears transformed into an enchantress who lures victims into the caverns of Horselberg (the Mountain of Venus), a mountain between the cities of Eisenach and Gotha, in Germany

That thing transformed which was the Cytherean,
 With lips that lost their Grecian laugh
 divine
 Long since, and face no more called Ery-cine; 160
 A ghost, a bitter and luxurious god.
 Thee also with fair flesh and singing spell
 Did she, a sad and second prey, compel
 Into the footless places once more trod,
 And shadows hot from hell. 165

And now no sacred staff shall break in blossom,
 No choral salutation lure to light
 A spirit with perfume and sweet night
 And love's tired eyes and hands and barren
 bosom
 There is no help for these things; none to mend 170
 And none to mar; not all our songs, O
 friend,
 Will make death clear or make life durable
 Howbeit with rose and ivy and wild vine
 And with wild notes about this dust of thine
 At least I fill the place where white dreams
 dwell 175
 And wreath an unseen shrine.

Sleep; and if life was bitter to thee, pardon,
 If sweet, give thanks; thou hast no more to live;
 And to give thanks is good, and to forgive.
 Out of the mystic and the mournful garden
 Where all day through thine hands in bar-ren braid 181
 Wove the sick flowers of secrecy and shade,
 Green buds of sorrow and sin, and remnants
 gray,
 Sweet-smelling, pale with poison, sanguine-
 hearted,
 Passions that sprang from sleep and thoughts that started, 185
 Shall death not bring us all as thee one day
 Among the days departed?

For thee, O now a silent soul, my brother,
 Take at my hands this garland, and farewell.
 Thin is the leaf, and chill the wintry smell,

158 the Cytherean, Aphrodite (Venus), who according to tradition arose from the foam of the sea near the island of Cythera, southeast of Greece 160 Erycine, a title of Venus derived from Mt. Eryx, in Sicily, where she was worshipped as the goddess of heavenly love 166 staff . . blossom After the knight Tannhauser had spent a year with Venus in her cavern, he made a visit of penance to Rome and asked for absolution, but Pope Urban IV (1261-64) said that he would grant no mercy until his staff should burst into bloom Shortly thereafter the staff began to bud, but the knight had returned to Venus See Laus Veneris, 346-372, page 669 Cf the story of the blossoming of Aaron's rod in Numbers, 17 See also Morris's The Hill of Venus

And chill the solemn earth, a fatal mother, 191
 With sadder than the Niobeian womb,
 And in the hollow of her breasts a tomb.
 Content thee, howsoe'er, whose days are done;
 There lies not any troublous thing before,
 Nor sight nor sound to war against thee
 more, 196
 For whom all winds are quiet as the sun,
 All waters as the shore. (1868)

PRELUDE TO SONGS BEFORE
 SUNRISE

Between the green bud and the red
 Youth sat and sang by Time, and shed
 From eyes and tresses flowers and tears,
 From heart and spirit hopes and fears,
 Upon the hollow stream whose bed 5
 Is channeled by the foamless years;
 And with the white the gold-haired head
 Mixed running locks, and in Time's ears
 Youth's dreams hung singing, and Time's
 truth
 Was half not harsh in the ears of Youth. 10

Between the bud and the blown flower
 Youth talked with joy and grief and hour,
 With footless joy and wingless grief
 And twin-born faith and disbelief
 Who share the seasons to devour; 15
 And long ere these made up their sheaf
 Felt the winds round him shake and shower
 The rose-red and the blood-red leaf,
 Delight whose germ grew never grain,
 And passion dyed in its own pain. 20

Then he stood up, and trod to dust
 Fear and desire, mistrust and trust,
 And dreams of bitter sleep and sweet,
 And bound for sandals on his feet
 Knowledge and patience of what must 25
 And what things may be, in the heat
 And cold of years that rot and rust
 And alter; and his spirit's meat
 Was freedom, and his staff was wrought
 Of strength, and his cloak woven of thought.

For what has he whose will sees clear 31
 To do with doubt and faith and fear,
 Swift hopes and slow despondencies?

Prelude to Songs before Sunrise In this Prelude Swinburne explains that his former interest in love, as expressed in his first volume of verse, has given place to a new devotion to the spirit of Freedom—freedom from the tyranny of government, of religion, of passion and prejudice, etc. Some of the poems in the volume entitled Songs before Sunrise were inspired chiefly by Italy's long struggle for freedom from the rule of Austria. Poems on pages 695-707 of this volume were included in Songs before Sunrise.

1. Between the green bud, etc. Lines 1-2 refer to the composition of the poems in the first series of Poems and Ballads, published in 1866

His heart is equal with the sea's
 And with the sea-wind's, and his ear 35
 Is level to the speech of these,
 And his soul communes and takes cheer
 With the actual earth's equalities,
 Air, light, and night, hills, winds, and streams,
 And seeks not strength from strengthless
 dreams. 40

His soul is even with the sun
 Whose spirit and whose eye are one,
 Who seeks not stars by day, nor light
 And heavy heat of day by night.
 Him can no god cast down, whom none 45
 Can lift in hope beyond the height
 Of fate and nature and things done
 By the calm rule of might and right
 That bids men be and bear and do,
 And die beneath blind skies or blue. 50

To him the lights of even and morn
 Speak no vain things of love or scorn,
 Fancies and passions miscreate
 By man in things dispassionate.
 Nor holds he fellowship forlorn 55
 With souls that pray and hope and hate,
 And doubt they had better not been born,
 And fain would lure or scare off fate
 And charm their doomsman from their doom
 And make fear dig its own false tomb. 60

He builds not half of doubts and half
 Of dreams his own soul's cenotaph,
 Whence hopes and fears with helpless eyes,
 Wrapped loose in cast-off cerecloths, rise 64
 And dance and wring their hands and laugh,
 And weep thin tears and sigh light sighs,
 And without living lips would quaff
 The living spring in man that lies,
 And drain his soul of faith and strength
 It might have lived on a life's length. 70

He hath given himself and hath not sold
 To God for heaven or man for gold,
 Or grief for comfort that it gives,
 Or joy for grief's restoratives.
 He hath given himself to time, whose fold 75
 Shuts in the mortal flock that lives
 On its plain pasture's heat and cold
 And the equal year's alternatives.
 Earth, heaven, and time, death, life, and he,
 Endure while they shall be to be. 80

"Yet between death and life are hours
 To flush with love and hide in hours;
 What profit save in these?" men cry.
 "Ah, see, between soft earth and sky,
 What only good things here are ours!" 85

62 cenotaph, tomb or monument 64 cerecloths, waxed grave clothes

They say, "what better wouldst thou try,
What sweeter sing of? or what powers
Serve, that will give thee ere thou die
More joy to sing and be less sad,
More heart to play and grow more glad?" 90

Play then and sing, we too have played,
We likewise, in that subtle shade.

We too have twisted through our hair
Such tendrils as the wild Loves wear,
And heard what mirth the Mænads made, 95
Till the wind blew our garlands bare
And left their roses disarrayed,
And smote the summer with strange air,
And disengirdled and discrowned
The limbs and locks that vine-wreaths bound

We too have tracked by star-proof trees 101
The tempest of the Thyiades
Scare the loud night on hills that hid
The blood-feasts of the Bassarid,
Heard their song's iron cadences 105
Fright the wolf hungering from the kid,
Outroar the lion-throated seas,
Outside the north-wind if it chid,
And hush the torrent-tongued ravines
With thunders of their tambourines. 110

But the fierce flute whose notes acclaim
Dim goddesses of fiery fame,
Cymbal and clamorous kettledrum,
Timbrels and tabrets, all are dumb
That turned the high chill air to flame; 115
The singing tongues of fire are numb
That called on Cotys by her name
Edonian, till they felt her come
And maddened, and her mystic face
Lightened along the streams of Thrace. 120

For Pleasure slumberless and pale,
And Passion with rejected veil,
Pass, and the tempest-footed throng
Of hours that follow them with song
Till their feet flag and voices fail, 125
And lips that were so loud so long
Learn silence, or a wearier wail;
So keen is change, and time so strong,
To weave the robes of life and rend
And weave again till life have end. 130

But weak is change, but strengthless time,
To take the light from heaven, or clumb

95 Mænads. See note on line 44, page 658. 101ff tracked . . . tempest . . . Scare, seen the tempests of the Thyiades scare, etc. The Thyiades were women of Attica, Greece, who worshiped Bacchus with great debauchery. 104 Bassarid, a worshiper of Bacchus in Lydia and Thrace, Greece. The celebration included licentious excesses and a sacrifice of some animal on the altar of the god. The participants ate the flesh raw. 114 Timbrels and tabrets, kinds of small drums, like tambourines. 117. Cotys, the same as Cotytto, a goddess whose festivals were marked with licentiousness. Her worship was associated with Mt. Edon, in Thrace, Greece.

The hills of heaven with wasting feet.
Songs they can stop that earth found meet,
But the stars keep their ageless rime, 135
Flowers they can slay that spring thought
sweet,
But the stars keep their spring sublime,
Passions and pleasures can defeat,
Actions and agonies control,
And life and death, but not the soul 140

Because man's soul is man's God still,
What wind soever waft his will
Across the waves of day and night
To port or shipwreck, left or right,
By shores and shoals of good and ill, 145
And still its flame at mainmast height
Through the rent air that foam-flakes fill Sustains the indomitable light
Whence only man hath strength to steer
Or helm to handle without fear. 150

Save his own soul's light overhead,
None leads him, and none ever led,
Across birth's hidden harbor-bar,
Past youth where shoreward shallows are,
Through age that drives on toward the red
Vast void of sunset hailed from far, 156
To the equal waters of the dead,
Save his own soul he hath no star,
And sinks, except his own soul guide,
Helmless in middle turn of tide. 160

No blast of air or fire of sun
Puts out the light whereby we run
With girdled loins our lamplit race
And each from each takes heart of grace
And spirit till his turn be done, 165
And light of face from each man's face
In whom the light of trust is one;
Since only souls that keep their place
By their own light, and watch things roll,
And stand, have light for any soul. 170

A little time we gain from time
To set our seasons in some chime,
For harsh or sweet or loud or low,
With seasons played out long ago
And souls that in their time and prime 175
Took part with summer or with snow,
Lived abject lives out or sublime,
And had their chance of seed to sow
For service or disservice done
To those days dead and this their son. 180

A little time that we may fill
Or with such good works or such ill
As loose the bonds or make them strong
Wherein all manhood suffers wrong

163ff lamplit race, etc., a reference to the ancient lampadedromy, a kind of relay race in which a torch or lighted lamp was passed by each runner to the next. The race was run in honor of some god or goddess.

By rose-hung river and light-foot rill 185
 There are who rest not; who think long
 Till they discern as from a hill
 At the sun's hour of morning song,
 Known of souls only, and those souls free,
 The sacred spaces of the sea. 190

SUPER FLUMINA BABYLONIS

By the waters of Babylon we sat down and wept,
 Remembering thee,
 That for ages of agony hast endured, and slept,
 And wouldst not see.

By the waters of Babylon we stood up and sang, 5
 Considering thee,
 That a blast of deliverance in the darkness rang,
 To set thee free.

And with trumpets and thunderings and with morning song
 Came up the light; 10
 And thy spirit uplifted thee to forget thy wrong
 As day doth night.

And thy sons were dejected not any more, as then
 When thou wast shamed,
 When thy lovers went heavily without heart, as men 15
 Whose life was maimed.

In the desolate distances, with a great desire,
 For thy love's sake,
 With our hearts going back to thee, they were filled with fire,
 Were nigh to break. 20

It was said to us: "Verily ye are great of heart,
 But ye shall bend;
 Ye are bondmen and bondwomen, to be scourged and smart,
 To toil and tend."

And with harrows men harrowed us, and subdued with spears, 25
 And crushed with shame,

And the summer and winter was, and the length of years,
 And no change came.

By the rivers of Italy, by the sacred streams,
 By town, by tower, 30
 There was feasting with reveling, there was sleep with dreams,
 Until thine hour.

And they slept and they rioted on their rose-hung beds,
 With mouths on flame,
 And with love-locks vine-chapleted, and with rose-crowned heads 35
 And robes of shame.

And they knew not their forefathers, nor the hills and streams
 And words of power,
 Nor the gods that were good to them, but with songs and dreams
 Filled up their hour. 40

By the rivers of Italy, by the dry streams' beds,
 When thy time came,
 There was casting of crowns from them, from their young men's heads,
 The crowns of shame.

By the horn of Eridanus, by the Tiber mouth, As thy day rose, 46
 They arose up and girded them to the north and south,
 By seas, by snows.

As a water in January the frost confines, Thy kings bound thee; 50
 As a water in April is, in the new-blown vines,
 Thy sons made free.

And thy lovers that looked for thee, and that mourned from far,
 For thy sake dead,
 We rejoiced in the light of thee, in the signal star 55
 Above thine head.

In thy grief had we followed thee, in thy passion loved,
 Loved in thy loss;
 In thy shame we stood fast to thee, with thy pangs were moved,
 Clung to thy cross. 60

By the hillside of Calvary we beheld thy blood,
 Thy blood-red tears,

Super Flumina Babylonis The title is translated in the first line, which is quoted from Psalms, 137 1—"By the rivers of Babylon, there we sat down, yea, we wept, when we remembered Zion." The Psalm refers to the afflictions of the Jews in captivity in Babylon, the great empire of western Asia. Swinburne has Italy in mind (See note on Prelude to Songs before Sunrise, page 693)

45. the horn of Eridanus, the delta of the River Po. Eridanus is its Greek name

As a mother's in bitterness, an unebbing flood,
Years upon years.

And the north was Gethsemane, without leaf or bloom, 65

A garden sealed,
And the south was Aceldama, for a sanguine
fume
Hid all the field.

By the stone of the sepulcher we returned to weep,

From far, from prison; 70
And the guards by it keeping it we beheld asleep,

But thou wast risen.

And an angel's similitude by the unsealed
grave,

And by the stone;
And the voice was angelical, to whose words
God gave 75

Strength like his own.

"Lo, the graveclothes of Italy that are folded up

In the grave's gloom!
And the guards as men wrought upon with a charméd cup,

By the open tomb. 80

"And her body most beautiful, and her shining head,

These are not here;
For your mother, for Italy, is not surely dead,
Have ye no fear.

"As of old time she spake to you, and you hardly heard, 85

Hardly took heed,
So now also she saith to you, yet another
word,

Who is risen indeed.

"By my saying she saith to you, in your ears
she saith,

Who hear these things, 90
Put no trust in men's royalties, nor in great men's breath,

Nor words of kings.

"For the life of them vanishes and is no more
seen,

Nor no more known;
Nor shall any remember him if a crown hath
been, 95

Or where a throne.

"Unto each man his handiwork, unto each
his crown,

The just Fate gives,
Whoso takes the world's life on him and his own lays down,

He, dying so, lives. 100

"Whoso bears the whole heaviness of the wronged world's weight

And puts it by,
It is well with him suffering, though he face
man's fate,

How should he die?

"Seeing death has no part in him any more,
no power 105

Upon his head,
He has bought his eternity with a little hour,
And is not dead.

"For an hour, if ye look for him, he is no more found,

For one hour's space; 110

Then ye lift up your eyes to him and behold him crowned,

A deathless face.

"On the mountains of memory, by the world's well-springs,

In all men's eyes,
Where the light of the life of him is on all past things, 115

Death only dies.

"Not the light that was quenched for us, nor the deeds that were,

Nor the ancient days,
Nor the sorrows not sorrowful, nor the face
most fair

Of perfect praise " 120

So the angel of Italy's resurrection said,
So yet he saith;

So the son of her suffering, that from breasts
nigh dead

Drew life, not death.

That the pavement of Golgotha should be white as snow, 125

Not red, but white;
That the waters of Babylon should no longer
flow,

And men see light.

HERTHA

I am that which began;
 Out of me the years roll;
 Out of me God and man;
 I am equal and whole;

God changes, and man, and the form of them
 bodily, I am the soul 5

Before ever land was,
 Before ever the sea,
 Or soft hair of the grass,
 Or fair limbs of the tree,
 Or the flesh-colored fruit of my branches, I was, and thy soul was in me. 10

First life on my sources
 First drifted and swam;
 Out of me are the foras
 That save it or damn;
 Out of me man and woman, and wild-beast and bird, before God was, I am. 15

Beside or above me
 Naught is there to go;
 Love or unlove me,
 Unknow me or know,
 I am that which unloves me and loves, I am stricken, and I am the blow. 20

I the mark that is missed
 And the arrows that miss,
 I the mouth that is kissed
 And the breath in the kiss,
 The search, and the sought, and the seeker,
 the soul and the body that is. 25

I am that thing which blesses
 My spirit elate;
 That which caresses
 With hands uncreate
 My limbs unbegotten that measure the length of the measure of fate. 30

But what thing dost thou now,
 Looking Godward, to cry,
 "I am I, thou art thou,
 I am low, thou art high?"

Hertha. Hertha was the ancient Germanic goddess of the earth, of fertility, and of growth. In Swinburne's conception, she is much vaster, being regarded as the evolution of the world-soul. Swinburne said of the poem "Of all I have done I rate Hertha highest as a single piece, finding in it the most of lyric force and music combined with the most of condensed and clarified thought" (letter to Stedman, Feb. 21, 1875).

15 before God was, I am Cf Exodus, 3:14—"And God said unto Moses, 'I AM THAT I AM'"; and John, 8:58—"Jesus said unto them, 'Verily, verily, I say unto you, Before Abraham was, I am.'" 20-40 I am the, etc. The thought of these lines is suggestive of Emerson's Brahma, especially lines 10-12—

"When me they fly, I am the wings;
 I am the doubter and the doubt,
 And I the hymn the Brahmin sings."

I am thou, whom thou seekest to find him, find thou but thyself, thou art I. 35

I the grain and the furrow,
 The plow-cloven clod
 And the plowshare drawn thorough,
 The germ and the sod,
 The deed and the doer, the seed and the sower, the dust which is God. 40

Hast thou known how I fashioned thee,
 Child, underground?
 Fire that impassioned thee,
 Iron that bound,
 Dim changes of water, what thing of all these hast thou known of or found? 45

Canst thou say in thine heart
 Thou has seen with thine eyes
 With what cunning of art
 Thou wast wrought in what wise,
 By what force of what stuff thou wast shapen,
 and shown on my breast to the skies? 50

Who hath given, who hath sold it thee,
 Knowledge of me?
 Hath the wilderness told it thee?
 Hast thou learnt of the sea?
 Hast thou communed in spirit with night?
 Have the winds taken counsel with thee?

Have I set such a star 56
 To show light on thy brow
 That thou sawest from afar
 What I show to thee now?
 Have ye spoken as brethren together, the sun
 and the mountains and thou? 60

What is here, dost thou know it?
 What was, hast thou known?
 Prophet nor poet
 Nor tripod nor throne
 Nor spirit nor flesh can make answer, but only thy mother alone. 65

Mother, not maker,
 Born, and not made,
 Though her children forsake her,
 Allured or afraid,
 Praying prayers to the God of their fashion,
 she stirs not for all that have prayed 70

A creed is a rod,
 And a crown is of night,

41ff Hast thou known, etc. With these questions compare the words spoken to Job by the Lord out of the whirlwind (Job, 38-39). 64 Nor tripod nor throne, neither priest nor king. The tripod was the altar, supported on three legs, on which the priestesses of Apollo at Delphi sat when they delivered their oracles. 67 Born, and not made. These lines are a protest against the idea of a single act of creation. Swinburne conceives nature as a continuous process of evolution.

But this thing is God,
 To be man with thy might,
 To grow straight in the strength of thy spirit,
 and live out thy life as the light 75

I am in thee to save thee,
 As my soul in thee saith;
 Give thou as I gave thee,
 Thy life-blood and breath,
 Green leaves of thy labor, white flowers of thy thought, and red fruit of thy death

Be the ways of thy giving 81
 As mine were to thee;
 The free life of thy living,
 Be the gift of it free,
 Not as servant to lord, nor as master to slave, shalt thou give thee to me 85

O children of banishment,
 Souls overcast,
 Were the lights ye see vanish meant
 Always to last,
 Ye would know not the sun overshadowing the shadows and stars overpast 90

I that saw where ye trod
 The dim paths of the night
 Set the shadow called God
 In your skies to give light;
 But the morning of manhood is risen, and the shadowless soul is in sight 95

The tree many-rooted
 That swells to the sky
 With frondage red-fruited,
 The life-tree am I,
 In the buds of your lives is the sap of my leaves; ye shall live and not die 100

But the gods of your fashion
 That take and that give,
 In their pity and passion
 That scourge and forgive,
 They are worms that are bred in the bark that falls off; they shall die and not live. 105

My own blood is what stanches
 The wounds in my bark;
 Stars caught in my branches
 Make day of the dark,
 And are worshiped as suns till the sunrise shall tread out their fires as a spark 110

Where dead ages hide under
 The live roots of the tree,
 In my darkness the thunder
 Makes utterance of me,

In the clash of my boughs with each other ye hear the waves sound of the sea 115

That noise is of Time,
 As his feathers are spread
 And his feet set to climb
 Through the boughs overhead,
 And my foliage rings round him and rustles,
 and branches are bent with his tread 120

The storm-winds of ages
 Blow through me and cease,
 The war-wind that rages,
 The spring-wind of peace,
 Ere the breath of them roughen my tresses,
 ere one of my blossoms increase 125

All sounds of all changes,
 All shadows and lights
 On the world's mountain-ranges
 And stream-riven heights,
 Whose tongue is the wind's tongue and language of storm-clouds on earth-shaking nights; 130

All forms of all faces,
 All works of all hands
 In unsearchable places
 Of time-stricken lands,
 All death and all life, and all reigns and all ruins, drop through me as sands 135

Though sore be my burden
 And more than ye know,
 And my growth have no guerdon
 But only to grow,
 Yet I fail not of growing for lightnings above me or deathworms below. 140

These too have their part in me,
 As I too in these;
 Such fire is at heart in me,
 Such sap is this tree's,
 Which hath in it all sounds and all secrets of infinite lands and of seas 145

In the spring-colored hours
 When my mind was as May's,
 There brake forth of me flowers
 By centuries of days,
 Strong blossoms with perfume of manhood,
 shot out from my spirit as rays. 150

And the sound of them springing
 And smell of their shoots
 Were as warmth and sweet singing
 And strength to my roots,
 And the lives of my children made perfect with freedom of soul were my fruits 155

88 lights, religious creeds and dogmas 96 The tree many-rooted, the mighty ash tree Yggdrasill, supposed, in Norse mythology, to support the entire universe

I bid you but be,
 I have need not of prayer,

I have need of you free
 As your mouths of mine air;
 That my heart may be greater within me,
 beholding the fruits of me fair. 160

More fair than strange fruit is
 Of faiths ye espouse,
 In me only the root is
 That blooms in your boughs;
 Behold now your God that ye made you, to feed him with faith of your vows. 165

In the darkening and whitening
 Abysses adored,
 With dayspring and lightning
 For lamp and for sword,
 God thunders in heaven, and his angels are red with the wrath of the Lord 170

O my sons, O too dutiful
 Toward gods not of me,
 Was not I enough beautiful?
 Was it hard to be free?
 For behold, I am with you, am in you and of you, look forth now and see. 175

Lo, winged with world's wonders,
 With miracles shod,
 With the fires of his thunders
 For raiment and rod,
 God trembles in heaven, and his angels are white with the terror of God. 180

For his twilight is come on him,
 His anguish is here;
 And his spirits gaze dumb on him,
 Grown gray from his fear;
 And his hour taketh hold on him stricken, the last of his infinite year. 185

Thought made him and breaks him,
 Truth slays and forgives;
 But to you, as time takes him,
 This new thing it gives,
 Even love, the beloved Republic, that feeds upon freedom and lives. 190

For truth only is living,
 Truth only is whole,
 And the love of his giving
 Man's polestar and pole;
 Man, pulse of my center, and fruit of my body, and seed of my soul; 195

One birth of my bosom,
 One beam of mine eye,
 One topmost blossom

181 his twilight. The idea of the twilight of the gods is derived from Norse mythology. This is the period, known as Ragnarok, which involves the destruction of the universe. After this period a new heaven and a new earth will arise out of the sea.

That scales the sky;
 Man, equal and one with me, man that is made of me, man that is I. 200

HYMN OF MAN

(DURING THE SESSION IN ROME OF THE ŒCUMENICAL COUNCIL)

In the gray beginning of years, in the twilight of things that began,
 The word of the earth in the ears of the world,
 was it God? was it man?
 The word of the earth to the spheres her sisters, the note of her song,
 The sound of her speech in the ears of the starry and sisterly throng,
 Was it praise or passion or prayer, was it love or devotion or dread, 5
 When the veils of the shining air first wrapped her jubilant head?
 When her eyes new-born of the night saw yet
 no star out of reach,
 When her maiden mouth was alight with the flame of musical speech,
 When her virgin feet were set on the terrible heavenly way,
 And her virginal lids were wet with the dew
 of the birth of the day — 10
 Eyes that had looked not on time, and ears that had heard not of death;
 Lips that had learned not the rime of change
 and passionate breath,
 The rhythmic anguish of growth, and the motion of mutable things,
 Of love that longs and is loath, and plume-
 plucked hope without wings, Passions and pains without number, and life
 that runs and is lame, 15
 From slumber again to slumber, the same race set for the same,
 Where the runners outwear each other, but running with lampless hands
 No man takes light from his brother till blind at the goal he stands —
 Ah, did they know, did they dream of it,
 counting the cost and the worth?
 The ways of her days, did they seem then good to the new-souled earth? 20
 Did her heart rejoice, and the might of her spirit exult in her then,
 Child yet no child of the night, and motherless mother of men?

Hymn of Man. The twenty-first Œcumenical (general) Council of the church met in Rome from December, 1869, to July, 1870. It voted for the dogma of the infallibility of the Pope on July 18, 1870. Swinburne characterized the Hymn to Proserpine (page 676) and the Hymn of Man as "the deathsong of spiritual decadence and the birthsong of spiritual renaissance."

21ff. Did her heart rejoice, etc. The idea expressed in these lines is frequently found in literature. See Critical Notes.

Was it Love brake forth flower-fashion, a bird with gold on his wings,
 Lovely, her firstborn passion, and impulse of firstborn things?
 Was Love that nestling indeed that under the plumes of the night 25
 Was hatched and hidden as seed in the furrow, and brought forth bright?
 Was it Love lay shut in the shell world-shaped, having over him there Black world-wide wings that impel the might of the night through air?
 And bursting his shell as a bird, night shook through her sail-stretched vans,
 And her heart as a water was stirred, and its heat was the firstborn man's. 30
 For the waste of the dead void air took form of a world at birth,
 And the waters and firmaments were, and light, and the life-giving earth.
 The beautiful bird unbegotten that night brought forth without pain
 In the fathomless years forgotten whereover
 the dead gods reign,
 Was it love, life, godhead, or fate? We say the spirit is one 35
 That moved on the dark to create out of darkness the stars and the sun.
 Before the growth was the grower, and the seed ere the plant was sown;
 But what was seed of the sower? and the grain of him, whence was it grown?
 Foot after foot ye go back and travail and make yourselves mad;
 Blind feet that feel for the track where highway is none to be had. 40
 Therefore the God that ye make you is grievous, and gives not aid,
 Because it is but for your sake that the God
 of your making is made.
 'Thou and I and he are not gods made men
 for a span,
 But God, if a God there be, is the substance of men which is man.
 Our lives are as pulses of pores of his manifold body and breath; 45
 As waves of his sea on the shores where birth is the beacon of death.
 We men, the multiform features of man, whatsoever we be,
 Re-create him of whom we are creatures, and all we only are he.
 For each man of all men is God, but God is the fruit of the whole;
 Indivisible spirit and blood, indiscernible body from soul. 50
 Not men's but man's is the glory of godhead,
 the kingdom of time,

35-36 spirit . . . sun. Cf the story of creation in Genesis, 1.

The mountainous ages made hoary with snows
 for the spirit to climb.
 A God with the world inwound whose clay to his footsole clings;
 A manifold God fast-bound as with iron of adverse things.
 A soul that labors and lives, an emotion, a strenuous breath, 55
 From the flame that its own mouth gives reillumed, and refreshed with death.
 In the sea whereof centuries are waves the live God plunges and swims;
 His bed is in all men's graves, but the worm
 hath not hold on his limbs.
 Night puts out not his eyes, nor time sheds change on his head;
 With such fire as the stars of the skies are the roots of his heart are fed. 60 Men are the thoughts passing through it, the veins that fulfill it with blood,
 With spirit of sense to renew it as springs fulfilling a flood.
 Men are the heartbeats of man, the plumes
 that feather his wings,
 Storm-worn, since being began, with the wind and thunder of things.
 Things are cruel and blind; their strength
 detains and deforms; 65
 And the wearying wings of the mind still beat up the stream of their storms
 Still, as one swimming upstream, they strike out blind in the blast,
 In thunders of vision and dream, and lightnings of future and past.
 We are baffled and caught in the current and bruised upon edges of shoals;
 As weeds or as reeds in the torrent of things are the wind-shaken souls. 70
 Spirit by spirit goes under, a foam-bell's bubble of breath,
 That blows and opens in sunder and blurs not the mirror of death.
 For a worm or a thorn in his path is a man's soul quenched as a flame;
 For his lust of an hour or his wrath shall the worm and the man be the same O God sore stricken of things! they have wrought him a raiment of pain; 75
 Can a God shut eyelids and wings at a touch on the nerves of the brain?
 O shamed and sorrowful God, whose force goes out at a blow!
 What world shall shake at his nod? at his coming what wilderness glow?
 What help in the work of his hands? what light in the track of his feet?
 His days are snowflakes or sands, with cold to consume him and heat. 80
 He is servant with Change for lord, and for wages he hath to his hire

Folly and force, and a sword that devours, and a ravening fire.
From the bed of his birth to his grave he is driven as a wind at their will;
Lest Change bow down as his slave, and the storm and the sword be still;
Lest earth spread open her wings to the sun-ward, and sing with the spheres, 85
Lest man be master of things, to prevail on their forces and fears.
By the spirit are things overcome; they are stark, and the spirit hath breath;
It hath speech, and their forces are dumb; it is living, and things are of death.
But they know not the spirit for master, they feel not force from above,
While man makes love to disaster, and woos desolation with love. 90
Yea, himself too hath made himself chains,
and his own hands plucked out his eyes;
For his own soul only constrains him, his own mouth only denies.
The herds of kings and their hosts and the flocks of the high priests bow
To a master whose face is a ghost's; O thou that wast God, is it thou?
Thou madest man in the garden; thou tempt-edst man, and he fell; 95
Thou gavest him poison and pardon for blood and burnt-offering to sell.
Thou hast sealed thine elect to salvation, fast locked with faith for the key;
Make now for thyself expiation, and be thine atonement for thee.
Ah, thou that darkenest heaven — ah, thou that bringest a sword —
By the crimes of thine hands unforgiven they beseech thee to hear them, O Lord. 100
By the balefires of ages that burn for thine
incense, by creed and by rood,
By the famine and passion that yearn and that hunger to find of thee food,
By the children that asked at thy throne of the priests that were fat with thine hire
For bread, and thou gavest a stone; for light,
and thou madest them fire;
By the kiss of thy peace like a snake's kiss,
that leaves the soul rotten at root; 105
By the savors of gibbets and stakes thou hast planted to bear to thee fruit;
By torture and terror and treason, that make to thee weapons and wings;
By thy power upon men for a season, made out of the malice of things;

85 sing with the spheres. The ancients believed that the stars made music as they revolved in their spheres 99 thou . . . sword Cf Matthew, 10 34 — "Think not that I am come to send peace on earth, I came not to send peace, but a sword" 101. balefires, funeral pyres. rood, cross 104 bread . . . stone. From Christ's Sermon on the Mount, Matthew, 7 9 — "What man is there of you, whom if his son ask bread, will he give him a stone?"

O thou that hast built thee a shrine of the madness of man and his shame,
And hast hung in the midst for a sign of his worship the lamp of thy name; 110
That hast shown him for heaven in a vision
a void world's shadow and shell,
And hast fed thy delight and derision with fire of belief as of hell;
That hast fleshed on the souls that believe thee the fang of the death-worm fear,
With anguish of dreams to deceive them whose faith cries out in thine ear;
By the face of the spirit confounded before thee humbled in dust, 115
By the dread wherewith life was astounded and shamed out of sense of its trust,
By the scourges of doubt and repentance that fell on the soul at thy nod, Thou art judged, O judge, and the sentence is gone forth against thee, O God.
Thy slave that slept is awake; thy slave but slept for a span,
Yea, man thy slave shall unmake thee, who made thee lord over man 120
For his face is set to the east, his feet on the past and its dead,
The sun rearisen is his priest, and the heat thereof hallows his head.
His eyes take part in the morning, his spirit
outsounding the sea
Asks no more witness or warning from temple or tripod or tree.
He hath set the centuries at union; the night
is afraid at his name; 125 Equal with life, in communion with death, he hath found them the same.
Past the wall unsurmounted that bars out our vision with iron and fire
He hath sent forth his soul for the stars to comply with and suns to conspire.
His thought takes flight for the center where-through it hath part in the whole,
The abysses forbid it not enter — the stars make room for the soul. 130
Space is the soul's to inherit; the night is hers
as the day;
Lo, saith man, this is my spirit, how shall not the worlds make way?
Space is thought's, and the wonders thereof,
and the secret of space;
Is thought not more than the thunders and lightnings? shall thought give place?
Is the body not more than the vesture, the life not more than the meat? 135
The will than the word or the gesture, the heart than the hands or the feet?

124 tripod See note on Hertha, 64, page 697 tree, the cross 135 body . . . meat From Christ's Sermon on the Mount, Matthew, 6 25 — "Is not the life more than meat, and the body than raiment?"

Is the tongue not more than the speech is? the head not more than the crown?
 And if higher than is heaven be the reach of the soul, shall not heaven bow down?
 Time, father of life, and more great than the life it begat and began,
 Earth's keeper and heaven's and their fate, lives, thinks, and hath substance in
 man. 140
 Time's motion that throbs in his blood is the thought that gives heart to the skies,
 And the springs of the fire that is food to the sunbeams are light to his eyes.
 The minutes that beat with his heart are the words to which worlds keep chime,
 And the thought in his pulses is part of the blood and the spirit of time
 He saith to the ages, Give, and his soul forgoes not her share; 145
 Who are ye that forbid him to live, and would feed him with heavenlier air?
 Will ye feed him with poisonous dust, and restore him with hemlock for drink, Till he yield you his soul up in trust, and have heart not to know or to think?
 He hath stirred him, and found out the flaw
 in his fetters, and cast them behind,
 His soul to his soul is a law, and his mind is a light to his mind. 150
 The seal of his knowledge is sure, the truth
 and his spirit are wed;
 Men perish, but man shall endure; lives die,
 but the life is not dead.
 He hath sight of the secrets of season, the roots of the years and the fruits;
 His soul is at one with the reason of things that is sap to the roots.
 He can hear in their changes a sound as the conscience of consonant spheres; 155
 He can see through the years flowing round him the law lying under the years.
 Who are ye that would bind him with curses
 and blind him with vapor of prayer?
 Your might is as night that disperses when light is alive in the air.
 The bow of your godhead is broken, the arm of your conquest is stayed; Though ye call down God to bear token, for fear of you none is afraid 160
 Will ye turn back times, and the courses of stars, and the season of souls?
 Shall God's breath dry up the sources that feed time full as it rolls?
 Nay, cry on him then till he show you a sign,
 till he lift up a rod;
 Hath he made not the nations to know him
 of old if indeed he be God?
 Is no heat of him left in the ashes of thousands burnt up for his sake? 165

Can prayer not rekindle the flashes that shone in his face from the stake?
 Cry aloud, for your God is a God and a Savior; cry, make yourselves lean,
 Is he drunk or asleep, that the rod of his wrath is unfelt and unseen?
 Is the fire of his old loving-kindness gone out,
 that his pyres are acold?
 Hath he gazed on himself unto blindness, who made men blind to behold? 170
 Cry out, for his kingdom is shaken, cry out,
 for the people blaspheme;
 Cry aloud till his godhead awaken; what doth
 he to sleep and to dream?
 Cry, cut yourselves, gash you with knives and with scourges, heap on to you dust,
 Is his life but as other gods' lives? is not this the Lord God of your trust?
 Is not this the great God of your sires, that with souls and with bodies was fed, 175
 And the world was on flame with his fires?
 O fools, he was God, and is dead.
 He will hear not again the strong crying of earth in his ears as before,
 And the fume of his multitudes dying shall flatter his nostrils no more.
 By the spirit he ruled as his slave is he slain
 who was mighty to slay,
 And the stone that is sealed on his grave he shall rise not and roll not away 180 Yea, weep to him, lift up your hands, be your eyes as a fountain of tears,
 Where he stood there is nothing that stands,
 if he call, there is no man that hears
 He hath doffed his king's raiment of lies now
 the wane of his kingdom is come;
 Ears hath he, and hears not; and eyes, and he sees not; and mouth, and is dumb.
 His red king's raiment is ripped from him
 naked, his staff broken down, 185
 And the signs of his empire are stripped from him shuddering, and where is his crown?
 And in vain by the wellsprings refrozen ye cry for the warmth of his sun —
 O God, the Lord God of thy chosen, thy will in thy kingdom be done
 Kingdom and will hath he none in him left him, nor warmth in his breath,
 Till his corpse be cast out of the sun will ye know not the truth of his death? 190 Surely, ye say, he is strong, though the times
 be against him and men,

167ff Cry aloud, etc Taken from 1 Kings, 18 19-40, where Elijah rebukes and destroys the prophets of Baal — "And it came to pass at noon that Elijah mocked them, and said, 'Cry aloud for he is a god, either he is talking, or he is pursuing, or he is in a journey, or peradventure he sleepeth, and must be awaked.' And they cried aloud, and cut themselves after their manner with knives and lancets, till the blood gushed out upon them" (verses 27-28) 184 Ears . . . dumb. Cf Psalms, 115 4-6 — "Their idols are silver and gold, the work of men's hands. They have mouths, but they speak not, eyes have they, but they see not, they have ears, but they hear not."

Yet a little, ye say, and how long, till he come to show judgment again?
Shall God then die as the beasts die? who is it hath broken his rod?
O God, Lord God of thy priests, rise up now and show thyself God.
They cry out, thine elect, thine aspirants to heavenward, whose faith is as flame;
O thou the Lord God of our tyrants, they call thee, their God, by thy name 196
By thy name that in hell-fire was written, and burned at the point of thy sword,
Thou art smitten, thou God, thou art smitten,
thy death is upon thee, O Lord.
And the love-song of earth as thou diest re-sounds through the wind of her wings—Glory to Man in the highest! for Man is the master of things. 200

THE PILGRIMS

Who is your lady of love, O ye that pass
Singing? and is it for sorrow of that which was That ye sing sadly, or dream of what shall
be?
For gladly at once and sadly it seems ye sing.
— Our lady of love by you is unbeholden; 5
For hands she hath none, nor eyes, nor lips, nor golden
Treasure of hair, nor face nor form; but we
That love, we know her more fair than anything.
— Is she a queen, having great gifts to give?
— Yea, these: that whoso hath seen her shall not live 10
Except he serve her sorrowing, with strange
pain,
Travail and bloodshedding and bit-
terer tears,
And when she bids die he shall surely die
And he shall leave all things under the sky
And go forth naked under sun and rain 15
And work and wait and watch out all his years.
— Hath she on earth no place of habitation?
— Age to age calling, nation answering nation,
Cries out, Where is she? and there is none to say; 19
For if she be not in the spirit of men,
For if in the inward soul she hath no place,
In vain they cry unto her, seeking her face,

200 Glory . . . highest. Cf Luke, 2 14—"Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men"
The Pilgrims. This poem pays tribute to the great spirits of the earth who in spite of hardship and death have dedicated themselves to the cause of humanity, the lady of love of line 1
It is in the form of a dialogue between those spirits and then fellowmen who live only for themselves

In vain their mouths make much of her,
for they
Cry with vain tongues, till the heart lives
again.
— O ye that follow, and have ye no repentance? 25
For on your brows is written a mortal sentence,
An hieroglyph of sorrow, a fiery sign,
That in your lives ye shall not pause or
rest,
Nor have the sure sweet common love, nor keep
Friends and safe days, nor joy of life nor
sleep. 30
— These have we not, who have one thing,
the divine
Face and clear eyes of faith and fruitful
breast.

— And ye shall die before your thrones be won.
— Yea, and the changed world and the liberal sun
Shall move and shine without us, and we
lie 35
Dead, but if she too move on earth and live,
But if the old world with all the old irons rent
Laugh and give thanks, shall we be not content?
Nay, we shall rather live, we shall not die,
Life being so little and death so good to give. 40
— And these men shall forget you. — Yea, but we Shall be a part of the earth and the ancient
sea,
And heaven-high air august, and awful fire,
And all things good; and no man's heart shall beat
But somewhat in it of our blood once shed 45 Shall quiver and quicken, as now in us the
dead
Blood of men slain and the old same life's
desire
Plants in their fiery footprints our fresh
feet.
— But ye that might be clothed with all things pleasant,
Ye are foolish that put off the fair soft present, 50
That clothe yourselves with the cold future
air;
When mother and father and tender sister and brother

And the old live love that was shall be as ye,
Dust, and no fruit of loving life shall be.

— She shall be yet who is more than all these were, 55
Than sister or wife or father unto us or mother.

— Is this worth life, is this, to win for wages?
Lo, the dead mouths of the awful gray-grown ages,

The venerable, in the past that is their
prison,

In the outer darkness, in the unopening
grave, 60
Laugh, knowing how many as ye now say have said,

How many, and all are fallen, are fallen and
dead,
Shall ye dead rise, and these dead have not risen?

— Not we but she, who is tender and swift to save.

— Are ye not weary and faint not by the
way, 65
Seeing night by night devoured of day by day,
Seeing hour by hour consumed in sleepless
fire?

Sleepless; and ye too, when shall ye too
sleep?

— We are weary in heart and head, in hands
and feet,
And surely more than all things sleep were
sweet, 70

Than all things save the inexorable desire
Which whoso knoweth shall neither faint nor weep.

— Is this so sweet that one were fain to follow?
Is this so sure where all men's hopes are hollow,

Even this your dream, that by much tribulation 75

Ye shall make whole flawed hearts, and bowed necks straight?

— Nay, though our life were blind, our death
were fruitless,

Not therefore were the whole world's high
hope rootless;

But man to man, nation would turn to nation,

And the old life live, and the old great word be great. 80

— Pass on then and pass by us and let us be,
For what light think ye after life to see?
And if the world fare better will ye know?

56 Than sister, etc Cf. Luke, 14 26 — "If any man come to me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sister, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple"

And if man triumph who shall seek you and say?

— Enough of light is this for one life's span, as
That all men born are mortal, but not man,
And we men bring death lives by night to sow,

That man may reap and eat and live by
day. (1871)

TO WALT WHITMAN IN AMERICA

Send but a song oversea for us,
Heart of their hearts who are free,
Heart of their singer, to be for us
More than our singing can be;
Ours, in the tempest at error, 5
With no light but the twilight of terror;
Send us a song oversea!

Sweet-smelling of pine-leaves and grasses,
And blown as a tree through and through
With the winds of the keen mountain-passes,
And tender as sun-smitten dew; 11
Sharp-tongued as the winter that shakes
The wastes of your limitless lakes,
Wide-eyed as the sea-line's blue.

O strong-winged soul with prophetic 15
Lips hot with the bloodbeats of song,
With tremor of heartstrings magnetic,
With thoughts as thunders in throng,
With consonant ardors of chords
That pierce men's souls as with swords 20
And hale them hearing along,

Make us, too, music, to be with us
As a word from a world's heart warm;
To sail the dark as a sea with us,
Full-sailed, outsinging the storm, 25
A song to put fire in our ears
Whose burning shall burn up tears,
Whose sign bid battle reform;

A note in the ranks of a clarion,
A word in the wind of cheer, 30
To consume as with lightning the carrion
That makes time foul for us here;
In the air that our dead things infest
A blast of the breath of the west,
Till east way as west way is clear. 35

Out of the sun beyond sunset,
From the evening whence morning shall be,
With the rollers in measureless onset,
With the van of the storming sea,

87 bring . . . sow Cf. 1 Corinthians, 15 36-38 — "That which thou sowest is not quickened, except it die And that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body that shall be, but bare grain But God giveth it a body as it hath pleased him, and to every seed his own body"
To Walt Whitman in America. See Critical Notes.
19. consonant, harmonious.

With the world-wide wind, with the breath 40
That breaks ships driven upon death,
With the passion of all things free,

With the sea-steeds footless and frantic,
White myriads for death to bestride
In the charge of the ruining Atlantic 45
Where deaths by regiments ride,
With clouds and clamors of waters,
With a long note shriller than slaughter's
On the furrowless fields world-wide,

With terror, with ardor and wonder, 50
With the soul of the season that wakes
When the weight of a whole year's thunder
In the tidestream of autumn breaks,
Let the flight of the wide-winged word
Come over, come in and be heard, 55
Take form and fire for our sakes.

For a continent bloodless with travail
Here toils and brawls as it can,
And the web of it who shall unravel
Of all that peer on the plan; 60
Would fain grow men, but they grow not,
And fain be free, but they know not
One name for freedom and man?

One name, not twain for division;
One thing, not twain, from the birth; 65
Spirit and substance and vision,
Worth more than worship is worth;
Unbeheld, unadored, undivined,
The cause, the center, the mind,
The secret and sense of the earth 70

Here as a weakling in irons,
Here as a weanling in bands,
As a prey that the stake-net environs,
Our life that we looked for stands; 75
And the man-child naked and dear,
Democracy, turns on us here
Eyes trembling, with tremulous hands.

It sees not what season shall bring to it
Sweet fruit of its bitter desire;
Few voices it hears yet sing to it, 80
Few pulses of hearts reaspire,
Foresees not time, nor forehears
The noises of imminent years,
Earthquake, and thunder, and fire;

When crowned and weaponed and curbless 85
It shall walk, without helm or shield,
The bare burnt furrows and herbless
Of war's last flame-stricken field —
Till godlike, equal with time,
It stand in the sun sublime, 90
In the godhead of man revealed

Round your people and over them
Light like raiment is drawn,
Close as a garment to cover them,
Wrought not of mail nor of lawn, 95
Here, with hope hardly to wear,
Naked nations and bare
Swim, sink, strike out for the dawn.

Chains are here, and a prison,
Kings, and subjects, and shame; 100
If the God upon you be arisen,
How should our songs be the same?
How, in confusion of change,
How shall we sing, in a strange
Land, songs praising his name? 105

God is buried and dead to us,
Even the spirit of earth,
Freedom; so have they said to us,
Some with mocking and mirth,
Some with heartbreak and tears; 110
And a God without eyes, without ears,
Who shall sing of him, dead in the birth?

The earth god Freedom, the lonely
Face lightening, the footprint unshod,
Not as one man crucified only, 115
Nor scourged with but one life's rod,
The soul that is substance of nations,
Reincarnate with fresh generations;
The great god Man, which is God.

But in weariest of years and obscurest 120
Doth it live not at heart of all things,
The one God and one spirit, a purest
Life, fed from unstanchable springs?
Within love, within hatred it is,
And its seed in the stripe as the kiss, 125
And in slaves is the germ, and in kings.

Freedom we call it, for holier
Name of the soul's there is none,
Surelier it labors, if slower,
Than the meters of star or of sun; 130
Slower than life into breath,
Surelier than time into death,
It moves till its labor be done —

Till the motion be done and the measure
Circling through season and clime, 135
Slumber and sorrow and pleasure,
Vision of virtue and crime;
Till consummate with conquering eyes,
A soul disembodied, it rise
From the body transfigured of time; 140

Till it rise and remain and take station
With the stars of the worlds that rejoice;

73 stake-net, a fishing net usually set in shallow water, held in a vertical position by means of stakes

115 Not as one man, etc. Swinburne means that others besides Christ have suffered martyrdom in the name of Freedom. 125 the stripe, the mark of the lash

Till the voice of its heart's exultation
 Be as theirs an invariable voice;
 By no discord of evil estranged, 145
 By no pause, by no breach in it changed,
 By no clash in the chord of its choice.

It is one with the world's generations,
 With the spirit, the star and the sod; 149
 With the kingless and king-stricken nations,
 With the cross, and the chain, and the rod,
 The most high, the most secret, most lonely,
 The earth-soul Freedom, that only
 Lives, and that only is God.

COR CORDIUM

O heart of hearts, the chalice of love's fire,
 Hid round with flowers and all the bounty
 of bloom,

O wonderful and perfect heart, for whom
 The lyrist liberty made life a lyre;
 O heavenly heart, at whose most dear desire Dead love, living and singing, cleft his tomb, 6

And with him risen and regent in death's room

All day thy choral pulses rang full choir;
 O heart whose beating blood was running
 song,

O sole thing sweeter than thine own songs
 were, 10

Help us for thy free love's sake to be free,
 True for thy truth's sake, for thy strength's sake strong,

Till very liberty make clean and fair
 The nursing earth as the sepulchral sea.

THE SONG OF THE STANDARD

Maiden most beautiful, mother most bountiful, lady of lands,

Queen and republican, crowned of the centuries whose years are thy sands,
 See for thy sake what we bring to thee, Italy,
 here in our hands.

This is the banner thy gonfalon, fair in the front of thy fight,

Cor Cordium. The title means Heart of Hearts. These are the words inscribed upon Shelley's tomb in Rome, they were suggested by Leigh Hunt, Shelley's friend. See Watson's Shelley's Centenary, page 900.

The Song of the Standard. This poem is addressed to Italy with her flag of three colors—red, white, and green. Although the country had won its freedom and was set up as a limited monarchy under Victor Emmanuel, the first king of Italy (1861-78), Swinburne still cherished the idea of an Italian republic.

4 gonfalon, an ensign or standard hung from a crosspiece or frame instead of from a staff.

Red from the hearts that were pierced for thee, white as thy mountains are white,
 Green as the spring of thy soul everlasting, whose life-blood is light. 6

Take to thy bosom thy banner, a fair bird fit for the nest,
 Feathered for flight into sunrise or sunset, for eastward or west,
 Fledged for the flight everlasting, but held yet warm to thy breast.

Gather it close to thee, song-bird or storm-bearer, eagle or dove, 10
 Lift it to sunward, a beacon beneath to the beacon above,
 Green as our hope in it, white as our faith in it, red as our love.

Thunder and splendor of lightning are hid in the folds of it furled;
 Who shall unroll it but thou, as thy bolt to be handled and hurled,
 Out of whose lips is the honey, whose bosom
 the milk of the world? 15

Out of thine hands hast thou fed us with pasture of color and song;
 Glory and beauty by birthright to thee as thy garments belong;
 Out of thine hands thou shalt give us as surely deliverance from wrong

Out of thine eyes thou hast shed on us love
 as a lamp in our night,
 Wisdom a lodestar to ships, and remembrance
 a flame-colored light; 20
 Out of thine eyes thou shalt show us as surely the sundawn of right.

Turn to us, speak to us, Italy, mother, but once and a word,
 None shall not follow thee, none shall not serve thee, not one that has heard, Twice hast thou spoken a message, and time is athirst for the third

Kingdom and empire of peoples thou hadst, and thy lordship made one 25
 North sea and south sea and east men and west men that look on the sun;
 Spirit was in thee and counsel, when soul in the nations was none.

Banner and beacon thou wast to the centuries of storm-wind and foam,

24 Twice . . . message The first time (lines 25-27) was when Rome exercised sovereignty over the nations of the ancient world. The second (lines 28-30) was when Rome, through the Renaissance, saved Europe from the chaos of the Dark Ages.

Ages that clashed in the dark with each other,
and years without home;
Empress and prophetess wast thou, and what wilt thou now be, O Rome? 30

Ah, by the faith and the hope and the love
that have need of thee now, Shines not thy face with the forethought of freedom, and burns not thy brow?
Who is against her but all men? and who is beside her but thou?

Art thou not better than all men? and where shall she turn but to thee?
Lo, not a breath, not a beam, not a beacon
from midland to sea; 35
Freedom cries out for a sign among nations, and none will be free.

England in doubt of her, France in despair of her, all without heart —
Stand on her side in the vanward of ages, and strike on her part!
Strike but one stroke for the love of her love of thee, sweet that thou art!

Take in thy right hand thy banner, a strong staff fit for thine hand; 40
Forth at the light of it lifted shall foul things flock from the land;
Faster than stars from the sun shall they fly,
being lighter than sand.

Green thing to green in the summer makes answer, and rose-tree to rose;
Lily by lily the year becomes perfect, and none of us knows
What thing is fairest of all things on earth as it brightens and blows. 45

This thing is fairest in all time of all things,
in all time is best — Freedom, that made thee, our mother, and suckled her sons at thy breast;
Take to thy bosom the nations, and there shall the world come to rest. (1871)

“NON DOLET”

It does not hurt. She looked along the knife
Smiling, and watched the thick drops mix and run
Down the sheer blade; not that which had been done

“Non Dolet” The title means It Does Not Hurt. When Pætus Cæcina, who was ordered by Claudius I., emperor of Rome (41-54 A.D.), to kill himself, hesitated to strike the blow, his wife Arria seized the dagger, plunged it into her own breast, and handed the bloody weapon to her husband, saying “Pæte, non dolet.” The incident is mentioned by Pliny, Letter 316, 6

Could hurt the sweet sense of the Roman
wife, 4
But that which was to do yet ere the strife
Could end for each forever, and the sun;
Nor was the palm yet, nor was peace yet
won,
While pain had power upon her husband’s life.

It does not hurt, Italia Thou art more Than bride to bridegroom; how shalt thou not take 10
The gift love’s blood has reddened for thy sake?
Was not thy lifeblood given for us before?
And if love’s heartblood can avail thy need,
And thou not die, how should it hurt
indeed? (1871)

THE OBLATION

Ask nothing more of me, sweet;
All I can give you I give.
Heart of my heart, were it more,
More would be laid at your feet —
Love that should help you to live, 5
Song that should spur you to soar.

All things were nothing to give,
Once to have sense of you more,
Touch you and taste of you, sweet,
Think you and breathe you and live, 10
Swept of your wings as they soar,
Trodden by chance of your feet.

I that have love and no more
Give you but love of you, sweet.
He that hath more, let him give; 15
He that hath wings, let him soar;
Mine is the heart at your feet
Here, that must love you to live
(1871)

From TRISTRAM OF LYONESSE

PRELUDE. TRISTRAM AND ISEULT

Love, that is first and last of all things made,
The light that has the living world for shade
The spirit that for temporal veil has on
The souls of all men woven in unison,
One fiery raiment with all lives inwrought 5
And lights of sunny and starry deed and
thought,
And always through new act and passion new Shines the divine same body and beauty
through,
The body spiritual of fire and light
That is to worldly noon as noon to night, 10

The Oblation This poem is addressed to Liberty.
Tristram of Lyonesse See Critical Notes

Love, that is flesh upon the spirit of man
 And spirit within the flesh whence breath began;
 Love, that keeps all the choir of lives in
 chime;
 Love, that is blood within the veins of time;
 That wrought the whole world without stroke
 of hand, 15
 Shaping the breadth of sea, the length of land,
 And with the pulse and motion of his breath
 Through the great heart of the earth strikes life and death,
 The sweet twain chords that make the sweet tune live
 Through day and night of things alternative,
 Through silence and through sound of stress and strife, 21
 And ebb and flow of dying death and life;
 Love, that sounds loud or light in all men's
 ears,
 Whence all men's eyes take fire from sparks
 of tears,
 That binds on all men's feet or chains or
 wings, 25
 Love, that is root and fruit of terrene things;
 Love, that the whole world's waters shall not drown,
 The whole world's fiery forces not burn down,
 Love, that what time his own hands guard his head
 The whole world's wrath and strength shall not strike dead; 30
 Love, that if once his own hands make his
 grave
 The whole world's pity and sorrow shall not save;
 Love, that for very life shall not be sold,
 Nor bought nor bound with iron nor with
 gold,
 So strong that heaven, could love bid heaven
 farewell, 35
 Would turn to fruitless and unflowering hell,
 So sweet that hell, to hell could love be given,
 Would turn to splendid and sonorous heaven,
 Love that is fire within thee and light above,
 And lives by grace of nothing but of love; 40
 Through many and lovely thoughts and much
 desire
 Led these twain to the life of tears and fire;
 Through many and lovely days and much
 delight
 Led these twain to the lifeless life of night.
 Yea, but what then? albeit all this were thus, 45
 And soul smote soul and left it ruinous,
 And love led love as eyeless men lead
 men,

Through chance by chance to deathward —
 ah, what then?
 Hath love not likewise led them further
 yet,
 Out through the years where memories rise and set, 50
 Some large as suns, some moon-like warm
 and pale,
 Some starry-sighted, some through clouds that sail
 Seen as red flame through spectral float of
 fume,
 Each with the blush of its own special bloom
 On the fair face of its own colored light, 55
 Distinguishable in all the host of night,
 Divisible from all the radiant rest
 And separable in splendor? Hath the best
 Light of love's all, of all that burn and move,
 A better heaven than heaven is? Hath not
 love 60
 Made for all these their sweet particular air
 To shine in, their own beams and names to
 bear,
 Their ways to wander and their wards to keep,
 Till story and song and glory and all things
 sleep?
 Hath he not plucked from death of lovers
 dead 65
 Their musical soft memories, and kept red
 The rose of their remembrance in men's eyes,
 The sunsets of their stories in his skies,
 The blush of their dead blood in lips that
 speak
 Of their dead lives, and in the listener's cheek
 That trembles with the kindling pity lit 71
 In gracious hearts for some sweet fever-fit,
 A fiery pity enkindled of pure thought
 By tales that make their honey out of naught,
 The faithless faith that lives without belief 75
 Its light life through, the griefless ghost of grief?
 Yea, as warm night refashions the sear blood
 In storm-struck petal or in sun-struck bud,
 With tender hours and tempering dew to cure
 The hunger and thirst of day's distemperature
 And ravin of the dry discoloring hours, 81
 Hath he not bid relume their flameless flowers
 With summer fire and heat of lamping song,
 And bid the short-lived things, long dead, live
 long, 84
 And thought remake their wan funereal fames,
 And the sweet shining signs of women's names
 That mark the months out and the weeks
 anew
 He moves in changeless change of seasons
 through
 To fill the days up of his dateless year

26 terrene, earthly. 42 these twain, Tristram and Isolt.

81 ravin, ravenous hunger 83 lamping, lighting, illuminating 89 dateless year, eternity

Flame from Queen Helen to Queen Guenevere? 90
 For first of all the sphery signs whereby
 Love severs light from darkness, and most high,
 In the white front of January there glows
 The rose-red sign of Helen like a rose;
 And gold-eyed as the shore-flower shelterless
 Whereon the sharp-breathed sea blows bitterness, 96
 A storm-star that the seafarers of love
 Strain their wind-wearied eyes for glimpses of, Shoots keen through February's gray frost and damp
 The lamplike star of Hero for a lamp; 100
 The star that Marlowe sang into our skies
 With mouth of gold, and morning in his eyes;
 And in clear March across the rough blue sea
 The signal sapphire of Alcyone
 Makes bright the blown brows of the wind-foot year; 105
 And shining like a sunbeam-smitten tear
 Full ere it fall, the fair next sign in sight
 Burns opal-wise with April-colored light
 When air is quick with song and rain and
 flame,
 My birth-month star that in love's heaven
 hath name 110
 Iseult, a light of blossom and beam and shower,
 My singing sign that makes the song-tree
 flower;
 Next like a pale and burning pearl beyond
 The rose-white sphere of flower-named Rosamond
 Signs the sweet head of Maytime; and for June 115
 Flares like an angered and storm-reddening
 moon
 Her signal sphere, whose Carthaginian pyre
 Shadowed her traitor's flying sail with fire,
 Next, glittering as the wine-bright jacinth-
 stone,

90 Flame The construction is. Hath he not bid the sweet signs of women's names . . . flame from, etc. Supply that before line 88, it refers to months and weeks Queen Helen. See note on A Dream of Fair Women, 85, page 32. Queen Guenevere Her love for Lancelot is a central theme of Arthurian romance. See Idylls of the King, page 119, and Critical Notes 91 sphery signs, the signs of the zodiac. Swinburne assigns a heroine to each sign. 100 Hero, a priestess of Aphrodite (Venus) in the city of Sestos, on the Hellespont, she was loved by Leander, who swam the Hellespont nightly to see her. Marlowe treated the theme in his Hero and Leander. 104 Alcyone, Halcyone, the daughter of Aeolus, god of the winds. When Halcyone learned that her husband Ceyx was drowned, she threw herself into the sea and was changed into a kingfisher. 105 wind-foot, swiftly passing. 110 My . . . star. Swinburne was born in April. 111 Iseult. This Iseult was the wife of King Mark, of Cornwall. See Arnold's Tristramp and Iseult and note, page 442. 114 Rosamond. See note on A Dream of Fair Women, 251, page 34. 117 Her signal sphere. After Dido, queen of Carthage, was deserted by Aeneas, she ascended a funeral pyre and was burned. The story is told in Virgil's Aeneid, Book 4.

A star south-risen that first to music shone,
 The keen girl-star of golden Juliet bears 121
 Light northward to the month whose forehead
 wears
 Her name for flower upon it, and his trees
 Mix their deep English song with Veronese,
 And like an awful sovereign chrysolite 125
 Burning, the supreme fire that blinds the
 night,
 The hot gold head of Venus kissed by Mars,
 A sun-flower among small spheréd flowers of
 stars,
 The light of Cleopatra fills and burns
 The hollow of heaven whence ardent August

 And fixed and shining as the sister-shed
 Sweet tears for Phæthon disorbed and dead,
 The pale bright autumn's amber-colored
 sphere,
 That through September sees the saddening
 year
 As love sees change through sorrow, hath to
 name 135
 Francesca's; and the star that watches flame
 The embers of the harvest overgone
 Is Thisbe's, slain of love in Babylon,
 Set in the golden girdle of sweet signs
 A blood-bright ruby; last save one light shines
 An eastern wonder of sphery chrysopras, 141
 The star that made men mad, Angelica's,
 And latest named and lordliest, with a sound
 Of swords and harps in heaven that ring it
 round,
 Last love-light and last love-song of the year's Gleams like a glorious emerald Guenevere's
 These are the signs wherethrough the year sees move,
 Full of the sun, the sun-god which is love,
 A fiery body blood-red from the heart
 Outward, with fire-white wings made wide
 apart, 150
 That close not and unclosed not, but upright

121. Juliet, of Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet. The scene of the drama is laid in Verona, Italy (line 124). 125 chrysolite, a yellowish or greenish crystal. 127. Venus, goddess of love. Mars, god of war. Venus and Mars stand for Cleopatra and Antony. 129 Cleopatra. See A Dream of Fair Women, 127 ff., page 32. 132 Phæthon, son of Phœbus Apollo, god of the sun. To prove his divine origin, Phæthon was permitted for one day to drive the chariot of the sun, but he lost control of the horses and fell into the river Eridanus. His sisters, the Helades, lamenting his fate, were turned into poplar trees, and their tears, which continued to flow, became amber as they dropped into the stream. 136 Francesca, Francesca da Rimini (13th century). She fell in love with her husband's brother Paolo and both lovers were killed by the husband. 138 Thisbe, the beautiful girl loved by Pyramus, of Babylon. Arriving first at the appointed meeting place, Thisbe, frightened by a lion, fled and dropped her veil, which the lion besmeared with blood. Pyramus, thinking that Thisbe was devoured, slew himself, and Thisbe returning to the scene stabbed herself also. 141 chrysopras, an apple-green variety of quartz. 142 Angelica, the fickle lover of Orlando, one of the great heroes of medieval romance. Because she did not return his love, Orlando went mad.

Steered without wind by their own light and
might Sweep through the flameless fire of air that rings
From heaven to heaven with thunder of wheels and wings
And antiphones of motion-molded rime 155
Through spaces out of space and timeless
time.
So shine above dead chance and conquered
change
The spheréd signs, and leave without their range
Doubt and desire, and hope with fear for wife, Pale pains, and pleasures long worn out of
life 160
Yea, even the shadows of them spiritless,
Through the dim door of sleep that seem to press,
Forms without form, a piteous people and
blind,
Men and no men, whose lamentable kind
The shadow of death and shadow of life compel 165
Through semblances of heaven and false-faced hell,
Through dreams of light and dreams of darkness tost
On waves innavigable, are these so lost?
Shapes that wax pale and shift in swift strange wise,
Void faces with unspeculative eyes, 170
Dim things that gaze and glare, dead mouths that move,
Featureless heads discrowned of hate and
love,
Mockeries and masks of motion and mute
breath,
Leavings of life, the superflux of death —
If these things and no more than these things
be 175
Left when man ends or changes, who can see?
Or who can say with what more subtle sense
Their subtler natures taste in air less dense
A life less thick and palpable than ours, Warmed with faint fires and sweetened with dead flowers 180
And measured by low music? how time fares
In that wan time-forgotten world of theirs,
Their pale poor world too deep for sun or star
To live in, where the eyes of Helen are,
And hers who made as God's own eyes to
shine 185
The eyes that met them of the Florentine,
Wherein the godhead thence transfigured lit
All time for all men with the shadow of it?

Ah, and these, too, felt on them as God's
grace
The pity and glory of this man's breathing
face; 190
For these, too, these my lovers, these my twain,
Saw Dante, saw God visible by pain,
With lips that thundered and with feet that trod
Before men's eyes incognizable God;
Saw love and wrath and light and night and
fire 195
Live with one life and at one mouth respire,
And in one golden sound their whole soul
heard
Sounding, one sweet immitigable word.
They have the night, who had like us the
day;
We, whom day binds, shall have the night as
they. 200
We, from the fetters of the light unbound,
Healed of our wound of living, shall sleep
sound.
All gifts but one the jealous God may keep From our soul's longing, one he cannot —
sleep
This, though he grudge all other grace to prayer, 205
This grace his closed hand cannot choose but spare
This, though his ear be sealed to all that live,
Be it lightly given or loathly, God must give
We, as the men whose name on earth is none,
We too shall surely pass out of the sun, 210
Out of the sound and eyeless light of things,
Wide as the stretch of life's time-wandering
wings,
Wide as the naked world and shadowless,
And long-lived as the world's own weariness
Us too, when all the fires of time are cold, 215
The heights shall hide us and the depths shall
hold.
Us too, when all the tears of time are dry,
The night shall lighten from her tearless eye
Blind is the day and eyeless all its light,
But the large unbewildered eye of night 220
Hath sense and speculation; and the sheer Limitless length of lifeless life and clear,
The timeless space wherein the brief worlds
move
Clothed with light life and fruitful with light
love,
With hopes that threaten, and with fears that cease, 225
Past fear and hope, hath in it only peace.

Yet of these lives inlaid with hopes and fears,
 Spun fine as fire and jeweled thick with tears,
 These lives made out of loves that long since were,
 Lives wrought as ours of earth and burning air, 230
 Fugitive flame, and water of secret springs,
 And clothed with joys and sorrows as with wings,
 Some yet are good, if aught be good, to save
 Some while from washing wreck and wrecking wave
 Was such not theirs, the twain I take, and give 235
 Out of my life to make their dead life live
 Some days of mine, and blow my living breath
 Between dead lips forgotten even of death?
 So many and many of old have given my twain
 Love and live song and honey-hearted pain,
 Whose root is sweetness and whose fruit is sweet, 241
 So many and with such joy have tracked their feet,
 What should I do to follow? Yet I too,
 I have the heart to follow, many or few
 Be the feet gone before me, for the way, 245
 Rose-red with remnant roses of the day
 Westward, and eastward white with stars that break, Between the green and foam is fair to take
 For any sail the sea-wind steers for me
 From morning into morning, sea to sea. 250

A VISION OF SPRING IN WINTER

O tender time that love thinks long to see,
 Sweet foot of spring that with her footfall sows
 Late snowlike flowery leavings of the snows,
 Be not too long irresolute to be,
 O mother-month, where have they hidden thee? 5
 Out of the pale time of the flowerless rose
 I reach my heart out toward the springtime lands,
 I stretch my spirit forth to the fair hours,
 The purplest of the prime,
 I lean my soul down over them, with hands 10

239 So many The love of Tristram and Isolt was a favorite theme of medieval romance. It was treated by Malory, by Tennyson, and by Arnold, also by Wagner in his opera Tristan and Isolde (1865).

A Vision of Spring in Winter Swinburne had a very great love for spring. 5 mother-month, April, the month of Swinburne's birth

Made wide to take the ghostly growths of flowers;
 I send my love back to the lovely time.

Where has the greenwood hid thy gracious head?
 Veiled with what visions while the gray world grieves,
 Or muffled with what shadows of green leaves, 15
 What warm intangible green shadows spread
 To sweeten the sweet twilight for thy bed?
 What sleep enchants thee? what delight deceives?
 Where the deep dreamlike dew before the dawn
 Feels not the fingers of the sunlight yet 20
 Its silver web unweave,
 Thy footless ghost on some unfooted lawn
 Whose air the unrisen sunbeams fear to fret
 Lives a ghost's life of daylong dawn and eve.

Sunrise it sees not, neither set of star, 25
 Large nightfall, nor imperial plenilune,
 Nor strong sweet shape of the full-breasted noon,
 But where the silver-sandaled shadows are,
 Too soft for arrows of the sun to mar,
 Moves with the mild gait of an ungrown moon: 30
 Hard overhead the half-lit crescent swims,
 The tender-colored night draws hardly breath,
 The light is listening;
 They watch the dawn of slender-shapen limbs,
 Virginal, born again of doubtful death, 35
 Chill foster-father of the weanling spring.

As sweet desire of day before the day,
 As dreams of love before the true love born,
 From the outer edge of winter overworn
 The ghost arisen of May before the May 40
 Takes through dim air her unawakened way,
 The gracious ghost of morning risen ere morn.
 With little unblown breasts and child-eyed looks
 Following, the very maid, the girl-child spring,
 Lifts windward her bright brows, 45
 Dips her light feet in warm and moving brooks,
 And kindles with her own mouth's coloring
 The fearful firstlings of the plumeless boughs.

26 plenilune, the time of full moon

I seek thee sleeping, and awhile I see,
 Fair face that art not, how thy maiden
 breath 50
 Shall put at last the deadly days to death
 And fill the fields and fire the woods with thee
 And seaward hollows where my feet would
 be
 When heaven shall hear the word that April saith
 To change the cold heart of the weary time, 55
 To stir and soften all the time to tears,
 Tears joyfuller than mirth;
 As even to May's clear height the young days
 climb
 With feet not swifter than those fair first
 years
 Whose flowers revive not with thy flowers on earth 60

I would not bid thee, though I might, give back
 One good thing youth has given and borne
 away;
 I crave not any comfort of the day
 That is not, nor on time's retrodden track
 Would turn to meet the white-robed hours or black 65
 That long since left me on their mortal way,
 Nor light nor love that has been, nor the
 breath
 That comes with morning from the sun to
 be
 And sets light hope on fire;
 No fruit, no flower thought once too fair for
 death, 70
 No flower nor hour once fallen from life's green tree,
 No leaf once plucked or once fulfilled
 desire.

The morning song beneath the stars that fled
 With twilight through the moonless mountain air,
 While youth with burning lips and wreath-less hair 75
 Sang toward the sun that was to crown his
 head,
 Rising; the hopes that triumphed and fell
 dead,
 The sweet swift eyes and songs of hours
 that were;
 These may'st thou not give back forever,
 these,
 As at the sea's heart all her wrecks lie waste, 80
 Lie deeper than the sea;
 But flowers thou may'st, and winds, and hours of ease,
 And all its April to the world thou may'st
 Give back, and half my April back to me.
 (1875)

A FORSAKEN GARDEN

In a coign of the cliff between lowland and highland,
 At the sea-down's edge between windward
 and lee,
 Walled round with rocks as an inland island,
 The ghost of a garden fronts the sea
 A girdle of brushwood and thorn encloses 5
 The steep square slope of the blossomless
 bed
 Where the weeds that grew green from the graves of its roses
 Now lie dead.

The fields fall southward, abrupt and broken,
 To the low last edge of the long lone
 land. 10
 If a step should sound or a word be spoken,
 Would a ghost not rise at the strange guest's hand?
 So long have the gray bare walks lain guest-
 less,
 Through branches and briars if a man make
 way,
 He shall find no life, but the sea-wind's, restless 15
 Night and day.

The dense hard passage is blind and stifled
 That crawls by a track none turn to climb
 To the strait waste place that the years have rifled
 Of all but the thorns that are touched not of time. 20
 The thorns he spares when the rose is taken,
 The rocks are left when he wastes the plain
 The wind that wanders, the weeds wind-shaken,
 These remain.

Not a flower to be pressed of the foot that falls not, 25
 As the heart of a dead man the seed-plots are dry;
 From the thicket of thorns whence the nightingale calls not,
 Could she call, there were never a rose to reply.
 Over the meadows that blossom and wither
 Wings but the note of a sea-bird's song; 30
 Only the sun and the rain come hither
 All year long.

The sun burns sear and the rain dishevels
 One gaunt bleak blossom of scentless
 breath.

A Forsaken Garden The scene of this poem is East Dene, on the Isle of Wight, where Swinburne spent much of his youth
 1 coign, corner, projection.

Only the wind here hovers and revels 35
 In a round where life seems barren as death
 Here there was laughing of old, there was weeping,

Haply, of lovers none ever will know,
 Whose eyes went seaward a hundred sleeping
 Years ago. 40

Heart handfast in heart as they stood, "Look thither,"

Did he whisper? "look forth from the flowers to the sea;

For the foam-flowers endure when the rose-blossoms wither,

And men that love lightly may die — but
 we?"

And the same wind sang and the same waves
 whitened, 45

And or ever the garden's last petals were
 shed,

In the lips that had whispered, the eyes that had lightened,
 Love was dead

Or they loved their life through, and then went whither?

And were one to the end — but what end who knows? 50

Love deep as the sea as a rose must wither,
 As the rose-red seaweed that mocks the
 rose.

Shall the dead take thought for the dead to love them?

What love was ever as deep as a grave?
 They are loveless now as the grass above them
 Or the wave. 56

All are at one now, roses and lovers,
 Not known of the cliffs and the fields and the sea.

Not a breath of the time that has been hovers
 In the air now soft with a summer to be 60
 Not a breath shall there sweeten the seasons hereafter

Of the flowers or the lovers that laugh now or weep,

When as they that are free now of weeping and laughter
 We shall sleep.

Here death may deal not again forever; 65
 Here change may come not till all change
 end.

From the graves they have made they shall rise up never,

Who have left naught living to ravage and rend.

Earth, stones, and thorns of the wild ground growing,

While the sun and the rain live, these shall
 be; 70

Till a last wind's breath upon all these blowing Roll the sea.

Till the slow sea rise and the sheer cliff
 crumble,

Till terrace and meadow the deep gulfs
 drink,

Till the strength of the waves of the high tides humble 75

The fields that lessen, the rocks that shrink,
 Here now in his triumph where all things
 falter,

Stretched out on the spoils that his own hand spread,

As a god self-slain on his own strange altar,
 Death lies dead. 80

A BALLAD OF DREAMLAND

I hid my heart in a nest of roses,
 Out of the sun's way, hidden apart;

In a softer bed than the soft white snow's
 is,

Under the roses I hid my heart.
 Why would it sleep not? why should it
 start, 5

When never a leaf of the rose-tree stirred?
 What made sleep flutter his wings and part?

Only the song of a secret bird.

Lie still, I said, for the wind's wing closes,
 And mild leaves muffle the keen sun's
 dart; 10

Lie still, for the wind on the warm sea dozes,
 And the wind is unquieter yet than thou
 art.

Does a thought in thee still as a thorn's wound smart?

Does the fang still fret thee of hope deferred?
 What bids the lids of thy sleep dispart? 15

Only the song of a secret bird.

The green land's name that a charm encloses,
 It never was writ in the traveler's chart,

And sweet on its trees as the fruit that grows
 is,

It never was sold in the merchant's mart.
 The swallows of dreams through its dim fields dart, 21

And sleep's are the tunes in its tree-tops
 heard;

No hound's note wakens the wildwood
 hart,

Only the song of a secret bird.

A Ballad of Dreamland This lyric is generally regarded as one of the best examples in English of the French ballade—a poem composed of three stanzas of eight or ten lines each and a concluding envoi. Each of the stanzas ends with the same refrain, and only three or four rimes are used in the entire poem

ENVOI

In the world of dreams I have chosen my part,²⁵
To sleep for a season and hear no word
Of true love's truth or of light love's art,
Only the song of a secret bird.

A LYKE-WAKE SONG

Fair of face, full of pride,
Sit ye down by a dead man's side.

Ye sang songs a' the day;
Sit down at night in the red worm's way.

Proud ye were a' day long,⁵
Ye'll be but lean at evensong

Ye had gowd kells on your hair;
Nae man kens what ye were.

Ye set scorn by the silken stuff;
Now the grave is clean enough.¹⁰

Ye set scorn by the rubis ring,
Now the worm is a saft sweet thing.

Fine gold and blithe fair face,
Ye are come to a grimly place.

Gold hair and glad grey een,¹⁵
Nae man kens if ye have been.

A JACOBITE'S FAREWELL

1716

There's nae mair lands to tyne, my dear,
And nae mair lives to gie;
Though a man think sair to live nae mair,
There's but one day to die.

For a' things come and a' days gane,⁵
What needs ye rend your hair?
But kiss me till the morn's morrow,
Then I'll kiss ye nae mair.

O lands are lost and life's losing,¹⁰
And what were they to gie?

A Jacobite's Farewell. See Macaulay's Epitaph on a Jacobite and note, page 10, and Aytoun's The Old Scottish Cavalier, page 388. The date 1716, linked with this poem, marked the end of the unsuccessful attempt to secure the English throne for James Stuart (1688-1766), known as the Old Pretender. He was the son of James II. Swinburne belonged to a family noted for its Jacobite sympathies, and he was proud of the sacrifices made by his ancestors for the cause of the Stuarts

But nae man else gives ye.

THE TYNESIDE WIDOW

There's mony a man loves land and life,
Loves life and land and fee,

- A BALLAD OF FRANÇOIS VILLON
PRINCE OF ALL BALLAD-MAKERS
- Bird of the bitter bright gray golden morn
Scarce risen upon the dusk of dolorous
years,
- First of us all and sweetest singer born Whose far shrill note the world of new men
hears
Cleave the cold shuddering shade as twilight clears, 5
When song new-born put off the old world's attire
And felt its tune on her changed lips expire, Writ foremost on the roll of them that came
Fresh girt for service of the latter lyre, Villon, our sad bad glad mad brother's
name! 10
- Alas the joy, the sorrow, and the scorn,
That clothed thy life with hopes and sins
and fears,
And gave thee stones for bread and tares for corn
And plume-plucked gaol-birds for thy starveling peers
Till death clipped close their flight with shameful shears; 15
Till shifts came short and loves were hard to hire,
When lit of song nor twitch of twangling wire
Could buy thee bread or kisses, when light
fame
Spurned like a ball and haled through brake
and briar,
Villon, our sad bad glad mad brother's
name! 20
- Poor splendid wings so frayed and soiled and torn!
Poor kind wild eyes so dashed with light
quick tears!
Poor perfect voice, most blithe when most forlorn,
That rings athwart the sea whence no man steers
Like joy-bells crossed with death-bells in our ears! 25
What far delight has cooled the fierce desire That like some ravenous bird was strong to tire
On that frail flesh and soul consumed with
flame,
But left more sweet than roses to respire, Villon, our sad bad glad mad brother's
name? 30

CHILD'S SONG

What is gold worth, say,
 Worth for work or play,
 Worth to keep or pay,
 Hide or throw away,
 Hope about or fear? ⁵
 What is love worth, pray?
 Worth a tear?

Golden on the mold
 Lie the dead leaves rolled
 Of the wet woods old, ¹⁰
 Yellow leaves and cold,
 Woods without a dove;
 Gold is worth but gold;
 Love's worth love. (1878)

TRIADS

I

The word of the sun to the sky,
 The word of the wind to the sea,
 The word of the moon to the night,
 What may it be?

The sense of the flower to the fly, ⁵
 The sense of the bird to the tree,
 The sense of the cloud to the light,
 Who can tell me?

The song of the fields to the kye, ¹⁰
 The song of the lime to the bee,
 The song of the depth to the height,
 Who knows all three?

The message of April to May,
 That May sends on into June
 And June gives out to July ¹⁵
 For birthday boon;

32 harlot . . . sire Many poets have sprung from humble origins, but few have shown so startling a combination of artistic fineness and baseness of life
 Triads A triad is a group of three things closely related
 9. kye, cows

The delight of the dawn in the day,
 The delight of the day in the noon,
 The delight of a song in a sigh
 That breaks the tune; ²⁰

The secret of passing away,
 The cast of the change of the moon,
 None knows it with ear or with eye,
 But all will soon.

The live wave's love for the shore, ²⁵
 The shore's for the wave as it dies,
 The love of the thunder-fire
 That sears the skies —

We shall know not though life wax hoar,
 Till all life, spent into sighs, ³⁰
 Burn out as consumed with desire
 Of death's strange eyes;

Till the secret be secret no more
 In the light of one hour as it flies,
 Be the hour as of suns that expire ³⁵
 Or suns that rise. (1878)

THALASSIUS

Upon the flowery forefront of the year,
 One wandering by the gray-green April sea
 Found on a reach of shingle and shallower
 sand

Inlaid with starrier glimmering jewelry
 Left for the sun's love and the light wind's cheer ⁵

Along the foam-flowered strand, Breeze-brightened, something nearer sea than
 land

Though the last shoreward blossom-fringe was near,

A babe asleep with flower-soft face that gleamed

To sun and seaward as it laughed and dreamed, ¹⁰

Too sure of either love for either's fear,
 Albeit so birdlike slight and light, it seemed Nor man nor mortal child of man, but fair
 As even its twin-born tenderer spray-flowers
 were,

That the wind scatters like an Oread's hair ¹⁵

For when July strewed fire on earth and sea
 The last time ere that year,

Thalassius The title means From the Sea and refers to the origin of the child, the central figure in the poem Thalassius is intimately autobiographical. It portrays the early influences that shaped the life of Swinburne and traces the progress of his spiritual development. Cf. the Prelude to Songs before Sunrise, page 693. See Critical Notes
 3 shingle, stony seashore ¹⁵ Oread's hair The Oreads were mountain nymphs.

Out of the flame of morn Cymothoë,
Beheld one brighter than the sunbright sphere
Move toward her from its fieriest heart, whence trod 20
The live sun's very god,
Across the foam-bright waterways that are As heavenlier heavens with star for answering star,
And on her eyes and hair and maiden mouth
Felt a kiss falling fierier than the South, 25
And heard above afar
A noise of songs and wind-enamored wings
And lutes and lyres of milder and mightier
strings,
And round the resonant radiance of his car
Where depth is one with height, 30
Light heard as music, music seen as light,
And with that second moondawn of the spring's
That fosters the first rose,
A sun-child whiter than the sunlit snows
Was born out of the world of sunless things 35
That round the round earth flows and ebbs and flows.

But he that found the sea-flower by the sea
And took to foster like a graft of earth
Was born of man's most highest and heaven-
liest birth,
Free-born as winds and stars and waves are
free; 40
A warrior gray with glories more than years,
Though more of years than change the quick to dead
Had rained their light and darkness on his
head;
A singer that in time's and memory's ears Should leave such words to sing as all his peers 45
Might praise with hallowing heat of rapturous tears
Till all the days of human flight were fled.
And at his knees his fosterling was fed
Not with man's wine and bread
Nor mortal mother-milk of hopes and fears, so
But food of deep memorial days long sped;
For bread with wisdom and with song for
wine
Clear as the full calm's emerald hyaline.
And from his grave glad lips the boy would gather
Fine honey of song-notes goldener than gold,
More sweet than bees make of the breathing
heather, 56
That he, as glad and bold,

Might drink as they, and keep his spirit from cold.
And the boy loved his laurel-laden hair
As his own father's risen on the eastern air, 60
And that less white brow-binding bayleaf
bloom
More than all flowers his father's eyes relume;
And those high songs he heard,
More than all notes of any landward bird,
More than all sounds less free 65
Than the wind's quiring to the choral sea.

High things the high song taught him—
how the breath
Too frail for life may be more strong than
death;
And this poor flash of sense in life, that gleams
As a ghost's glory in dreams, 70
More stable than the world's own heart's root seems,
By that strong faith of lordliest love which gives
To death's own sightless-seeming eyes a light
Clearer, to death's bare bones a verier might,
Than shines or strikes from any man that lives. 75
How he that loves life overmuch shall die
The dog's death, utterly:
And he that much less loves it than he hates
All wrongdoing that is done
Anywhere always underneath the sun 80
Shall live a mightier life than time's or fate's
One fairer thing he shewed him, and in might
More strong than day and night
Whose strengths build up time's towering period:
Yea, one thing stronger and more high than
God, 85
Which if man had not, then should God not
be.
And that was Liberty.
And gladly should man die to gain, he said,
Freedom; and gladlier, having lost, lie dead
For man's earth was not, nor the sweet sea-
waves 90
His, nor his own land, nor its very graves,
Except they bred not, bore not, hid not slaves:
But all of all that is,
Were one man free in body and soul, were
his.

18 Cymothoë, a sea nymph 21 sun's very god, Phoebus Apollo 37 he that found, etc. This has been identified as Landor. See In Memory of Walter Savage Landor, page 681 53 hyaline, a poetic term for the sea or for clear atmosphere

59 laurel-laden, crowned with the poet's laurel-wreath of honor 61 bayleaf, myrtle, used in crowning poets. 76 he that . . . die Cf. Matthew, 16 25—"Whoever will save his life shall lose it, and whosoever will lose his life for my sake shall find it" 88-89 gladly . . . lie dead, a free translation of the Latin inscription written by Landor for the Spanish patriots who died resisting the invasion of Napoleon in the campaign of 1811-12.

And the song softened, even as heaven by
 night 95
 Softens, from sunnier down to starrier light,
 And with its moonbright breath
 Blessed life for death's sake, and for life's sake death,
 Till as the moon's own beam and breath confuse,
 In one clear hueless haze of glimmering hues, 100
 The sea's line and the land's line and the sky's,
 And light for love of darkness almost dies,
 As darkness only lives for light's dear love,
 Whose hands the web of night is woven of;
 So in that heaven of wondrous words were
 life 105
 And death brought out of strife;
 Yea, by that strong spell of serene increase
 Brought out of strife to peace.

And the song lightened, as the wind at
 morn
 Flashes, and even with lightning of the wind 110
 Night's thick-spun web is thinned
 And all its web unwoven and overworn
 Shrinks, as might love from scorn,
 And as when wind and light on water and
 land
 Leap as twin gods from heavenward hand in
 hand, 115
 And with the sound and splendor of their leap Strike darkness dead, and daunt the spirit of
 sleep,
 And burn it up with fire,
 So with the light that lightened from the lyre
 Was all the bright heat in the child's heart
 stirred 120
 And blown with blasts of music into flame
 Till even his sense became Fire, as the sense that fires the singing bird
 Whose song calls night by name.
 And in the soul within the sense began 125
 The manlike passion of a godlike man,
 And in the sense within the soul again Thoughts that make men of gods and gods of men.

For love the high song taught him—love that turns
 God's heart toward man as man's to God-ward, love 130
 That life and death and life are fashioned of,
 From the first breath that burns
 Half-kindled on the flowerlike yeanling's lip,
 So light and faint that life seems like to slip,
 To that yet weaklier drawn 135
 When sunset dies of night's devouring dawn.
 But the man dying not wholly as all men dies

If aught be left of his in live men's eyes
 Out of the dawnless dark of death to rise;
 If aught of deed or word 140
 Be seen for all time or of all time heard.
 Love, that though body and soul were overthrown
 Should live for love's sake of itself alone,
 Though spirit and flesh were one thing
 doomed and dead,
 Not wholly annihilated. 145
 Seeing even the hoariest ash-flake that the pyre
 Drops, and forgets the thing was once afire
 And gave its heart to feed the pile's full flame
 Till its own heart its own heat overcame, Outlives its own life, though by scarce a
 span, 150
 As such men dying outlive themselves in man,
 Outlive themselves forever; if the heat
 Outburn the heart that kindled it, the sweet
 Outlast the flower whose soul it was, and flit
 Forth of the body of it 155
 Into some new shape of a strange perfume
 More potent than its light live spirit of bloom,
 How shall not something of that soul relive,
 That only soul that had such gifts to give
 As lighten something even of all men's doom, 160
 Even from the laboring womb,
 Even to the seal set on the unopening tomb?
 And these the loving light of song and love
 Shall wrap and lap round and impend above,
 Imperishable, and all springs born illumine 165
 Their sleep with brighter thoughts than wake the dove
 To music, when the hillside winds resume
 The marriage-song of heather-flower and broom
 And all the joy thereof.

And hate the song too taught him—hate of all 170
 That brings or holds in thrall
 Of spirit or flesh, free-born ere God began,
 The holy body and sacred soul of man
 And wheresoever a curse was or a chain,
 A throne for torment or a crown for bane 175
 Rose, molded out of poor men's molten pain,
 There, said he, should man's heaviest hate be set
 Inexorably, to faint not or forget
 Till the last warmth bled forth of the last vein
 In flesh that none should call a king's again, Seeing wolves and dogs and birds that plague-strike air 181
 Leave the last bone of all the carrion bare.

And hope the high song taught him—hope whose eyes
 Can sound the seas unsoundable, the skies
 Inaccessible of eyesight, that can see 185

What earth beholds not, hear what wind and
 sea
 Hear not, and speak what all these crying in
 one
 Can speak not to the sun.
 For in her sovereign eyelight all things are Clear as the closest seen and kindlier star 190
 That marries morn and even and winter and
 spring
 With one love's golden ring
 For she can see the days of man, the birth
 Of good and death of evil things on earth
 Inevitable and infinite, and sure 195
 As present pain is, or herself is pure.
 Yea, she can hear and see, beyond all things
 That lighten from before Time's thunderous
 wings
 Through the awful circle of wheel-winged periods,
 The tempest of the twilight of all gods, 200
 And higher than all the circling course they ran
 The sundawn of the spirit that was man.

And fear the song too taught him—fear to
 be Worthless the dear love of the wind and sea
 That bred him fearless, like a sea-mew
 reared 205
 In rocks of man's foot feared,
 Where naught of wingless life may sing or
 shine.
 Fear to wax worthless of that heaven he had
 When all the life in all his limbs was glad,
 And all the drops in all his veins were wine, 210
 And all the pulses music; when his heart,
 Singing, bade heaven and wind and sea bear
 part
 In one live song's reiteration, and they bore,
 Fear to go crownless of the flower he wore
 When the winds loved him and the waters
 knew, 215
 The blithest life that clove their blithe life
 through
 With living limbs exultant, or held strife
 More amorous than all dalliance aye anew
 With the bright breath and strength of their large life,
 With all strong wrath of all sheer winds that blew, 220
 All glories of all storms of the air that fell Prone, ineluctable,
 With roar from heaven of revel, and with hue
 As of a heaven turned hell
 For when the red blast of their breath had made 225
 All heaven aflush with light more dire than
 shade,

He felt it in his blood and eyes and hair
 Burn as if all the fires of the earth and air
 Had laid strong hold upon his flesh, and stung
 The soul behind it as with serpent's tongue, Forked like the lovehest lightnings; nor could bear 231
 But hardly, half distraught with strong
 delight,
 The joy that like a garment wrapped him
 round
 And lapped him over and under
 With raiment of great light 235
 And rapture of great sound
 At every loud leap earthward of the thunder
 From heaven's most furthest bound;
 So seemed all heaven in hearing and in sight,
 Alive and mad with glory and angry joy, 240
 That something of its marvelous mirth and
 might Moved even to madness, fledged as even for flight,
 The blood and spirit of one but mortal boy.

So, clothed with love and fear that love makes great,
 And armed with hope and hate, 245
 He set first foot upon the spring-flowered
 ways
 That all feet pass and praise
 And one dim dawn between the winter and
 spring,
 In the sharp harsh wind harrying heaven and
 earth
 To put back April that had borne his birth 250
 From sunward on her sunniest shower-struck
 wing,
 With tears and laughter for the dew-dropped
 thing,
 Slight as indeed a dew-drop, by the sea
 One met him lovelier than all men may be,
 God-featured, with god's eyes, and in their
 might 255
 Somewhat that drew men's own to mar their
 sight,
 Even of all eyes drawn toward him, and his mouth
 Was as the very rose of all men's youth,
 One rose of all the rose-beds in the world
 Bur round his brows the curls were snakes that curled, 260
 And like his tongue a serpent's, and his voice
 Speaks death, and bids rejoice.
 Yet then he spake no word, seeming as dumb,
 A dumb thing mild and hurtless; nor at first
 From his bowed eyes seemed any light to
 come, 265
 Nor his meek lips for blood or tears to thirst,
 But as one blind and mute in mild sweet wise
 Pleading for pity of piteous lips and eyes,
 He strayed with faint bare lily-lovely feet
 Helpless, and flowerlike sweet, 270

205 like a sea-mew. Swinburne frequently compares himself to a sea-mew 222 ineluctable, inescapable

Nor might man see, not having word hereof,
That this of all gods was the great god Love

And seeing him lovely and like a little child
That wellnigh wept for wonder that it smiled
And was so feeble and fearful, with soft
speech 275

The youth bespake him softly; but there fell
From the sweet lips no sweet word audible
That ear or thought might reach—
No sound to make the dim cold silence glad,
No breath to thaw the hard harsh air with heat; 280

Only the saddest smile of all things sweet,
Only the sweetest smile of all things sad.

And so they went together one green way
Till April dying made free the world for May,
And on his guide suddenly Love's face
turned, 285

And in his blind eyes burned
Hard light and heat of laughter, and like flame
That opens in a mountain's ravening mouth
To blear and sear the sunlight from the south,
His mute mouth opened, and his first word
came: 290

"Knowest thou me now by name?"
And all his stature waxed immeasurable,
As of one shadowing heaven and lightening
hell;

And statelier stood he than a tower that stands

And darkens with its darkness far-off sands
Whereon the sky leans red, 296
And with a voice that stilled the winds he
said:

"I am he that was thy lord before thy birth,
I am he that is thy lord till thou turn earth,
I make the night more dark, and all the morrow 300

Dark as the night whose darkness was my
breath.

O fool, my name is sorrow;
Thou fool, my name is death."

And he that heard spake not, and looked right on Again, and Love was gone. 305

Through many a night toward many a wearier day
His spirit bore his body down its way.
Through many a day toward many a wearier
night

His soul sustained his sorrows in her sight.
And earth was bitter, and heaven, and even
the sea 310

Sorrowful even as he.

And the wind helped not, and the sun was dumb;

And with too long stress of grief to be
His heart grew sear and numb.

And one bright even ere summer in autumn sank 315

At stardawn standing on a gray sea-bank,
He felt the wind fitfully shift and heave
As toward a stormier eve;
And all the wan wide sea shuddered, and
earth

Shook underfoot as toward some timeless
birth, 320

Intolerable and inevitable; and all
Heaven, darkling, trembled like a stricken thrall.

And far out of the quivering east, and far
From past the moonrise and its guiding star,
Began a noise of tempest and a light 325

That was not of the lightning, and a sound
Rang with it round and round
That was not of the thunder; and a flight
As of blown clouds by night,

That was not of them; and with songs and cries 330

That sang and shrieked their soul out at the
skies

A shapeless earthly storm of shapes began
From all ways round to move in on the
man,

Clamorous against him silent, and their feet
Were as the wind's are fleet, 335
And their shrill songs were as wild birds' are sweet.

And as when all the world of earth was wronged

And all the host of all men driven afoam
By the red hand of Rome,
Round some fierce amphitheater over-thronged 340

With fair clear faces full of bloodier lust
Than swells and stings the tiger when his mood

Is fieriest after blood
And drunk with trampling of the murderous must

That soaks and stains the tortuous closecoiled wood 345

Made monstrous with its myriad-mustering
brood,

Face by fair face panted and gleamed and pressed,

And breast by passionate breast

281-82 Only the saddest . . . sad. With these lines compare Shelley's To a Skylark, 90—"Our sweetest songs are those that tell of saddest thought"

Heaved hot with ravenous rapture, as they quaffed
 The red ripe full fume of the deep live draft, 350
 The sharp quick reck of keen fresh bloodshed, blown
 Through the dense deep drift up to the emperor's throne
 From the under steaming sands
 With clamor of all-applausive throats and
 hands,
 Mungling in mirthful time 355
 With shrill blithe mockeries of the lithe-limbed
 mime:
 So from somehence far forth of the un-
 beholden,
 Dreadfully driven from over and after and under,
 Fierce, blown through fifes of brazen blast
 and golden,
 With sound of chiming waves that drown the
 thunder 360
 Or thunder that strikes dumb the sea's own chimes,
 Began the bellowing of the bull-voiced mimes,
 Terrible; firs bowed down as briars or palms
 Even at the breathless blast as of a breeze Fulfilled with clamor and clangor and storms of psalms; 365
 Red hands rent up the roots of old-world
 trees,
 Thick flames of torches tossed as tumbling seas
 Made mad the moonless and infuriate air
 That, ravenging, reveled in the riotous hair
 And raiment of the furred Bassarides. 370

So came all those in on him; and his heart,
 As out of sleep suddenly struck astart,
 Danced, and his flesh took fire of theirs, and grief
 Was as a last year's leaf Blown dead far down the wind's way; and he set 375
 His pale mouth to the brightest mouth it met
 That laughed for love against his lips, and bade
 Follow; and in following all his blood grew glad
 And as again a sea-bird's; for the wind—
 Took him to bathe him deep round breast and brow 380

356 mime, an actor in the ancient mime, a kind of drama in which scenes from life were imitated and generally represented in a ridiculous manner. 370 furred Bassarides, devotees of Bacchus, god of wine. They were noted for their wild orgies, which included sacrifices of animals, eaten raw by the participants. They wore garments made of fur 373. flesh . . . theirs. This symbolizes the mood in which Swinburne wrote the poems in the first series of Poems and Ballads. Poems on pages 662-689 of this volume were included in Poems and Ballads.

Not as it takes a dead leaf drained and thinned,
 But as the brightest bay-flower blown on
 bough,
 Set springing toward it singing; and they rode
 By many a vine-leaved, many a rose-hung road,
 Exalt with exultation; many a night 385
 Set all its stars upon them as for spies
 On many a moon-bewildering mountain-
 height
 Where he rode only by the fierier light
 Of his dread lady's hot sweet hungering eyes.
 For the moon wandered witless of her
 way, 390
 Spell-stricken by strong magic in such wise
 As wizards use to set the stars astray.
 And in his ears the music that makes mad
 Beat always; and what way the music bade,
 That alway rode he; nor was any sleep 395
 His, nor from height nor deep.
 But heaven was as red iron, slumberless,
 And had no heart to bless;
 And earth lay sear and darkling as distraught,
 And help in her was naught. 400

Then many a midnight, many a morn and even,
 His mother, passing forth of her fair heaven,
 With goodlier gifts than all save gods can give From earth or from the heaven where sea-things live,
 With shine of sea-flowers through the bay-leaf braid 405
 Woven for a crown her foam-white hands had made
 To crown him with land's laurel and sea-
 dew,
 Sought the sea-bird that was her boy; but he Sat panther-throned beside Erigone,
 Riding the red ways of the revel through 410
 Midmost of pale-mouthed passion's crownless crew.
 Till on some winter'd dawn of some dim year
 He let the vine-bit on the panther's lip
 Slide, and the green rein slip,
 And set his eyes to seaward, nor gave ear 415
 If sound from landward hailed him, dire or
 dear;
 And passing forth of all those fair fierce ranks
 Back to the gray sea-banks,
 Against a sea-rock lying, aslant the steep,
 Fell after many sleepless dreams on sleep. 420

409. panther-throned beside Erigone. Erigone was the daughter of Icarus, who was taught by Dionysus (god of wine) the culture of the grape. He gave wine to some shepherds who, thinking it poison, killed him. Overcome with grief, Erigone took her own life. She was later placed by Zeus among the stars as the constellation Virgo (Virgin). The panther was sacred to Dionysus.

And in his sleep the dun green light was shed
Heavily round his head
That through the veil of sea falls fathom-deep, Blurred like a lamp's that when the night drops dead
Dies, and his eyes gat grace of sleep to see 425
The deep divine dark dayshine of the sea,
Dense water-walls and clear dusk water-
ways,
Broad-based, or branching as a sea-flower sprays
That side or this dividing; and anew
The glory of all her glories that he knew. 430
And in sharp rapture of recovering tears
He woke on fire with yearnings of old years,
Pure as one purged of pain that passion bore,
Ill child of bitter mother; for his own Looked laughing toward him from her midsea
throne, 435
Up toward him there ashore

Thence in his heart the great same joy
began,
Of child that made him man;
And turned again from all hearts else on quest,
He communed with his own heart, and had
rest. 440
And like sea-winds upon loud waters ran
His days and dreams together, till the joy
Burned in him of the boy.
Till the earth's great comfort and the sweet sea's breath
Breathed and blew life in where was heartless
death, 445
Death spirit-stricken of soul-sick days, where
strife
Of thought and flesh made mock of death and
life
And grace returned upon him of his birth
Where heaven was mixed with heavenlike sea
and earth;
And song shot forth strong wings that took
the sun 450
From inward, fledged with might of sorrow
and mirth
And father's fire made mortal in his son.
Nor was not spirit of strength in blast and breeze
To exalt again the sun's child and the sea's;
For as wild mares in Thessaly grow great 455
With child of ravishing winds, that violate
Their leaping length of limb with manes like
fire
And eyes outburning heaven's

455-460. wild mares in Thessaly, etc. Boreas, god of the wind, becoming enamored of some beautiful mares on the plain of Thessaly, took on the form of an azure-maned steed and became the sire of twelve female foals. The incident is related in the Iliad, 20, 223 ff., in Virgil's Georgics, 3, 275 ff.

With fires more violent than the lightning levin's
And breath drained out and desperate of
desire, 460
Even so the spirit in him, when winds grew
strong,
Grew great with child of song.
Nor less than when his veins first leapt for
joy
To draw delight in such as burns a boy,
Now too the soul of all his senses felt 465
The passionate pride of deep sea-pulses dealt Through nerve and jubilant vein
As from the love and largess of old time,
And with his heart again
The tidal throb of all the tides keep rime 470
And charm him from his own soul's separate sense
With infinite and invasive influence
That made strength sweet in him and sweetness strong,
Being now no more a singer, but a song.

Till one clear day when brighter sea-wind
blew 475
And louder sea-shine lightened, for the waves
Were full of godhead and the light that saves,
His father's, and their spirit had pierced him
through,
He felt strange breath and light all round him shed
That bowed him down with rapture, and he knew 480
His father's hand, hallowing his humbled
head,
And the old great voice of the old good time,
that said:

"Child of my sunlight and the sea, from
birth
A fosterling and fugitive on earth;
Sleepless of soul as wind or wave or fire, 485
A manchild with an ungrown god's desire;
Because thou hast loved naught mortal more than me,
Thy father, and thy mother-hearted sea;
Because thou hast set thine heart to sing, and sold
Life and life's love for song, God's living
gold, 490
Because thou hast given thy flower and fire of
youth
To feed men's hearts with visions, truer than
truth;

459 levin's, flash's 472 invasive, penetrating. 478 father's, Apollo's. Apollo was god of the sun, of music, and of poetry. Swinburne represents himself as born of Apollo and the sea nymph Cymothoe. See lines 16-30. 483ff. Child of my sunlight, etc. The concluding lines of the poem are spoken by Apollo.

Because thou hast kept in those world-wandering eyes
The light that makes me music of the skies;
Because thou hast heard with world-unwearied ears 495
The music that puts light into the spheres;
Have therefore in thine heart and in thy mouth
The sound of song that mingles north and south,
The song of all the winds that sing of me,
And in thy soul the sense of all the sea." 500

FROM BY THE NORTH SEA

I

A land that is lonelier than ruin;
A sea that is stranger than death;
Far fields that a rose never blew in,
Wan waste where the winds lack breath;
Waste endless and boundless, and flowerless
But of marsh-blossoms fruitless as free; 6
Where earth lies exhausted, as powerless
To strive with the sea.

Far flickers the flight of the swallows,
Far flutters the weft of the grass 10
Spun dense over desolate hollows,
More pale than the clouds as they pass;
Thick woven as the weft of a witch is
Round the heart of a thrall that hath sinned,
Whose youth and the wrecks of its riches 15
Are waifs on the wind.

The pastures are herdless and sheepless,
No pasture or shelter for herds
The wind is relentless and sleepless,
And restless and songless the birds; 20
Their cries from afar fall breathless,
Their wings are as lightnings that flee;
For the land has two lords that are deathless—
Death's self, and the sea.

These twain, as a king with his fellow, 25
Hold converse of desolate speech,
And her waters are haggard and yellow
And crass with the scurf of the beach;
And his garments are gray as the hoary
Wan sky where the day lies dim; 30
And his power is to her, and his glory,
As hers unto him.

In the pride of his power she rejoices,
In her glory he glows and is glad;

10 weft of the grass, gossamer, or cobwebs, seen on the grass, especially in autumn

In her darkness the sound of his voice is, 35
With his breath she dilates and is mad
"If thou slay me, O death, and outlive me, Yet thy love hath fulfilled me of thee"
"Shall I give thee not back if thou give me,
O sister, O sea?" 40

And year upon year dawns living,
And age upon age drops dead,
And his hand is not weary of giving,
And the thirst of her heart is not fed,
And the hunger that moans in her passion, 45
And the rage in her hunger that roars,
As a wolf's that the winter lays lash on,
Still calls and implores

Her walls have no granite for girder,
No fortalice fronting her stands, 50
But reefs the bloodguiltiest of murder
Are less than the banks of her sands.
These number their slain by the thousand,
For the ship hath no surety to be,
When the bank is abreast of her bows and 55
Afflush with the sea.

No surety to stand, and no shelter
To dawn out of darkness but one,
Out of waters that hurtle and welter
No succor to dawn with the sun, 60
But a rest from the wind as it passes,
Where, hardly redeemed from the waves,
Lie thick as the blades of the grasses
The dead in their graves.

A multitude noteless of numbers, 65
As wild weeds cast on an heap;
And sounder than sleep are their slumbers,
And softer than song is their sleep,
And sweeter than all things and stranger
The sense, if perchance it may be, 70
That the wind is divested of danger
And scatheless the sea,

That the roar of the banks they breasted
Is hurtless as bellowing of herds,
And the strength of his wings that invested
The wind, as the strength of a bird's, 76
As the sea-mew's might or the swallow's
That cry to him back if he cries,
As over the graves and their hollows
Days darken and rise. 80

As the souls of the dead men disburdened
And clean of the sins that they sinned,
With a lovelier than man's life guerdoned
And delight as a wave's in the wind,
And delight as the wind's in the billow, 85

50 fortalice, a small fort 62 hardly, with difficulty.

Birds pass, and deride with their glee
The flesh that has dust for its pillow
As wrecks have the sea.

When the ways of the sun wax dimmer,
Wings flash through the dusk like beams,
As the clouds in the lit sky glimmer, 91
The bird in the graveyard gleams;
As the cloud at its wing's edge whitens
When the clarions of sunrise are heard,
The graves that the bird's note brightens 95
Grow bright for the bird.

As the waves of the numberless waters
That the wind cannot number who guides
Are the sons of the shore and the daughters
Here lulled by the chime of the tides; 100
And here in the press of them standing,
We know not if these or if we Live truest, or anchored to landing
Or drifted to sea.

In the valley he named of decision, 105
No denser were multitudes met
When the soul of the seer in her vision
Saw nations for doom of them set;
Saw darkness in dawn, and the splendor
Of judgment, the sword and the rod; 110
But the doom here of death is more tender
And gentler the god

And gentler the wind from the dreary
Sea-banks by the waves overlapped,
Being weary, speaks peace to the weary, 115
From slopes that the tide-stream hath sapped;
And sweeter than all that we call so
The seal of their slumber shall be Till the graves that embosom them also
Be sapped of the sea. 120

But afar on the headland exalted,
But beyond in the curl of the bay,
From the depth of his dome deep-vaulted,
Our father is lord of the day —
Our father and lord that we follow, 5
For deathless and ageless is he;
And his robe is the whole sky's hollow,
His sandal the sea.

Where the horn of the headland is sharper,
And her green floor glitters with fire, 10
The sea has the sun for a harper,

105 valley . . . decision, a reference to the prophecy of Joel regarding the judgment of God upon the enemies of his people "Multitudes, multitudes in the valley of decision, for the day of the Lord is near in the valley of decision" (Joel, 14)

4 Our father, Phoebus Apollo, god of the sun.

The sun has the sea for a lyre.
The waves are a pavement of amber,
By the feet of the sea-winds trod
To receive in a god's presence-chamber 15
Our father, the god.

Time, haggard and changeful and hoary,
Is master and god of the land;
But the air is fulfilled of the glory
That is shed from our lord's right hand. 20
O father of all of us ever,
All glory be only to thee
From heaven, that is void of thee never,
And earth, and the sea.

O Sun, whereof all is beholden, 25
Behold now the shadow of this death,
This place of the sepulchers, olden
And emptied and vain as a breath.
The bloom of the bountiful heather
Laughs broadly beyond in thy light 30
As dawn, with her glories to gather,
At darkness and night.

Though the gods of the night lie rotten,
And their honor be taken away,
And the noise of their names forgotten, 35
Thou, Lord, art god of the day.
Thou art father and savior and spirit,
O Sun, of the soul that is free,
And hath grace of thy grace to inherit
Thine earth and thy sea. 40

The hills and the sands and the beaches,
The waters adrift and afar,
The banks and the creeks and the reaches
How glad of thee all these are!
The flowers, overflowing, overcrowded, 45
Are drunk with the mad wind's mirth;
The delight of thy coming unclouded
Makes music of earth.

I, last least voice of her voices,
Give thanks that were mute in me long 50
To the soul in my soul that rejoices
For the song that is over my song.
Time gives what he gains for the giving
Or takes for his tribute of me;
My dreams to the wind everliving, 55
My song to the sea. (1880)

THE HIGHER PANTHEISM IN A NUT-SHELL

One, who is not, we see; but one, whom we see not, is.

Surely this is not that, but that is assuredly
this.

The Higher Pantheism in a Nutshell This is a parody on Tennyson's The Higher Pantheism, page 118

What, and wherefore, and whence? for under is over and under;
If thunder could be without lightning, lightning could be without thunder.

Doubt is faith, in the main; but faith, on the whole, is doubt. 5
We cannot believe by proof; but could we believe without?

Why, and whither, and how? for barley and
rye are not clover;
Neither are straight lines curves — yet over is under and over.

Two and two may be four, but four and four are not eight;
Fate and God may be twain, but God is the same thing as fate. 10

Ask a man what he thinks, and get from a man what he feels;
God, once caught in the fact, shows you a fair pair of heels.

Body and spirit are twins; God only knows which is which —
The soul squats down in the flesh, like a tinker drunk in a ditch.

More is the whole than a part, but half is more than the whole; 15
Clearly, the soul is the body — but is not the body the soul?

One and two are not one, but one and nothing is two;
Truth can hardly be false, if falsehood cannot be true.

Once the mastodon was; pterodactyls were common as cocks.
Then the mammoth was God; now is He a prize ox 20

Parallels all things are — yet many of these are askew,
You are certainly I, but certainly I am not
you.

Springs the rock from the plain, shoots the stream from the rock;
Cocks exist for the hen, but hens exist for the cock.

God, whom we see not, is; and God, who is not, we see. 25
Fiddle, we know, is diddle; and diddle, we take it, is dee. (1880)

NEPHELIDIA

From the depth of the dreamy decline of the dawn through a notable nimbus of nebulous noonshine,

Pallid and pink as the palm of the flag-flower that flickers with fear of the flies as they float,

Are the looks of our lovers that lustroously lean from a marvel of mystic, miraculous moonshine,

These that we feel in the blood of our blushes that thicken and threaten with throbs through the throat?

Thicken and thrill as a theater thronged at appeal of an actor's appalled agitation, Fainter with fear of the fires of the future than pale with the promise of pride in the past; 6

Flushed with the famishing fullness of fever that reddens with radiance of rathe recreation,

Gaunt as the ghastliest of glimpses that gleam through the gloom of the gloaming when ghosts go aghast?

Nay, for the nick of the tick of the time is a tremulous touch on the temples of terror,

Strained as the sinews yet strenuous with strife of the dead who is dumb as the dust-heaps of death; 10

Surely no soul is it, sweet as the spasm of erotic emotional exquisite error,

Bathed in the balms of beatified bliss,
beatific itself by beatitudes' breath.

Surely no spirit or sense of a soul that was soft to the spirit and soul of our senses

Sweetens the stress of suspiring suspicion that sobs in the semblance and sound of a sigh;

Only this oracle opens Olympian, in mystical moods and triangular tenses — 15

"Life is the lust of a lamp for the light that is dark till the dawn of the day when we die."

Mild is the mirk and monotonous music of memory, melodiously mute as it may
be,

While the hope in the heart of a hero is bruised by the breach of men's rapiers, resigned to the rod;

Made meek as a mother whose bosom-beats bound with the bliss-bringing bulk of a balm-breathing baby,

As they grope through the graveyard of creeds, under skies growing green at a groan for the grimness of God. 20

Nephelidia The title means Cloudlets Swinburn here
parodies his own mannerisms of diction and rhythm
7 rathe, quick, fast 14 suspiring, sighing, desiring 15 Olympian, godlike, after the manner of the gods
Mt Olympus, in ancient Greece.

Blank is the book of his bounty beholden of old, and its binding is blacker than bluer;

Out of blue into black is the scheme of the skies, and their dewes are the wine of the bloodshed of things;

Till the darkling desire of delight shall be free as a fawn that is freed from the fangs that pursue her,

Till the heart-beats of hell shall be hushed by a hymn from the hunt that has harried the kennel of kings. (1880)

HOPE AND FEAR

Beneath the shadow of dawn's aërial cope,
With eyes enkindled as the sun's own sphere,
Hope from the front of youth in godlike cheer
Looks Godward, past the shades where blind men grope

Round the dark door that prayers nor dreams can ope, 5

And makes for joy the very darkness dear
That gives her wide wings play; nor dreams that fear

At noon may rise and pierce the heart of hope

Then, when the soul leaves off to dream and yearn,

May truth first purge her eyesight to discern What, once being known, leaves time no power to appall; 11

Till youth at last, ere yet youth be not, learn
The kind wise word that falls from years that fall —

"Hope thou not much, and fear thou not at
all" (1882)

ON THE DEATHS OF THOMAS CARLYLE AND GEORGE ELIOT

Two souls diverse out of our human sight
Pass, followed one with love and each with wonder:

The stormy sophist with his mouth of thunder, Clothed with loud words and mantled in the
might

Of darkness and magnificence of night; 5
And one whose eye could smite the night in sunder,

Searching if light or no light were thereunder,
And found in love of loving-kindness light.
Duty divine and Thought with eyes of fire,
Still following Righteousness with deep desire,
Shone sole and stern before her and above —

On the Deaths of Thomas Carlyle and George Eliot Carlyle, the "stormy sophist," died in 1881, Eliot in 1880.

Sure stars and sole to steer by; but more
sweet 12
Shone lower the loveliest lamp for earthly
feet —

The light of little children, and their love (1882)

DICKENS

Chief in thy generation born of men,
Whom English praise acclaimed as English-
born,

With eyes that matched the worldwide eyes of morn

For gleam of tears or laughter, tenderest then When thoughts of children warmed their light, or when 5

Reverence of age with love and labor worn,
Or godlike pity fired with godlike scorn, Shot through them flame that winged thy swift live pen:

Where stars and suns that we behold not
burn,

Higher even than here, though highest was here thy place, 10

Love sees thy spirit laugh and speak and
shine

With Shakespeare and the soft bright soul of Sterne

And Fielding's kindest might and Gold-smith's grace;

Scarce one more loved or worthier love than thine (1882)

ADIEUX À MARIE STUART

I

Queen, for whose house my fathers fought,
With hopes that rose and fell,
Red star of boyhood's fiery thought,
Farewell.

They gave their lives, and I, my queen, 5
Have given you of my life,
Seeing your brave star burn high between Men's strife.

The strife that lightened round their spears
Long since fell still; so long 10
Hardly may hope to last in years
My song.

Dickens Swinburne came under the spell of Dickens at Eton and admired him most of the English novelists
12 Sterne Laurence Sterne (1713-68), Henry Fielding (1707-54), and Oliver Goldsmith (1728-74) were among the earliest English novelists

Adieux à Marie Stuart The title means *Farewell to Mary
Stuart* See Critical Notes

1 my . . . fought Swinburne was proud of the fact that his ancestors had fought and died in Mary's support 6 given . . . life. Swinburne wrote a trilogy of tragedies dealing with Mary Queen of Scots—Chastelard (1865), Bothwell
(1874), and Mary Stuart (1881)

But still through strife of time and thought
Your light on me too fell,
Queen, in whose name we sang or fought, 15
Farewell.

2

There beats no heart on either border
Wherethrough the north blasts blow
But keeps your memory as a warder
His beacon-fire aglow. 20

Long since, it fired with love and wonder
Mine, for whose April age
Blithe midsummer made banquet under
The shade of Hermitage.

Soft sang the burn's blithe notes, that gather Strength to ring true; 26
And air and trees and sun and heather Remembered you.

Old border ghosts of fight or fairy
Or love or teen, 30
These they forgot, remembering Mary
The Queen.

3

Queen once of Scots and ever of ours
Whose sires brought forth for you
Their lives to strew your way like flowers, 35
Adieu.

Dead is full many a dead man's name
Who died for you this long
Time past; shall this too fare the same,
My song? 40

But surely, though it die or live,
Your face was worth
All that a man may think to give
On earth.

No darkness cast of years between 45
Can darken you;
Man's love will never bid my queen
Adieu.

4

Love hangs like light about your name
As music round the shell, 50
No heart can take of you a tame
Farewell.

Yet, when your very face was seen,
Ill gifts were yours for giving;

24 Hermitage, a castle on the Hermitage River, a small stream in Roxborough, Scotland. Swinburne spent a day in the vicinity of the castle some years before this poem was written, and his imagination was stirred by the sight of the fortification, the scene of Mary's visit to the wounded Bothwell. 25. burn's, brook's. 30 teen, sorrow, grief.

Love gat strange guerdons of my queen 55
When living

O diamond heart, unflawed and clear,
The whole world's crowning jewel!
Was ever heart so deadly dear
So cruel? 60

Yet none for you of all that bled
Grudged once one drop that fell;
Not one to life reluctant said

5

Strange love they have given you, love disloyal, 65
Who mock with praise your name,
To leave a head so rare and royal
Too low for praise or blame.

You could not love nor hate, they tell us,
You had nor sense nor sting, 70
In God's name, then, what plague befell us
To fight for such a thing?

"Some faults the gods will give," to fetter
Man's highest intent;
But surely you were something better 75
Than innocent!

No maid that strays with steps unwary
Through snares unseen,
But one to live and die for, Mary,

6

Forgive them all their praise, who blot
Your fame with praise of you;
Then love may say, and falter not,
Adieu.

Yet some you hardly would forgive 85
Who did you much less wrong
Once; but resentment should not live
Too long.

They never saw your lip's bright bow,
Your swordbright eyes, 90
The bluest of heavenly things below
The skies.

Clear eyes that love's self finds most like
A swordblade's blue,
A swordblade's ever keen to strike, 95
Adieu.

55 guerdons, rewards. 73-76 Some faults. Innocent Swinburne believed that a person was the better if he had in him a touch of earth. See Critical Note on title, also Maud, I, 80-83, page 98, and Lancelot and Elaine, 132-133, page 122. 85-86 some . . . wrong. She should be much more ready to forgive those who, like John Knox, were her out-and-out enemies, than those, like the Earl of Murray, who pretended to be her friends.

7

Though all things breathe or sound of fight
That yet make up your spell,
To bid you were to bid the light
Farewell. 100

Farewell the song says only, being
A star whose race is run;
Farewell the soul says never, seeing
The sun

Yet, wellnigh as with flash of tears, 105
The song must say but so
That took your praise up twenty years
Agó.

More bright than stars or moons that vary,
Sun kindling heaven and hell, 110
Here, after all these years, Queen Mary,
Farewell. (1882)

THE SALT OF THE EARTH

If childhood were not in the world,
But only men and women grown;
No baby-locks in tendrils curled,
No baby-blossoms blown;

Though men were stronger, women fairer, 5
And nearer all delights in reach,
And verse and music uttered rarer
Tones of more godlike speech;

Though the utmost life of life's best hours
Found, as it cannot now find, words, 10
Though desert sands were sweet as flowers
And flowers could sing like birds,

But children never heard them, never
They felt a child's foot leap and run —
This were a drearier star than ever 15
Yet looked upon the sun. (1882)

A CHILD'S LAUGHTER

All the bells of heaven may ring,
All the birds of heaven may sing,
All the wells on earth may spring,
All the winds on earth may bring
All sweet sounds together; 5
Sweeter far than all things heard,
Hand of harper, tone of bird,
Sound of woods at sundawn stirred,
Welling water's winsome word,
Wind in warm wan weather, 10

107-108 twenty years Ago See note on line 6
The Salt of the Earth Christ calls his disciples "the salt of the earth" in Matthew, 5 13

One thing yet there is, that none
Hearing ere its chime be done
Knows not well the sweetest one
Heard of man beneath the sun,
Hoped in heaven hereafter; 15
Soft and strong and loud and light,
Very sound of very light
Heard from morning's rosiest height,
When the soul of all delight
Fills a child's clear laughter. 20

Golden bells of welcome rolled
Never forth such notes, nor told
Hours so blithe in tones so bold,
As the radiant mouth of gold
Here that rings forth heaven 25
If the golden-crested wren
Were a nightingale — why, then,
Something seen and heard of men
Might be half as sweet as when Laughs a child of seven. (1882)

From SONNETS OF ENGLISH DRAMATIC POETS (1590-1650)

I. CHRISTOPHER MARLOWE

Crowned, girdled, garbed and shod with light
and fire,
Son first-born of the morning, sovereign
star!
Soul nearest ours of all, that wert most far,
Most far off in the abysm of time, thy lyre
Hung highest above the dawn-enkindled quire
Where all ye sang together, all that are, 6
And all the starry songs behind thy car
Rang sequence, all our souls acclaim thee sire.
"If all the pens that ever poets held
Had fed the feeling of their masters' thoughts," 10
And as with rush of hurtling chariots
The flight of all their spirits were impelled Toward one great end, thy glory — nay, not then,
Not yet might'st thou be praised enough
of men. (1882)

2. WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE

Not if men's tongues and angels' all in one Spake, might the word be said that might speak thee.
Streams, winds, woods, flowers, fields,
mountains, yea, the sea,

Sonnets of English Dramatic Poets (1590-1650) The series contains twenty-one sonnets

Christopher Marlowe Marlowe (1564-93), the most brilliant of the pre-Shakespearean playwrights, was the morning star that heralded the Elizabethan day Swinburne found him the most congenial of the Elizabethans

What power is in them all to praise the sun?
His praise is this — he can be praised of none.

Man, woman, child, praise God for him;
but he

Exults not to be worshiped, but to be.
He is; and, being, beholds his work well done.
All joy, all glory, all sorrow, all strength, all
mirth,

Are his; without him, day were night on earth
Time knows not his from time's own period
All lutes, all harps, all viols, all flutes, all lyres,
Fall dumb before him ere one string suspires.
All stars are angels; but the sun is God.

(1882)

3. BEN JONSON

Broad-based, broad-fronted, bounteous, multiform,

With many a valley impleached with ivy
and vine,

Wherein the springs of all the streams run
wine,

And many a crag full-faced against the storm,
The mountains where thy Muse's feet made warm

Those lawns that reveled with her dance
divine

Shines yet with fire as it was wont to shine
From tossing torches round the dance aswarm.

Nor less, high-stationed on the gray grave heights,

High-thoughted seers with heaven's heartkindling lights

Hold converse; and the herd of meaner
things

Knows or by fiery scourge or fiery shaft
When wrath on thy broad brows has risen,
and laughed,

Darkening thy soul with shadow of thunderous wings.

(1882)

4. BEAUMONT AND FLETCHER

An hour ere sudden sunset fired the west,
Arose two stars upon the pale deep east.

The hall of heaven was clear for night's high feast,

Yet was not yet day's fiery heart at rest.

Love leapt up from his mother's burning

5

Ben Jonson Jonson (1573?-1637) is praised for the many aspects of his genius. He could carouse with his friends and write delicate lyrics, thunderous blank verse, rollicking comedy, and stately masques (line 8). He was familiar with classic writers (line 10), and his broad experiences in actual life made him a capital satirist (line 13).

Beaumont and Fletcher. Francis Beaumont (1584-1616) and John Fletcher (1579-1625) were joint authors of a number of plays including romantic tragi-comedies. Lines 1-4 suggest that Elizabethan drama had about reached its end when these two came

To see those warm twin lights, as day decreased,

Wax wider, till when all the sun had ceased,
As suns they shone from evening's kindled crest.

Across them and between, a quickening fire,
Flamed Venus, laughing with appeased desire

Their dawn, scarce lovelier for the gleam
of tears,

Filled half the hollow shell 'twixt heaven and
earth

With sound like moonlight, mingling moan
and mirth,

Which rings and glitters down the darkling years.

(1882)

19. THE MANY

Greene, garlanded with February's few flowers
Ere March came in with Marlowe's rapturous rage;

Peele, from whose hand the sweet white locks of age

Took the mild chaplet woven of honored
hours;

Nash, laughing hard; Lodge, flushed from lyric bowers;

And Lilly, a goldfinch in a twisted cage
Fed by some gay great lady's pettish page

Till short sweet songs gush clear like short spring showers;

Kid, whose grim sport still gamboled over
graves;

And Chettle, in whose fresh funereal verse Weeps Marian yet on Robin's wildwood hearse;

Cooke, whose light boat of song one soft breath saves,

Sighed from a maiden's amorous mouth
averse;

Live likewise ye — Time takes not you for slaves.

(1882)

CHILDREN

Of such is the kingdom of heaven.

No glory that ever was shed
From the crowning star of the seven

That crown the north world's head,

The Many. Swinburne indicates the general spirit of each of the men mentioned in this sonnet—Robert Greene (1560-92), Christopher Marlowe (1564-93), George Peele (1558-98), Thomas Nash (1567-1601), Thomas Lodge (1558?-1625), John Lyly (1553?-1606), Thomas Kyd (1558?-94), Henry Chettle (d. 1607?), and Joshua Cooke (fl. 1614).

11. Marian. Maid Marian, a female character in the old May games, who became attached to the Robin Hood ballads and plays as the outlaw's sweetheart.

Children. 1. Of such . . . heaven. From Matthew, 19 14—"Jesus said, 'Suffer little children, and forbid them not, to come unto me; for of such is the kingdom of heaven.'" Cf. Matthew, 18 1-6. 3-4. crowning star . . . head, the North Star, the brightest of the seven stars composing the constellation of Ursa Minor.

No word that ever was spoken 5
Of human or godlike tongue,
Gave ever such godlike token
Since human harps were strung.

No sign that ever was given
To faithful or faithless eyes 10
Showed ever beyond clouds riven
So clear a Paradise.

Earth's creeds may be seventy times seven
And blood have defiled each creed,
If of such be the kingdom of heaven, 15
It must be heaven indeed. (1882)

CHILD AND POET

You send me your love in a letter,
I send you my love in a song,
Ah, child, your gift is the better,
Mine does you but wrong

No fame, were the best less brittle, 5
No praise, were it wide as earth,
Is shewn so much as a little Child's love may be worth.

We see the children above us
As they might angels above; 10
Come back to us, child, if you love us,
And bring us your love. (1882)

ÉTUDE RÉALISTE

I

A baby's feet, like sea-shells pink,
Might tempt, should heaven see meet,
An angel's lips to kiss, we think,
A baby's feet.

Like rose-hued sea-flowers toward the heat 5
They stretch and spread and wink
Their ten soft buds that part and meet.

No flower-bells that expand and shrink
Gleam half so heavenly sweet
As shine on life's untrodden brink 10
A baby's feet.

2

A baby's hands, like rosebuds furled
Whence yet no leaf expands,
Ope if you touch, though close upcurled,
A baby's hands. 15

Then, fast as warriors grip their brands
When battle's bolt is hurled,
They close, clenched hard like tightening bands.

Étude Réaliste The title means A Realistic Study.

No rosebuds yet by dawn impearled
Match, even in loveliest lands, 20
The sweetest flowers in all the world —
A baby's hands.

3

A baby's eyes, ere speech begin,
Ere lips learn words or sighs,
Bless all things bright enough to win 25
A baby's eyes.

Love, while the sweet thing laughs and lies,
And sleep flows out and in,
Sees perfect in them Paradise

Their glance might cast out pain and sin, 30
Their speech make dumb the wise,
By mute glad godhead felt within
A baby's eyes. (1883)

THE ROUNDEL

A roundel is wrought as a ring or a starbright
sphere,
With craft of delight and with cunning of sound unsought,
That the heart of the hearer may smile if to pleasure his ear
A roundel is wrought.

Its jewel of music is carven of all or of aught —
Love, laughter, or mourning — remembrance of rapture or fear — 6
That fancy may fashion to hang in the ear of
thought

As a bird's quick song runs round, and the hearts in us hear
Pause answer to pause, and again the same strain caught,
So moves the device whence, round as a pearl or tear, 10
A roundel is wrought. (1883)

My mother sea, my fostress, what new strand,
What new delight of waters, may this be,
The fairest found since time's first breezes
fanned
My mother sea? 15

Once more I give me, body and soul, to
thee,
Who hast my soul forever, cliff and sand Recede, and heart to heart once more are
we.

My heart springs first and plunges, ere my
hand
Strike out from shore; more close it brings to me, 20
More near and dear than seems my father-
land,
My mother sea.

Impels us, and broader the wide waves

The whole world's heart is uplifted, and knows not wrong;
The whole world's life is a chant to the sea-

Are we not as waves of the water, as notes of the song?

toils that wore us, 30
We breast for a season the breath of the seas

Rejoicing as they, to be borne as of old they

From A MIDSUMMER HOLIDAY

ON A COUNTRY ROAD

Along these low pleached lanes, on such a day,
So soot a day as this, through shade and sun,
With glad grave eyes that scanned the glad wild way,

And heart still hovering o'er a song begun,
And smile that warmed the world with benison, 5

Our father, lord long since of lordly rime,
Long since hath haply ridden, when the lime Bloomed broad above him, flowering where he came.

Because thy passage once made warm this
clime,

Our father Chaucer, here we praise thy name.

Each year that England clothes herself with
May, 11

She takes thy likeness on her. Time hath spun

Fresh raiment all in vain and strange array
For earth and man's new spirit, fain to shun
Things past for dreams of better to be won, 15
Through many a century since thy funeral
chime

Rang, and men deemed it death's most direful
crime

To have spared not thee for very love or
shame;

And yet, while mists round last year's memories climb,

Our father Chaucer, here we praise thy name.

Each turn of the old wild road whereon we stray, 21

Meseems, might bring us face to face with one Whom, seeing, we could not but give thanks,
and pray

For England's love our father and her son
To speak with us as once in days long done 25
With all men, sage and churl and monk and
mime,

Who knew not as we know the soul sublime
That sang for song's love more than lust of fame.

Yet, though this be not, yet, in happy time,
Our father Chaucer, here we praise thy name.

Friend, even as bees about the flowering
thyme, 31

Years crowd on years, till hoar decay begrime Names once beloved; but, seeing the sun the
same,

spring. See A Vision of Spring in Winter, page 711

IN THE WATER

The sea is awake, and the sound of the song of the joy of her waking is rolled
From afar to the star that recedes, from anear to the wastes of the wild wide shore
Her call is a trumpet compelling us homeward, if dawn in her east be acold,
From the sea shall we crave not her grace to rekindle the life that it kindled before,
Her breath to requicken, her bosom to rock us, her kisses to bless as of yore? 5
For the wind, with his wings half open, at pause in the sky, neither fettered nor free, Leans waveward and flutters the ripple to laughter; and fain would the twain of us be Where lightly the wave yearns forward from under the curve of the deep dawn's dome,
And, full of the morning and fired with the pride of the glory thereof and the glee,
Strike out from the shore as the heart in us
bids and beseeches, athirst for the foam.

Life holds not an hour that is better to live in; the past is a tale that is told, 11
The future a sun-flecked shadow, alive and asleep, with a blessing in store.
As we give us again to the waters, the rapture of limbs that the waters enfold
Is less than the rapture of spirit whereby,
though the burden it quits were sore,
Our souls and the bodies they wield at their will are absorbed in the life they adore —
In the life that endures no burden, and bows not the forehead, and bends not the knee — 16
In the life everlasting of earth and of heaven,
in the laws that atone and agree,
In the measureless music of things, in the fervor of forces that rest or that roam,
That cross and return and reissue, as I after you and as you after me
Strike out from the shore as the heart in us
bids and beseeches, athirst for the foam.
For, albeit he were less than the least of them, haply the heart of a man may be bold 21
To rejoice in the word of the sea, as a mother's that saith to the son she bore,
"Child, was not the life in thee mine, and my spirit the breath in thy lips from of
old?
Have I let not thy weakness exult in my strength, and thy foolishness learn of my lore?

Have I helped not or healed not thine anguish, or made not the might of thy gladness more?" 25
And surely his heart should answer, "The light of the love of my life is in thee"
She is fairer than earth, and the sun is not fairer, the wind is not blither than she
From my youth hath she shown me the joy of her bays that I crossed, of her cliffs
that I clomb,
Till now that the twain of us here, in desire of the dawn and in trust of the sea,
Strike out from the shore as the heart in us
bids and beseeches, athirst for the foam.

Friend, earth is a harbor of refuge for winter,
a covert whereunder to flee 31
When day is the vassal of night, and the strength of the hosts of her mightier than he;
But here is the presence adored of me, here
my desire is at rest and at home.
There are cliffs to be climbed upon land, there are ways to be trodden and ridden, but
we 34
Strike out from the shore as the heart in us
bids and beseeches, athirst for the foam.
(1884)

ON THE VERGE

Here begins the sea that ends not till the world's end Where we stand,
Could we know the next high sea-mark set beyond these waves that gleam,
We should know what never man hath known,
nor eye of man hath scanned.
Naught beyond these coiling clouds, that melt like fume of shrines that steam, Breaks or stays the strength of waters till they pass our bounds of dream. 5
Where the waste Land's End leans westward, all the seas it watches roll
Find their border fixed beyond them, and a worldwide shore's control;
These whereby we stand no shore beyond us limits — these are free.
Gazing hence, we see the water that grows
iron round the Pole,
From the shore that hath no shore beyond it
set in all the sea. 10

Sail on sail along the sea-line fades and flashes; here on land
Flash and fade the wheeling wings on wings of mews that plunge and scream.
Hour on hour along the line of life and time's evasive strand

On the Verge 1 the sea that ends not, the North Sea 6 Land's End, the southwestern extremity of England.

Shines and darkens, wanes and waxes, slays and dies; and scarce they seem More than motes that thronged and trembled in the brief noon's breath and beam.
Some with crying and wailing, some with notes like sound of bells that toll, 16
Some with sighing and laughing, some with words that blessed and made us whole, Passed, and left us, and we know not what they were, nor what were we.
Would we know, being mortal? Never breath of answering whisper stole
From the shore that hath no shore beyond it set in all the sea. 20

Shadows, would we question darkness? Ere our eyes and brows be fanned Round with airs of twilight, washed with dews from sleep's eternal stream, Would we know sleep's guarded secret? Ere the fire consume the brand,
Would it know if yet its ashes may requicken?
Yet we deem
Surely man may know, or ever night unyoke
her starry team, 25
What the dawn shall be, or if the dawn shall be not; yea, the scroll
Would we read of sleep's dark scripture, pledge of peace or doom of dole.
Ah, but here man's heart leaps, yearning toward the gloom with venturous glee, Though his pilot eye behold nor bay nor harbor, rock nor shoal,
From the shore that hath no shore beyond it
set in all the sea. 30

Friend, who knows if death indeed have life or life have death for goal?
Day nor night can tell us, nor may seas declare nor skies unroll
What has been from everlasting, or if aught shall always be Silence, answering, only strikes response reverberate on the soul
From the shore that hath no shore beyond it
set in all the sea. 35

NEAP-TIDE

Far off is the sea, and the land is afar.
The low banks reach at the sky,
Seen hence, and are heavenward high;
Though light for the leap of a boy they are,
And the far sea late was nigh. 5

The fair wild fields and the circling downs,
The bright sweet marshes and meads,
All glorious with flowerlike weeds,

The great gray churches, the sea-washed towns,
Recede as a dream recedes. 10

The world draws back and the world's light
waned,
As a dream dies down and is dead;
And the clouds and the gleams overhead
Change, and change, and the sea remains,
A shadow of dreamlike dread. 15

Wild, and woeful, and pale, and gray,
A shadow of sleepless fear,
A corpse with the night for bier,
The fairest thing that beholds the day
Lies haggard and hopeless here. 20

And the wind's wings, broken and spent,
subside;
And the dumb waste world is hoar
And strange as the sea the shore;
And shadows of shapeless dreams abide
Where life may abide no more. 25

A sail to seaward, a sound from shoreward,
And the spell were broken that seems
To reign in a world of dreams
Where vainly the dreamer's feet make forward
And vainly the low sky gleams. 30

The sea-forsaken, forlorn, deep-wrinkled,
Salt, slanting stretches of sand
That slope to the seaward hand — Were they fain of the ripples that flashed and twinkled
And laughed as they struck the strand? 35

As bells on the reins of the fairies ring 36
The ripples that kissed them rang,
The light from the sundawn sprang,
And the sweetest of songs that the world may sing
Was theirs when the full sea sang. 40

Now no light is in heaven, and now
Not a note of the sea-wind's tune
Rings hither; the bleak sky's boon
Grants hardly sight of a gray sun's brow —
A sun more sad than the moon. 45

More sad than a moon that clouds beleaguer
And storm is a scourge to smite,
The sick sun's shadowlike light
Grows faint as the clouds and the waves wax eager,
And withers away from sight. 50

The day's heart cowers, and the night's heart
quicken;—
Full fain would the day be dead,

And the stark night reign in his stead;
The sea falls dumb as the sea-fog thickens,
And the sunset dies for dread. 55

Outside of the range of time, whose breath
Is keen as the manslayer's knife
And his peace but a truce for strife,
Who knows if haply the shadow of death
May be not the light of life? 60

For the storm and the rain and the darkness borrow
But an hour from the suns to be,
But a strange swift passage, that we May rejoice, who have mourned not today,
tomorrow,
In the sun and the wind and the sea. 65

ON THE DEATH OF ROBERT BROWNING

He held no dream worth waking; so he said,
He who stands now on death's triumphal
steep,

Awakened out of life wherein we sleep
And dream of what he knows and sees, being
dead.

But never death for him was dark or dread,
"Look forth," he bade the soul, and fear not
Weep, 6

All ye that trust not in his truth, and keep Vain memory's vision of a vanished head
As all that lives of all that once was he Save that which lightens from his word; but
we, 10

Who, seeing the sunset-colored waters roll,
Yet know the sun subdued not of the sea,
Nor weep nor doubt that still the spirit is
whole,

And life and death but shadows of the soul.
(1889; 1890)

THE LAKE OF GAUBE

The sun is lord and god, sublime, serene,
And sovereign on the mountains, earth and
air

Lie prone in passion, blind with bliss unseen
By force of sight and might of rapture, fair
As dreams that die and know not what they
were. 5

On the Death of Robert Browning Browning died in Venice on December 12, 1889. This is the seventh in a series of sonnets on Browning's death.

Glad glory, thrilled with sense of unison
In strong compulsive silence of the sun.

Flowers dense and keen as midnight stars

And living things of light like flames in

That glance and flash as though no hand might tame

Lightnings whose life outshone their stormlit hour

And played and laughed on earth, with all their power

Gone, and with all their joy of life made long
And harmless as the lightning life of song, 15 Shine sweet like stars when darkness feels them strong.

The deep mild purple flaked with moonbright
gold

That makes the scales seem flowers of hardened light,

The flamelike tongue, the feet that noon
leaves cold,

The kindly trust in man, whence once the
sight 20

Grew less than strange, and faith bade fear
take flight,

Outlive the little harmless life that shone
And gladdened eyes that loved it, and was
gone

Ere love might fear that fear had looked thereon.

Fear held the bright thing hateful, even as
fear, 25

Whose name is one with hate and horror,
saith

That heaven, the dark deep heaven of water
near,

Is deadly deep as hell and dark as death

and breath

With pause more sweet than passion, ere they strive 30

To raise again the limbs that yet would dive Deeper, should there have slain the soul alive.

As the bright salamander in fire of the noon-

death, a reference to the local superstition that death awaited anyone who dared to bathe in the lake

Far down through the fathomless night of the water, the gladness of silence and
gloom

Death-dark and delicious as death in the dream of a lover and dreamer may
be,

It clasps and encompasses body and soul with delight to be living and free —

Free utterly now, though the freedom endure
but the space of a perilous breath,

And living, though girdled about with the darkness and coldness and strangeness of death — 40

Each limb and each pulse of the body rejoicing, each nerve of the spirit at rest,

All sense of the soul's life rapture, a passionate peace in its blindness blest.

So plunges the downward swimmer, embraced of the water unfathomed of man,

The darkness unplummeted, icier than seas
in midwinter, for blessing or ban;

And swiftly and sweetly, when strength and breath fall short, and the dive is done,

Shoots up as a shaft from the dark depth shot,
sped straight into sight of the sun; 46

And sheer through the snow-soft water, more dark than the roof of the pines above,

Strikes forth, and is glad as a bird whose flight is impelled and sustained of love

As a sea-mew's love of the sea-wind breasted and ridden for rapture's sake

Is the love of his body and soul for the darkling delight of the soundless lake; 50

As the silent speed of a dream too living to live for a thought's space more

Is the flight of his limbs through the still strong chill of the darkness from shore to shore.

Might life be as this is and death be as life
that casts off time as a robe,

The likeness of infinite heaven were a symbol revealed of the lake of Gaube.

Whose thought has fashioned and measured
The darkness of life and of death, 56

The secret within them treasured,
The spirit that is not breath?

Whose vision has yet beholden
The splendor of death and of life? 60

Though sunset as dawn be golden,
Is the word of them peace, not strife?

Deep silence answers; the glory
We dream of may be but a dream, 65

And the sun of the soul wax hoary
As ashes that show not a gleam

But well shall it be with us ever
Who drive through the darkness here,

If the soul that we live by never,
For aught that a lie saith, fear 70

EDWARD LEAR (1812-1888)

THE JUMBLIES

They went to sea in a sieve, they did;

In a sieve they went to sea;

In spite of all their friends could say,

On a winter's morn, on a stormy day,

In a sieve they went to sea. 5

And when the sieve turned round and round,

And everyone cried, "You'll be drowned!"

They called aloud, "Our sieve ain't big,

But we don't care a button; we don't care a

fig—

In a sieve we'll go to sea!" 10

Far and few, far and few,

Are the lands where the Jumbles live

Their heads are green, and their hands

are blue;

And they went to sea in a sieve.

They sailed away in a sieve, they did, 15

In a sieve they sailed so fast,

With only a beautiful pea-green veil

Tied with a ribbon, by way of a sail,

To a small tobacco-pipe mast.

And everyone said who saw them go, 20

"Oh! won't they be soon upset, you know,

For the sky is dark, and the voyage is long;

And, happen what may, it's extremely wrong

In a sieve to sail so fast."

The water it soon came in, it did; 25

The water it soon came in.

So, to keep them dry, they wrapped their feet

In a pinky paper all folded neat;

And they fastened it down with a pin.

And they passed the night in a crockery-jar,

And each of them said, "How wise we are! 31

Though the sky be dark, and the voyage be

long,

Yet we never can think we were rash or

wrong,

While round in our sieve we spin "

And all night long they sailed away; 35

And, when the sun went down,

They whistled and warbled a moony song

To the echoing sound of a coppery gong,

In the shade of the mountains brown,

"O Timballoo! how happy we are 40

When we live in a sieve and a crockery-jar!

And all night long, in the moonlight pale,

We sail away with a pea-green sail

In the shade of the mountains brown "

They sailed to the Western Sea, they did —

To a land all covered with trees, 46

And they bought an owl, and a useful cart,

And a pound of rice, and a cranberry-tart,

And a hive of silvery bees,
 And they bought a pig, and some green jackdaws, 50
 And a lovely monkey with lollipop paws,
 And forty bottles of ring-bo-ree,
 And no end of Stilton cheese.

And in twenty years they all came back —
 In twenty years or more; 55
 And everyone said, "How tall they've grown!
 For they've been to the Lakes, and the Terrible Zone,
 And the hills of the Chankly Bore."

And they drank their health, and gave them
 a feast

Of dumplings made of beautiful yeast; 60
 And everyone said, "If we only live,
 We, too, will go to sea in a sieve,
 To the hills of the Chankly Bore."

Far and few, far and few,
 Are the lands where the Jumblies live.
 Their heads are green, and their hands
 are blue; 66

And they went to sea in a sieve

THE OWL AND THE PUSSY-CAT

The Owl and the Pussy-Cat went to sea
 In a beautiful pea-green boat,
 They took some honey, and plenty of money
 Wrapped up in a five-pound note.

The Owl looked up to the stars above, 5
 And sang to a small guitar,

"O lovely Pussy, O Pussy, my love,
 What a beautiful Pussy you are,
 You are,
 You are! 10

What a beautiful Pussy you are!"

Pussy said to the Owl, "You elegant fowl,
 How charmingly sweet you sing!
 Oh! let us be married; too long we have tarried;

But what shall we do for a ring?" 15
 They sailed away, for a year and a day,
 To the land where the bong-tree grows;

And there in a wood a Piggy-wig stood,
 With a ring at the end of his nose,
 His nose, 20
 His nose,

With a ring at the end of his nose.

"Dear Pig, are you willing to sell for one shilling

Your ring?" Said the Piggy, "I will"
 So they took it away, and were married next
 day 25

By the Turkey who lives on the hill.

53 Stilton cheese, a popular brand of English cheese, originally sold at Stilton, a parish in Huntingdonshire

They dined on mince and slices of quince,
 Which they ate with a runcible spoon,
 And hand in hand, on the edge of the sand,
 They danced by the light of the moon,
 The moon, 31
 The moon,
 They danced by the light of the moon

MORNING

'Tis the hour when white-horsed Day
 Chases Night her mares away,
 When the Gates of Dawn (they say)
 Phœbus opes,
 And I gather that the Queen 5
 May be uniformly seen,
 Should the weather be serene,
 On the slopes.

When the plowman, as he goes
 Leathern-gaitered o'er the snows, 10
 From his hat and from his nose
 Knocks the ice;

And the panes are frosted o'er,
 And the lawn is crisp and hoar,
 As has been observed before 15
 Once or twice,

When, arrayed in breastplate red,
 Sings the robin for his bread,
 On the elm-tree that hath shed
 Every leaf; 20

While, within, the frost benumbs
 The still sleepy school-boy's thumbs,
 And in consequence his sums
 Come to grief,

But when breakfast-time hath come, 25
 And he's crunching crust and crumb,
 He'll no longer look a-glum,
 Little dunce;

But be brisk as bees that settle
 On a summer-rose's petal, 30
 Wherefore, Polly, put the kettle
 On at once (1872)

COMPANIONS

A TALE OF A GRANDFATHER

I know not of what we pondered
 Or made pretty pretense to talk,
 As, her hand within mine, we wandered

Morning 2 Night her, Night's This is an old form of the genitive 4 Phœbus, Phœbus Apollo, god of the sun
 5 Queen, Aurora, goddess of the dawn

Toward the pool by the lime-tree walk,
While the dew fell in showers from the passion
flowers 5
And the blush-rose bent on her stalk

I cannot recall her figure:
Was it regal as Juno's own?
Or only a trifle bigger
Than the elves who surround the throne 10
Of the Faery Queen, and are seen, I ween,
By mortals in dreams alone?

What her eyes were like I know not:
Perhaps they were blurred with tears;
And perhaps in yon skies there glow not 15
(On the contrary) clearer spheres
No! as to her eyes I am just as wise
As you or the cat, my dears.

Her teeth, I presume, were "pearly":
But which was she, brunette or blonde? 20
Her hair, was it quaintly curly;
Or as straight as a beadle's wand?
That I failed to remark; it was rather dark
And shadowy round the pond.

Then the hand that reposed so snugly 25
In mine — was it plump or spare?
Was the countenance fair or ugly?
Nay, children, you have me there!
My eyes were p'haps blurred; and besides I'd
heard
That it's horribly rude to stare. 30

And I — was I brusque and surly?
Or oppressively bland and fond?
Was I partial to rising early?
Or why did we twain abscond,
When nobody knew, from the public view 35
To prow! by a misty pond?

What passed, what was felt or spoken —
Whether anything passed at all —
And whether the heart was broken
That beat under that shelt'ring shawl — 40 (If shawl she had on, which I doubt) — has
gone,
Yes, gone from me past recall.

Was I haply the lady's suitor?
Or her uncle? I can't make out;
Ask your governess, dears, or tutor. 45
For myself, I'm in hopeless doubt
As to why we were there, who on earth we
were,
And what this is all about.

BALLAD

PART I

The auld wife sat at her ivied door,
(Butler and eggs and a pound of cheese)
A thing she had frequently done before;
And her spectacles lay on her aproned
knees.

The piper he piped on the hilltop high, 5
Till the cow said, "I die," and the goose asked "Why?"
And the dog said nothing, but searched for fleas.

The farmer he strode through the square farmyard;
(Butler and eggs and a pound of cheese) 10
His last brew of ale was a trifle hard,
The connection of which with the plot one sees.

The farmer's daughter hath frank blue eyes,
(Butler and eggs and a pound of cheese)
She hears the rooks caw in the windy skies,
As she sits at her lattice and shells her peas. 16

The farmer's daughter hath ripe red lips;
(Butler and eggs and a pound of cheese)
If you try to approach her away she skips
Over tables and chairs with apparent ease.

The farmer's daughter hath soft brown hair;
(Butler and eggs and a pound of cheese) 22
And I met with a ballad, I can't say where,
Which wholly consisted of lines like these.

PART 2

She sat with her hands 'neath her dimpled
cheeks, 25
(Butler and eggs and a pound of cheese)
And spake not a word. While a lady speaks
There is hope, but she didn't even sneeze.

She sat with her hands 'neath her crimson
cheeks;
(Butler and eggs and a pound of cheese) 30
She gave up mending her father's breeks,
And let the cat roll in her best chemise

She sat with her hands 'neath her burning
cheeks,
And gazed at the piper for thirteen weeks, 35
Then she followed him out o'er the misty leas.

31 breeks, breeches

Her sheep followed her, as their tails did them,
(Butter and eggs and a pound of cheese)
 And this song is considered a perfect gem;
 And as to the meaning, it's what you please 40

 ("Lewis Carroll") (1832-1898)

From ALICE IN WONDERLAND

FATHER WILLIAM

"You are old, Father William," the young man said,
 "And your hair has become very white,
 And yet you incessantly stand on your head —
 Do you think, at your age, it is right?"

"In my youth," Father William replied to his son, 5
 "I feared it might injure the brain;
 But now that I'm perfectly sure I have none,
 Why, I do it again and again "

"You are old," said the youth, "as I mentioned before,
 And have grown uncommonly fat, 10
 Yet you turned a back-somersault in at the
 door —
 Pray, what is the reason of that?"

"In my youth," said the sage, as he shook his gray locks,
 "I kept all my limbs very supple
 By the use of this ointment — one shilling
 the box — 15
 Allow me to sell you a couple."

"You are old," said the youth, "and your jaws are too weak
 For anything tougher than suet;
 Yet you finished the goose, with the bones
 and the beak;
 Pray, how did you manage to do it?" 20

"In my youth," said his father, "I took to the law,
 And argued each case with my wife;
 And the muscular strength which it gave to my jaw
 Has lasted the rest of my life "

"You are old," said the youth, "one would hardly suppose 25
 That your eye was as steady as ever,

Father William. This is a parody on Southey's The Old Man's Comforts. See Critical Notes

Yet you balanced an eel on the end of your nose —
 What made you so awfully clever?"

"I have answered three questions, and that is enough,"
 Said his father, "don't give yourself airs! 30
 Do you think I can listen all day to such stuff?
 Be off, or I'll kick you downstairs!" (1865)

THE MOCK TURTLE'S SONG

"Will you walk a little faster?" said a whiting
 to a snail,
 "There's a porpoise close behind us, and he's treading on my tail.
 See how eagerly the lobsters and the turtles
 all advance!
 They are waiting on the shingle — will you come and join the dance?
 Will you, won't you, will you, won't you,
 will you join the dance? 5
 Will you, won't you, will you, won't you,
 won't you join the dance?"

"You can really have no notion how delightful it will be
 When they take us up and throw us, with the lobsters, out to sea!"
 But the snail replied, "Too far, too far!" and gave a look askance —
 Said he thanked the whiting kindly, but he would not join the dance. 10
 Would not, could not, would not, could not, would not join the dance.
 Would not, could not, would not, could not, could not join the dance

"What matters it how far we go?" his scaly friend replied,
 "There is another shore, you know, upon the other side.
 The further off from England the nearer is to France; 15
 Then turn not pale, beloved snail, but come and join the dance.
 Will you, won't you, will you, won't you,
 will you join the dance?
 Will you, won't you, will you, won't you,
 won't you join the dance?" (1865)

From THROUGH THE LOOKING-GLASS
JABBERWOCKY

'Twas brillig, and the slithy toves
 Did gyre and gimble in the wabe,
 All mimsy were the borogoves,
 And the mome raths outgrabe

"Beware the Jabberwock, my son!
The jaws that bite, the claws that catch!
Beware the Jubjub bird, and shun
The frumious Bandersnatch!"

He took his vorpal sword in hand;
Long time the manxome foe he sought —
So rested he by the Tumtum tree,
And stood awhile in thought.

And, as in uffish thought he stood,
The Jabberwock, with eyes of flame,
Came whiffing through the tulgey wood,
And burbled as it came!

One, two! One, two! And through and through
The vorpal blade went snicker-snack!
He left it dead, and with its head
He went galumphing back.

"And hast thou slain the Jabberwock?
Come to my arms, my beamish boy!
O frabjous day! Callooh! Callay!"
He chortled in his joy.

'Twas brillig, and the slithy toves
Did gyre and gimble in the wabe;
All mimsy were the borogoves,
And the mome raths outgrabe. (1872)

THE WALRUS AND THE CARPENTER

The sun was shining on the sea,
Shining with all his might;
He did his very best to make
The billows smooth and bright —
And this was odd, because it was
The middle of the night.

The moon was shining sulkily,
Because she thought the sun
Had got no business to be there
After the day was done —
"It's very rude of him," she said,
"To come and spoil the fun!"

The sea was wet as wet could be,
The sands were dry as dry.
You could not see a cloud, because
No cloud was in the sky;
No birds were flying overhead —
There were no birds to fly.

The Walrus and the Carpenter
Were walking close at hand;
They wept like anything to see
Such quantities of sand.
"If this were only cleared away,"
They said, "it would be grand!"

"If seven maids with seven mops
Swept it for half a year,
Do you suppose," the Walrus said,
"That they could get it clear?"
"I doubt it," said the Carpenter,
And shed a bitter tear.

"O Oysters, come and walk with us!"
The Walrus did beseech
"A pleasant walk, a pleasant talk,
Along the briny beach;
We cannot do with more than four,
To give a hand to each."

The eldest Oyster looked at him,
But never a word he said;
The eldest Oyster winked his eye,
And shook his heavy head —
Meaning to say he did not choose
To leave the oyster-bed

But four young Oysters hurried up,
All eager for the treat;
Their coats were brushed, their faces washed,
Their shoes were clean and neat —
And this was odd, because, you know,
They hadn't any feet.

Four other Oysters followed them,
And yet another four,
And thick and fast they came at last,
And more, and more, and more —
All hopping through the frothy waves,
And scrambling to the shore.

The Walrus and the Carpenter
Walked on a mile or so,
And then they rested on a rock
Conveniently low;
And all the little Oysters stood
And waited in a row.

"The time has come," the Walrus said,
"To talk of many things:
Of shoes — and ships — and sealing-wax —
Of cabbages — and kings —
And why the sea is boiling hot —
And whether pigs have wings."

"But wait a bit," the Oysters cried,
"Before we have our chat;
For some of us are out of breath,
And all of us are fat!"
"No hurry!" said the Carpenter
They thanked him much for that.

"A loaf of bread," the Walrus said,
"Is what we chiefly need,
Pepper and vinegar besides
Are very good indeed —"

Now, if you're ready, Oysters dear,
We can begin to feed "

"But not on us!" the Oysters cried,
Turning a little blue. 80

"After such kindness, that would be A dismal thing to do!"

"The night is fine," the Walrus said,
"Do you admire the view?"

"It was so kind of you to come!
And you are very nice!" 85

The Carpenter said nothing but
"Cut us another slice.

I wish you were not quite so deaf —
I've had to ask you twice!" 90

"It seems a shame," the Walrus said,
"To play them such a trick,

After we've brought them out so far,
And made them trot so quick!"

The Carpenter said nothing but 95
"The butter's spread too thick!"

"I weep for you," the Walrus said;
"I deeply sympathize "

With sobs and tears he sorted out
Those of the largest size, 100

Holding his pocket-handkerchief
Before his streaming eyes.

"O Oysters," said the Carpenter,
"You've had a pleasant run!" 105

Shall we be trotting home again?"
But answer came there none —

And this was scarcely odd, because They'd eaten every one.

From THE HUNTING OF THE SNARK

THE BAKER'S TALE

They roused him with muffins — they roused him with ice —

They roused him with mustard and cress —
They roused him with jam and judicious advice —

They set him conundrums to guess.

When at length he sat up and was able to
speak, 5

His sad story he offered to tell;
And the Bellman cried, "Silence! Not even a shriek!"

And excitedly tingled his bell.

The Baker's Tale 1 him, the Baker, who had fainted when the Bellman, after mentioning the "unmistakable marks" of snarks, had said, "Some are Boojums "

There was silence supreme! Not a shriek, not a scream,
Scarcely even a howl or a groan, 10
As the man they called "Ho!" told his story of woe
In an antediluvian tone.

"My father and mother were honest though poor —"

"Skip all that!" cried the Bellman in haste.
"If it once becomes dark, there's no chance of a Snark —" 15
We have hardly a minute to waste!"

"I skip forty years," said the Baker, in tears,
"And proceed without further remark
To the day when you took me aboard of your ship
To help you in hunting the Snark. 20

"A dear uncle of mine (after whom I was named)

Remarked, when I bade him farewell —"
"Oh, skip your dear uncle!" the Bellman
exclaimed,
As he angrily tingled his bell.

"He remarked to me then," said that mildest
of men, 25

"If your Snark be a Snark, that is right, Fetch it home by all means — you may serve
it with greens,
And it's handy for striking a light.

"You may seek it with thimbles — and seek
it with care;

You may hunt it with forks and hope; 30
You may threaten its life with a railway-
share;

You may charm it with smiles and soap—" "

("That's exactly the method," the Bellman
bold

In a hasty parenthesis cried,
"That's exactly the way I have always been told" 35

That the capture of Snarks should be tried!")

"But oh, beamish nephew, beware of the
day,

If your Snark be a Boojum! For then
You will softly and suddenly vanish away,
And never be met with again!" 40

"It is this, it is this that oppresses my soul,
When I think of my uncle's last words,
And my heart is like nothing so much as a bowl

Brimming over with quivering curds!

"It is this, it is this — " "We have had that before!" 45
The Bellman indignantly said.
And the Baker replied, "Let me say it once more
It is this, it is this that I dread!

"I engage with the Snark — every night after dark —
In a dreamy, delirious fight; 50
I serve it with greens in those shadowy scenes,
And I use it for striking a light;

"But if ever I meet with a Boojum, that day,
In a moment (of this I am sure),
I shall softly and suddenly vanish away — 55
And the notion I cannot endure!" (1876)

WILLIAM SCHWENK GIL ERT
(1836-1911)

THE YARN OF THE NANCY BELL

'Twas on the shores that round our coast
From Deal to Ramsgate span,
That I found alone on a piece of stone
An elderly naval man.

His hair was weedy, his beard was long, 5
And weedy and long was he,
And I heard this wight on the shore recite
In a singular minor key:

"Oh, I am a cook and a captain bold,
And the mate of the Nancy brig, 10
And a bo'sun tight, and a midshipmite,
And the crew of the captain's gig."

And he shook his fists and he tore his hair,
Till I really felt afraid,
For I couldn't help thinking the man had been drinking, 15
And so I simply said:

"Oh, elderly man, it's little I know
Of the duties of men of the sea,
And I'll eat my hand if I understand
However you can be 20

"At once a cook, and a captain bold,
And the mate of the Nancy brig,
And a bo'sun tight, and a midshipmite,
And the crew of the captain's gig."

The Yarn of the Nancy Bell. This poem was first offered to Punch but was declined by the editor on the ground that it was too cannibalistic for his readers' tastes
2 Deal, Ramsgate. These are famous watering-places about ten miles apart on the coast of Kent.

Then he gave a hitch to his trousers, which
Is a trick all seamen larn, 26
And having got rid of a thumping quid,
He spun this painful yarn:

"'Twas in the good ship Nancy Bell
That we sailed to the Indian Sea, 30
And there on a reef we come to grief,
Which has often occurred to me.

"And pretty nigh all the crew was drowned
(There was seventy-seven o' soul),
And only ten of the Nancy's men 35
Said 'Here!' to the muster-roll.

"There was me and the cook and the captain
bold,
And the mate of the Nancy brig,
And the bo'sun tight, and a midshipmite,
And the crew of the captain's gig. 40

"For a month we'd neither wittles nor drink,
Till a-hungry we did feel,
So we drewed a lot, and, accordin' shot
The captain for our meal.

"The next lot fell to the Nancy's mate, 45
And a delicate dish he made;
Then our appetite with the midshipmite
We seven survivors stayed.

"And then we murdered the bo'sun tight,
And he much resembled pig; 50
Then we wittled free, did the cook and me,
On the crew of the captain's gig.

"Then only the cook and me was left,
And the delicate question, 'Which
Of us two goes to the kettle?' arose, 55
And we argued it out as sich.

"For I loved that cook as a brother, I did,
And the cook he worshiped me;
But we'd both be blowed if we'd either be stowed
In the other chap's hold, you see. 60

"'I'll be eat if you dines off me,' says Tom;
'Yes, that,' says I, 'you'll be —'
'I'm boiled if I die, my friend,' quoth I;
And 'Exactly so,' quoth he.

"Says he, 'Dear JAMES, to murder me 65
Were a foolish thing to do,
For don't you see that you can't cook me,
While I can — and will — cook you!

"So he boils the water, and takes the salt
And the pepper in portions true 70

(Which he never forgot) and some chopped shalot,
And some sage and parsley too.

"Come here," says he, with a proper pride
Which his smiling features tell,
'Twill soothing be if I let you see 75
How extremely nice you'll smell.'

"And he stirred it round and round and
round,
And he sniffed at the foaming froth;
When I ups with his heels, and smothers his squeals
In the scum of the boiling broth. 80

"And I eat that cook in a week or less,
And — as I eating be
The last of his chops, why, I almost drops,
For a wessel in sight I see!

"And I never larf, and I never smile, 85
And I never lark nor play,
But sit and croak, and a single joke
I have — which is to say:

"Oh, I am a cook and captain bold,
And the mate of the Nancy brig, 90
And a bo'sun tight, and a midshipmite,
And the crew of the captain's gig!" (1866)

THE BISHOP OF RUM-TI-FOO

From east and south the holy clan
Of bishops gathered, to a man;
To Synod, called Pan-Anglican;
In flocking crowds they came.
Among them was a Bishop, who 5
Had lately been appointed to The balmy isle of Rum-ti-Foo,
And Peter was his name.

His people — twenty-three in sum —
They played the eloquent tum-tum 10
And lived on scalps served up in rum —
The only sauce they knew.
When first good BISHOP PETER came
(For PETER was that Bishop's name),
To humor them, he did the same 15
As they of Rum-ti-Foo.

71 shalot, a kind of onion

The Bishop of Rum-Ti-Foo The imaginary bishopric of Rum-Ti-Foo may be placed in England's island possessions in the South Seas

31 Synod. Pan-Anglican The first General Council of the Pan-Anglican Churches, to which bishops of the Church of England came from all parts of the Empire, met in London, September 25, 1867. Gilbert's poem was published in Fun on November 16 of that year

His flock, I've often heard him tell (His name was PETER), loved him well,
And summoned by the sound of bell,
In crowds together came. 20

"Oh, Massa, why you go away?
Oh, MASSA PETER, please to stay."
(They called him PETER, people say,
Because it was his name.)

He told them all good boys to be, 25
And sailed away across the sea,
At London Bridge that Bishop he Arrived one Tuesday night —
And as that night he homeward strode
To his Pan-Anglican abode 30
He passed along the Borough Road
And saw a gruesome sight.

He saw a crowd assembled round
A person dancing on the ground,
Who straight began to leap and bound 35
With all his might and main.
To see that dancing man he stopped,
Who twirled and wriggled, skipped and hopped,
Then down incontinently dropped,
And then sprang up again. 40

The Bishop chuckled at the sight,
"This style of dancing would delight
A simple Rum-ti-Foozle-ite.
I'll learn it, if I can,
To please the tribe when I get back " 45
He begged the man to teach his knack.
"Right Reverend Sir, in half a crack,"
Replied that dancing man.

The dancing man he worked away
And taught the Bishop every day — 50
The dancer skipped like any fay —
Good PETER did the same.
The Bishop buckled to his task
With battements, cuts, and pas de basque (I'll tell you, if you care to ask, 55
That PETER was his name).

"Come, walk like this," the dancer said,
"Stick out your toes — stick in your head,
Stalk on with quick, galvanic tread —
Your fingers thus extend; 60
The attitude's considered quaint."
The weary Bishop, feeling faint,
Replied, "I do not say it ain't,
But 'Time!' my Christian friend!"

31 Borough Road, a street on the south bank of the Thames, between London Bridge and Lambeth Palace, where the meetings of the Synod were held 54 battements . . . basque, agile dance movements, involving striking the feet together, crossing over, and quick turning.

"We now proceed to something new — 65
Dance as the PAYNES and LAURIS do,
Like this — one, two — one, two — one, two."

The Bishop, never proud,
But in an overwhelming heat
(His name was PETER, I repeat) 70
Performed the PAYNE and LAURI feat,
And puffed his thanks aloud.

Another game the dancer planned —
"Just take your ankle in your hand,
And try, my lord, if you can stand — 75
Your body stiff and stark.
If when revisiting your see,
You learnt to hop on shore — like me —
The novelty must striking be,
And must excite remark." 80

"No," said the worthy Bishop, "No;
That is a length to which, I trow,
Colonial Bishops cannot go.
You may express surprise
At finding Bishops deal in pride — 85
But, if that trick I ever tried,
I should appear undignified
In Rum-ti-Foozle's eyes.

"The islanders of Rum-ti-Foo
Are well-conducted persons, who 90
Approve a joke as much as you,
And laugh at it as such;
But if they saw their Bishop land,
His leg supported in his hand,
The joke they wouldn't understand — 95
'Twould pain them very much!" (1867)

CAPTAIN REECE

Of all the ships upon the blue,
No ship contained a better crew
Than that of worthy CAPTAIN REECE,
Commanding of The Mantelpiece.

He was adored by all his men, 5
For worthy CAPTAIN REECE, R. N., Did all that lay within him to Promote the comfort of his crew.

If ever they were dull or sad,
Their captain danced to them like mad, 10
Or told, to make the time pass by,
Droll legends of his infancy.

66 Paynes and Lauris, two families of actors, pantomimists, and dancers. The Paynes, a father and four children, acted in legitimate drama and performed in ballet and harlequinade before distinguished audiences, the Lauris, a brother and two sisters, were cheap music-hall entertainers.
Captain Reece. This ballad anticipates Gilbert's comic opera H. M. S. Pinafore
6 R. N., Royal Navy

A feather bed had every man,
Warm shippers and hot-water can,
Brown Windsor from the captain's store, 15
A valet, too, to every four.

Did they with thirst in summer burn?
Lo, seltzogenes at every turn,
And on all very sultry days
Cream ices handed round on trays. 20

Then currant wine and ginger pops
Stood handily on all the "tops";
And, also, with amusement rife,
A "Zoetrope, or Wheel of Life."

New volumes came across the sea 25
From MISTER MUDIE's libraree;
The Times and Saturday Review
Beguiled the leisure of the crew.

Kind-hearted CAPTAIN REECE, R. N.,
Was quite devoted to his men, 30
In point of fact, good CAPTAIN REECE
Beautified The Mantelpiece.

One summer eve, at half-past ten,
He said (addressing all his men):
"Come, tell me, please, what I can do 35
To please and gratify my crew.

"By any reasonable plan
I'll make you happy if I can;
My own convenience count as nil;
It is my duty, and I will." 40

Then up and answered WILLIAM LEE
(The kindly captain's coxswain he,
A nervous, shy, low-spoken man);
He cleared his throat and thus began:

"You have a daughter, CAPTAIN REECE, 45
Ten female cousins and a niece,
A ma, if what I'm told is true,
Six sisters, and an aunt or two.

"Now, somehow, sir, it seems to me,
More friendly-like we all should be, 50
If you united of 'em to Unmarried members of the crew.

"If you'd ameliorate our life,
Let each select from them a wife;
And as for nervous me, old pal, 55
Give me your own enchanting gal!"

15 Brown Windsor, a kind of scented soap. 18 seltzogenes, apparatus for making carbonated water. 22 "tops," platforms near the heads of the lower masts. 24 Zoetrope . . . Life, an optical toy in which figures on the inside of a revolving cylinder are viewed through slits in the cylinder and appear to be moving. 26. Mudie's libraree, a popular circulating library near the British Museum in London

Good CAPTAIN REECE, that worthy man,
Debated on his coxswain's plan:
"I quite agree," he said, "O BILL,
It is my duty, and I will.

60

"My daughter, that enchanting gurl,
Has just been promised to an earl,
And all my other familiee
To peers of various degree.

"But what are dukes and viscounts to
The happiness of all my crew?
The word I gave you I'll fulfill;
It is my duty, and I will.

65

"As you desire it shall befall,
I'll settle thousands on you all,
And I shall be, despite my hoard,
The only bachelor on board."

70

The boatswain of The Mantelpiece,
He blushed and spoke to CAPTAIN REECE:
"I beg your honor's leave," he said,
"If you would wish to go and wed,

75

"I have a widowed mother who
Would be the very thing for you —
She long has loved you from afar,
She washes for you, CAPTAIN R "

80

The captain saw the dame that day —
Addressed her in his playful way —
"And did it want a wedding ring?
It was a tempting ickle sing!

"Well, well, the chaplain I will seek,
We'll all be married this day week —
At yonder church upon the hill,
It is my duty, and I will!"

85

The sisters, cousins, aunts, and niece,
And widowed ma of CAPTAIN REECE,
Attended there as they were bid;
It was their duty, and they did.

From TRIAL BY JURY

THE JUDGE'S SONG

When I, good friends, was called to the Bar,
I'd an appetite fresh and hearty,
But I was, as many young barristers are,
An impecunious party.
I'd a swallow-tail coat of a beautiful blue —

The Judge's Song The remaining poems of Gilbert are taken from his comic operas. The Judge sings this song just after he takes his position on the bench before beginning the trial of a breach-of-promise suit

A brief which was brought by a booby — 6
A couple of shirts and a collar or two,
And a ring that looked like a ruby!

In Westminster Hall I danced a dance,
Like a semi-despondent fury; 10
For I thought I should never hit on a chance
Of addressing a British jury —
But I soon got tired of third-class journeys,
And dinners of bread and water,
So I fell in love with a rich attorney's 15
Elderly, ugly daughter.

The rich attorney, he wiped his eyes,
And replied to my fond professions.
"You shall reap the reward of your enterprise,
At the Bailey and Middlesex Sessions 20
You'll soon get used to her looks," said he,
"And a very nice girl you'll find her —
She may very well pass for forty-three
In the dusk, with a light behind her!"

The rich attorney was as good as his word; 25
The briefs came trooping gayly,
And every day my voice was heard
At the Sessions or Ancient Bailey.
All thieves who could my fees afford
Relied on my orations, 30
And many a burglar I've restored
To his friends and his relations

At length I became as rich as the GURNEYS —
An incubus then I thought her,
So I threw over that rich attorney's 35
Elderly, ugly daughter.

The rich attorney my character high
Tried vainly to disparage —
And now, if you please, I'm ready to try
This Breach of Promise of Marriage! 40

THE POLICEMAN'S LOT

When a felon's not engaged in his employment,
Or maturing his felonious little plans,
His capacity for innocent enjoyment

6 brief, in English law, a condensed statement of the facts of a litigated case drawn up by an attorney for the use of a barrister in conducting proceedings in a court of justice. Only barristers are admitted to plead at the bar, attorneys, or solicitors, institute actions in behalf of their clients and furnish counsel (barristers) with necessary materials, facts, etc. 9 Westminster Hall, until 1882 the seat of the chief law courts in England. 20 Bailey, "Old Bailey," the central criminal court of London. Middlesex, a criminal court in Westminster. 33 Gurneys, a family of wealthy bankers and philanthropists.

The Policeman's Lot The Sergeant, soft-hearted leader of sentimental police, laments that he must apprehend a band of ruthless but magnanimous pirates who infest the shores of Cornwall

Is just as great as any honest man's.
 Our feelings we with difficulty smother 5
 When constabulary duty's to be done.
 Ah, take one consideration with another,
 A policeman's lot is not a happy one!

When the enterprising burglar's not a-burgling,
 When the cut-throat isn't occupied in crime, 10
 He loves to hear the little brook a-gurgling,
 And listen to the merry village chime.
 When the coster's finished jumping on his
 mother,
 He loves to lie a-basking in the sun.
 Ah, take one consideration with another, 15
 The policeman's lot is not a happy one!

THE ÆSTHETE

If you're anxious for to shine in the high æsthetic line as a man of culture rare,
 You must get up all the germs of the transcendental terms, and plant them everywhere.
 You must lie upon the daisies, and discourse in novel phrases of your complicated
 state of mind,
 The meaning doesn't matter if it's only idle chatter of a transcendental kind.
 And everyone will say, 5
 As you walk your mystic way,
 "If this young man expresses himself in terms too deep for me,
 Why, what a very singularly deep young man
 this deep young man must be!"

Be eloquent in praise of the very dull old ways which have long since passed away,
 And convince 'em, if you can, that the reign of good Queen Anne was Culture's palmiest day. 10
 Of course you will pooh-pooh whatever's fresh and new, and declare it's crude and mean,
 For Art stopped short in the cultivated court of the Empress Josephine.
 And everyone will say,
 As you walk your mystic way,

13. coster, a peddler of fruit, vegetables, and fish
The Æsthe This poem is a caricature of Oscar Wilde and his fellow æsthetes. It is sung by Bunthorne, a fleshly poet, in one of his melodramatic moods. See Biographical Sketch of Wilde.

10. reign . . . day. The reign of Queen Anne (1702-14) was an important period in the classical movement in English literature, which emphasized perfection of form. 12. Empress
Josephine, wife of Napoleon I and empress of the French (1763-1814)

"If that's not good enough for him which is good enough for me, 15
 Why, what a very cultivated kind of youth
 this kind of youth must be!"

Then a sentimental passion of a vegetable fashion must excite your languid spleen,
 An attachment a la Plato for a bashful young potato, or a not-too-French French bean!
 Though the Philistines may jostle, you will rank as an apostle in the high æsthetic band,
 If you walk down Piccadilly with a poppy or a lily in your mediæval hand. 20
 And everyone will say,
 As you walk your flowery way,
 "If he's content with a vegetable love, which would certainly not suit me,
 Why, what a most particularly pure young man this pure young man must be!"

THE SUSCEPTIBLE CHANCELLOR

The law is the true embodiment
 Of everything that's excellent.
 It has no kind of fault or flaw,
 And I, my lords, embody the law.
 The constitutional guardian I 5
 Of pretty young wards in Chancery.
 All are agreeable girls, and none
 Are over the age of twenty-one.
 A pleasant occupation for
 A rather susceptible Chancellor! 10

But though the compliment implied
 Inflates me with legitimate pride,
 It nevertheless can't be denied
 That it has its inconvenient side
 For I'm not so old and not so plain, 15
 And I'm quite prepared to marry again,
 But there'd be the deuce to pay in the Lords
 If I fell in love with one of my wards;
 Which rather tries my temper, for
 I'm such a susceptible Chancellor! 20

And everyone who'd marry a ward
 Must come to me for my accord;

17. vegetable fashion Wilde was a vegetarian. 18 attachment à la Plato, a Platonic love, which involved a purely spiritual comradeship. 19. Philistines, persons lacking liberal culture and refinement. 20. Piccadilly, a famous London street.

The Susceptible Chancellor Phyllis, beloved by the half-fairy Strephon and by the entire House of Lords, is a Ward of Chancery, and so can marry only with the consent of the Lord Chancellor, who in this song describes his dilemma.

6. Chancery, a branch of the High Court of Justice. The wardship of infants and minors left without other guardian comes under its jurisdiction. 17. Lords, the House of Lords, of which the Lord Chancellor is the presiding officer.

So in my court I sit all day,
 Giving agreeable girls away —
 With one for him, and one for he, 25
 And one for you, and one for ye,
 And one for thou, and one for thee;
 But never, oh, never, a one for me!
 Which is exasperating for 29
 A highly susceptible Chancellor!
 (1882)

SAID I TO MYSELF, SAID I

When I went to the Bar as a very young man
 (Said I to myself, said I),
 I'll work on a new and original plan
 (Said I to myself, said I).
 I'll never assume that a rogue or a thief 5
 Is a gentleman worthy implicit belief
 Because his attorney has sent me a brief
 (Said I to myself, said I).
 I'll never throw dust in a juryman's eyes
 (Said I to myself, said I), 10
 Or hoodwink a judge who is not over-wise
 (Said I to myself, said I),
 Or assume that the witnesses summoned in force
 In Exchequer, Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, or Divorce
 Have perjured themselves as a matter of course 15
 (Said I to myself, said I).
 Ere I go into court I will read my brief
 through
 (Said I to myself, said I),
 And I'll never take work I'm unable to do
 (Said I to myself, said I) 20
 My learned profession I'll never disgrace
 By taking a fee with a grin on my face
 When I haven't been there to attend to the case
 (Said I to myself, said I).
 In other professions in which men engage 25
 (Said I to myself, said I),
 The Army, the Navy, the Church, and the Stage
 (Said I to myself, said I),
 Professional license, if carried too far,
 Your chance of promotion will certainly
 mar; 30
 And I fancy the rule might apply to the Bar
 (Said I to myself, said I). (1882)

Said I to Myself, Said I The Chancellor refuses to admit that Strephon may love Phyllis without the Court's permission, even though the "case bubbles over with poetic emotion" He says, "I have always kept my duty strictly before my eyes, and it is to this fact that I owe my advancement to my present distinguished position" He then sings this song

THE CONTEMPLATIVE SENTRY

When all night long a chap remains
 On sentry-go, to chase monotony
 He exercises of his brains —
 That is, assuming that he's got any.
 Though never nurtured in the lap 5
 Of luxury, yet I admonish you,
 I am an intellectual chap,
 And think of things that would astonish
 you.
 I often think it's comical
 How Nature always does contrive 10
 That every boy and every gal,
 That's born into the world alive,
 Is either a little Liberal,
 Or else a little Conservative.
 Fal, lal, la! 15
 When in that house M P.'s divide,
 If they've a brain and cerebellum too,
 They've got to leave that brain outside
 And vote just as their leaders tell 'em
 to.
 But then the prospect of a lot 20
 Of statesmen, all in close proximity,
 A-thinking for themselves, is what
 No man can face with equanimity.
 Then let's rejoice with loud fal, lal,
 That Nature wisely does contrive 25
 That every boy and every gal
 That's born into the world alive
 Is either a little Liberal,
 Or else a little Conservative 29
 Fal, lal, la!

THE DISAGREEABLE MAN

If you give me your attention, I will tell you what I am:
 I'm a genuine philanthropist — all other kinds are sham
 Each little fault of temper and each social defect
 In my erring fellow-creatures, I endeavor to correct.
 To all their little weaknesses I open peoples'
 eyes, 5
 And little plans to snub the self-sufficient I devise;
 I love my fellow-creatures — I do all the good I can —

The Contemplative Sentry On guard outside the Houses of Parliament, Private Willis amuses himself with political speculations

The Disagreeable Man. The misshapen and adder-tongued King Gama, who here describes himself, is a professional cynic, he is later subjected to the ingenious torture of having all his wants satisfied and hence being left with "nothing to grumble at"

Yet everybody says I'm such a disagreeable man!

And I can't think why!

To compliments inflated I've a withering reply,¹⁰

And vanity I always do my best to mortify;

A charitable action I can skillfully dissect;
And interested motives I'm delighted to detect.

I know everybody's income and what everybody earns,

And I carefully compare it with the income-tax returns,¹⁵

But to benefit humanity, however much I plan,

Yet everybody says I'm such a disagreeable man!

And I can't think why!

I'm sure I'm no ascetic; I'm as pleasant as can be;

You'll always find me ready with a crushing repartee;²⁰

I've an irritating chuckle, I've a celebrated sneer,

I've an entertaining snigger, I've a fascinating leer;

To everybody's prejudice I know a thing or two;

I can tell a woman's age in half a minute — and I do —

But although I try to make myself as pleasant as I can,²⁵

Yet everybody says I'm such a disagreeable man!

And I can't think why! (1884)

From THE MIKADO

THEY'LL NONE OF 'EM BE MISSED

As some day it may happen that a victim must be found,

I've got a little list — I've got a little list
Of social offenders who might well be underground,

And who never would be missed — who never would be missed!

There's the pestilential nuisances who write for autographs —⁵

All people who have flabby hands and irritating laughs —

All children who are up in dates, and floor you with 'em flat —

All persons who in shaking hands, shake hands with you like that —

They'll None of 'Em Be Missed This song is sung by Ko-Ko, the Lord High Executioner

And all third persons who on spoiling tête-à-têtes insist —

They'd none of 'em be missed — they'd none of 'em be missed!¹⁰

Chorus

He's got 'em on the list — he's got 'em on the list,

And they'll none of 'em be missed — they'll none of 'em be missed!

There's a nigger serenader, and the others of his race,

And the piano-organist — I've got him on the list!

And the people who eat peppermint and puff it in your face,¹⁵

They never would be missed — they never would be missed!

Then the idiot who praises, with enthusiastic tone,

All centuries but this, and every country but his own;

And the lady from the provinces who dresses like a guy,

And "who doesn't think she waltzes, but would rather like to try!"²⁰

And that singular anomaly, the lady novelist —

I don't think she'd be missed — I'm sure she'd not be missed!

Chorus

He's got her on the list — he's got her on the list;

And I don't think she'll be missed — I'm sure she'll not be missed!

And that Nisi Prius nuisance, who just now is rather rife,²⁵

The Judicial humorist — I've got him on the list!

All funny fellows, comic men, and clowns of private life —

They'd none of 'em be missed — they'd none of 'em be missed!

And apologetic statesmen of a compromising kind,

Such as — What d'ye call him — Thing'em bob, and likewise Never Mind,³⁰

And 'St — 'st — 'st — and What's-his-name, and also You-know-who —

The task of filling up the blanks I'd rather leave to you.

²⁵ Nisi Prius, literally, unless before, a law term used of any cause involving issues of fact and appointed to be tried in the courts of Westminster unless before the day set the judges tried the cause in the county in which it arose

But it really doesn't matter whom you put upon the list,
For they'd none of 'em be missed — they'd none of 'em be missed!

Chorus

You may put 'em on the list — you may put
'em on the list; 35
And they'll none of 'em be missed — they'll none of 'em be missed! (1885)

THREE LITTLE MAIDS FROM SCHOOL

Three little maids from school are we,
Pert as a school girl well can be,
Filled to the brim with girlish glee,
Three little maids from school!

Everything is a source of fun. 5
Nobody's safe, for we care for none!
Life is a joke that's just begun!
Three little maids from school!

Three little maids who, all unwary,
Come from a ladies' seminary, 10
Freed from its genius tutelary —
Three little maids from school!

One little maid is a bride, Yum-Yum —
Two little maids in attendance come —
Three little maids is the total sum, 15
Three little maids from school!

From three little maids take one away —
Two little maids remain, and they —
Won't have to wait very long, they say — 20
Three little maids from school!

Three little maids who, all unwary,
Come from a ladies' seminary,
Freed from its genius tutelary —
Three little maids from school! (1885)

LET THE PUNISHMENT FIT THE CRIME

A more humane Mikado never Did in Japan exist,
To nobody second,
I'm certainly reckoned
A true philanthropist. 5
It is my very humane endeavor
To make, to some extent,
Each evil liver
A running river
Of harmless merriment. 10

Three Little Maids from School This song is sung by Yum-Yum, Peep-Bo, and Pitti-Sing after they have been heralded by a Chorus of Yum-Yum's schoolfellows.

Let the Punishment Fit the Crime This song is sung by the Mikado after he has been heralded by a procession and a Chorus.

My object all sublime
I shall achieve in time —
To let the punishment fit the crime —
The punishment fit the crime;
And make each prisoner pent 15
Unwillingly represent
A source of innocent merriment,
Of innocent merriment!

All prosy dull society sinners,
Who chatter and bleat and bore, 20
Are sent to hear sermons
From mystical Germans
Who preach from ten to four.
The amateur tenor, whose vocal villainies
All desire to shirk, 25
Shall, during off-hours,
Exhibit his powers
To Madame Tussaud's waxwork.

The lady who dyes a chemical yellow,
Or stains her gray hair puce, 30
Or pinches her figger,
Is blacked like a nigger
With permanent walnut juice.
The idiot who, in railway carriages,
Scribbles on window panes, 35
We only suffer
To ride on a buffer
In Parliamentary trains.

My object all sublime, etc.

The advertising quack who wearies 40
With tales of countless cures,
His teeth, I've enacted,
Shall all be extracted
By terrified amateurs.
The music hall singer attends a series 45
Of masses and fugues and "ops"
By Bach, interwoven
With Spohr and Beethoven,
At classical Monday Pops.

The billiard sharp whom any one catches, 50
His doom's extremely hard —
He's made to dwell
In a dungeon cell
On a spot that's always barred.

28 Madame Tussaud's waxwork, an exhibition of wax-portrait models of ancient and modern personages and historical tableaux, founded by Marie Tussaud (1760-1850) and located in Marylebone Road, London 30 puce, dark brown 38. Parliamentary trains, trains that each railway company is required to run daily each way over its system for the convenience of third-rate passengers at a rate not over one penny a mile 46 masses . . .  On a cloth untrue

WILLOW, TITWILLOW

On a tree by a river a little tom-tit
 Sang "Willow, titwillow, titwillow!"
 And I said to him, "Dicky-bird, why do you
 sit
 Singing, 'Willow, titwillow, titwillow'?
 Is it weakness of intellect, birdie?" I cried, 5
 "Or a rather tough worm in your little inside?"
 With shake of his poor little head he replied,
 "Oh, willow, titwillow, titwillow!"

He slapped at his chest, as he sat on that
 bough,
 Singing, "Willow, titwillow, titwillow!" 10
 And a cold perspiration bespangled his brow,
 Oh, willow, titwillow, titwillow!
 He sobbed and he sighed, and a gurgle he gave,
 Then he threw himself into the billowy wave,
 And an echo arose from the suicide's grave —
 "Oh, willow, titwillow, titwillow!" 16

Now I feel just as sure as I'm sure that my
 name
 Isn't Willow, titwillow, titwillow,
 That 'twas blighted affection that made him
 exclaim,
 "Oh, willow, titwillow, titwillow!" 20
 And if you remain callous and obdurate, I Shall perish as he did, and you will know why,
 Though I probably shall not exclaim as I die,
 "Oh, willow, titwillow, titwillow!" (1885)

THE FOUNTAIN OF TEARS

If you go over desert and mountain,
 Far into the country of sorrow,
 Today and tonight and tomorrow,
 And maybe for months and for years,
 You shall come, with a heart that is bursting
 For trouble and toiling and thirsting, 6
 You shall certainly come to the fountain
 At length — to the Fountain of Tears.

56 fittess finger-stalls, ill-fitting coverings for the fingers

Willow, Titwillow This song is sung by Ko-Ko, the Lord High Executioner of the Town of Titipu, as he tries to convince the elderly lady Katisha that he will "perish on the spot" if she does not accept his love. She had protested that no one had ever died of a broken heart.

Very peaceful the place is, and solely
 For piteous lamenting and sighing, 10
 And those who come living or dying
 Alike from their hopes and their fears;
 Full of cypress-like shadows the place is,
 And statues that cover their faces;
 But out of the gloom springs the holy 15
 And beautiful Fountain of Tears.

And it flows and it flows with a motion
 So gentle and lovely and listless,
 And murmurs a tune so restless
 To him who hath suffered and hears — 20
 You shall surely — without a word spoken,
 Kneel down there and know your heart
 broken,
 And yield to the long curbed emotion
 That day by the Fountain of Tears.

For it grows and it grows, as though leap-
 ing
 Up higher the more one is thinking; 26
 And ever its tunes go on sinking
 More poignantly into the ears;
 Yea, so blessed and good seems that fountain,
 Reached after dry desert and mountain, 30
 You shall fall down at length in your weeping
 And bathe your sad face in the tears

Then, alas! while you lie there a season,
 And sob between living and dying,
 And give up the land you were trying 35
 To find 'mid your hopes and your fears;
 — O the world shall come up and pass o'er
 you;
 Strong men shall not stay to care for you,
 Nor wonder indeed for what reason
 Your way should seem harder than theirs. 40

But perhaps, while you lie, never lifting
 Your cheek from the wet leaves it presses,
 Nor caring to raise your wet tresses
 And look how the cold world appears —
 O perhaps the mere silences round you —
 All things in that place grief hath found 46
 you,
 Yea, e'en to the clouds o'er you drifting,
 May soothe you somewhat through your tears.

You may feel, when a falling leaf brushes
 Your face, as though someone had kissed
 you, 50
 Or think at least someone who missed you
 Hath sent you a thought — if that cheers,
 Or a bird's little song, faint and broken,
 May pass for a tender word spoken;
 — Enough, while around you there rushes 55
 That life-drowning torrent of tears.

13 cypress-like, dark and full of the associations of death.

And the tears shall flow faster and faster,
 Brim over, and baffle resistance,
 And roll down bleared roads to each distance

Of past desolation and years; 60
 Till they cover the place of each sorrow,
 And leave you no Past and no morrow;
 For what man is able to master
 And stem the great Fountain of Tears?

But the floods and the tears meet and gather;
 The sound of them all grows like thunder
 — O into what bosom, I wonder,

Is poured the whole sorrow of years?
 For Eternity only seems keeping 70
 Account of the great human weeping;
 May God, then, the Maker and Father —
 May He find a place for the tears! (1870)

From CHAIVIVEL

Hath any loved you well, down there,
 Summer or winter through?
 Down there, have you found any fair
 Laid in the grave with you?
 Is death's long kiss a richer kiss 5
 Than mine was wont to be —
 Or have you gone to some far bliss
 And quite forgotten me?

What soft enamoring of sleep
 Hath you in some soft way? 10
 What charmed death holdeth you with deep Strange lure by night and day?
 — A little space below the grass,
 Out of the sun and shade;
 But worlds away from me, alas, 15
 Down there where you are laid?

My bright hair's waved and wasted gold,
 What is it now to thee —
 Whether the rose-red life I hold
 Or white death holdeth me? 20
 Down there you love the grave's own green,
 And evermore you rave
 Of some sweet seraph you have seen
 Or dreamt of in the grave.

There you shall lie as you have lain, 25
 Though in the world above,
 Another live your life again,
 Loving again your love
 Is it not sweet beneath the palm?

Chaitivel. This poem is based freely upon a lai of Marie de France, 12th century poet and fabulist. Sarrazine has loved Pharamond and has given him a tress of her golden hair as a token, but he has died in warfare against the Paynims and has been buried with the tress of hair wrapped around him. Thereafter Sarrazine takes a new lover, Chaitivel. One day, in a mood of pity and half-revived love, she sings this song to Pharamond; he listens from his grave.
 23 seraph, angel

Is not the warm day rife 30
 With some long mystic golden calm
 Better than love and life?

The broad quaint odorous leaves like hands
 Weaving the fair day through,
 Weave sleep no burnished bird withstands, 35
 While death weaves sleep for you,
 And many a strange rich breathing sound
 Ravishes morn and noon;
 And in that place you must have found
 Death a delicious swoon. 40

Hold me no longer for a word
 I used to say or sing,
 Ah, long ago you must have heard
 So many a sweeter thing
 For rich earth must have reached your heart
 And turned the faith to flowers; 46
 And warm wind stolen, part by part,
 Your soul through faithless hours

And many a soft seed must have won
 Soil of some yielding thought, 50
 To bring a bloom up to the sun
 That else had ne'er been brought;
 And, doubtless, many a passionate hue
 Hath made that place more fair,
 Making some passionate part of you 55
 Faithless to me down there. (1872)

ODE

We are the music makers,
 And we are the dreamers of dreams,
 Wandering by lone sea-breakers,
 And sitting by desolate streams —
 World-losers and world-forsakers, 5
 On whom the pale moon gleams —
 Yet we are the movers and shakers
 Of the world forever, it seems.

With wonderful deathless ditties
 We build up the world's great cities, 10
 And out of a fabulous story
 We fashion an empire's glory:
 One man with a dream, at pleasure,
 Shall go forth and conquer a crown;
 And three with a new song's measure 15
 Can trample a kingdom down.

We, in the ages lying
 In the buried past of the earth,
 Built Nineveh with our sighing,
 And Babel itself in our mirth; 20

Ode Cf. Tennyson's The Poet, page 16
 19-20 Built Nineveh, etc. Nineveh, the magnificent capital of the ancient Assyrian Empire, traditionally the greatest city, and Babel, the highest tower in the world, are taken as types of superb projects conceived by dreamers
 See Genesis, 11 1-9

And o'erthrew them with prophesying
 To the old of the new world's worth;
 For each age is a dream that is dying,
 Or one that is coming to birth.

A breath of our inspiration 25
 Is the life of each generation;
 A wondrous thing of our dreaming
 Unearthly, impossible seeming —
 The soldier, the king, and the peasant
 Are working together in one, 30
 Till our dream shall become their present,
 And their work in the world be done.

They had no vision amazing
 Of the goodly house they are raising;
 They had no divine foreshowing 35
 Of the land to which they are going.
 But on one man's soul it hath broken,
 A light that doth not depart;
 And his look, or a word he hath spoken,
 Wrought flame in another man's heart. 40

And therefore today is thrilling
 With a past day's late fulfilling;
 And the multitudes are enlisted
 In the faith that their fathers resisted,
 And, scorning the dream of tomorrow, 45
 And bringing to pass, as they may,
 In the world, for its joy or its sorrow,
 The dream that was scorned yesterday.

But we, with our dreaming and singing,
 Ceaseless and sorrowless we! 50
 The glory about us clinging
 Of the glorious futures we see,
 Our souls with high music ringing.
 O men! it must ever be
 That we dwell, in our dreaming and singing,
 A little apart from ye. 56

For we are afar with the dawning
 And the suns that are not yet high,
 And out of the infinite morning
 Intrepid you hear us cry — 60
 How, spite of your human scorning,
 Once more God's future draws nigh,
 And already goes forth the warning
 That ye of the past must die.

Great hail! we cry to the comers 65
 From the dazzling unknown shore;
 Bring us hither your sun and your summers,
 And renew our world as of yore;
 You shall teach us your song's new numbers,
 And things that we dreamed not before —
 Yea, in spite of a dreamer who slumbers, 71
 And a singer who sings no more. (1874)

SONG

I made another garden, yea,
 For my new love;
 I left the dead rose where it lay,
 And set the new above
 Why did the summer not begin? 5
 Why did my heart not haste?
 My old love came and walked therein,
 And laid the garden waste.

She entered with her weary smile,
 Just as of old; 10
 She looked around a little while
 And shivered with the cold
 Her passing touch was death to all,
 Her passing look a blight,
 She made the white rose-petals fall, 15
 And turned the red rose white.

Her pale robe clinging to the grass
 Seemed like a snake
 That bit the grass and ground, alas!
 And a sad trail did make. 20
 She went up slowly to the gate;
 And there, just as of yore,
 She turned back at the last to wait,
 And say farewell once more. (1874)

ZULEIKA

Zuleika is fled away,
 Though your bolts and your bars were
 strong;
 A minstrel came to the gate today
 And stole her away with a song.
 His song was subtle and sweet, 5
 It made her young heart beat,
 It gave a thrill to her faint heart's will,
 And wings to her weary feet.

Zuleika was not for ye,
 Though your laws and your threats were hard; 10
 The minstrel came from beyond the sea,
 And took her in spite of your guard.
 His ladder of song was slight,
 But it reached to her window height,
 Each verse so frail was the silken rail 15
 From which her soul took flight

The minstrel was fair and young;
 His heart was of love and fire,
 His song was such as you ne'er have sung,
 And only love could inspire. 20
 He sang of the singing trees,
 And the passionate sighing seas,
 And the lovely land of his minstrel band,
 And with many a song like these

21 o'erthrew . . . prophesying. O'Shaughnessy calls the prophets of Israel poets. The destruction of Nineveh was prophesied by Nahum (2-3), Jonah (1-4), and Zephaniah (2 13-15), of Babylon by Isaiah (13, 14, 21, 47, etc.) and Jeremiah (50-51)

He drew her forth to the distant wood, 25
 Where bird and flower were gay,
 And in silent joy each green tree stood,
 And with singing along the way,
 He drew her to where each bird
 Repeated his magic word, 30
 And there seemed a spell she could not tell
 In every sound she heard.

And singing and singing still,
 He lured her away so far,
 Past so many a wood and valley and hill, 35
 That now, would you know where they are?
 In a bark on a silver stream,
 As fair as you see in a dream;
 Lo! the bark glides along to the minstrel's
 song,
 While the smooth waves ripple and gleam 40

And soon they will reach the shore
 Of that land whereof he sings,
 And love and song will be evermore
 The precious, the only things,
 They will live and have long delight, 45
 They two in each other's sight,
 In the violet vale of the nightingale,
 And the flower that blooms by night (1874)

SONG

When the Rose came I loved the Rose,
 And thought of none beside,
 Forgetting all the other flowers,
 And all the others died,
 And morn and noon, and sun and showers, 5
 And all things loved the Rose,
 Who only half returned my love,
 Blooming alike for those.

I was the rival of a score
 Of loves on gaudy wing, 10
 The nightingale I would implore
 For pity not to sing,
 Each called her his, still I was glad
 To wait or take my part;
 I loved the Rose — who might have had 15
 The fairest lily's heart. (1881)

AT HER GRAVE

I have stayed too long from your grave, it seems,
 Now I come back again.
 Love, have you stirred down there in your
 dreams
 Through the sunny days or the rain?

At Her Grave This poem was written at the grave of O'Shaughnessy's wife a few months after her death

Ah, no! the same peace — you are happy so,
 And your flowers, how do they grow? 6

Your rose has a bud, is it meant for me?
 Ah, little red gift put up
 So silently, like a child's present, you see
 Lying beside your cup! 10
 And geranium leaves — I will take, if I may,
 Two or three to carry away

I went not far. In yon world of ours
 Grow ugly weeds With my heart,
 Thinking of you and your garden of flowers,
 I went to do my part, 16
 Plucking up, where they poison the human wheat,
 The weeds of cant and deceit

'Tis a hideous thing I have seen, and the toil
 Begets few thanks, much hate; 20
 And the new crop only will find the soil
 Less foul — for the old 'tis too late.
 I come back to the only spot I know
 Where a weed will never grow (1881)

THOMAS EDWARD BROWN*
 (1830-1897)

CHALSE A KILLEY

TO CHALSE IN HEAVEN

So you are gone, dear Chalse!
 Ah! well, it was enough —
 The ways were cold, the ways were rough —
 O Heaven! O home!
 No more to roam — 5
 Chalse, poor Chalse

And now it's all so plain, dear Chalse!
 So plain —
 The wildered brain,
 The joy, the pain — 10
 The phantom shapes that haunted,
 The half-born thoughts that daunted —
 All, all is plain,
 Dear Chalse!
 All is plain 15

Yet where you're now, dear Chalse,
 Have you no memory
 Of land and sea,
 Of vagrant liberty?
 Through all your dreams 20
 Come there no gleams
 Of morning sweet and cool
 On old Barrule?

*The poems of Brown are from The Collected Poems of Thomas Edward Brown By permission of The Macmillan Company, publishers
Chalse A Killey 23 Barrule, a mountain on the Isle of Man, northwest of England

Breathes there no breath,
Far o'er the hills of Death, 25
Of a soft wind that dallies
Among the Curragh sallies — Shaking the perfumed gold-dust on the streams?
Chalse, poor Chalse!

Or is it all forgotten, Chalse? 30
A fever fit that vanished with the night —
Has God's great light
Pierced through the veiled delusions,
The errors and confusions;
And pointed to the tablet, where 35
In quant and wayward character,
As of some alien clime,
His name was graven all the time?
All the time!
O Chalse! poor Chalse. 40

Such music as you made, dear Chalse!
With that crazed instrument
That God had given you here for use —
You will not wonder now if it did loose
Our childish laughter, being writhen and bent
From native function — was it not, sweet saint? 46
But when such music ceases,
'Tis God that takes to pieces
The inveterate complication,
And makes a restoration 50
Most subtle in its sweetness,
Most strong in its completeness,
Most constant in its meetness;
And gives the absolute tone,
And so appoints your station 55
Before the throne —
Chalse, poor Chalse.

And yet while you were here, dear Chalse,
You surcly had more joy than sorrow.
Even from your weakness you did borrow 60
A strength to mock
The frowns of fortune, to decline the shock
Of rigorous circumstance,
To weave around your path a dance
Of "airy nothings," Chalse, and while your soul, 65
Dear Chalse! was dark,
As an o'erwanéd moon from pole to pole,
Yet had you still an arc
Forlorn, a silvery rim
Of the same light wherein the cherubim 70
Bathe their glad brows, and veer

27 Curragh, an extensive region in the Isle of Man—from the Northern Mountains to the coast Sallies are willows
65. "airy nothings" From Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream, V, 1, 16 Theseus explains that the poet's pen turns the forms of imaginary things
"to shapes and gives to airy nothing
A local habitation and a name"
70. cherubim, an order of angels.

On circling wings above the starry sphere —
Chalse, poor Chalse.

Yes, you had joys, dear Chalse! as when forsooth
Right valiant for the truth, 75
You crossed the Baldwin hills,
And at the Union Mills,
Inspired with sacred fury,
You helped good Parson Drury
To "put the Romans out," 80
A champion brave and stout —
Ah! now, dear Chalse, of all the radiant host,
Who loves you most?
I think I know him, kneeling on his knees —
Is it Saint Francis of Assise? 85
Chalse, poor Chalse.

Great joy was yours, dear Chalse! when first
I met you
In that old Vicarage
That shelters under Bradda: we did get you
By stratagem most sage 90
Of youthful mischief — got you all unweeting
Of mirthful toys —
A merry group of girls and boys,
To hold a missionary meeting,
And you did stand upon a chair, 95
In the best parlor there,
And dear old Parson Corrin was from home,
And I did play a tune upon a comb,
And unto us
You did pronounce a speech most marvelous,
Dear Chalse! and then you said 101
And sthroughed the head —
"If there'll be no objection,
We'll now pursed to the collection" —
Chalse, poor Chalse! 105

And do you still remember, Chalse,
How at the Dhoor —
Near Ramsey, to be sure —
I got two painters painting in the chapel
To make with me a congregation? 110
And you did mount the pulpit, and did grapple
With a tremendous text, and warn the nation
Of drunkenness; and in your hand
Did wave an empty bottle, so that we,

It is a dialect word of the Isle of Man 107 Dhoor, a well of "black water" near Ramsey, a seaport on the northeast coast of the Isle

By palpable typology, 115
Might understand —
Dear Chalse, you never had
An audience more silent or more sad!

And have you met him, Chalse,
Whom you did long to meet? 120
You used to call him dear and sweet —
Good Bishop Wilson — has he taken you
In hand, dear Chalse? And is he true,
And is he kind,
And do you tell him all your mind, 125
Dear Chalse —
All your mind?
And have you yet set up the press,
And is the type in readiness,
Founded with gems 130
Of living sapphire, dipped
In blood of molten rubies, diamond-tipped?
And, with the sanction of the Governor,
Do you, a proud compositor,
Stand forth, and print the Hymns? 135
Chalse, poor Chalse! (1875; 1893)

AN OXFORD IDYLL

Ah, little mill, you're rumbling still,
Ah, sunset flecked with gold!
Ah, deepening tinge, ah, purple fringe
Of lilac as of old!
Ah, hawthorn hedge, ah, light-won pledge 5
Of kisses warm and plenty,
When she was true, and twenty-two,
And I was two-and-twenty.
I don't know how she broke her vow —
She said that I was "horty"; 10
And there's the mill a-goin' still,
And I am five-and-forty.
And sooth to tell, 'twas just as well,
Her aitches were uncertain,
Her ways though nice, not point-device, 15
Her father liked his "Burton"
But there's a place you cannot trace,
So spare the fond endeavor —
A cloudless sky, where Kate and I
Are twenty-two forever. (1875; 1893)

OPIFEX

As I was carving images from clouds,
And tinting them with soft ethereal dyes
Pressed from the pulp of dreams, one comes, and cries —
"Forbear!" and all my heaven with gloom enshrouds

essay 5

Wouldst have due recompense of vulgar

Thou hast not known the Master; in thy

Thereat I rose, and from his presence passed,
But, going, murmured — "To the God
above,
Who holds my heart, and knows its store
of love, 15
I turn from thee, thou proud iconoclast."

Then on the shore God stooped to me, and
said.

I bid thee carve them, knowing what I know" 1893)

THE VOICES OF NATURE

This cluck of water in the tangles —
What said it to the Angles?
What to the Jutes,
This wave sip-sopping round the salt sea-
roots?
With what association did it hit on 5
The tympanum of a Damnonian Briton?
To tender Guinevere, to Britomart,
The stout of heart,
Along the guarded beach
Spoke it the same speech 10
It speaks to me —
This sopping of the sea?

19 let, hindrance
The Voices of Nature The scenery of this poem is that near Clevedon, in East Somerset
2 Angles. The Angles and the Jutes were Germanic peoples who went to England in the 5th century. The Angles, who gave their name to the country, settled in the north-eastern section. The Jutes settled in Kent 6 Damnonian Briton. The Damnonians were a powerful ancient people chiefly of Cornwall and Devonshire 7 Guinevere, Arthur's queen. See Lancelot and Elaine, page 120, and Critical Note Britomart, in Spenser's Faerie Queen, a lady knight representing Chastity.

Surely the plash
 Of water upon stones,
 Encountering in their ears the tones 15
 Of dominant passions masterful,
 Made but a bourdon for the chord
 Of a great key, that rested lord
 Of all the music, straining not the bones
 Of Merlin's scull; 20
 And in the ear of Vivian its frets
 Were silver castanets
 That tinkled 'mong the vanities, and quickened
 The free, full-blooded pulse,
 Nor sickened 25
 Her soul, nor stabbed her to the heart.
 Strange! that to me this gurgling of the dulse
 Allays no smart,
 Consoles no nerve,
 Rounds off no curve — 30
 Alack!
 Comes rather like a sigh,
 A question that has no reply —
 Opens a deep misgiving
 What is this life I'm living — 35
 Our fathers were not so —
 Silence, thou moaning wrack!
 And yet . . . I do not know.
 And yet . . . I would go back. (1893)

DORA

She knelt upon her brother's grave,
 My little girl of six years old —
 He used to be so good and brave,
 The sweetest lamb of all our fold;
 He used to shout, he used to sing, 5
 Of all our tribe the little king —
 And so unto the turf her ear she laid,
 To hark if still in that dark place he played.

No sound! no sound
 Death's silence was profound; 10
 And horror crept
 Into her aching heart, and Dora wept.
 If this is as it ought to be,
 My God, I leave it unto Thee.

RISUS DEI

Methinks in Him there dwells alway
 A sea of laughter very deep,
 Where the leviathans leap,

17 bourdon, a bass accompaniment 20 Merlin, the magician of Arthur's Court Vivian was Merlin's mistress See note on The Holy Grail, 175-76, page 139 21 frets, the sounds made by using frets, the ridges across the fingerboard of a stringed instrument 27 dulse, a kind of coarse seaweed found along the coasts of Ireland and Scotland
Risus Dei The title means Laughter of God

And little children play,
 Their white feet twinkling on its crispéd
 edge;
 But in the outer bay 6
 The strong man drives the wedge
 Of polished limbs,
 And swims.
 Yet there is one will say, 10
 "It is but shallow, neither is it broad" —
 And so he frowns, but is he nearer God?

One saith that God is in the note of bird,
 And piping wind, and brook,
 And all the joyful things that speak no word,
 Then if from sunny nook 16
 Or shade a fair child's laugh
 Is heard,
 Is not God half?
 And if a strong man gird 20
 His loins for laughter, stirred
 By trick of ape or calf —
 Is he no better than a cawing rook?

Nay 'tis a Godlike function, laugh thy fill!
 Mirth comes to thee unsought, 25
 Mirth sweeps before it like a flood the mill
 Of languaged logic; thought
 Hath not its source so high;
 The will
 Must let it by: 30
 For though the heavens are still,
 God sits upon His hill,
 And sees the shadows fly;
 And if He laughs at fools, why should He
 not?

"Yet hath a fool a laugh" — Yea, of a sort, 35
 God careth for the fools;
 The chemic tools
 Of laughter He hath given them, and some toys
 Of sense, as 'twere a small retort
 Wherein they may collect the joys 40
 Of natural giggling, as becomes their state.
 The fool is not inhuman, making sport
 For such as would not gladly be without
 That old familiar noise
 Since, though he laugh not, he can cachinnate — 45
 This also is of God, we may not doubt.

"Is there an empty laugh?" Best called a shell
 From which a laugh has flown,
 A mask, a well
 That hath no water of its own, 50
 Part echo of a groan,
 Which, if it hide a cheat,

37 chemic tools, chemical tools—that is, voice and muscles 45 cachinnate, chuckle

Is a base counterfeit,
 But if one borrow
 A cloak to wrap a sorrow 55
 That it may pass unknown,
 Then can it not be empty. God doth dwell
 Behind the feigned gladness,
 Inhabiting a sacred core of sadness.

"Yet is there not an evil laugh?" Content —
 What follows? 61
 When Satan fills the hollows
 Of his bolt-riven heart
 With spasms of unrest,
 And calls it laughter; if it give relief 65
 To his great grief,
 Grudge not the dreadful jest.
 But if the laugh be aimed
 At any good thing that it be ashamed,
 And blush thereafter, 70
 Then it is evil, and it is not laughter.

There are who laugh, but know not why:
 Whether the force
 Of simple health and vigor seek a course
 Extravagant, as when a wave runs high, 75
 And tips with crest of foam the incontinent curve,
 Or if it be reserve
 Of power collected for a goal, which had,
 Behold! the man is fresh So when strung nerve,
 Stout heart, pent breath, have brought you to the source 80
 Of a great river, on the topmost stie
 Of cliff, then have you bade
 All heaven to laugh with you, yet somewhere
 nigh
 A shepherd lad
 Has wondering looked, and deemed that you were mad. 85

O GOD TO THEE I YIELD

O God to Thee I yield
 The gift Thou givest most precious, most divine!
 Yet to what field
 I must resign
 His little feet 5
 That wont to be so fleet,
 I muse. Oh, joy to think
 On what soft brink
 Of flood he plucks the daffodils,
 On what empurpled hills 10
 He stands, Thy kiss all fresh upon his brow,
 And wonders if His father sees him now!

MY GARDEN

A garden is a lovesome thing, God wot!
 Rose plot,
 Fringed pool,
 Ferned grot —
 The veriest school 5
 Of peace; and yet the fool
 Contends that God is not —
 Not God! in gardens! when the eve is cool?
 Nay, but I have a sign;
 'Tis very sure God walks in mine. 10

I BENDED UNTO ME

I bended unto me a bough of May,
 That I might see and smell;
 It bore it in a sort of way,
 It bore it very well.
 But, when I let it backward sway, 5
 Then it were hard to tell
 With what a toss, with what a swing,
 The dainty thing
 Resumed its proper level,
 And sent me to the devil. 10
 I know it did — you doubt it?
 I turned, and saw them whispering about it.

JOHN LEICESTER WARREN, LORD DE TABLEY (1835-1895)

From PHILOCTETES

CHORUS

In wonder and time-mists
 They shaped it to glory
 The beautiful earth;
 They gave it a vesture
 Of sea to heave round it. 5
 And over it softened
 Forever the cloud-swell.

Firmly then they ringed the giant mountains,
 The ancient powers.
 The snows went on them flake by flake, 10
 Till spring was warming underneath Their hoarded silence. How it snapped with
 sound,
 The gleaming and the leaping and the exuberant
 Wrestle and trouble of down-going rills.
 The shivering forests heard it and they called

2 They, the elder gods, the ancient powers of line 9

To the warm vernal waters in delight, 16
 "Our roots are dry, O sweetest child of the hill;
 Lap us and bathe us and drench us in exquisite
 Coiling, enormous,
 Limitless streams. 20
 Let the great light be on us like a music,
 Light and water flooding down with sound.
 Smite the gray branch
 Out in crumpled leaflets;
 Let the white resinous 25
 Ends be throbbing with the bud within;
 So shall the wood lead out as with a song
 Its tender vaporous greening."
 So runs the forest music,
 As all the great world goes 30
 Into its daylight of the year. Behold
 Winter is nature's night
 And summer this earth's day.
 Lonely of man stood nature at her prime;
 There was no human voice about her
 woods, 35
 The morning melody of birds
 Praising the gods alone.
 Then on the bosom of the earth arose
 Man, gods' plowman of the soil.
 They gave him brain to understand how strong 40
 Their hands could be;
 For these, although almighty, needed yet
 The incense of his wonder. What avail
 Omnipotence without some weaker thing
 To be amazed? With only brother gods, 45
 To see, as strong as they, who would create?
 Natheless these men they planted to sing praises
 And offer beast's blood
 To out-of-reach perfection,
 Mutinous grew; 50
 Requiring justice, beholding frailty
 Among celestials,
 They laughed and straightway
 They made their reason god,
 Which all gods hate. 55
 Therefore innumerable Calamitous auguries
 Dismayed the roaming,
 Tribeless, kingless,
 Men who buidled god in thought. 60
 Till Themis came, the golden-locked one,
 And taught them ritual, justice, mercy,
 And many an old forgotten phrasing
 Of Orphic hymn,

And choral flutings and cakes well kneaded 65
 To Pan the bud-expander:
 Which is a god seated in nature's core,
 Abiding with us,
 No cloudy ruler in the delicate air-belts:
 But in the ripening slips and tangles 70
 Of cork-woods, in the bulrush pits where oxen
 Lie soaking chin-deep;
 In the mulberry orchard
 With milky kexes and marrowy hemlocks,
 Among the floating silken under-darnels. 75
 He is a god this Pan
 Content to dwell among us, nor disdains
 The damp hot wood-smell.
 He loves the flaky pine-boles sand-brown,
 And, when the first few crisping leaf-falls herald 80
 The year at wasting, he feels the ivies
 Against the seamy beech-sides
 Push up their stem-feet,
 And broaden downwards, rounded budward
 Into their orb'd tops of mealy white-green.
 Pan too will watch in the open glaring 86
 Shadeless quarry quiet locusts
 Seething in the blaze on vine-leaves.
 He will hear the sour sharp yelping
 Of the dog-troop on the sea-marge 90
 Tearing at some stranded carcass,
 Flushing up the cranes and herons.
 He will watch some bloom of a maiden
 From the shrine-porch slow descending,
 With her flashing silver sandals, 95
 Bound on service to the image,
 Leaning hold by the myrtle bushes,
 Rinsing from the lowest marble
 Stair her sacrificial urnlet.
 Aye, and Pan will watch the tillage, 100
 Millet fields and mastich coppice,
 Whereby sits the bronzed and rough-lipped
 Bondsman with his goad to hasten
 On the oxen treading barley,
 Round and round; he scopeth eager 105
 For his meat a pulpy gourd-head —
 These old Pan considers surely
 Knowing man, and all his labor,
 Which the newer god-brood send him,
 Lest in over-ease revolting 110
 Man should hurl an insurrection
 Titanlike against Olympus.

FORTUNE'S WHEEL

I had a true-love, none so dear,
And a friend both leal and tried;
I had a cask of good old beer,
And a gallant horse to ride.

A little while did Fortune smile 5
On him and her and me,
We sang along the road of life
Like birds upon a tree.

My lady fell to shame and hell,
And with her took my friend, 10
My cask ran sour, my horse went lame,
So alone in the cold I end. (1893)

AN ODE

Sire of the rising day,
Lord of the faded ray,
King of sweet ways of morn or daylight done,
Ruler of cloud and sleep, 5
Whose tread is on the deep,
Whose feet are red in glory like the sun,
Whose hand binds up the winds as in a sheaf,
Whose shadow makes them tremble like a
leaf

Lordship and Fear are thine,
Upon whose brow divine 10
The diadem of pale eternal fire
Burns over eyes that fear
No stain of earthly tear,
Nor soften for a yearning world's desire
The treasure of strong thunder at thy hand 15
Waits like an eagle watching thy command.

Thee rosy beams enshroud;
Rich airs and amber cloud
Reach the calm golden spaces of thy hall
The floods awake with noise 20
Churning the deep, whose voice,
Thou heedest not; although the storm-wind
call,
And break beneath the swollen vapor-bands,
In wild rains wearing at the sodden lands.

Can then our weak-winged prayer 25
Ascend and touch thee there,
Sailing between the gleaming gates of heaven?
Can our wail clumb and smite
Thy council-seat of light?
Where for a garment is the moon-ray given 30
To clothe thy shoulders, and blue star-dust strown
Bickers about the borders of thy throne.

Ah, Lord, who may withstand
One reaching of thy hand,
Who from thy fury fence his house secure? 35
What citadel is there,
In lifted hand or prayer,
If all the radiant heaven may not endure
The scathing of thine anger, keen to blight
The strong stars rolling in their fields of
light?

Arise and take thine ease, 41
For thou art Lord, and these Are but as sprinkled dust before thy power.
Art thou the less divine,
If they lift hands and whine, 45
Or less eternal since they crawl an hour?
After a little pain to fold their hands,
And perish like the beasts that tilled their lands.

They dug their field and died,
Believed thee or denied, 50
Cursed at thy name, or fed thy shrine with
fume;
Loved somewhat, hated more,
Hoarded, grew stiff and sore,
Gat sturdy sons to labor in their room,
Became as alien faces in their land, 55
Died, worn and done with as a waste of sand.

Strong are alone the dead.
They need not bow the head,
Or reach one hand in ineffectual prayer.
Safe in their iron sleep 60
What wrong shall make them weep,
What sting of human anguish reach them
there?
They are gone safe beyond the strong one's reign;
Who shall decree against them any pain?

Will they entreat in tears 65
The inexorable years
To sprinkle trouble gently on their head?
Safe in their house of grass,
Eternity may pass,
And be to these an instant in its tread, 70
Calm as an autumn night, brief as the song
Of the wood dove. The dead alone are strong

Love is not there, nor Hate,
Weak slaves of feeble Fate;
Their lord is nothing here, his reign is done 75
Here side by side can lie
Glory and Infamy;
Hero and herdsman in red earth are one.
Their day is over; sad they silence keep,
Abashed before the perfect crowning sleep. 80

CONCLUSION

'Tis gone, the land of dreams! a grayer sky
Has leadened all the beaming sunrise zone,
The hard world wakes in cold reality,
Romance hath stilled her music, touch and tone.

It was a land of heroes, and of streams 5
Rolling gigantic music, dreadful heights Beetled beneath the thunder clouds, with gleams
Of a wild sunset spread in flying lights,

Or emerald valleys, myrtle growths embayed
Whereby the masted streamers fluttering
ride, 10
Where wakeful fountains rippled on, nor stayed
The night-long murmur of their hisping tide.

The maiden waits by some enchanted spring,
His charger watches by a bleeding knight,
The fairy princess leads her elves a ring, 15
The ogre crashes down the pinewood's
height.

Gone? all shall go, the fable and the truth;
Ambrosial glimpses of an antique day,
Lost, as the love dream of a withered youth
In wintry eyes where charmed laughter
lay. (1895)

HENRY AUSTIN DO SON
(1840-1921)

INCOGNITA

Just for a space that I met her —
Just for a day in the train!
It began when she feared it would wet her,
That tiniest spurtle of rain;
So we tucked a great rug in the sashes, 5
And carefully padded the pane;
And I sorrow in sackcloth and ashes,
Longing to do it again!

Then it grew when she begged me to reach her
A dressing-case under the seat; 10
She was "really so tiny a creature
That she needed a stool for her feet!"
Which was promptly arranged to her order
With a care that was even minute,
And a glimpse — of an open-work border, 15
And a glance — of the fairiest boot.

Conclusion This poem is of interest mainly as showing the inroad of realism upon romance Cf Kipling's The King,
page 889

Incognita The title means An Unknown Woman

Then it drooped, and revived at some hovels —
"Were they houses for men or for pigs?"
Then it shifted to muscular novels,
With a little digression on prigs: 20
She thought Wives and Daughters "so jolly",
"Had I read it?" She knew when I had,
Like the rest, I should dote upon "Molly,"
And "poor Mrs. Gaskell — how sad!"

"Like Browning?" "But so-so." His proof lay
Too deep for her frivolous mood, 26
That preferred your mere metrical soufflé
To the stronger poetical food;
Yet at times he was good — "as a tonic."
Was Tennyson writing just now? 30
And was this new poet Byronic
And clever, and naughty, or how?

Then we trifled with concerts and croquet,
Then she daintily dusted her face;
Then she sprinkled herself with "Ess Bou-quet," 35
Fished out from the foregoing case;
And we chattered of Gassier and Grisi,
And voted Aunt Sally a bore;
Discussed if the tight rope were easy,
Or Chopin much harder than Spohr. 40

And oh! the odd things that she quoted,
With the prettiest possible look,
And the price of two buns that she noted
In the prettiest possible book;
While her talk like a musical rillet 45
Flashed on with the hours that flew;
And the carriage, her smile seemed to fill it
With just enough summer — for Two.

Till at last in her corner, peeping
From a nest of rugs and of furs, 50
With the white shut eyelids sleeping
On those dangerous looks of hers,
She seemed like a snow-drop breaking,
Not wholly alive nor dead,
But with one blind impulse making 55
To the sounds of the spring overhead,

And I watched in the lamplight's swerving
The shade of the down-dropped lid,
And the lip-line's delicate curving,

Where a slumbering smile lay hid, 60
Till I longed that, rather than sever,
The train should shriek into space,
And carry us onward — forever —
Me and that beautiful face.

But she suddenly woke in a fidget, 65
With fears she was "nearly at home,"
And talk of a certain Aunt Bridget,
Whom I mentally wished — well, at Rome,
Got out at the very next station,
Looking back with a merry Bon Sour; 70
Adding, too, to my utter vexation,
A surplus, unkind Au Revour.

So left me to muse on her graces,
To doze and to muse, till I dreamed
That we sailed through the sunniest places 75
In a glorified galley, it seemed;
But the cabin was made of a carriage,
And the ocean was Eau-de-Cologne,
And we split on a rock labeled MARRIAGE,
And I woke — as cold as a stone. 80

And that's how I lost her — a jewel,
Incognita — one in a crowd,
Not prudent enough to be cruel,
Not worldly enough to be proud
It was just a shut lid and its lashes, 85
Just a few hours in a train,
And I sorrow in sackcloth and ashes,
Longing to see her again. (1866; 1866)

A DEAD LETTER

"À cœur blessé — l'ombre et le silence"
— H. DE BALZAC

I

I drew it from its china tomb —
It came out feebly scented
With some thin ghost of past perfume
That time and years had lent it

An old, old letter — folded still! 5
To read with due composure
I sought the sun-lit window-sill
Above the gray enclosure,

That, glimmering in the sultry haze,
Faint-flowered, dimly shaded, 10
Slumbered, like Goldsmith's Madam Blaize,
Bedizened and brocaded

A Dead Letter "À cœur . . . silence," darkness and silence for the wounded heart

11 Madam Blaize See Oliver Goldsmith's An Elegy
on Thos. Glady of Her Sex, Mrs. Mary Blaize, 1759

"At church, in silks and satins new,
With hoop of monstrous size,
She never slumbered in her pew —
But when she shut her eyes"

A queer old place! You'd surely say
Some tea-board garden-maker
Had planned it in Dutch William's day 15
To please some florist Quaker,

So trim it was The yew-trees still,
With pious care perverted,
Grew in the same grim shapes, and still
The lipless dolphin spurted, 20

Still in his wonted state abode
The broken-nosed Apollo;
And still the cypress-arbor showed
The same umbrageous hollow.

Only — as fresh young Beauty gleams 25
From coffee-colored laces —
So peeped from its old-fashioned dreams
The fresher modern traces;

For idle mallet, hoop, and ball
Upon the lawn were lying, 30
A magazine, a tumbled shawl,
Round which the swifts were flying;

And, tossed beside the Guelder rose,
A heap of rainbow knitting,
Where, blinking in her pleased repose, 35
A Persian cat was sitting

"A place to love in — live — for aye,
If we too, like Tithonus,
Could find some god to stretch the gray
Scant life the Fates have thrown us, 40

"But now by steam we run our race
With buttoned heart and pocket,
Our Love's a gilded, surplus grace —
Just like an empty locket.

"The time is out of joint" Who will, 45
May strive to make it better;
For me, this warm old window-sill,
And this old dusty letter."

"Dear John (the letter ran), it can't, can't be,
For Father's gone to Chorley Fair with

But we shall meet before a Week is gone —

And Sam's two Eyes are all for Cissy, John!

"My Dear, I don't think that I thought of much

Before we knew each other, I and you;
And now, why, John, your least, least Finger-touch

Gives me enough to think a Summer
through 70
See, for I send you Something! There, 'tis
gone!

Look in this corner — mind you find it,
John!"

3

This was the matter of the note —
A long-forgot deposit,
Dropped in an Indian dragon's throat, 75
Deep in a fragrant closet,

Piled with a dapper Dresden world —
Beaux, beauties, prayers, and poses —
Bonzes with squat legs undercurled,
And great jars filled with roses. 80

Ah, heart that wrote! Ah, lips that kissed!
You had no thought or presage
Into what keeping you dismissed
Your simple old-world message!

A reverent one. Though we today 85
Distrust beliefs and powers,
The artless, ageless things you say
Are fresh as May's own flowers,

Starring some pure primeval spring,
Ere Gold had grown despotic — 90
Ere Life was yet a selfish thing,
Or Love a mere exotic!

I need not search too much to find
Whose lot it was to send it,
That feel upon me yet the kind 95
Soft hand of her who penned it;

And see, through two score years of smoke,
In by-gone, quaint apparel,
Shine from yon time-black Norway oak
The face of Patience Caryl — 100

The pale, smooth forehead, silver-tressed;
The gray gown, primly flowered;
The spotless, stately coif whose crest
Like Hector's horse-plume towered;

And still the sweet half-solemn look 105
Where some past thought was clinging,
As when one shuts a serious book
To hear the thrushes singing.

I kneel to you! Of those you were,
Whose kind old hearts grow mellow — 110
Whose fair old faces grow more fair
As Point and Flanders yellow;

Whom some old store of garnered grief,
Their placid temples shading,
Crowns like a wreath of autumn leaf 115
With tender tints of fading.

Peace to your soul! You died unwed —
Despite this loving letter.
And what of John? The less that's said
Of John, I think, the better. (r868)

TO "LYDIA LANGUISH"

"Il me faut des émotions."

— BLANCHE AMORY

You ask me, Lydia, "whether I,
If you refuse my suit, shall die"
(Now pray don't let this hurt you!)
Although the time be out of joint,
I should not think a bodkin's point 5
The sole resource of virtue;
Nor shall I, though your mood endure
Attempt a final Water-cure

103 coif, a linen cap 104 Hector's horse-plume, described by Homer (the Iliad, Book 6, lines 494-5), in connection with Hector's parting from his wife 112 Point and Flanders, varieties of fine lace

To "Lydia Languish" Lydia Languish is the sentimental lady in R. B. Sheridan's The Rivals, 1775

"II . . . émotions," "I must have my thrills," a phrase which Thackeray gave to Blanche Amory, a character in The History of Pendennis, Volume 2, Chapter 35

4 time, joint From Hamlet, I, 5, 188 5 bodkin's point. See Hamlet, III, 1, 70-76 —

"For who would bear the whips and scorn of time,
When he himself might his quietus make
With a bare bodkin?"

8 Water-cure The final water-cure is drowning, the usual water-cure involved bathing in such medicinal springs as those at Bath and Tunbridge Wells

Except against my wishes;
 For I respectfully decline
 To dignify the Serpentine,
 And make hors-d'œuvres for fishes;
 But if you ask me whether I
 Composedly can go,
 Without a look, without a sigh,
 Why, then I answer — No

"You are assured," you sadly say
 (If in this most considerate way
 To treat my suit your will is),
 That I shall "quickly find as fair
 Some new Neëra's tangled hair —
 Some easier Amaryllis "
 I cannot promise to be cold
 If smiles are kind as yours of old
 On lips of later beauties;
 Nor can I, if I would, forget
 The homage that is Nature's debt,
 While man has social duties;
 But if you ask shall I prefer
 To you I honor so,
 A somewhat visionary Her,
 I answer truly — No.

You fear, you frankly add, "to find
 In me too late the altered mind
 That altering Time estranges "
 To this I make response that we
 (As physiologists agree)
 Must have septennial changes;
 This is a thing beyond control,
 And it were best upon the whole
 To try and find out whether
 We could not, by some means, arrange
 This not-to-be-avoided change
 So as to change together;
 But, had you asked me to allow
 That you could ever grow
 Less amiable than you are now —
 Emphatically — No

But — to be serious — if you care
 To know how I shall really bear
 This much discussed rejection,
 I answer you: As feeling men
 Behave, in best romances, when You outrage their affection; —
 With that gesticulatory woe,
 By which, as melodramas show,
 Despair is indicated;
 Enforced by all the liquid grief
 Which hugest pocket-handkerchief

11 the Serpentine, a body of water in Hyde Park, London 21-22 Neëra . . . Amaryllis, shepherdesses in classical Latin pastoral poetry Cf Milton's Lycidas, 64-69 —

"Alas what boots it with incessant care
 To tend the homely, slighted shepherd's trade,
 And strictly meditate the thankless Muse?
 Were it not better done as others use,
 To sport with Amaryllis in the shade,
 Or with the tangles of Neëra's hair?"

Has ever simulated;
 And when, arrived so far, you say
 In tragic accents, "Go,"
 Then, Lydia, then . . . I still shall stay,
 And firmly answer — No.

ROSE-LEAVES

"Sans peser. — Sans rester."

A KISS

Rose kissed me today.
 Will she kiss me tomorrow?
 Let it be as it may,
 Rose kissed me today
 But the pleasure gives way
 To a savor of sorrow, —
 Rose kissed me today —
 Will she kiss me tomorrow?

CIRCE

In the School of Coquettes
 Madam Rose is a scholar —
 Oh, they fish with all nets
 In the School of Coquettes!
 When her brooch she forgets
 'Tis to show her new collar;
 In the School of Coquettes
 Madam Rose is a scholar!

A TEAR

There's a tear in her eye —
 Such a clear little jewel!
 What can make her cry?
 There's a tear in her eye.
 "Puck has killed a big fly —
 And it's horribly cruel";
 There's a tear in her eye —
 Such a clear little jewel!

A GREEK GIFT

Here's a present for Rose,
 How pleased she is looking!
 Is it verse? — is it prose?
 Here's a present for Rose!
 "Plats," "Entrées," and "Rôts" —
 Why, it's "Gouffé on Cooking",

Rose-Leaves "Sans rester," "without pondering, without waiting" These lyrics are in the medieval French form known as the triolet, characterized by its lightness and the set repetition of its lines

Circe Circe was the epic coquette who held the men of Ulysses in her power, see Homer's Odyssey, Book 5

A Tear 5 Puck, probably a cat, named from Shakespeare's goblin in A Midsummer Night's Dream

A Greek Gift A Greek gift is one that brings profit to the giver—said of the Trojan Horse

5 "Plats . . . Rôts," chapter headings on "main dishes," "subordinate dishes," and "roasts" in a cook-book 6 "Gouffé on Cooking," a glorified cook-book, written in French by Jules Gouffé, chef at the Paris Jockey Club, and translated by Alphonse Gouffé, head pastry-cook to her Majesty the Queen, London, 1868

Here's a present for Rose,
How pleased she is looking!

"URCEUS EXIT"

I intended an Ode,
And it turned to a Sonnet.
It began à la mode,
I intended an Ode;
But Rose crossed the road 5
In her latest new bonnet;
I intended an Ode,
And it turned to a Sonnet. (1874)

ARS VICTRIX

(IMITATED FROM THÉOPHILE GAUTIER)

Yes; when the ways oppose —
When the hard means rebel,
Fairer the work outgrows —
More potent far the spell.

O Poet, then, forbear 5
The loosely-sandaled verse,
Choose rather thou to wear
The buskin — straight and terse;

Leave to the tiro's hand
The limp and shapeless style, 10
See that thy form demand
The labor of the file.

Sculptor, do thou discard
The yielding clay — consign
To Paros marble hard 15
The beauty of thy line —

Model thy Satyr's face
In bronze of Syracuse;
In the veined agate trace
The profile of thy Muse. 20

Painter, that still must mix
But transient tints anew,
Thou in the furnace fix
The firm enamel's hue;

Let the smooth tile receive 25
Thy dove-drawn Erycine;

"Urceus Exit" From Horace's Art of Poetry, lines 21-22
"Amphora coepit institui: currente rota cur urceus exit?" —
"That was a wine-jar when the molding began, why, as the wheel runs round, does it turn out a pitcher?" (Fairclough's translation) Horace is speaking of poems that begin grandly and end trivially.

Ars Victorix. The title means Art the Victor. Gautier

All passes ART alone
Enduring stays to us, 30
The Bust outlasts the throne —
The Coin, Tiberius;

Even the gods must go;
Only the lofty Rime
Not countless years o'erthrow — 35
Not long array of time.

Paint, chisel, then, or write;
But, that the work surpass,
With the hard fashion fight —
With the resisting mass. 40

"GOOD-NIGHT, BABETTE!"

"Si vieillesse pouvait!" — "

SCENE — A small neat room. In a high Voltaire chair sits a white-haired old gentleman.

MONSIEUR VIEUXBOIS. BABETTE.

M. Vieuxbois (turning querulously)

Day of my life! Where can she get?
Babette! I say! Babette! — Babette!
Babette (entering hurriedly)
Coming, M'sieu'! If M'sieu' speaks
So loud, he won't be well for weeks!

M. Vieuxbois

Where have you been?

Babette

Why, M'sieu' knows — 5
April! . . . Ville d'Avray! . . . Ma'am'-selle
Rose!

M. Vieuxbois

Ah! I am old — and I forget
Was the place growing green, Babette?

Babette

But of the greenness! — yes, M'sieu'!
And then the sky so blue! — so blue! 10

27 Sirens, sea nymphs said to frequent an island near the coast of Italy, and by their singing to lure mariners to destruction 32 Coin, Tiberius, the coin outlasts the monarch whose face it bears Tiberius was emperor of Rome (14-37 A.D.)

"Good-Night, Babette!" "Si pouvait!" From an old French proverb, adapted by H. Estienne, Les Premices, Epigram 191. "Si jeunesse savait! si vieillesse pouvait!" — "If youth only knew! if age only could!" Voltaire chair, a deep, low easy-chair with an adjustable back.

6 Ville d'Avray, a quiet suburb down the Seine from Paris, evidently Rose was buried there.

And when I dropped my immortelle,
How the birds sang!
(Lifting her apron to her eyes)
This poor Ma'am'selle!

M. Vieuxbois

You're a good girl, Babette, but she —
She was an angel, verily.
Sometimes I think I see her yet 15
Stand smiling by the cabinet,
And once, I know, she peeped and laughed
Betwixt the curtains . . .

Where's the draft?

(She gives him a cup)

Now I shall sleep, I think, Babette —
Sing me your Norman chansonnette. 20

Babette (sings)

"Once at the Angelus

(Ere I was dead),

Angels all glorious

Came to my bed;

Angels in blue and white 25
Crowned on the head."

M. Vieuxbois (drowsily)

"She was an angel" . . . "Once she laughed" . . .
What, was I dreaming?

Where's the draft?

Babette (showing the empty cup)

The draft, M'sieu?

M. Vieuxbois

How I forget!
I am so old! But sing Babette! 30

Babette (sings)

"One was the friend I left

Stark in the snow;

One was the wife that died

Long — long ago;

One was the love I lost . . . 35

How could she know?"

M. Vieuxbois (murmuring)

Ah, Paul! . . . old Paul! . . . Eulalie too!
And Rose . . . And O! "the sky so blue!"

Babette (sings)

"One had my mother's eyes,

Wistful and mild, 40

One had my father's face;

One was a child:
All of them bent to me —
Bent down and smiled!"

(He is asleep!)

M. Vieuxbois (almost inaudibly)

"How I forget!" 45
"I am so old" . . . "Good night, Babette!" (1876; 1876)

"YOU BID ME TRY"

You bid me try, BLUE-EYES, to write
A Rondeau What! — forthwith? — tonight?
Reflect. Some skill I have, 'tis true,
But thirteen lines! — and rimed on two!
"Refrain," as well Ah, hapless plight! 5

Still, there are five lines — ranged aright.
These Gallic bonds, I feared, would fright
My easy Muse They did, till you —
You bid me try!

That makes them eight. The port's in
sight — 10

'Tis all because your eyes are bright!

Now just a pair to end in "oo" —

When maids command, what can't we do?
Behold! — the RONDEAU, tasteful, light,
You bid me try! 15

THE CURÉ'S PROGRESS

Monsieur the Curé down the street

Comes with his kind old face —

With his coat worn bare, and his straggling
hair,

And his green umbrella-case.

You may see him pass by the little "Grande
Place," 5

And the tiny "Hôtel-de-Ville";

He smiles as he goes to the fleuriste Rose,

And the pompier Théophile

He turns, as a rule, through the "Marché"
cool,

Where the noisy fish-wives call, 10

And his compliment pays to the "belle Thérèse,"

As she knits in her dusky stall.

"You Bid Me Try" This poem, adapted from the original of the French poet Vincent Voiture (1598-1648), exemplifies its own form—a rondeau, which consists of thirteen lines running on two rimes, and an unrimed refrain taken from the beginning of the first line The form is of French origin

7 Gallic bonds, the restrictions imposed by the French (Gallic) form
The Curé's Progress The title means The Parish Priest
on a Stroll

5 "Grande Place," the public square 6 "Hôtel-de-Ville," the town hall 7 fleuriste, florist 8 pompier, fireman 9 "Marché," public market 11. "belle Thérèse," beautiful Theresa

11. immortelle, a daisy-like flower, the everlasting, often used for decorating graves 20. chansonnette, a folk-song
21. Angelus, the bell rung at morning, noon, or evening to summon worshippers to recite the Angelus, a prayer commemorating the Annunciation

There's a letter to drop at the locksmith's shop,
And Toto, the locksmith's niece,
Has jubilant hopes, for the Curé gropes 15
In his tails for a pain d'épice.

There's a little dispute with a merchant of fruit,
Who is said to be heterodox,
That will ended be with a "Ma foi, ouï!"
And a pinch from the Curé's box. 20

There is also a word that no one heard
To the furrier's daughter Lou;
And a pale cheek fed with a flickering red,
And a "Bon Dieu garde M'sieu!"

But a grander way for the Sous-Préfet, 25
And a bow for Ma'am'selle Anne;
And a mock "off-hat" to the Notary's cat,
And a nod to the Sacristan —

For ever through life the Curé goes
With a smile on his kind old face — 30
With his coat worn bare, and his straggling
hair,
And his green umbrella-case

ON A FAN THAT BELONGED TO THE MARQUISE DE POMPADOUR

Chicken-skin, delicate, white,
Painted by Carlo Vanloo,
Loves in a riot of light,
Roses and vaporous blue;
Hark to the dainty frou-frou! 5
Picture above, if you can,
Eyes that could melt as the dew —
This was the Pompadour's fan!

See how they rise at the sight,
Thronging the Œil de Bœuf through 10
Courtiers as butterflies bright,
Beauties that Fragonard drew,
Talon-rouge, falbala, queue,

16 pain d'épice, piece of gingerbread 19 "Ma foi, ouï!" "You're certainly right" 20 pinch . . . box, a pinch of snuff 24 "Bon . . . M'sieu!" "God protect you, sir" 25 Sous-Préfet, the highest state official in the arrondissement, or county, to which the town belongs 28 Sacristan, the church functionary who has charge of the sacred vessels and vestments

On a Fan That Belonged to the Marquise de Pompadour This is a ballade in honor of Jeanne Antoinette Poisson le Normant d'Étioles (1721-1764), mistress of Louis XV of France, and a lady of great political astuteness and power (For an explanation of the ballade form, see note on Swinburne's A Ballad of Dreamland, page 713)

2 Carlo Vanloo, a painter (1705-1765), high in the favor of Louis XV and the court 5 frou-frou, the rustling of skirts 10 Œil de Bœuf, a waiting-room in the royal palace at Versailles 12 Fragonard, Jean Honoré Fragonard (1732-1806), fashionable painter of amorous and gay ladies at the French court 13 Talon queue, characteristic details in the aristocratic dress of the period—red heels, plaited flounces, and pigtails

Cardinal, Duke — to a man,
Eager to sigh or to sue — 15
This was the Pompadour's fan!

Ah, but things more than polite
Hung on this toy, voyez-vous!
Matters of state and of might,
Things that great ministers do; 20
Things that, maybe, overthrew
Those in whose brains they began;
Here was the sign and the cue —
This was the Pompadour's fan!

Envoy

Where are the secrets it knew? 25
Weavings of plot and of plan?
— But where is the Pompadour, too?
This was the Pompadour's fan!
(1878; 1878)

ON THE HURRY OF THIS TIME

With slower pen men used to write,
Of old, when "letters" were "polite";
In Anna's, or in George's days,
They could afford to turn a phrase,
Or trum a straggling theme aright. 5

They knew not steam; electric light
Not yet had dazed their calmer sight; —
They meted out both blame and praise
With slower pen.

Too swiftly now the hours take flight! 10
What's read at morn is dead at night;
Scant space have we for Art's delays,
Whose breathless thought so briefly stays,
We may not work — ah! would we might! —
With slower pen. 15

THE LADIES OF ST. JAMES'S

A PROPER NEW BALLAD OF THE COUNTRY AND THE TOWN

The ladies of St. James's
Go swinging to the play;
Their footmen run before them,
With a "Stand by! Clear the way!"
But Phyllida, my Phyllida! 5

18 voyez-vous! don't you see?

On the Hurry of This Time This is a rondeau (see note on "You Bid Me Try," page 764)

3 Anna's . . . George's days, the Neo-Classic age of English literature, comprising the reigns of Anne (1702-14) and George I (1714-27)

The Ladies of St. James's St. James is a fashionable district in London with Pall Mall as its principal thoroughfare

Sub-title country town London is the "town", the rest of the British Isles is the "country"

She takes her buckled shoon,
When we go out a-courting
Beneath the harvest moon.

The ladies of St James's
Wear satin on their backs;
They sit all night at Ombre,
With candles all of wax.
But Phyllida, my Phyllida!
She dons her russet gown,
And runs to gather May dew
Before the world is down.

The ladies of St James's!
They are so fine and fair,
You'd think a box of essences
Was broken in the air;
But Phyllida, my Phyllida!
The breath of heath and furze,
When breezes blow at morning,
Is not so fresh as hers.

The ladies of St James's!
They're painted to the eyes;
Their white it stays forever,
Their red it never dies.
But Phyllida, my Phyllida!
Her color comes and goes;
It trembles to a lily —
It wavers to a rose.

The ladies of St James's!
You scarce can understand
The half of all their speeches,
Their phrases are so grand,
But Phyllida, my Phyllida!
Her shy and simple words
Are clear as after rain-drops
The music of the birds.

The ladies of St. James's!
They have their fits and freaks;
They smile on you — for seconds,
They frown on you — for weeks
But Phyllida, my Phyllida!
Come either storm or shine,
From Shrove-tide unto Shrove-tide,
Is always true — and mine.

My Phyllida! my Phyllida!
I care not though they heap
The hearts of all St James's,
And give me all to keep;

I care not whose the beauties
Of all the world may be,
For Phyllida — for Phyllida
Is all the world to me! (1883; 1883) 55

ON A NANKIN PLATE

"Ah me, but it might have been!
Was there ever so dismal a fate?" —
Quoth the little blue mandarin.

"Such a maid as was never seen!
She passed, though I cried to her 'Wait' —
Ah me, but it might have been!

"I cried, O my Flower, my Queen,
Be mine!" 'Twas precipitate" —
Quoth the little blue mandarin —

"But then . . . she was just sixteen,
Long-eyed — as a lily straight —
Ah me, but it might have been!

"As it was, from her palankeen,
She laughed — 'You're a week too late!' "
(Quoth the little blue mandarin) 15

"That is why, in a mist of spleen,
I mourn on this Nankin Plate
Ah me, but it might have been!" —
Quoth the little blue mandarin. (1883, 1883)

"IN AFTER DAYS"

In after days when grasses high
O'er-top the stone where I shall lie,
Though ill or well the world adjust
My slender claim to honored dust,
I shall not question nor reply 5

I shall not see the morning sky;
I shall not hear the night-wind sigh;
I shall be mute, as all men must
In after days!

On a Nankin Plate The Nankin blue-and-white china porcelain, made at the Imperial works at King-te-chin and exported from Nankin, was much in vogue in England at the time, compare Lang's Ballade of Blue China, page 796 Dobson's poem is a villanelle, an old French form of lyric

3 mandarin, a Chinese official of army or state 13 palankeen, an enclosed chair borne on the shoulders of porters.

"In After Days" This is a rondeau (see note on "You Bid Me Try," page 764). "The old French forms which M Théodore de Banville has turned to such good use in his Odes Funambulesques and Occidentales are rather better known at this moment [1877] than when, in the course of 1876, most of these attempts were published. The rondeau (not the first in English by a century or so) is here written upon the model of Voiture, the rondel upon that of Charles of Orleans, but with a (symmetric) deviation in the arrangement of the lines" (Dobson's note)

6 shoon, shoes 11 Ombre, the 18th century equivalent of bridge, for a graphic description of the game, see Pope's Rape of the Lock, Canto 3 14 russet, rustic, homespun, made of coarse brown cloth 47 Shrove-tide, the three days just before Lent

But yet, now living, fain were I 10
That someone then should testify,
Saying — "He held his pen in trust
To Art, not serving shame or lust."
Will none? — Then let my memory die
In after days! 15

"WHEN BURBADGE PLAYED"

When Burbadge played, the stage was bare
Of fount and temple, tower and stair;
Two backwords eked a battle out;
Two supers made a rabble rout;
The throne of Denmark was a chair! 5

And yet, no less, the audience there
Thrilled through all changes of Despair,
Hope, Anger, Fear, Delight, and Doubt
When Burbadge played!

This is the Actor's gift: to share 10
All moods, all passions, nor to care
One whit for scene, so he without
Can lead men's minds the roundabout
Stirred as of old those hearers were
When Burbadge played! 15

A DIALOGUE

TO THE MEMORY OF MR. ALEXANDER POPE

"Non in jussa cano." — VIRGIL

Poet. I sing of Pope —

Friend. What, Pope, the Twitnam Bard, Whom Dennis, Cibber, Tibbald pushed so hard!

Pope of the Dunciad! Pope who dared to woo,

And then to libel, Wortley-Montagu! 5
Pope of the Ham-walks story —

Poet. Scandals all!
Scandals that now I care not to recall.
Surely a little, in two hundred Years,
One may neglect Contemporary Sneers —
Surely allowance for the Man may make 10
That had all Grub Street yelping in his Wake!
And who (I ask you) has been never Mean,
When urged by Envy, Anger, or the Spleen?

"When Burbadge Played" This is another rondeau (see note on "You Bid Me Try," page 164, and on "In After Days," page 766) Richard Burbadge (c. 1567-1619) was a business associate of Shakespeare and the most popular actor of his time

A Dialogue to the Memory of Mr. Alexander Pope "Non in jussa cano." "Not unbidden do I sing," from Virgil's sixth Eclogue, line 9

For a discussion of the literary background of the poem see Critical Notes

No, I prefer to look on Pope as one
Not rightly happy till his Life was done, 15
Whose whole Career, romance it as you please,
Was (what he called it) but a "long Disease"
Think of his Lot — his Pilgrimage of Pain,
His "crazy Carcass," and his restless Brain;
Think of his Night-Hours with their Feet of Lead, 20

His dreary Vigil and his aching Head,
Think of all this, and marvel then to find
The "crooked Body with a crooked Mind!"
Nay rather, marvel that, in Fate's Despite,
You find so much to solace and delight — 25
So much of Courage, and of Purpose high
In that unequal Struggle not to die.

I grant you freely that Pope played his Part
Sometimes ignobly — but he loved his Art,
I grant you freely that he sought his Ends, 30
Not always wisely — but he loved his Friends,
And who for Friends a nobler Roll could
show —

Swift, St. John, Bathurst, Marchmont, Peterb'ro',

Arbuthnot—

Friend ATTICUS?

Poet. Well (entre nous),

Most that he said of Addison was true. 35

Plain Truth you know —

Friend. Is often not polite
(So Hamlet thought) —

Poet. And Hamlet (Sir) was right

But leave Pope's Life. Today, methinks, we touch

The Work too little and the Man too much.
Take up the Lock, the Satires, Eloise — 40
What Art supreme, what Elegance, what Ease!

How keen the Irony, the Wit how bright,
The Style how rapid, and the Verse how
light!

Then read once more, and you shall wonder
yet

At Skill, at Turn, at Point, at Epithet 45
"True Wit is Nature to Advantage dressed!"
Was ever Thought so pithily expressed?

"And ten low Words oft creep in one dull Line" —

Ah, what a Homily on Yours . . . and
Mine!

Or take — to choose at Random — take but

This — 50

"Ten censure wrong for one that writes
amiss."

Friend. Packed and precise, no Doubt

Yet surely those

Are but the Qualities we ask of Prose.

Was he a Poet?

Poet. Yes, if that be what

Byron was certainly and Bowles was not; 55

Or say you grant him, to come nearer Date,
What Dryden had, that was denied to Tate —

Friend Which means, you claim for him
the Spark divine,
Yet scarce would place him on the highest
Line —

Poet. True, there are classes. Pope was most of all 60
Akin to Horace, Persius, Juvenal,
Pope was, like them, the Censor of his Age,
An Age more suited to Repose than Rage;
When Riming turned from Freedom to the Schools,

And shocked with License, shuddered into Rules, 65
When Phœbus touched the Poet's trembling
Ear

With one supreme Commandment, *Be thou
Clear,*
When Thought meant less to reason than compile,

And the Muse labored . . . chiefly with the File

Beneath full Wigs no Lyric drew its Breath
As in the Days of great Elizabeth; 71
And to the Bards of Anna was denied
The Note that Wordsworth heard on Duddon-
side

But Pope took up his Parable, and knit
The Woof of Wisdom with the Warp of Wit,
He trimmed the Measure on its equal Feet, 76
And Smoothed and fitted till the Line was neat,

He taught the Pause with due Effect to fall,
He taught the Epigram to come at Call,
He wrote —

Friend. His Ihad!
Poet. Well, suppose you own 80
You like your Ihad in the Prose of Bohn — Though if you'd learn in Prose how Homer sang,

'Twere best to learn of Butcher and of Lang —
Suppose you say your Worst of Pope, declare

His Jewels Paste, his Nature a Parterre, 85
His Art but Artifice — I ask once more
Where have you seen such Artifice before?
Where have you seen a Parterre better graced,
Or Gems that glitter like his Gems of Paste?
Where can you show, among your Names of Note, 90

So much to copy and so much to quote?
And where, in Fine, in all our English Verse,

66 Phœbus, Apollo, who presided over the Muses and artistic composition 71 Days. . . Elizabeth Cf Tennyson's A Dream of Fair Women, 6-8, pages 30-31 72 Bards of Anna, poets of Queen Anne's reign, 1702-14 73 Note . . . Duddon-side, lyric inspiration from nature, see Wordsworth's A Series of Sonnets on the River Duddon, 1820 85 Parterre, a garden with flower-beds formally arranged in geometric symmetry

A Style more trenchant and a Sense more terse?

So I, that love the old Augustan Days
Or formal Courtesies and formal Phrase, 95
That like along the finished Line to feel
The Ruffle's Flutter and the Flash of Steel,
That like my Couplet as compact as clear,
That like my Satire sparkling though severe,
Unmixed with Bathos and unmarred by Trope, 100

I fling my Cap for Polish — and for Pope!
(1888; 1888)

A POSTSCRIPT TO "RETALIATION"

[After the Fourth Edition of DR GOLDSMITH'S RETALIATION was printed, the Publisher received a supplementary Epitaph on the Wit and Punster CALEB WHITEFOORD Though it is found appended to the later issue of the Poem, it has been suspected that WHITEFOORD wrote it himself It may be that the following which has recently come to light is another forgery]

Here JOHNSON is laid Have a care how you walk,
If he stir in his sleep, in his sleep he will talk.
Ye gods! how he talked! What a torrent of
sound,

His hearers invaded, encompassed, and — drowned!

What a banquet of memory, fact, illustration,
In that innings-for-one that he called con- versation!

Can't you hear his sonorous "Why no, Sir!"
and "Stay, Sir!

Your premise is wrong," or "You don't see your way, Sir!"

How he silenced a prig, or a slipshod ro-mancer!

How he pounced on a fool with a knock-me-down answer! 10

But peace to his slumbers! Though rough in the rind,

The heart of the giant was gentle and kind,
What signifies now, if in bouts with a friend,
When his pistol missed fire, he would use the butt-end?

If he trampled your flow'rs, like a bull in a garden, 15

A Postscript to "Retaliation" Retaliation, 1774, is a series of mock epitaphs descriptive of Goldsmith's friends David Garrick, Edmund Burke, Sir Joshua Reynolds, and others Caleb Whitefoord (1734-1810), friend of Benjamin Franklin, was secretary of the commission that drafted articles of peace after the Revolutionary War, and was prominent among the wits of the day. The unfinished epitaph on Whitefoord is said by Kearsley, the original publisher, to have come from a friend of Goldsmith

1 Johnson, Dr Samuel Johnson (1709-1784), whose virtues and peculiarities are minutely described in Boswell's Life of Johnson, 1791 The poem contains a number of references to the Life (see Critical Notes)

What matter for that? — he was sure to ask pardon;
 And you felt on the whole, though he'd tossed
 you and gored you,
 It was something, at least, that he had not ignored you
 Yes! the outside was rugged. But test him within,
 You found he had naught of the bear but the skin; 20
 And for bottom and base to his anfractuosity,
 A fund of fine feeling, good taste, generosity
 He was true to his conscience, his King, and his duty;
 And he hated the Whigs, and he softened to Beauty.

Turn now to his Writings. I grant, in his tales, 25
 That he made little fishes talk vastly like whales;
 I grant that his language was rather emphatic,
 Nay, even — to put the thing plainly — dogmatic,
 But read him for Style — and dismiss from your thoughts,
 The crowd of compilers who copied his faults — 30
 Say, where is there English so full and so
 clear,
 So weighty, so dignified, manly, sincere?
 So strong in expression, conviction, persuasion?
 So prompt to take color from place and occasion?
 So widely removed from the doubtful, the tentative, 35
 So truly — and in the best sense — argumentative?
 You may talk of your Burkes and your Gibbons so clever,
 But I hark back to him with a "Johnson forever!"
 And I feel as I muse on his ponderous figure,
 Though he's great in this age, in the next he'll grow bigger; 40
 And still while . . . (Cætera Desunt)
 (1896; 1896)

29-30 read . faults Dobson, in a note on this passage, recognizes its similarity to couplets in Goldsmith's
Edwin and Angelina and Retaliation and to verses by Pope and Prior 37 Burkes Edmund Burke (1729-97) was the only man whom Johnson admitted to be his match in conversation Gibbons. Edward Gibbon (1737-94) was the author of The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, and a member of Johnson's "Club" 41 Cætera Desunt, the rest is missing "On the 22d of June, 1896, these verses were read at the dinner given in celebration of the five hundredth meeting of the Johnson Society of Pembroke College, Oxford They then concluded with a couplet appropriate to that occasion In their present place, it has been thought preferable to leave them—like Goldsmith's epitaph on Reynolds—unfinished" (Dobson's note)

RANK AND FILE

(SOUTH AFRICA, 1900)

O undistinguished Dead!
 Whom the bent covers, or the rock-strewn
 steep
 Shows to the stars, for you I mourn — I weep,
 O undistinguished Dead!

None knows your name 5
 Blackened and blurred in the wild battle's brunt,
 Hotly you fell . . . with all your wounds in front,
 This is your fame! (1900; 1900)

ON THE FUTURE OF POETRY

Bards of the Future! you that come
 With striding march, and roll of drum,
 What will your newest challenge be
 To our prose-bound community?

What magic will you find to stir 5
 The limp and languid listener?
 Will it be daring and dramatic?
 Will it be frankly democratic?

Will Pegasus return again
 In guise of modern aeroplane, 10
 Descending from a cloudless blue
 To drop on us a bomb or two?

I know not. Far be it from me
 To darken dark futurity;
 Still less to render more perplexed 15
 The last vagary, or the next.

Leave Pindus Hill to those who list,
 Iconoclast or anarchist —
 So be it. "They that break shall pay."
 I stand upon the ancient way 20

I hold it for a certain thing,
 That, blank or riming, song must sing;
 And more, that what is good for verse,
 Need not, by dint of rime, grow worse

I hold that they who deal in rime 25
 Must take the standpoint of the time —

But not to catch the public ear,
As mountebank or pulpiteer,

That the old notes are still the new,
If the musician's touch be true — 30
Nor can the hand that knows its trade
Achieve the trite and ready-made,

That your first theme is Human Life,
Its hopes and fears, its love and strife —
A theme no custom can efface, 35
Common, but never commonplace,

For this, beyond all doubt is plain:
The Truth that pleased will please again,
And move men as in bygone years 39

From PART I — TO MANON

2. COMPARING HER TO A FALCON

Brave as a falcon and as merciless,
With bright eyes watching still the world,
thy prey,

I saw thee pass in thy lone majesty,
Untamed, unmated, high above the press
The dull crowd gazed at thee. It could not 5
guess

The secret of thy proud earl way,
Or read in thy mute face the soul which lay
A prisoner there in chains of tenderness
— Lo, thou art captured. In my hand today
I hold thee, and awhile thou deignest to be 10
Pleased with my jesses I would fain beguile
My foolish heart to think thou lovest me
See,

40 Hector's wife . . . tears, a reference to the scene of tender parting between Hector and Andromache (Iliad, Book 6, lines 390-502), her tears were at the thought of losing Hector, her smiles from a sense of their happy love

The Love Sonnets of Proteus "The author of these sonnets, styling himself Proteus, acknowledges thereby a natural mood of change. He here lays bare what was once his heart, to the public, but what for good or evil is his heart no longer, thus closing forever his account with youth. He stands upon the threshold of middle life, and already his dreams are changed" (from the Preface to the first edition)

Proteus, in Greek myth, was a sea-god who had the power of changing his shape with great rapidity. The four parts of the sonnet-cycle deal frankly with successive love experiences, real or imagined, the first two perhaps relate to episodes during Blunt's service with the English embassy at Paris, 1864-68, the last two lead up to his marriage with the Lady Arabella Noel, granddaughter of Lord Byron, in 1870

Blunt uses the word sonnet in a rather loose sense. Part I To Manon Blunt's state of mind, in this section, recalls that of the Chevalier de Greux, who, in the Abbé Prevost's novel (1733), loved the fascinating, selfish Manon Lescaut not wisely but too well

I dare not love thee quite. A little while
And thou shalt sail back heavenwards. Woe is me!

3. ON HIS FORTUNE IN LOVING HER

I did not choose thee, dearest. It was Love
That made the choice, not I. Mine eyes were blind

As a rude shepherd's who to some lone grove
His offering brings, and cares not at what shrine

He bends his knee The gifts alone were
mine, 5

The rest was Love's. He took me by the
hand,

And fired the sacrifice, and poured the wine,
And spoke the words I might not understand
I was unwise in all but the dear chance

Which was my fortune, and the blind desire 10
Which led my foolish steps to Love's abode,
And youth's sublime unreasoned prescience
Which raised an altar and inscribed in fire
Its dedication. "To the unknown god"

5. ON THE POWER OF HER BEAUTY

I am light-hearted now An hour ago
There was a tempest in my heaven, a flame
Of sullen lightning under a bent brow
And a dull muttering which breathed no
name.

Now all is changed. The very winds are tame, 5

And the birds sing aloud from every bough,
And my heart leaps. What empire dost thou claim,

Child, o'er this earth, that nature serves thee so?

Sublime magician! Well may earth and
heaven

Change at thy bidding, and the hearts of
men 10

Didst thou but know the power that beauty hath,

The sea should leave his bed, the rocks be riven,

And wise men, deeming chaos come again,
Should kneel before thee and conjure thy wrath.

21. HIS BONDAGE TO MANON IS BROKEN

From this day forth I lead another life,
Another life! A life without a tear!

Today has ended the unequal strife,
My service and my sorrow finish here.

See, my soul cuts her cable of belief 5

On His Fortune in Loving Her 14 To . . . god In addressing the Athenians, Paul said. "As I passed by and beheld your devotions, I found an altar with this inscription, TO THE UNKNOWN GOD Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you" (Acts, 17 23)

And sails toward the ocean She shall steer
 Sublime henceforth o'er accidents of grief.
 Her storm has rolled to a new hemisphere.
 I have loved too much, too loyally, too long
 Today I am a pirate of the sea. 10
 Let others suffer. I have suffered wrong.
 Let others love, and love as tenderly.
 Oh, Manon, there are women yet unborn
 Shall rue thy frailty, else am I forsworn.

From PART II — JULIET

33. REMINDING HER OF A PROMISE

Oh, Juliet, we have quarreled with our fate,
 And fate has struck us. Wherefore do we cry?
 We prayed for liberty, and now too late Find liberty is this, to say "good-by."
 The winter, which we loved not, has gone by
 And spring is come. The gardens, which were bare 6
 When we first wandered through them, you and I,
 The prisoners of our vain wishes, are Now full of golden flowers The very lane
 Down to the sea is green. The cactus hedge
 We saw cut down has sprouted new again, 11
 And swallows have their nests on the cliff's
 edge
 Where we so often sat and dared complain
 Because our joy was new, and called it pain

34. THE SAME CONTINUED

Yes, spring is come, but joy, alas, is gone —
 Gone ere we knew it, while our foolish eyes,
 Which should have watched its motions every
 one
 Were looking elsewhere, at the hills, the skies, Chasing vain thoughts, as children butterflies, 5
 Until the hour struck and the day was done,
 And we looked up in passionate surprise
 To find that clouds had blotted out our sun
 Our joys are gone And what is left to us,
 Who loved not even love when it was here?
 What but a voice which sobs monotonous 11
 As these sad waves upon the rocks, the dear Fond voice which once made music with our
 own,
 And which our hearts now ache to think
 upon.

39. FAREWELL TO JULIET

Juliet, farewell. I would not be forgiven
 Even if I forgave. These words must be
 The last between us two in earth or heaven,

Part II Juliet This section concerns a "woman with a past" and suggests the "young waverer" Romeo, to whom Friar Laurence said, "These violent delights have violent ends" (Romeo and Juliet, II, 6, 9)

The last and bitterest. You are henceforth
 free
 Forever from my bitter words and me. 5
 You shall not at my hand be further vexed
 With either love, reproach, or jealousy (So help me Heaven), in this world or the next.
 Our souls are single for all time to come
 And for eternity, and thus farewell 10
 Is as the trumpet note, the crack of doom,
 Which heralds an eternal silence Hell
 Has no more fixed and absolute decree
 And heaven and hell may meet — yet never
 we.

53. THE SAME CONTINUED

Farewell, then It is finished. I forgo
 With this all right in you, even that of tears
 If I have spoken hardly, it will show
 How much I loved you With you disappears
 A glory, a romance of many years. 5
 What you may be henceforth I will not know
 The phantom of your presence on my fears
 Is impotent at length for weal or woe.
 Your past, your present, all alike must fade
 In a new land of dreams where love is not. 10
 Then kiss me and farewell. The choice is made
 And we shall live to see the past forgot,
 If not forgiven. See, I came to curse,
 Yet stay to bless I know not which is worse

From PART III — GODS AND FALSE GODS

55. ST. VALENTINE'S DAY

Today, all day, I rode upon the Down,
 With hounds and horsemen, a brave company.
 On this side in its glory lay the sea,
 On that the Sussex Weald, a sea of brown
 The wind was light, and brightly the sun shone, 5
 And still we galloped on from gorse to gorse
 And once, when checked, a thrush sang, and my horse
 Pricked his quick ears as to a sound unknown
 I knew the spring was come. I knew it even Better than all by this, that through my chase 10
 In bush and stone and hill and sea and heaven
 I seemed to see and follow still your face
 Your face my quarry was For it I rode,
 My horse a thing of wings, myself a god.

56. TO ONE WHOM HE DARED NOT LOVE

As one who, in a desert wandering
 Alone and faint beneath a pitiless sky,
 And doubting in his heart if he shall bring
 His bones back to his kindred or there die,
 Finds at his feet a treasure suddenly 5
 Such as would make him for all time a king,
 And so forgets his fears and with keen eye
 Falls to a-counting each new precious thing —
 So was I when you told me yesterday
 The tale of your dear love. Awhile I stood 10
 Astonished and enraptured, and my heart
 Began to count its treasures. Now dismay
 Steals back my joy, and terror chills my blood,
 And I remember only "We must part."

61. TO ONE EXCUSING HIS POVERTY

Ah! love, impute it not to me a sin
 That my poor soul thus beggared comes to thee.

My soul a pilgrim was, in search of thine,
 And met these accidents by land and sea.
 The world was hard, and took its usury, 5
 Its toll for each new night in each new inn,
 And every road had robber bands to fee;
 And all, even kindness, must be paid in coin
 Behold my scrip is empty, my heart bare
 I give thee nothing who my all would give
 My pilgrimage is finished, and I fare 11
 Bare to my death, unless with thee I live
 Ah! give, love, and forgive that I am poor
 Ah! take me to thy arms and ask no more

69. SIBYLLINE BOOKS

When first, a boy, at your fair knees I kneeled,
 'Twas with a worthy offering. In my hand
 My young life's book I held, a volume sealed,
 Which none but you, I deemed, might under-stand

And you I did entreat to loose the band 5
 And read therein your own soul's destiny.
 But, Tarquin-like, you turned from my demand,

Too proudly fair to find your fate in me.
 When now I come, alas, what hands have turned

Those virgin pages! Some are torn away, 10
 And some defaced, and some with passion burned,

And some besmeared with life's least holy clay.

Say, shall I offer you these pages wet

To One Excusing His Poverty 9 scrip, wallet or small bag
Sibylline Books These were three prophetic books which Lucius Tarquinius Superbus, legendary seventh king of Rome, obtained from a prophethess and deposited in the vaults of the Capitol

7 Tarquin-like. demand The sibyl demanded 300 pieces of gold for her books, Tarquin at first refused, but later accepted

With blood and tears? And will your sorrow read

What your joy heeded not? — Unopened yet
 One page remains. It still may hold a fate, 16
 A counsel for the day of utter need.

Nay, speak, sad heart, speak quick. The hour is late.

Age threatens us. The Gaul is at the gate.

71. THE TWO HIGHWAYMEN

I long have had a quarrel set with Time,
 Because he robbed me Every day of life
 Was wrested from me after bitter strife,
 I never yet could see the sun go down 5
 But I was angry in my heart, nor hear
 The leaves fall in the wind without a tear
 Over the dying summer I have known
 No truce with Time nor Time's accomplice,
 Death.

The fair world is the witness of a crime
 Repeated every hour. For life and breath 10
 Are sweet to all who live, and bitterly
 The voices of these robbers of the heath Sound in each ear and chill the passer-by — What have we done to thee, thou monstrous Time?

What have we done to Death that we must die? 15

From PART IV — VITA NOVA

91. LAUGHTER AND DEATH

There is no laughter in the natural world
 Of beast or fish or bird, though no sad doubt
 Of their futurity to them unfurled
 Has dared to check the mirth-compelling shout.

The lion roars his solemn thunder out 5
 To the sleeping woods. The eagle screams her cry.

Even the lark must strain a serious throat
 To hurl his blest defiance at the sky
 Fear, anger, jealousy have found a voice
 Love's pain or rapture the brute bosoms 10
 swell.

Nature has symbols for her nobler joys,
 Her nobler sorrows. Who had dared foretell
 That only man, by some sad mockery,
 Should learn to laugh who learns that he must die?

95. HE IS NOT A POET

I would not, if I could, be called a poet
 I have no natural love of the "chaste muse"
 If aught be worth the doing I would do it;

19 Gaul . . . gate, the cry uttered in Rome when Brennus, the leader of the Gauls, was discovered at the gates of the city in 390 B.C. His presence was revealed by the cackling of the sacred geese in the temple.

Part IV Vita Nova. The title means New Life, compare Vita Nuova (c. 1307), in which Dante recorded the varying moods of his love for Beatrice

And others, if they will, may tell the news.
 I care not for their laurels, but would choose
 On the world's field to fight or fall or run. 6
 My soul's ambition will not take excuse
 To play the dial rather than the sun.
 The faith I held I hold, as when a boy
 I left my books for cricket-bat and gun. 10
 The tales of poets are but scholars' themes,
 In my hot youth I held it that a man
 With heart to dare and stomach to enjoy
 Had better work to his hand in any plan
 Of any folly, so the thing were done, 15
 Than in the noblest dreaming of mere dreams.

97. CHANCELBURY RING

Say what you will, there is not in the world
 A nobler sight than from this upper Down.
 No rugged landscape here, no beauty hurled
 From its Creator's hand as with a frown,
 But a green plain on which green hills look
 down 5
 Trim as a garden plot. No other hue
 Can hence be seen, save here and there the brown
 Of a square fallow, and the horizon's blue.
 Dear checker-work of woods, the Sussex
 Weald!
 If a name thrills me yet of things of earth, 10
 That name is thine. How often have I fled
 To thy deep hedgerows and embraced each field,
 Each lag, each pasture — fields which gave me birth
 And saw my youth, and which must hold me
 dead

112. GIBALTAR

Seven weeks of sea, and twice seven days of storm
 Upon the huge Atlantic, and once more
 We ride into still water and the calm
 Of a sweet evening screened by either shore
 Of Spain and Barbary Our toils are o'er, 5
 Our exile is accomplished Once again
 We look on Europe, mistress as of yore
 Of the fair earth and of the hearts of men
 Aye, this is the famed rock, which Hercules
 And Goth and Moor bequeathed us. At this
 door 10
 England stands sentry God! to hear the shrill

SONG — LOVE ME A LITTLE

Love me a little, love me as thou wilt,
 Whether a draft it be of passionate wine
 Poured with both hands divine,
 Or just a cup of water spilt
 On dying lips and mine. 5
 Give me the love thou wilt,
 The purity, the guilt,
 So it be thine

Love me a little Let it be thy cheek
 With its red signals. That were dear to kisses. 10
 Or, if thou mayest not this,
 A finger-tip my own to seek
 At nightfall when none guess.
 Eyes have the wit to speak,
 And sighs send messages; 15
 Even give less.

Love me a little Let it be in words
 Of happy omen heralding thy choice,
 Or in a veiled sad voice
 Of warning, like a frightened bird's. 20
 How should I not rejoice,
 Though swords be crossed with swords
 And discord mar love's chords
 And tears thy voice?

Love me a little All my world thou art 25
 Thy much were Heaven; thy little, Earth
 shall be
 If not Eternity,
 Then Time be mine, the human part,
 A single hour with thee
 Love as thou wilt and art, 30
 With all or half a heart,
 So thou love me (1875)

THE STRICKEN HART

The stricken hart had fled the brake,
 His courage spent for life's dear sake.
 He came to die beside the lake.

The golden trout leaped up to view,
 The moorfowl clapped his wings and crew, 5
 The swallow brushed him as she flew.

The Love Lyrics of Proteus Under this title, in 1892 Blunt grouped a number of lyrics that had been published previously On the title see note on The Love Sonnets of Proteus, page 770

The Stricken Hart 1 brake, thicket

He looked upon the glorious sun,
His blood dropped slowly on the stone,
He loved the life so nearly won,

And then he died The ravens found 10
A carcass couched upon the ground,
They said their god had dealt the wound.

The Eternal Father calmly shook
One page untitled from life's book
Few words. None ever cared to look 15

Yet woe for life thus idly riven.
He blindly loved what God had given,
And love, some say, has conquered Heaven
(1875)

SONG — LILAC AND GOLD AND GREEN

Lilac and gold and green!
Those are the colors I love the best,
Spring's own raiment untouched and clean,
When the world is awake and yet hardly dressed,
And the stranger sun, her bridegroom shy, 5
Looks at her bosom and wonders why
She is so beautiful, he so blest

Lilac and green and gold!
Those were the colors you wore today,
Robed you were in them fold on fold, 10
Clothed in the light of your love's delay
And I held you thus in my arms, once only,
And wondered still, as you left me lonely,
How the world's beauty was changed to
gray

Lilac and gold and green! 15
I would die for the truth of those colors
true!
Lilac for loyalty, gold for my queen,
And green the faith of my love for you.
Here is a posy of all the three.
My heart is with it. So think of me, 20
And our weeping skies shall once more be blue (1875)

THE BROKEN PITCHER

Accursed be the hour of that sad day
The careless potter put his hand to thee,
And dared to fashion out of common clay
So pure a shape as thou didst seem to
me.
An idle boy, when vintage was begun, 5
I passed and saw thy beauty for my sin,
And poured unheeding till it was done
The red wine of my love's first gathering
in

And thou, ah! thou didst look at me and smile
To see me give with such ungrudging hand,
As taking all to thy dear heart, the while 11
It only fell upon the thirsting sand.

Sad pitcher, thou wast broken at the well,
Ere yet the shepherd's lip had tasted thine
A god had lost in thee his hydromel, 15
As I have wasted my poor wealth of wine.

Yet, wherefore wast thou made so fair a
thing?
Or why of clay, whose fabric rightly were
Of finest gold, new-fashioned for a king,
And framed by some divine artificer? 20

I will not curse thee, thou poor shape of clay,
That thou art other than thou seemed to be,
Yet I will break thee, that no passer may Unthinking break another heart on thee
(1875)

SONG — YOU HAVE LET THE BEAUTY OF THE DAY GO OVER

You have let the beauty of the day go over,
You have let the glory of the noon go by Clouds from the west have gathered close and cover
All but a remnant now of our proud sky

Dumbly the rain beats on our darkened faces
Hushed are the woods Alas, for us no bird 6
Shall sing today of pleasure in green places,
No touch shall thrill, no soul of leaves be stirred.

Why did we wait? What faith was ours in fortune?
What was our pride that fate should kneel to us? 10
Oh, we were fools. Love loves not to im-portune,
And he is silent here in this sad house.

Alas, dear love, the day for us is ended,
The pleasure of green fields, of streams, of
skies.
One hour remains, one only of joy blended 15
With coming night. Ah, seize it ere it flies

Draw fast the curtains Close the door on sorrow
Shut out the dusk It only makes us grieve
Here we may live a life — and then, tomorrow,
If fate still wills it, we may take our leave. (1875)

The Broken Pitcher 15 hydromel, a drink compounded of honey and water

SONG — COME WITH THE SUMMER
LEAVES

Come with the summer leaves, love, to my grave,

And, if you doubt among the quiet dead,
Choose out that mound where greenest grasses wave

And where the flowers grow thickest and most red.

Come in the morning while the dews of night,
Which are fair Nature's tears in darkness shed,

Rim the sad petals nor are garnered quite,
Like my last hopes untimely harvested.

Come to my grave — ah, gather, love, those flowers!

Out of my heart they grow for your dear head.

These are its songs unwritten and all yours,
The love I loved you with and left unsaid (1875)

THE DESOLATE CITY

Dark to me is the earth. Dark to me are the heavens

Where is she that I loved, the woman with eyes like stars?

Desolate are the streets. Desolate is the city,
A city taken by storm, where none are left but the slain!

Sadly I rose at dawn, undid the latch of my shutters,

Thinking to let in light, but I only let in love

Birds in the boughs were awake; I listened to their chaunting;

Each one sang to his love; only I was alone

This, I said in my heart, is the hour of life and of pleasure.

Now each creature on earth has his joy,
and lives in the sun,

Each in another's eyes finds light, the light of compassion,

This is the moment of pity, this is the moment of love.

Speak, O desolate city! Speak, O silence in sadness!

Where is she that I loved in my strength, that spoke to my soul?

Where are those passionate eyes that appealed to my eyes in passion?

Where is the mouth that kissed me, the breast I laid to my own?

Speak, thou soul of my soul, for rage in my heart is kindled

Tell me, where didst thou flee on the day of destruction and fear?

See, my arms still enfold thee, enfolding thus all heaven,

See, my desire is fulfilled in thee, for it fills the earth

Thus in my grief I lamented. Then turned I from the window,

Turned to the stair, and the open door, and the empty street,

Crying aloud in my grief, for there was none to chide me,

None to mock my weakness, none to behold my tears.

Groping I went, as blind I sought her house. my beloved's.

There I stopped at the silent door, and listened and tried the latch

Love, I cried, dost thou slumber? This is no hour for slumber,

This is the hour of love, and love I bring in my hand.

I knew the house, with its windows barred, and its leafless fig-tree,

Climbing round by the doorstep, the only one in the street,

I knew where my hope had climbed to its goal and there encircled

All that those desolate walls once held, my beloved's heart.

There in my grief she consoled me She loved me when I loved not.

She put her hand in my hand, and set her lips to my lips

She told me all her pain and showed me all her trouble.

I, like a fool, scarce heard, hardly returned her kiss.

Love, thy eyes were like torches. They changed as I beheld them

Love, thy lips were like gems, the seal thou settest on my life.

Love, if I loved not then, behold this hour thy vengeance;

This is the fruit of thy love and thee, the unwise grown wise.

Weeping strangled my voice. I called out, but none answered;

Blindly the windows gazed back at me, dumbly the door;

She whom I love, who loved me, looked not on my yearning,

Gave me no more her hands to kiss, showed me no more her soul.

Therefore the earth is dark to me, the sunlight blackness, 45
 Therefore I go in tears and alone, by night
 and day;
 Therefore I find no love in heaven, no light,
 no beauty,
 A heaven taken by storm, where none are left but the slain!

THE OLD SQUIRE

I like the hunting of the hare
 Better than that of the fox;
 I like the joyous morning air,
 And the crowing of the cocks.

I like the calm of the early fields, 5
 The ducks asleep by the lake,
 The quiet hour which nature yields
 Before mankind is awake.

I like the pheasants and feeding things
 Of the unsuspecting morn; 10
 I like the flap of the wood-pigeon's wings
 As she rises from the corn

I like the blackbird's shriek, and his rush
 From the turnips as I pass by,
 And the partridge hiding her head in a bush,
 For her young ones cannot fly. 16

I like these things, and I like to ride,
 When all the world is in bed,
 To the top of the hill where the sky grows
 wide,
 And where the sun grows red. 20

The beagles at my horse heels trot
 In silence after me;
 There's Ruby, Roger, Diamond, Dot,
 Old Slut and Margery —

A score of names well used, and dear, 25
 The names my childhood knew;
 The horn, with which I rouse their cheer,
 Is the horn my father blew

I like the hunting of the hare
 Better than that of the fox; 30
 The new world still is all less fair
 Than the old world it mocks.

I covet not a wider range
 Than these dear manors give;
 I take my pleasures without change, 35
 And as I lived I live.

I leave my neighbors to their thought;
 My choice it is, and pride,

The Old Squire 12 corn, wheat or other grain

On my own lands to find my sport,
 In my own fields to ride 40

The hare herself no better loves
 The field where she was bred,
 Than I the habit of these groves,
 My own inherited.

I know my quarries every one, 45
 The meuse where she sits low;
 The road she chose today was run
 A hundred years ago.

The lags, the gills, the forest ways,
 The hedgerows one and all, 50
 These are the kingdoms of my chase,
 And bounded by my wall,

Nor has the world a better thing,
 Though one should search it round,
 Than thus to live one's own sole king, 55
 Upon one's own sole ground

I like the hunting of the hare,
 It brings me, day by day,
 The memory of old days as fair,
 With dead men passed away. 60

To these, as homeward still I ply
 And pass the churchyard gate,
 Where all are laid as I must lie,
 I stop and raise my hat.

I like the hunting of the hare; 65
 New sports I hold in scorn.
 I like to be as my fathers were,
 In the days ere I was born. (1880)

HEAVEN — HAVEN

(A NUN TAKES THE VEIL)

I have desired to go
 Where springs not fail,
 To fields where flies no sharp and sided hail,
 And a few lilies blow

And I have asked to be 5
 Where no storms come,
 Where the green swell is in the haven dumb,
 And out of the swing of the sea

THE HABIT OF PERFECTION

Elected Silence, sing to me
And beat upon my whorled ear;
Pipe me to pastures still and be
The music that I care to hear

Shape nothing, lips; be lovely-dumb —
It is the shut, the curfew sent
From there where all surrenders come
Which only makes you eloquent.

Be shelléd, eyes, with double dark
And find the uncreated light;
This ruck and reel which you remark
Coils, keeps, and teases simple sight.

Palate, the hutch of tasty lust,
Desire not to be rinsed with wine;
The can must be so sweet, the crust
So fresh that come in fasts divine!

Nostrils, your careless breath that spend
Upon the stir and keep of pride,
What relish shall the censers send
Along the sanctuary side!

O feel-of-primrose hands, O feet
That want the yield of plushy sward,
But you shall walk the golden street
And you unhouse and house the Lord.

And, Poverty, be thou the bride
And now the marriage feast begun,
And lily-colored clothes provide
Your spouse not labored-at nor spun (1866; 1918)

GOD'S GRANDEUR

The world is charged with the grandeur of God.

It will flame out, like shining from shook foil;
It gathers to a greatness, like the ooze of oil Crushed. Why do men then now not reckon his rod?

Generations have trod, have trod, have trod,
And all is seared with trade; bleared, smeared with toil,
And wears man's smudge and shares man's smell — the soil

Is bare now, nor can foot feel, being shod.
And for all this, nature is never spent,

The Habit of Perfection 2 whorled, having whorls
11 ruck and reel, crowding and confusion
27-28 lily-colored spun Cf. Matthew, 6 28-29 —
"Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow, they toil not, neither do they spin And yet I say unto you, That even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these."
God's Grandeur. 3-4 ooze of oil Crushed, oil from crushed olives

There lives the dearest freshness deep down
things,
And though the last lights off the black
West went
Oh, morning, at the brown brink eastward,
springs —
Because the Holy Ghost over the bent
World broods with warm breast and with ah!
bright wings
(1877; 1918)

THE STARLIGHT NIGHT

Look at the stars! look, look up at the skies!
O look at all the fire-folk sitting in the air!
The bright boroughs, the quivering citadels
there!
The dim woods quick with diamond wells,
the elf-eyes!
The gray lawns cold where quaking gold-dew
lies!
Wind-beat white-beam, airy abeles all on flare!
Flake-doves sent floating out at a farmyard scare! —
Ah well! it is a purchase and a prize.
Buy then! Bid then! — What? — Prayer, patience, alms, vows. —
Look, look! a May-mess, like on orchard boughs;
Look! March-bloom, like on mealed-with-yellow fallows. —
These are indeed the barn, within-doors house
The shocks. This piece-bright paling hides the Spouse
Christ, and the mother of Christ and all his hallows.

THE WINDHOVER

(To Christ our Lord)

I caught this morning morning's minion, kingdom of daylight's dauphin, dapple-dawn-drawn Falcon, in his riding
Of the rolling level underneath him steady air, and striding
High there, how he rung upon the rein of a wimpling wing
In his ecstasy! then off, off forth on swing,
As a skate's heel sweeps smooth on a bow-bend, the hurl and gliding

The Starlight Night 6 white-beam, a small tree with leaves white on the underside abeles, white poplars 10
May-mess, medley, like blossoms in May 11 mealed

The Windhover The windhover is a kestrel, or sparrowhawk Hopkins regarded this as his best poem
3 wimpling, rippling

Rebuffed the big wind. My heart in hiding Stirred for a bird—the achieve of, the mastery of the thing!

Brute beauty and valor and act, oh, air, pride,
 plume, here

Buckle! AND the fire that breaks from thee
 then, a billion
 Times told lovelier, more dangerous, O my chevalier! 10

No wonder of it, sheer plod makes plow down sillion

Shine, and blue-bleak embers, ah, my dear,
 Fall, gall themselves, and gash gold-ver-million. (1877; 1918)

PIED BEAUTY

Glory be to God for dappled things—
 For skies of couple-color as a brindled cow,
 For rose-moles all in stipple upon trout that swim;
 Fresh-firecoal chestnut-falls, finches' wings,
 Landscape plotted and pieced—fold, fallow, and plow; 5
 And all trades, their gear and tackle and trim.

All things counter, original, spare, strange, Whatever is fickle, freckled (who knows how?)

With swift, slow, sweet, sour, adazzle,
 dim;
 He fathers-forth whose beauty is past
 change— 10
 Praise him. (1877, 1918)

 In coop and in comb the fleece of his foam

 Of a pool so pitchblack, fell-frowning,
 It rounds and rounds Despair to drowning.

AN EPISODE

Vasari tells that Luca Signorelli,
 The morning star of Michael Angelo,
 Had but one son, a youth of seventeen summers,

Who died. That day the master at his easel Wielded the liberal brush wherewith he painted 5

At Orvieto, on the Duomo's walls, Stern forms of Death and Heaven and Hell and Judgment.

Then came they to him, and cried "Thy son
 is dead,

Slain in a duel, but the bloom of life
 Yet lingers round red lips and downy cheek " Luca spoke not, but listened Next they bore 11

His dead son to the silent painting-room,
 And left on tiptoe son and sire alone Still Luca spoke and groaned not; but he raised

The wonderful dead youth, and smoothed his hair, 15

Washed his red wounds, and laid him on a
 bed,

Naked and beautiful, where rosy curtains
 Shed a soft glimmer of uncertain splendor
 Life-like upon the marble limbs below.

9 Degged, dampened 10 braes, hillsides 11 heath-packs, clumps of heather fitches, patches

An Episode Cf Browning's Fra Lippo Lippi, page 261
 "The value and significance of flesh," which Lippo (line 268) struggled, against odds, to embody in his art, was the creed to which the painters of the later Italian Renaissance gave free expression

1 Vasari, Giorgio Vasari, from whose Lives of the Painters (1550-1568) may be gleaned many anecdotes concerning artists of the Italian Renaissance Luca Signorelli (c 1442-1524), an Italian painter, famous for his powerful treatment of the nude and his interest in anatomical exact-ness His figure of the crucified Christ at Cortona (painted 1502) is said to be the painting referred to in this poem 2
 Michael Angelo, Michaelangelo Buonarroti (1475-1564), Italian poet, sculptor, and painter, who owed much of his enthusiasm for glorious human bodies to the influence of Signorelli 5-7 painted . . . Judgment, a reference to Signorelli's masterpiece, The Last Judgment, painted in the chapel of S. Brizio in the cathedral, or duomo, at Orvieto, a hill-town between Florence and Rome

Then Luca seized his palette. Hour by hour Silence was in the room, none durst approach. 21

Morn wore to noon, and noon to eve, when shlyly

A little maid peeped in, and saw the painter
Painting his dead son with unerring hand-
stroke,

Firm and dry-eyed before the lordly canvas 25

LE JEUNE HOMME CARESSANT SA CHIMÈRE

(FOR AN INTAGLIO)

A boy of eighteen years 'mid myrtle-boughs
Lying love-languid on a morn of May,
Watched half-asleep his goats insatiate browse Thin shoots of thyme and lentisk, by the spray

Of biting sea-winds bitter made and gray
Therewith when shadows fell, his waking
thought 6

Of love into a wondrous dream was wrought

A woman lay beside him — so it seemed,
For on her marble shoulders, like a mist
Irradiate with tawny moonrise, gleamed 10 Thick silken tresses, her white woman's wrist,

Glittering with snaky gold and amethyst,
Upheld a dainty chin, and there beneath,
Her twin breasts shone like pinks that lilies
wreath

What color were her eyes I cannot tell, 15
For as he gazed thereon, at times they darted

Dun rays like water in a dusky well,
Then turned to topaz; then like rubies
smarted

With smoldering flames of passion tiger-
hearted;

Then 'neath blue-veinéd lids swam soft and
tender 20

With pleadings and shy timorous surrender

Thus far a woman, but the breath that lifted
Her panting breast with long melodious
sighs,

Stirred o'er her neck and hair broad wings that sifted

The perfumes of meridian Paradise, 25

4 thyme, an aromatic herb lentisk, the mastic tree, an evergreen 25 meridian Paradise, central Paradise,
hence the perfumes would be especially delicious

Dusk were they, furred like velvet, gemmed with eyes

Of such dull luster as in isles afar
Night-flying moths spread to the summer star.

Music these pinions made — a sound and surge

Of pines innumerable near lispings waves —
Rustling of reeds and rushes on the verge 31

Of level lakes and naiad-haunted caves —
Drowned whispers of a wandering stream that laves

Deep alder-boughs and tracts of ferny grass
Bordered with azure-bellèd campanulas 35

Potent they were; for never since her birth
With feet of woman this fair siren pressed
Sleek meadow swords or stony ways of earth,
But 'neath the silken marvel of her breast,
Displayed in sinuous length of coil and
crest, 40

Glittered a serpent's tail, fold over fold,
In massy labyrinths of languor rolled.

Ah, me! what fascination! what faint stars
Of emerald and opal, with the shine
Of rubies intermingled, and dim bars 45

Of twisting turquoise and pale coralline!
What rings and rounds! what thin streaks sapphirine

Freckled that gleaming glory, like the bed
Of Eden streams with gems enamelléd!

There lurked no loathing, no soul-freezing
fear, 50

But luxury and love these coils between
Faint grew the boy; the siren filled his ear
With singing sweet as when the village-
green

Re-echoes to the tinkling tambourine,
And feet of girls aglow with laughter glance 55
In myriad mazy errors of the dance.

How long he dallied with delusive joy
I know not, but thereafter never more
The peace of passionless slumber soothed the
boy,

For he was stricken to the very core 60
With sickness of desire exceeding sore,
And through the radiance of his eyes there
shone

Consuming fire too fierce to gaze upon.

He, ere he died — and they whom lips divine
Have touched, fade flower-like and cease to be — 65

THE FALL OF A SOUL

I sat unsphering Plato ere I slept;
 Then through my dream the choir of gods was borne,
 Swift as the wind and splendid as the morn,
 Fronting the night of stars; behind them swept Tempestuous darkness o'er a drear descent, 5
 Wherein I saw a crowd of charioteers Urging their giddy steeds with cries and cheers,
 To join the choir that aye before them went
 But one there was who fell, with broken car
 And horses swooning down the gulf of gloom; Heavenward his eyes, though prescient of their doom, 11
 Reflected glory like a falling star,
 While with wild hair blown back and listless
 hands
 Ruining he sank toward undiscovered lands.
 (1878)

HARVEST

The west is purple, and a golden globe,
 Sphered with new-risen moonlight, hangs between
 The skirts of evening's amethystine robe
 And the round world bathed in the steady sheen.
 There bending o'er a sickle bright and keen,
 Rests from his long day's labor one whose
 eyes 6
 Are fixed upon the large and luminous skies

 An earnest man he seems, with yellow hair,
 And yellow neath his scythe-sweep are the sheaves;

The Fall of a Soul 1 unsphering Plato. Cf Milton's
Il Penseroso, lines 85-92—

Or let my lamp, at midnight hour,
 Be seen in some high, lonely tower,
 Where I may oft outwatch the Bear,
 With thrice-great Hermes, or unsphere
 The spirit of Plato " (Lines 85-89)

According to neo-Platonic conceptions, the souls of the departed inhabit the concentric spheres that comprise the universe, to unsphere Plato is to summon his spirit back to earth—in this instance, by reading his philosophy

The poem is based upon a famous passage in Plato's Phaedrus (246-48), in which a soul is described under the image of two-winged horses and a charioteer. The horses, in conflict, symbolize the opposing sides of man's nature, and the soul falls when the driver loses control of his horses Cf the legend of Phaeton, who drove the chariot of the sun for one day and fell headlong into a river when he lost control of the horses.

Much need hath he to waste the nights with care, 10
 Lest waking he should hear from dripping
 eaves
 The plash of rain, or hail among thin leaves,
 Or melancholy wailings of a wind,
 That lays broad field and furrow waste behind.

Much need hath he the livelong day to toil, 15
 Sweeping the golden granaries of the plain,
 Until he garner all the summer's spoil,
 And store his gaping barns with heavy grain;
 Then will he sleep, nor heed the plash of
 rain,
 But with gay wassail and glad winter cheer 20
 Steel a stout heart against the coming year

From IN VENICE

I. THE INVITATION TO THE GONDOLA

Come forth; for Night is falling,
 The moon hangs round and red
 On the verge of the violet waters,
 Fronting the daylight dead.

 Come forth, the liquid spaces 5
 Of sea and sky are as one,
 Where outspread angel flame-wings
 Brood o'er the buried sun

 Bells call to bells from the islands,
 And far-off mountains rear 10
 Their shadowy crests in the crystal
 Of cloudless atmosphere

 A breeze from the sea is wafted,
 Lamp-litten Venice gleams
 With her towers and domes uplifted 15
 Like a city seen in dreams

Her waterways are a-tremble
 With melody far and wide,
 Borne from the phantom galleys
 That o'er the darkness glide. 20

There are stars in heaven, and starry
 Are the wandering lights below,
 Come forth! for the Night is calling,
 Sea, city, and sky are aglow! (1880)

3. IN THE SMALL CANALS

Love, felt from far, long sought, scarce found,
 On thee I call;
 Here where with silvery silent sound
 The smooth oars fall,

Here where the glimmering waterways, 5
 Above yon stair,
 Mirror one trembling lamp that plays
 In twilight air!

What sighs, what sounds, O poignant Love,
 Ere thou wert flown, 10
 Quivered these darksome waves above,
 In darkness known!

I dare not dream thereof, the sting
 Of those dead eyes
 Is too acute and close a thing 15
 For one who dies.

Only I feel through glare and gloom,
 Where yon lamp falls,
 Dim specters hurrying to their doom,
 And Love's voice calls. 20

'Twas better thus toward death to glide,
 Soul-full of bliss,
 Than with long life unsatisfied
 Life's crown to miss (1880)

From STELLA MARIS

3

Venice, thou Siren of sea-cities, wrought
 By mirage, built on water, stair o'er stair,
 Of sunbeams and cloud-shadows, phantom-
 fair,

With naught of earth to mar thy sea-born
 thought!

Thou floating film upon the wonder-fraught
 Ocean of dreams! Thou hast no dream so rare
 As are thy sons and daughters, they who wear Foam-flakes of charm from thine enchantment caught!

O dark brown eyes! O tangles of dark hair!
 O heaven-blue eyes, blonde tresses where the
 breeze 10

Plays over sun-burned cheeks in sea-blown
 air!

Firm limbs of molded bronze! frank debonair Smiles of deep-bosomed women! Loves that seize

Man's soul, and waft her on storm-melodies!

Stella Maris Symonds explained (Preface to Vagabunduli Libellus, 1884) that this series of sonnets dealt with an "episode of passionate experience" in a Venetian setting. It was designed to show how a "fictitious character" yields to a passion which overmasters the man at first, how his acquired habits of self-analysis necessitate doubt and conflict in the very moment of fruition, and how he becomes aware of a discord not only between his own tone of feeling and that of the woman who attracted him, but also between the emotion she inspired and his inalienable ideal of love. In a moment of disillusionment he roughly rejects what he ardently desired, because he finds himself upon the verge of disloyalty to his superior nature." Cf. Blunt's Love Sonnets of Proteus, page 770

22

Give me thyself! It were as well to cry
 Give me the splendor of this night of June!
 Give me yon star upon the swart lagoon
 Trembling in unapproached serenity!
 Our gondola, that four swift oarsmen ply, 5
 Shoots from the darkening Lido's sandy dune,
 Splits with her steel the mirrors of the moon,
 Shivers the star-beams that before us fly.
 Give me thyself! This prayer is even a knell,
 Warning me back to mine own impotence. 10
 Self gives not self; and souls sequestered
 dwell

In the dark fortalice of thought and sense,
 Where, though life's prisoners call from cell
 to cell,
 Each pines alone and may not issue thence 34

How often have I now outwatched the night
 Alone in this gray chamber toward the sea
 Turning its deep-arcaded balcony!
 Round yonder sharp acanthus-leaves the light
 Comes stealing, red at first, then golden bright; 5

Till when the day-god in his strength and glee
 Springs from the orient flood victoriously,
 Each cusp is tipped and tongued with quivering
 white

The islands, that were blots of purple bloom,
 Now tremble in soft liquid luminous haze, 10
 Uplifted from the sea-floor to the skies,
 And dim discerned erewhile through roseate
 gloom,

A score of sails now stud the waterways,
 Ruffling like swans afloat from paradise
 (1884)

THE BLACK KNIGHT

A beaten and a baffled man,
My life drags lamely day by day,
Too young to die, too old to plan,
In failure gray.

For ladies' tokens blithe of cheer, 6
Each bound upon some gallant quest;
While I rust here. (1881)

AGHADOE

There's a glade in Aghadoe, Aghadoe, Agha-doe,
There's a green and silent glade in Aghadoe,
Where we met, my love and I, Love's fair planet in the sky,
O'er that sweet and silent glade in Aghadoe

There's a glen in Aghadoe, Aghadoe, Aghadoe,
There's a deep and secret glen in Aghadoe, 6
Where I hid him from the eyes of the red-coats and their spies,
That year the trouble came to Aghadoe!

Oh! my curse on one black heart in Aghadoe,
Aghadoe,
On Shaun Dhu, my brother's son in Aghadoe!
When your throat fries in hell's drouth, salt
the flame be in your mouth, 11
For the treachery you did in Aghadoe!

For they tracked me to that glen in Aghadoe,
Aghadoe,
When the price was on his head in Aghadoe
O'er the mountain, through the wood, as I stole to him with food, 15
Where in hiding lone he lay in Aghadoe.

But they never took him living in Aghadoe,
Aghadoe,
With the bullets in his heart in Aghadoe,
There he lay, the head — my breast keeps the warmth where once 'twould rest —
Gone, to win the traitor's gold, from Aghadoe!

I walked to Mallow Town from Aghadoe,
Aghadoe, 21
Brought his head from the gaol's gate to Aghadoe,

Aghadoe! 25
There to rest upon his breast in Aghadoe!
Sure your dog for you could die with no
truer heart than I —
Your own love cold on your cairn in Aghadoe

WILLIAM ERNEST HENLEY
(1849-1903)

TO MY MOTHER

Chiming a dream by the way
With ocean's rapture and roar,
I met a maiden today
Walking alone on the shore;
Walking in maiden wise, 5
Modest and kind and fair,
The freshness of spring in her eyes
And the fullness of spring in her hair.

Cloud-shadow and scudding sun-burst
Were swift on the floor of the sea, 10
And a mad wind was romping its worst,
But what was their magic to me?
Or the charm of the midsummer skies?
I only saw she was there,
A dream of the sea in her eyes 15
And the kiss of the sea in her hair.

I watched her vanish in space;
She came where I walked no more,
But something had passed of her grace
To the spell of the wave and the shore, 20
And now, as the glad stars rise,
She comes to me, rosy and rare,
The delight of the wind in her eyes
And the hand of the wind in her hair
(1872, 1888)

From IN HOSPITAL

I ENTER PATIENT

The morning mists still haunt the stony street,
The northern summer air is shrill and cold,
And, lo, the hospital, gray, quiet, old,
Where Life and Death like friendly chafferers
meet

In Hospital This is a series of poems based upon impressions of the Old Infirmary, Edinburgh, where Henley was a patient for twenty months, suffering from a tubercular disease. One foot had been amputated in his youth, and it was feared that he would lose the other, but it was saved by the skill of Dr. Joseph Lister (1827-1912), originator of antiseptic surgery.

Through the loud spaciousness and drafty
gloom 5
A small, strange child — so agéd yet so young! —
Her little arm besplinted and beslung,
Precedes me gravely to the waiting-room.
I lump behind, my confidence all gone
The gray-haired soldier-porter waves me on,
And on I crawl, and still my spirits fail, 11
A tragic meanness seems so to environ
These corridors and stairs of stone and iron, Cold, naked, clean — half-workhouse and half-jail.

2. WAITING

A square, squat room (a cellar on promotion),
Drab to the soul, drab to the very daylight;
Plasters astray in unnatural-looking tinware,
Scissors and lint and apothecary's jars.

Here, on a bench a skeleton would writhe
from, 5
Angry and sore, I wait to be admitted;
Wait till my heart is lead upon my stomach,
While at their ease two dressers do their chores.

One has a probe — it feels to me a crowbar
A small boy sniffs and shudders after blue-
stone. 10
A poor old tramp explains his poor old ulcers
Life is (I think) a blunder and a shame.

4. BEFORE

Behold me waiting — waiting for the knife.
A little while, and at a leap I storm
The thick, sweet mystery of chloroform,
The drunken dark, the little death-in-life.
The gods are good to me — I have no wife, 5
No innocent child, to think of as I near
The fateful minute, nothing all-too dear
Unmans me for my bout of passive strife.
Yet I am tremulous and a trifle sick,
And, face to face with chance, I shrink a little; 10
My hopes are strong, my will is something
weak
Here comes the basket? Thank you. I am ready.

But, gentlemen my porters, life is brittle,
You carry Cæsar and his fortunes — steady!

5 OPERATION

You are carried in a basket,
Like a carcass from the shambles,

2 Waiting 10 bluestone, cupric sulphate, or blue vitriol, used as an emetic

4 Before 14 You fortunes, Julius Cæsar's words, quoted by Plutarch in his Life of Cæsar. They were addressed, during the war with Pompey, to a boatman who had Cæsar as his passenger.

To the theater, a cockpit
Where they stretch you on a table.

Then they bid you close your eyelids, 5
And they mask you with a napkin,
And the anæsthetic reaches
Hot and subtle through your being.

And you gasp and reel and shudder
In a rushing, swaying rapture, 10
While the voices at your elbow
Fade — receding — fainter — farther.

Lights about you shower and tumble,
And your blood seems crystallizing —
Edged and vibrant, yet within you 15
Racked and hurried back and forward.

Then the lights grow fast and furious,
And you hear a noise of waters,
And you wrestle, blind and dizzy,
In an agony of effort, 20

Till a sudden lull accepts you,
And you sound an utter darkness . . .
And awaken . . . with a struggle . . .
On a hushed, attentive audience.

of her.

10. STAFF-NURSE: NEW STYLE

Blue-eyed and bright of face but waning fast
Into the sear of virginal decay,
I view her as she enters, day by day,

5 Operation 15 Edged, sharp

8 Staff-Nurse Old Style 2 Rembrandt, Dutch realistic painter (1606-1669) Sir Walter, Sir Walter Scott (1771-1832), whose graphic word-paintings of Edinburgh characters, as in The Heart of Midlothian, were doubtless in Henley's mind 10. Syme, James Syme (1799-1870), recognized as the greatest living surgeon in his day 14
"The Chief," Dr. Lister, successor to Syme as chief surgeon at the Edinburgh Infirmary

As a sweet sunset almost overpast.
 Kindly and calm, patrician to the last, 5
 Superbly falls her gown of sober gray,
 And on her chignon's elegant array
 The plainest cap is somehow touched with caste
 She talks BEETHOVEN; frowns disapprobation
 At BALZAC's name, sighs it at "poor GEORGE
 SAND's", 10
 Knows that she has exceeding pretty hands;
 Speaks Latin with a right accentuation;
 And gives at need (as one who understands)
 Draft, counsel, diagnosis, exhortation.

13. CASUALTY

As with varnish red and glistening
 Dripped his hair; his feet looked rigid;
 Raised, he settled stiffly sideways
 You could see his hurts were spinal.

He had fallen from an engine, 5
 And been dragged along the metals.
 It was hopeless, and they knew it;
 So they covered him, and left him.

As he lay, by fits half sentient,
 Inarticulately moaning, 10
 With his stockinged soles protruded
 Stark and awkward from the blankets,

To his bed there came a woman,
 Stood and looked and sighed a little,
 And departed without speaking, 15
 As himself a few hours after

I was told it was his sweetheart
 They were on the eve of marriage.
 She was quiet as a statue,
 But her lip was gray and writhen 20

16. HOUSE-SURGEON

Exceeding tall, but built so well his height
 Half-disappears in flow of chest and limb,
 Moustache and whisker trooper-like in trim,
 Frank-faced, frank-eyed, frank-hearted, always bright
 And always punctual — morning, noon, and
 night; 5

Bland as a Jesuit, sober as a hymn;
 Humorous, and yet without a touch of whim,
 Gentle and amiable, yet full of fight.
 His piety, though fresh and true in strain,

7 chignon, a roll of hair worn on the back of the head 9

 composer, he was born in Germany and was well-established servative Englishwomen found his stories too frank George

 French novelist, celebrated also for her romantic love affairs with the poet Musset, the composer Chopin, and others.

19 SCRUBBER

She's tall and gaunt, and in her hard, sad face
 With flashes of the old fun's animation
 There lowers the fixed and peevish resignation
 Bred of a past where troubles came apace
 She tells me that her husband, ere he died, 5
 Saw seven of their children pass away,
 And never knew the little lass at play
 Out on the green, in whom he's deified
 Her kin dispersed, her friends forgot and gone,
 All simple faith her honest Irish mind, 10
 Scolding her spoiled young saint, she labors
 on —

Telling her dreams, taking her patients' part, Trailing her coat sometimes, and you shall find
 No rougher, quainter speech, nor kinder heart

25 APPARITION

Thin-legged, thin-chested, slight unspeakably,
 Neat-footed and weak-fingered, in his face — Lean, large-boned, curved of back, and touched with race,
 Bold-lipped, rich-tinted, mutable as the sea,
 The brown eyes radiant with vivacity — 5
 There shines a brilliant and romantic grace,
 A spirit intense and rare, with trace on trace
 Of passion and impudence and energy.
 Valiant in velvet, light in ragged luck,
 Most vain, most generous, sternly critical, 10
 Buffoon and poet, lover and sensualist,
 A deal of Ariel, just a streak of Puck,
 Much Antony, of Hamlet most of all,
 And something of the Shorter-Catechist

O the wonder, the spell of the streets!
 The stature and strength of the horses, 5
 The rustle and echo of footfalls,
 The flat roar and rattle of wheels!
 A swift tram floats huge on us . .
 It's a dream?
 The smell of the mud in my nostrils 10
 Blows brave — like a breath of the sea!

As of old,
 Ambulant, undulant drapery,
 Vaguely and strangely provocative,
 Flutters and beckons O yonder — 15
 Is it? — the gleam of a stocking!
 Sudden, a spire
 Wedged in the mist! O the houses,
 The long lines of lofty, gray houses,
 Cross-hatched with shadow and light!
 These are the streets . 20
 Each is an avenue leading Whither I will!

Free . . . !
 Dizzy, hysterical, faint,
 I sit, and the carriage rolls on with me 25
 Into the wonderful world (1872-1875, 1888)

INVICTUS

Out of the night that covers me,
 Black as the Pit from pole to pole,
 I thank whatever gods may be
 For my unconquerable soul.

In the fell clutch of circumstance 5
 I have not winced nor cried aloud
 Under the bludgeonings of chance
 My head is bloody, but unbowed

Beyond this place of wrath and tears
 Looms but the Horror of the shade, 10
 And yet the menace of the years
 Finds, and shall find, me unafraid

It matters not how strait the gate,
 How charged with punishments, the scroll,
 I am the master of my fate, 15
 I am the captain of my soul (1875; 1888)

THE SANDS ARE ALIVE WITH SUNSHINE

The sands are alive with sunshine,
 The bathers lounge and throng,
 And out in the bay a bugle
 Is hitting a gallant song.

Invictus The title means Unconquered Cf. Swinburne's
The Garden of Proserpine, lines 83-84, page 687

The clouds go racing eastward, 5
 The blithe wind cannot rest,
 And a shard on the shingle flashes
 Like the shining soul of a jest;

While children romp in the surges,
 And sweethearts wander free, 10
 And the Firth as with laughter dimples . .
 I would it were deep over me! (1875, 1888)

TO A D.

The nightingale has a lyre of gold,
 The lark's is a clarion call;
 And the blackbird plays but a boxwood flute,
 But I love him best of all.

For his song is all of the joy of life, 5
 And we in the mad, spring weather,
 We two have listened till he sang
 Our hearts and lips together (1876; 1888)

TO K. DE M.

*Love blows as the wind blows,
 Love blows into the heart.
 — NILE BOAT SONG*

Life in her creaking shoes
 Goes, and more formal grows,
 A round of calls and cues,
 Love blows as the wind blows.
 Blows! . . in the quiet close 5
 As in the roaring mart,
 By ways no mortal knows
 Love blows into the heart.

The stars some cadence use,
 Forthright the river flows, 10
 In order fall the dews,
 Love blows as the wind blows;
 Blows! . . and what reckoning shows
 The courses of his chart?
 A spirit that comes and goes, 15
 Love blows into the heart (1878; 1888)

I M
MARGARITÆ SORORI

A late lark twitters from the quiet skies,
 And from the west,
 Where the sun, his day's work ended,

7 shard . . shingle, a fragment of pottery or glass on the beach 11 Firth, a narrow arm of the sea

To A D The poem was dedicated to Henry Austin
 Dobson (1840-1921), poet and essayist, who had expressed great admiration for it See Alban Dobson, Some Notes on Austin Dobson, 1928, page 157

To K de M This poem was dedicated to Henley's friend and literary protégé, Mrs. Katherine de Mattos, cousin of Robert Louis Stevenson In some of Henley's poems, as in this one and in To W A, page 786, there is no relation between the content and the person to whom it is dedicated

I M. Margaritæ Sorori Henley wrote this poem in memory of his wife's sister Margaret

Lingers as in content,
There falls on the old, gray city 5
An influence luminous and serene,
A shining peace

The smoke ascends
In a rosy-and-golden haze The spires
Shine, and are changed. In the valley 10
Shadows rise. The lark sings on. The sun,
Closing his benediction,
Sinks, and the darkening air
Thrills with a sense of the triumphing night —
Night with her train of stars 15
And her great gift of sleep

So be my passing!
My task accomplished and the long day done,
My wages taken, and in my heart
Some late lark singing, 20
Let me be gathered to the quiet west,
The sundown splendid and serene,
Death.

(1886; 1888)

TO W. A.

Or ever the knightly years were gone
With the old world to the grave,
I was a King in Babylon
And you were a Christian Slave.

I saw, I took, I cast you by, 5
I bent and broke your pride.
You loved me well, or I heard them lie,
But your longing was denied.
Surely I knew that by and by
You cursed your gods and died. 10

And a myriad suns have set and shone
Since then upon the grave
Decreed by the King of Babylon
To her that had been his Slave.

The pride I trampled is now my scathe, 15
For it tramples me again.
The old resentment lasts like death,
For you love, yet you refrain.
I break my heart on your hard unfaith,
And I break my heart in vain. 20

Yet not for an hour do I wish undone
The deed beyond the grave,
When I was a King in Babylon
And you were a Virgin Slave.

(1884)

To W. A. This poem was probably dedicated to William Archer (1856-1924), playwright and critic, a member of the younger literary group in which Henley and Stevenson were interested. See note on To K. de M., page 785. The time indicated in line 1 is a conscious anachronism. Babylon was in ruins before the 5th century B. C.

ON THE WAY TO KEW

On the way to Kew,
By the river old and gray,
Where in the Long Ago
We laughed and loitered so,
I met a ghost today, 5
A ghost that told of you —
A ghost of low replies
And sweet inscrutable eyes,
Coming up from Richmond
As you used to do. 10

By the river old and gray,
The enchanted Long Ago
Murmured and smiled anew.
On the way to Kew,
March had the laugh of May, 15
The bare boughs looked aglow,
And old immortal words
Sang in my breast like birds,
Coming up from Richmond
As I used with you. 20

With the life of Long Ago
Lived my thought of you.
By the river old and gray,
Flowing his appointed way,
As I watched I knew 25
What is so good to know —
Not in vain, not in vain,
Shall I look for you again,
Coming up from Richmond
On the way to Kew. (1888)

BALLADE OF A TOYOKUNI COLOR-PRINT

Was I a Samurai renowned,
Two-sworded, fierce, immense of bow?
A histrion angular and profound?
A priest? a porter? — Child, although
I have forgotten clean, I know 5
That in the shade of Fujisan,
What time the cherry-orchards blow,
I loved you once in old Japan.

As here you loiter, flowing-gowned
And hugely sashed, with pins a-row 10
Your quaint head as with flamelets crowned,
Demure, inviting — even so,

On the Way to Kew Kew, with its famous gardens, and Richmond are in the environs of London, a short distance up the Thames

Ballade of a Toyokuni Color-Print Utagawa Toyokuni (1769-1825) was a popular Japanese painter of women and actors. On the form of the poem see note on On a Fan, page 765

1 Samurai, a member of the ancient Japanese military aristocracy 3 histrion, actor 6 Fujisan, Mount Fuji, which forms a characteristic background for many Japanese prints 7 blow, bloom. The flowering cherry is a tree common in Japan.

When merry maids in Miyako
To feel the sweet o' the year began,
And green gardens to overflow,
I loved you once in old Japan 15

Clear shine the hills, the rice-fields round
Two cranes are circling, sleepy and slow,
A blue canal the lake's blue bound
Breaks at the bamboo bridge, and lo! 20
Touched with the sundown's spirit and glow,
I see you turn, with flirited fan,
Against the plum-tree's bloomy snow. . .
I loved you once in old Japan!

ENVOY

Dear, 'twas a dozen lives ago; 25
But that I was a lucky man
The Toyokuni here will show:
I loved you — once — in old Japan. (1888)

BALLADE OF YOUTH AND AGE

Spring at her height on a morn at prime,
Sails that laugh from a flying squall,
Pomp of harmony, rapture of rime —
Youth is the sign of them, one and all.
Winter sunsets and leaves that fall, 5
An empty flagon, a folded page,
A tumble-down wheel, a tattered ball —
These are a type of the world of Age.

Bells that clash in a gaudy chime,
Swords that clatter in onsets tall, 10
The words that ring and the fames that
climb —

Youth is the sign of them, one and all.
Hymnals old in a dusty stall,
A bald, blind bird in a crazy cage,
The scene of a faded festival — 15
These are a type of the world of Age.

Hours that strut as the heirs of time,
Deeds whose rumor's a clarion-call,
Songs where the singers their souls sublime —
Youth is the sign of them, one and all. 20
A staff that rests in a nook of wall,
A reeling battle, a rusted gage,
The chant of a nearing funeral —
These are a type of the world of Age.

ENVOY

Struggle and turmoil, revel and brawl — 25
Youth is the sign of them, one and all
A smoldering hearth and a silent stage —
These are a type of the world of Age. (1888)

BALLADE OF DEAD ACTORS

Where are the passions they essayed,
And where are the tears they made to flow?
Where the wild humors they portrayed
For laughing worlds to see and know? 5
Othello's wrath and Juliet's woe?
Sir Peter's whims and Timon's gall?
And Mollamant and Romeo?
Into the night go one and all

Where are the braveries, fresh or frayed?
The plumes, the armors — friend and foe? 10
The cloth of gold, the rare brocade,
The mantles glittering to and fro?
The pomp, the pride, the royal show?
The cries of war and festival?
The youth, the grace, the charm, the glow? 15
Into the night go one and all

The curtain falls, the play is played
The Beggar packs beside the Beau,
The Monarch troops, and troops the Maid,
The Thunder huddles with the Snow. 20
Where are the revelers high and low?
The clashing swords? The lover's call?
The dancers gleaming row on row?
Into the night go one and all

ENVOY

Prince, in one common overthrow 25
The Hero tumbles with the Thrall,
As dust that drives, as straws that blow,
Into the night go one and all (1888)

DOUBLE BALLADE OF LIFE AND FATE

Fools may pine, and sots may swill,
Cynics gibe and prophets rail,
Moralists may scourge and drill,
Preachers prose, and fainthearts quail. 5
Let them whine, or threat, or wail!
Till the touch of Circumstance
Down to darkness sink the scale,
Fate's a fiddler, Life's a dance

What if skies be wan and chill?
What if winds be harsh and stale? 10
Presently the east will thrill,
And the sad and shrunken sail,
Belying with a kindly gale,

Bear you sunwards, while your chance
Sends you back the hopeful hail! — 15
"Fate's a fiddler, Life's a dance "

Idle shot or coming bill,
Hapless love or broken bail,
Gulp it (never chew your pill!),
And, if Burgundy should fail, 20
Try the humbler pot of ale!
Over all is heaven's expanse
Gold's to find among the shale.
Fate's a fiddler, Life's a dance.

Dull Sir Joskin sleeps his fill, 25
Good Sir Galahad seeks the Grail,
Proud Sir Pertinax flaunts his frill,
Hard Sir Aeger dints his mail;
And the while by hill and dale
Tristram's braveries, gleam and glance, 30
And his blithe horn tells its tale —
"Fate's a fiddler, Life's a dance."

Araminta's grand and shrill,
Delia's passionate and frail,
Doris drives an earnest quill, 35
Athanasia takes the veil;
Wiser Phyllis o'er her pail,
At the heart of all romance
Reading, sings to Strephon's flail —
"Fate's a fiddler, Life's a dance." 40

Every Jack must have his Jill
(Even Johnson had his Thrale!), Forward, couples — with a will!
This, the world, is not a jail
Hear the music, sprat and whale! 45
Hands across, retire, advance!
Though the doomsman's on your trail,
Fate's a fiddler, Life's a dance.

ENVOY

Boys and girls, at slug and snail
And their kindred look askance. 50
Pay your footing on the nail;
Fate's a fiddler, Life's a dance. (1888)

20 Burgundy, an expensive wine, from the province of Burgundy, France 25-36 Joskin . . . Athanasia While many of these names should be associated with varying human types rather than with actual characters, some are capable of identification Galahad is the central figure of the Grail quest in Arthurian romance, Sir Pertinax is a strutting patriot in Macklin's comedy, The Man of the World, 1764, Tristram is famous in Arthurian romance as a knight and the lover of Isolde; Araminta is an extravagant and snobbish woman in Vanbrugh's comedy, The Confederacy, 1695, Delia is the fickle and alluring lady to whom the Roman poet Tibullus addressed his poems, Sir Aeger may be a character in the 15th century romance, Sir Eger, Sir Grame, and Sir Graysteel, Athanasia is possibly St. Anastasia, a Roman girl who entered a nunnery in the 4th century. 37-39 Phyllis . . . Strephon, traditional names for a pastoral shepherdess and shepherd, see Virgil's Eclogues, Sidney's Arcadia, and W. S. Gilbert's Iolanthe 42 Johnson . . . Thrale. Mrs Thrale, later Mrs Piozzi, was a friend and patron of Dr Samuel Johnson, the literary dictator of the later 18th century.

WHEN YOU ARE OLD

When you are old, and I am passed away —
Passed, and your face, your golden face, is
gray —
I think whate'er the end, this dream of mine,
Comforting you, a friendly star will shine
Down the dim slope where still you stumble and stray. 5
So may it be: that so dead Yesterday,
No sad-eyed ghost but generous and gay,
May serve you memories like almighty wine,
When you are old!

Dear Heart, it shall be so Under the sway 10
Of death the past's enormous disarray Lies hushed and dark. Yet though there come no sign,
Live on well pleased, immortal and divine
Love shall still tend you, as God's angels may,
When you are old 15
(1888)

WHAT IS TO COME

What is to come we know not But we know
That what has been was good — was good to
show,
Better to hide, and best of all to bear
We are the masters of the days that were,
We have lived, we have loved, we have suffered . even so 5

Shall we not take the ebb who had the flow?
Life was our friend. Now, if it be our foe —
Dear, though it spoil and break us! — need we care
What is to come?

Let the great winds their worst and wildest
blow, 10
Or the gold weather round us mellow slow,
We have fulfilled ourselves, and we can dare
And we can conquer, though we may not share
In the rich quiet of the afterglow
What is to come. 15

LONDON VOLUNTARIES

1. Grave

St Margaret's bells,
Quiring their innocent, old-world canticles,
Sing in the storied air,

When You Are Old This and the following poem are rondeaus (see note on Dobson's "You Bid Me Try," page 764)

London Voluntaries 1 Grave A voluntary is an organ solo, grave is a slow, solemn movement in music

1 St. Margaret's, the parish church of Westminster, close beside Westminster Abbey 2 canticles, hymns, chants

All rosy-and-golden, as with memories
Of woods at evensong, and sands and seas 5
Disconsolate for that the night is nigh.
O the low, lingering lights! The large last gleam

(Hark! how those brazen choristers cry and call!)

Touching these solemn ancientries, and there,
The silent River ranging tide-mark high 10
And the callow, gray-faced Hospital,
With the strange glimmer and glamour of a
dream!

The Sabbath peace is in the slumbrous trees,
And from the wistful, the fast-widowing sky (Hark! how those plangent comforters call and cry!) 15

Falls as in August plots late roseleaves fall
The sober Sabbath stir —
Leisurely voices, desultory feet! —
Comes from the dry, dust-colored street,
Where in their summer frocks the girls go
by, 20

And sweethearts lean and loiter and confer,
Just as they did an hundred years ago,
Just as an hundred years to come they will —
When you and I, dear love, lie lost and low,
And sweet-throats none our welkin shall fulfill, 25

Nor any sunset face serene and slow,
But, being dead, we shall not grieve to die

2. Andante con moto

Forth from the dust and din,
The crush, the heat, the many-spotted glare,
The odor and sense of life and lust aflare,
The wrangle and jangle of unrests,
Let us take horse, dear heart, take horse and
win —

As from swart August to the green lap of
May —

To quietness and the fresh and fragrant breasts

Of the still, delicious night, not yet aware
In any of her innumerable nests
Of that first sudden plash of dawn, 10
Clear, sapphirine, luminous, large,
Which tells that soon the flowing springs of
day

In deep and ever deeper eddies drawn
Forward and up, in wider and wider way,
Shall float the sands, and brim the shores, 15
On this our lth of the world, as round it roars

10 River, the Thames 11 Hospital, Chelsea Hospital, a short distance up the Thames from St Margaret's 15
plangent, resounding comforters, the bells of St Margaret's

2 Andante con moto, with energy or emotion, a musical movement not so slow as andante but less rapid than al-legretto

16 lth, limb, section

And spins into the outlook of the sun
(The Lord's first gift, the Lord's especial charge),

With light, with living light, from marge to marge

Until the course He set and staked be run 20

Through street and square, through square and street,

Each with his home-grown quality of dark
And violated silence, loud and fleet,
Waylaid by a merry ghost at every lamp,
The hansom wheels and plunges. Hark, O
hark, 25

Sweet, how the old mare's bit and chain
Ring back a rough refrain

Upon the marked and cheerful tramp
Of her four shoes! Here is the Park,
And, oh, the languid midsummer wafts adust,
The tired midsummer blooms! 30
O the mysterious distances, the glooms
Romantic, the august

And solemn shapes! At night this City of Trees

Turns to a tryst of vague and strange 35
And monstrous Majesties,
Let loose from some dim underworld to range
These terrene vistas till their twilight sets,
When, dispossessed of wonderfulness, they stand

Beggared and common, plain to all the land 40
For stooks of leaves! And lo! the Wizard
Hour,

His silent, shining sorcery winged with power!
Still, still the streets, between their carcanets
Of linking gold, are avenues of sleep

But see how gable ends and parapets 45
In gradual beauty and significance Emerge! And did you hear

That little twitter-and-cheep,
Breaking inordinately loud and clear
On this still, spectral, exquisite atmosphere?

'Tis a first nest at matins! And behold 51
A rakehell cat — how furtive and acold!

A spent witch homing from some infamous dance —

Obscene, quick-trotting, see her tip and fade
Through shadowy railings into a pit of shade!
And now! a little wind and shy, 56

The smell of ships (that earnest of romance),
A sense of space and water, and thereby

A lamplit bridge touching the troubled sky,
And look, O look! a tangle of silver gleams 60

And dusky lights, our River and all his
dreams,

His dreams that never save in our deaths can
die.

38 terrene, earthly 41 stooks, bundles 43 carca-nets, golden collars set with jewels—referring to the rows of street-lamps 51 matins, morning songs

What miracle is happening in the air,
 Charging the very texture of the gray
 With something luminous and rare? ⁶⁵
 The night goes out like an ill-parceled fire,
 And, as one lights a candle, it is day
 The extinguisher, that perks it like a spire
 On the little formal church, is not yet green
 Across the water; but the housetops nigher, ⁷⁰
 The corner-lines, the chimneys — look how clean,
 How new, how naked! See the batch of boats,
 Here at the stairs, washed in the freshsprung
 beam!
 And those are barges that were goblin floats,
 Black, hag-steered, fraught with devilry and dream! ⁷⁵
 And in the piles the water frolics clear,
 The ripples into loose rings wander and flee,
 And we — we can behold that could but hear
 The ancient River singing as he goes, ⁷⁹
 New-mailed in morning, to the ancient
 Sea
 The gas burns lank and jaded in its glass,
 The old Ruffian soon shall yawn himself
 awake,
 And light his pipe, and shoulder his tools, and take
 His hobnailed way to work!

Let us too pass —
 Pass ere the sun leaps and your shadow shows — ⁸⁵
 Through these long, blindfold rows
 Of casements staring blind to right and left,
 Each with his gaze turned inward on some piece
 Of life in death's own likeness — Life bereft
 Of living looks as by the Great Release — ⁹⁰
 Pass to an exquisite night's more exquisite
 close!

Reach upon reach of burial — so they feel,
 These colonies of dreams! And as we steal Homeward together, but for the buxom
 breeze,
 Fitfully frolicking to heel ⁹⁵
 With news of dawn-drenched woods and tumbling seas,
 We might — thus awed, thus lonely that we are —
 Be wandering some dispeopled star,
 Some world of memories and unbroken
 graves,
 So broods the abounding Silence near and far — ¹⁰⁰
 Till even your footfall craves
 Forgiveness of the majesty it braves

3 Scherzando

Down through the ancient Strand
 The spirit of October, mild and boon
 And sauntering, takes his way
 This golden end of afternoon,
 As though the corn stood yellow in all the land,
 And the ripe apples dropped to the harvest-moon ⁶

Lo! the round sun, half-down the western slope —
 Seen as along an unglazed telescope —
 Lingers and lolls, loath to be done with day:
 Gifting the long, lean, lanky street ¹⁰
 And its abounding confluences of being
 With aspects generous and bland,
 Making a thousand harnesses to shine
 As with new ore from some enchanted mine,
 And every horse's coat so full of sheen ¹⁵
 He looks new-tailored, and every 'bus feels
 clean,
 And never a hansom but is worth the feeing,
 And every jeweler within the pale
 Offers a real Arabian Night for sale;
 And even the roar ²⁰
 Of the strong streams of toil, that pause and pour

Eastward and westward, sounds suffused —
 Seems as it were bemused
 And blurred, and like the speech
 Of lazy seas on a lotus-haunted beach — ²⁵
 With this enchanted lustrousness,
 This mellow magic, that (as a man's caress Brings back to some faded face, beloved
 before,
 A heavenly shadow of the grace it wore
 Ere the poor eyes were minded to beseech) ³⁰
 Old things transfigures, and you hail and bless
 Their looks of long-lapsed loveliness once
 more;

Till Clement's, angular and cold and staid,
 Gleans forth in glamour's very stuffs arrayed,
 And Bride's, her airy, unsubstantial charm ³⁵
 Through flight on flight of springing, soaring
 stone
 Grown flushed and warm,
 Laughs into life full-mooded and fresh-blown,
 And the high majesty of Paul's

 1 Strand The direct way from St. Paul's Cathedral to Charing Cross and Trafalgar Square comprises Ludgate Hill, Fleet Street, and the Strand, each a continuation of the other. The Strand was anciently a country road linking London with the village of Westminster. 2 boon, good, of the Strand, it was built in 1681 by Sir Christopher Wren

Uplifts a voice of living light, and calls — 40
 Calls to his millions to behold and see How goodly this his London Town can be!

For earth and sky and air
 Are golden everywhere,
 And golden with a gold so suave and fine 45
 The looking on it lifts the heart like wine.
 Trafalgar Square
 (The fountains volleying golden glaze)
 Shines like an angel-market. High aloft
 Over his couchant Lions, in a haze 50
 Shimmering and bland and soft,
 A dust of chrysoprase,
 Our Sailor takes the golden gaze
 Of the saluting sun, and flames superb,
 As once he flamed it on his ocean round 55
 The dingy dreariness of the picture-place,
 Turned very nearly bright,
 Takes on a luminous transiency of grace,
 And shows no more a scandal to the ground
 The very blind man pottering on the curb 60
 Among the posies and the ostrich feathers
 And the rude voices touched with all the weathers
 Of the long, varying year,
 Shares in the universal alms of light
 The windows, with their fleeting, flickering
 fires, 65
 The height and spread of frontage shining sheer,
 The quiring signs, the rejoicing roofs and spires —
 'Tis El Dorado — El Dorado plain,
 The Golden City! And when a girl goes by,
 Look! as she turns her glancing head, 70
 A call of gold is floated from her ear!
 Golden, all golden! In a golden glory,
 Long-lapsing down a golden coasted sky,
 The day not dies, but seems
 Dispersed in wafts and drifts of gold, and shed
 Upon a past of golden song and story 76
 And memories of gold and golden dreams

Out of the poisonous East,

 From the most squalid cellarage of hell,

Comes slouching, sullen and obscene,
 Hard on the skirts of the embittered night,
 And in a cloud unclean
 Of excremental humors, roused to strife 10
 By the operation of some ruinous change,
 Wherever his evil mandate run and range,
 Into a dire intensity of life,
 A craftsman at his bench, he settles down
 To the grim job of throttling London Town 15

So, by a jealous lightlessness beset
 That might have oppressed the dragons of old
 time
 Crunching and groping in the abysmal slime,
 A cave of cutthroat thoughts and villainous
 dreams,
 Hag-rid and crying with cold and dirt and wet, 20
 The afflicted City, prone from mark to mark
 In shameful occultation, seems
 A nightmare labyrinthine, dim and drifting,
 With wavering gulfs and antic heights, and shifting,
 Rent in the stuff of a material dark, 25
 Wherein the lamplight, scattered and sick and
 pale,
 Shows like the leper's living blotch of bale —
 Uncoiling monstrous into street on street
 Paven with perils, teeming with mischance,
 Where man and beast go blindfold and in
 dread, 30
 Working with oaths and threats and faltering
 feet
 Somewhither in the hideousness ahead;
 Working through wicked airs and deadly dewes
 That make the laden robber grin askance
 At the good places in his black romance, 35
 And the poor, loitering harlot rather choose
 Go pinched and pined to bed
 Than lurk and shiver and curse her wretched
 way
 From arch to arch, scouting some threc-penny prey

Forgot his dawns and far-flushed afterglows,
 His green garlands and windy eyots forgot, 41
 The old Father-River flows,
 His watchfires cores of menace in the gloom,
 As he came oozing from the Pit, and bore,
 Sunk in his filthily transfigured sides, 45
 Shoals of dishonored dead to tumble and rot
 In the squalor of the universal shore —
 His voices sounding through the gruesome air
 As from the Ferry where the Boat of Doom
 With her blaspheming cargo reels and rides, 50

As through a tangle of alleys murder-haunted,
From sinister reach to reach out—out—to sea

And Death the while—Death with his well-worn, lean, professional smile, 60

Death in his threadbare working trim—
Comes to your bedside, unannounced and bland,

And with expert, inevitable hand
Feels at your windpipe, fingers you in the lung,
Or flicks the clot well into the laboring heart,
Thus signifying unto old and young, 66
However hard of mouth or wild of whim,
'Tis time—'tis time by his ancient watch—
to part

From books and women and talk and drink and art

And you go humbly after him 70
To a mean suburban lodging—on the way
To what or where

Not Death, who is old and very wise, can say;
And you—how should you care
So long as, unreclaimed of hell, 75
The Wind-Fiend, the insufferable,
Thus vicious and thus patient, sits him down
To the black job of burking London Town?

PROLOGUE TO RHYMES AND RHYTHMS

Something is dead
 The grace of sunset solitudes, the march
 Of the solitary moon, the pomp and power
 Of round on round of shining soldier-stars
 Patrolling space, the bounties of the sun — 5
 Sovran, tremendous, unimaginable —
 The multitudinous friendliness of the sea,
 Possess no more — no more.

Something is dead . . .
 The autumn rain-rot deeper and wider soaks
 And spreads, the burden of winter heavier weighs, 11
 His melancholy close and closer yet
 Cleaves, and those incantations of the spring
 That made the heart a center of miracles
 Grow formal, and the wonder-working hours
 Arise no more — no more 16

Something is dead . . .
 'Tis time to creep in close about the fire
 And tell gray tales of what we were, and dream
 Old dreams and faded, and as we may rejoice
 In the young life that round us leaps and laughs, 21
 A fountain in the sunshine, in the pride
 Of God's best gift to us twain returns,
 Dear heart, no more — no more. (1892)

WHERE FORLORN SUNSETS FLARE AND FADE

Where forlorn sunsets flare and fade
 On desolate sea and lonely sand,
 Out of the silence and the shade

What is the voice of strange command
 Calling you still, as friend calls friend 5
 With love that cannot brook delay,
 To rise and follow the ways that wend
 Over the hills and far away?

Hark to the city, street on street
 A roaring reach of death and life, 10
 Of vortices that clash and fleet
 And run in appointed strife,
 Hark to it calling, calling clear,
 Calling until you cannot stay
 From dearer things than your own most dear
 Over the hills and far away. 16

Out of the sound of the ebb-and-flow,
 Out of the sight of lamp and star,
 It calls you where the good winds blow,
 And the unchanging meadows are — 20
 From faded hopes and hopes agleam,
 It calls you, calls you night and day
 Beyond the dark into the dream
 Over the hills and far away. (1892)

MIDSUMMER MIDNIGHT SKIES

Midsummer midnight skies,
 Midsummer midnight influences and airs,
 The shining, sensitive silver of the sea
 Touched with the strange-hued blazonings
 of dawn,
 And all so solemnly still I seem to hear 5
 The breathing of Life and Death,
 The secular Accomplices,
 Renewing the visible miracle of the world

The wistful stars
 Shine like good memories. The young morning wind 10
 Blows full of unforgotten hours
 As over a region of roses Life and Death Sound on — sound on . . . And the night magical,
 Troubled yet comforting, thrills
 As if the Enchanted Castle at the heart 15
 Of the wood's dark wonderment
 Swung wide his valves, and filled the dim sea-banks
 With exquisite visitants
 Words fiery-hearted yet, dreams and desires
 With living looks intolerable, regrets 20
 Whose voice comes as the voice of an only child
 Heard from the grave: shapes of a Might-
 Have-Been —
 Beautiful, miserable, distraught —
 The Law no man may baffle denied and slew

The spell-bound ships stand as at gaze 25
 To let the marvel by. The gray road
 glooms . . .
 Glimmers . . . goes out . . . and there, O
 there where it fades,
 What grace, what glamour, what wild will,
 Transfigure the shadows? Whose,
 Heart of my heart, Soul of my soul, but yours? 30

Ghosts — ghosts — the sapphirine air
 Teems with them even to the gleaming ends
 Of the wild day-spring! Ghosts,
 Everywhere — everywhere — till I and you
 At last — dear love, at last! — 35
 Are in the dreaming, even as Life and Death
 Twin-ministers of the unoriginal Will

TO JAMES McNEILL WHISTLER

Under a stagnant sky,
 Gloom out of gloom uncoiling into gloom,
 The River, jaded and forlorn, Welters and wanders wearily — wretchedly —
 on;

Yet in and out among the ribs 5
 Of the old skeleton bridge, as in the piles
 Of some dead lake-built city, full of skulls,
 Worm-worn, rat-riddled, moldy with memories,

Lingers to babble to a broken tune
 (Once, O the unvoiced music of my heart!) 10
 So melancholy a soliloquy
 It sounds as it might tell
 The secret of the unending grief-in-grain,
 The terror of Time and Change and Death,
 That wastes this floating, transitory world. 15

What of the incantation
 That forced the huddled shapes on yonder
 shore

To take and wear the night
 Like a material majesty?
 That touched the shafts of wavering fire 20
 About this miserable welter and wash (River, O River of Journeys, River of Dreams!)

Into long, shining signals from the panes
 Of an enchanted pleasure-house,
 Where life and life might live life lost in life
 For ever and evermore? 26

To James McNeill Whistler Whistler was a noted painter and etcher (1834-1903). He was born in America, but lived most of his life in Chelsea, a district of London on the bank of the Thames, there he made a series of paintings and etchings of the river, done at twilight or at night, that show it at its loveliest.

FRESH FROM HIS FASTNESSES

Fresh from his fastnesses
 Wholesome and spacious,
 The North Wind, the mad huntsman,
 Halloas on his white hounds
 Over the gray, roaring 5
 Reaches and ridges,
 The forest of ocean,
 The chace of the world.

Hark to the peal
 Of the pack in full cry,
 As he thongs them before him,
 Swarming voluminous,
 Weltering, wide-wallowing,
 Till in a ruining
 Chaos of energy, 15
 Hurlled on their quarry,
 They crash into foam!

Old Indefatigable,
 Time's right-hand man, the sea
 Laughs as in joy 20
 From his millions of wrinkles,
 Laughs that his destiny,
 Great with the greatness
 Of triumphing order,
 Shows as a dwarf 25
 By the strength of his heart
 And the might of his hands

Master of masters,
 O maker of heroes,
 Thunder the brave, 30
 Irresistible message:
 "Life is worth Living
 Through every grain of it,
 From the foundations
 To the last edge 35
 Of the cornerstone, death "

(1892)

SPACE AND DREAD AND THE DARK

Space and dread and the dark —
 Over a livid stretch of sky
 Cloud-monsters crawling, like a funeral train
 Of huge, primeval presences
 Stooping beneath the weight 5
 Of some enormous, rudimentary grief;
 While in the haunting loneliness
 The far sea waits and wanders with a sound

Fresh from His Fastnesses 8 chace, hunting ground (obsolete form of chase)

As of the trailing skirts of Destiny,
Passing unseen 10
To some immitigable end
With her gray henchman, Death.

What larve, what specter is this Thrilling the wilderness to life
As with the bodily shape of Fear? 15
What but a desperate sense,
A strong foreboding of those dim
Interminable continents, forlorn
And many-silenced, in a dusk
Inviolable utterly, and dead 20
As the poor dead it huddles and swarms and styes
In hugger-mugger through eternity?

Life — life — let there be life!
Better a thousand times the roaring hours
When wave and wind, 25
Like the Arch-Murderer in flight
From the Avenger at his heel,
Storms through the desolate fastnesses
And wild waste places of the world!

Life — give me life until the end, 30
That at the very top of being,
The battle-spirit shouting in my blood,
Out of the reddest hell of the fight
I may be snatched and flung
Into the everlasting lull, 35
The immortal, incommunicable dream (1892)

ENGLAND, MY ENGLAND

What have I done for you,
England, my England?
What is there I would not do,
England, my own? 5
With your glorious eyes austere,
As the Lord were walking near,
Whispering terrible things and dear
As the Song on your bugles blown,
England —
Round the world on your bugles blown!

Where shall the watchful Sun, 10
England, my England,
Match the master-work you've done,
England, my own?
When shall he rejoice again
Such a breed of mighty men 15
As come forward, one to ten,
To the Song on your bugles blown,
England —
Down the years on your bugles blown?

Ever the faith endures,
England, my England — 20

Space and Dread and the Dark 13 larve, glost

"Take and break us; we are yours,
England, my own!
Life is good, and joy runs high
Between English earth and sky,
Death is death, but we shall die 25
To the Song on your bugles blown,
England —
To the stars on your bugles blown!"

They call you proud and hard,
England, my England,
You with worlds to watch and ward, 30
England, my own!
You whose mailed hand keeps the keys
Of such teeming destinies
You could know nor dread nor ease
Were the Song on your bugles blown,
England — 35
Round the Pit on your bugles blown!

Mother of Ships whose might,
England, my England,
Is the fierce old Sea's delight,
England, my own, 40
Chosen daughter of the Lord,
Spouse-in-Chief of the ancient Sword,
There's the menace of the Word
In the Song on your bugles blown,
England —
Out of heaven on your bugles blown! 45

ANDREW LANG (1844-1912)

TWILIGHT ON TWEED

Three crests against the saffron sky,
Beyond the purple plain,
The kind remembered melody
Of Tweed once more again.

Wan water from the border hills, 5
Dear voice from the old years,
Thy distant music lulls and stills,
And moves to quiet tears.

Like a loved ghost thy fabled flood
Fleets through the dusky land; 10
Where Scott, come home to die, has stood,
My feet returning stand.

A mist of memory broods and floats,
The border waters flow,

Twilight on Tweed The Tweed River flows through the border country of Scotland and England, and hence is associated with many stirring folk-ballads. Abbotsford, the home of Sir Walter Scott, was on the bank of the Tweed. In 1831 Scott was induced to cruise in the Mediterranean in order to regain his health, but when he felt himself dying, he insisted upon being taken home to Abbotsford.

¹ Three crests, three peaks near Abbotsford, the highest of these is Eildon Hill (line 21)

The air is full of ballad notes, 15
Borne out of long ago.

Old songs that sung themselves to me,
Sweet through a boy's day-dream,
While trout below the blossomed tree
Plashed in the golden stream. 20

Twilight, and Tweed, and Eildon Hill,
Fair and too fair you be,
You tell me that the voice is still
That should have welcomed me. (1872)

BALLADE OF BLUE CHINA

There's a joy without canker or cark,
There's a pleasure eternally new,
'Tis to gloat on the glaze and the mark
Of china that's ancient and blue,
Unchipped, all the centuries through 5
It has passed, since the chime of it rang,
And they fashioned it, figure and hue,
In the reign of the Emperor Hwang.

These dragons (their tails, you remark,
Into bunches of gillyflowers grew) — 10
When Noah came out of the ark,
Did these lie in wait for his crew?
They snorted, they snapped, and they slew,
They were mighty of fin and of fang,
And their portraits Celestials drew 15
In the reign of the Emperor Hwang.

Here's a pot with a cot in a park,
In a park where the peach-blossoms blew,
Where the lovers eloped in the dark,
Lived, died, and were changed into two 20
Bright birds that eternally flew
Through the boughs of the may, as they sang,
'Tis a tale was undoubtedly true
In the reign of the Emperor Hwang.

BALLADE OF HIS CHOICE OF A SEPULCHER

Here I'd come when weariest!
Here the breast
Of the Windberg's tufted over
Deep with bracken; here his crest
Takes the west, 5
Where the wide-winged hawk doth hover.

Silent here are lark and plover;
In the cover
Deep below, the cushat best Loves his mate, and croons above her 10
O'er their nest,
Where the wide-winged hawk doth hover.

Bring me here, life's tired-out guest,
To the blest
Bed that waits the weary rover — 15
Here should failure be confessed,
Ends my quest,
Where the wide-winged hawk doth hover!

ENVOY

Friend, or stranger kind, or lover,
Ah, fulfill a last behest, 20
Let me rest
Where the wide-winged hawk doth hover!

THE ODYSSEY

As one that for a weary space has lain
Lulled by the song of Circe and her wine
In gardens near the pale of Proserpine,
Where that Ææan isle forgets the main,
And only the low lutes of love complain, 5
And only shadows of wan lovers pine,
As such an one were glad to know the brine
Salt on his lips, and the large air again —
So gladly, from the songs of modern speech Men turn, and see the stars, and feel the
free 10
Shrill wind beyond the close of heavy flowers,
And, through the music of the languid hours.

SCYTHE SONG

Mowers, weary and brown, and blithe,
What is the word methinks ye know —
Endless over-word that the scythe
Sings to the blades of the grass below?
Scythes that swing in the grass and clover, 5
Something, still, they say as they pass,
What is the word that, over and over,
Sings the scythe to the flowers and grass?

Hush, ah hush, the scythes are saying,
Hush, and heed not, and fall asleep, 10
Hush, they say to the grasses swaying;
Hush, they sing to the clover deep!
Hush — 'tis the lullaby Time is singing —
Hush, and heed not, for all things pass;
Hush, ah hush! and the scythes are swinging 15
Over the clover, over the grass! (1888)

HERODOTUS IN EGYPT

He left the land of youth, he left the young,
The smiling gods of Greece, he passed the isle
Where Jason loitered, and where Sappho
sung,
He sought the secret-founted wave of Nile,
And of their old world, dead a weary while, 5
Heard the priests murmur in their mystic
tongue,
And through the fanes went voyaging, among Dark tribes that worshiped Cat and Crocodile.
He learned the tales of death Divine and
birth,
Strange loves of Hawk and Serpent, Sky and
Earth, 10
The marriage, and the slaying of the Sun.

Herodotus in Egypt Herodotus, Greek traveler and historian, visited Egypt approximately from 460 to 454 B.C., and in Book 2 of his History recorded his impressions of Egyptian customs and religion.

2-3 isle . . . sung Jason spent a considerable time on the island of Lemnos, in the Aegean sea, before proceeding on his quest of the Golden Fleece, Sappho (6th century B.C.), Greek lyric poet, lived on the island of Lesbos. 4 secret-founted . . . Nile The source of the Nile was unknown to the ancients, who imagined it to proceed from mysterious underground channels, see Herodotus, Book 2, Section 28. 8 Cat and Crocodile The cat, identified with the goddess Pasht, and the crocodile, identified with the water-god Sobk, were worshipped in Egyptian temples as sacred animals. See Herodotus, Book 2, Sections 67, 69. 9-11 tales . . . Sun, references to Egyptian myths. The death of the god Osiris from being locked in a chest and thrown into the sea, and the birth of the god Horus, are celebrated myths. Osiris, identified with the hawk, was the husband of Isis, identified with the serpent. From the marriage of Seb, the earth, and Nut, the sky, was born the race of Egyptian gods. According to one Egyptian legend, Osiris, the primal god of the sun, married Isis, goddess of the moon, he was later slain by his enemy, Set, but restored to life by Isis.

The shrines of gods and beasts he wandered
through,
And mocked not at their godhead, for he knew
Behind all creeds the Spirit that is One.

ON CALAIS SANDS

On Calais Sands the gray began,
Then rosy red above the gray;
The morn with many a scarlet van
Leaped, and the world was glad with May!
The little waves along the bay 5
Broke white upon the shelving strands,
The sea-mews flitted white as they
On Calais Sands!

On Calais Sands must man with man
Wash honor clean in blood today; 10
On spaces wet from waters wan
How white the flashing rapiers play —
Parry, riposte! and lunge! The fray
Shifts for a while, then mournful stands
The victor; life ebbs fast away 15
On Calais Sands!

On Calais Sands a little space
Of silence, then the splash and spray,
The sound of eager waves that ran
To kiss the perfumed locks astray, 20
To touch these lips that ne'er said "Nay,"
To dally with the helpless hands,
Till the deep sea in silence lay
On Calais Sands!

Between the lilac and the may 25
She waits her love from alien lands;
Her love is colder than the clay
On Calais Sands!

THREE PORTRAITS OF PRINCE CHARLES

1731

Lang describes actual portraits of the Prince. See Lang's Prince Charles Edward Stuart, the Young Chevalier, 1903.

Mirthful and tender and wild,
My heart is heavy for thee!

As an eagle poised to fly forth
To the old land loyal of truth,
To the hills and the sounds of the North
Fair face, daring and proud,
Lo! the shadow of doom, even now, 10
The fate of thy line, like a cloud,
Rests on the grace of thy brow!

1773

Cruel and angry face!
Hateful and heavy with wine,
Where are the gladness, the grace, 15
The beauty, the mirth that were thine?

Ah, my Prince, it were well —
Hadst thou to the gods been dear —
To have fallen where Keppoch fell,
With the war-pipe loud in thine ear! 20
To have died with never a stain
On the fair White Rose of renown,
To have fallen, fighting in vain,
For thy father, thy faith, and thy crown!
More than thy marble pile, 25
With its women weeping for thee,
Were to dream in thine ancient isle,
To the endless durge of the sea!
But the fates deemed otherwise,
Far thou sleepest from home, 30
From the tears of the northern skies,
In the secular dust of Rome.

Wearing on weary head 35

Little the Lucrine lake

Scarce did the memories wake
Of the far-off years and dim, 40
For he stood by Avernus' shore.
But he dreamed of a northern glen,
And he murmured, over and o'er,
"For Charlie and his men":
And his feet, to death that went, 45

EDMUND WILLIAM GOSSE (1849-1928)

LYING IN THE GRASS

TO THOMAS HARDY

Between two golden tufts of summer grass,
I see the world through hot air as through
glass,
And by my face sweet lights and colors pass.

Before me, dark against the fading sky,
I watch three mowers mowing, as I lie: 5
With brawny arms they sweep in harmony.

Brown English faces by the sun burnt red,
Rich glowing color on bare throat and head,
My heart would leap to watch them, were I
dead!

And in my strong young living as I lie, 10
I seem to move with them in harmony —
A fourth is mowing, and that fourth am I

The music of the scythes that glide and leap,
The young men whistling as their great arms sweep,
And all the perfume and sweet sense of sleep,

The weary butterflies that droop their
wings, 16
The dreamy nightingale that hardly sings,
And all the lassitude of happy things,

Is mingling with the warm and pulsing blood
That gushes through my veins a languid flood,
And feeds my spirit as the sap a bud. 21

Behind the mowers, on the amber air,
A dark-green beech-wood rises, still and fair,
A white path winding up it like a star.

And see that girl, with pitcher on her head, 25
And clean white apron on her gown of red —
Her even-song of love is but half-said,

She waits the youngest mower. Now he goes,
Her cheeks are redder than a wild blush-rose,
They climb up where the deepest shadows
close. 30

46 St Peter's shrine. The tomb of the Stuarts is in St Peter's Cathedral at Rome 47 latest minstrel, Scott, author of The Lay of the Last Minstrel.

But though they pass, and vanish, I am
there
I watch his rough hands meet beneath her
hair,
Their broken speech sounds sweet to me like prayer.

Ah! now the rosy children come to play,
And romp and struggle with the new-mown
hay;
Their clear high voices sound from far away

They know so little why the world is sad,
They dig themselves warm graves and yet are glad,
Their muffled screams and laughter make me mad!

I long to go and play among them there; 40
Unseen, like wind, to take them by the hair,
And gently make their rosy cheeks more fair

The happy children! full of frank surprise,
And sudden whims and innocent ecstasies,
What godhead sparkles from their liquid
eyes! 45

No wonder round those urns of mingled clays
That Tuscan potters fashioned in old days,
And colored like the torrid earth ablaze,

We find the little gods and loves portrayed,
Through ancient forests wandering undismayed, 50
And fluting hymns of pleasure unafraid.

They knew, as I do now, what keen delight
A strong man feels to watch the tender
flight
Of little children playing in his sight;

What pure sweet pleasure, and what sacred
love, 55
Come drifting down upon us from above,
In watching how their limbs and features
move.

I do not hunger for a well-stored mind;
I only wish to live my life, and find
My heart in unison with all mankind. 60

My life is like the single dewy star
That trembles on the horizon's primrose-bar—
A microcosm where all things living are.

Lying in the Grass 47 Tuscan potters, a reference to the glossy red Samian ware made in Arezzo, a town in Tuscany, during the first centuries of the Roman Empire, these urns were made of blended clay and were decorated with foliage and figures in slight relief. 49 little . . . loves, Cupids 63 microcosm, a world in miniature

And if, among the noiseless grasses, Death Should come behind and take away my
breath, 65
I should not rise as one who sorroweth,

For I should pass, but all the world would be Full of desire and young delight and glee,
And why should men be sad through loss of
me?

The light is flying; in the silver-blue 70
The young moon shines from her bright window through
The mowers are all gone, and I go too. (1873)

ON A LUTE FOUND IN A SARCOPHAGUS

What curled and scented sun-girls, almond-eyed,
With lotos-blossoms in their hands and hair,
Have made their swarthy lovers call them
fair,
With these spent strings, when brutes were deified,
And Memnon in the sunrise sprang and cried, 5
And love-winds smote Bubastis, and the bare
Black breasts of carven Pasht received the prayer
Of suppliants bearing gifts from far and wide!
This lute has out-sung Egypt; all the lives
Of violent passion, and the vast calm art 10
That lasts in granite only, all lie dead;
This little bird of song alone survives,
As fresh as when its fluting smote the heart
Last time the brown slave wore it garlanded
(1873)

 Birds are his choir.

IMPRESSION

In these restrained and careful times
 Our knowledge petrifies our rimes;
 Ah! for that reckless fire men had
 When it was witty to be mad,

When wild conceits were piled in scores, 5
 And lit by flaring metaphors,
 When all was crazed and out of tune —
 Yet throbbled with music of the moon.

If we could dare to write as ill
 As some whose voices haunt us still, 10
 Even we, perchance, might call our own
 Their deep enchanting undertone.

We are too diffident and nice,
 Too learned and too over-wise,
 Too much afraid of faults to be 15
 The flutes of bold sincerity.

For as this sweet life passes by,
 We blink and nod with critic eye;
 We've no words rude enough to give
 Its charm so frank and fugitive 20

The green and scarlet of the Park,
 The undulating streets at dark,
 The brown smoke blown across the blue,
 This colored city we walk through —

The pallid faces full of pain, 25
 The field-smell of the passing wain,
 The laughter, longing, perfume, strife,
 The daily spectacle of life —

ALICE CHRISTIANA MEYNELL (1850-1922)

SONG OF THE NIGHT AT DAYBREAK

All my stars forsake me,
 And the dawn-winds shake me;
 Where shall I betake me?

Whither shall I run
 Till the set of the sun, 5
 Till the day be done?

To the mountain-mine,
 To the boughs o' the pine,
 To the blind man's eyne,

To a brow that is 10
 Bowed upon the knees,
 Sick with memories. (1875)

A SONG OF DERIVATIONS

I come from nothing; but from where
 Come the undying thoughts I bear?
 Down, through long links of death and
 birth,
 From the past poets of the earth,
 My immortality is there. 5

I am like the blossom of an hour.
 But long, long vanished sun and shower
 Awoke my breath i' the young world's air;
 I track the past back everywhere
 Through seed and flower and seed and flower.

Or I am like a stream that flows 11
 Full of the cold springs that arose
 In morning lands, in distant hills;
 And down the plain my channel fills
 With melting of forgotten snows. 15

Voices I have not heard possessed
 My own fresh songs; my thoughts are blessed
 With relics of the far unknown,
 And mixed with memories not my own
 The sweet streams throng into my breast. 20

Before this life began to be,
 The happy songs that wake in me

AFTER A PARTING

Farewell has long been said, I have foregone
thee,
I never name thee even.
But how shall I learn virtues and yet shun
thee?
For thou art so near heaven
That heavenward meditations pause upon
thee. 5

Thou dost beset the path to every shrine,
My trembling thoughts discern
Thy goodness in the good for which I pine,
And, if I turn from but one sin, I turn
Unto a smile of thine. 10

How shall I thrust thee apart
Since all my growth tends to thee night
and day —
To thee faith, hope, and art? 13
Swift are the currents setting all one
way;
They draw my life, my life, out of my heart
(1877; 1890)

RENOUNCEMENT

I must not think of thee; and, tired yet
strong,
I shun the thought that lurks in all delight —
The thought of thee — and in the blue heaven's height,
And in the sweetest passage of a song.
Oh, just beyond the fairest thoughts that
throng 5
This breast, the thought of thee waits, hidden yet bright;
But it must never, never come in sight,
I must stop short of thee the whole day
long.
But when sleep comes to close each difficult
day,
When night gives pause to the long watch I
keep, 10
And all my bonds I needs must loose apart,
Must doff my will as raiment laid away —
With the first dream that comes with the first sleep
I run, I run, I am gathered to thy heart.
(1877; 1893)

After a Parting This lyric, like Renouncement, was written to the young Catholic priest who had first encouraged her writing and who had received her into the Catholic Church.

THE SHEPHERDESS

She walks — the lady of my delight —
A shepherdess of sheep.
Her flocks are thoughts. She keeps them
white;
She guards them from the steep;
She feeds them on the fragrant height, 5
And folds them in for sleep.

She roams maternal hills and bright,
Dark valleys safe and deep.
Into that tender breast at night
The chastest stars may peep. 10
She walks — the lady of my delight —
A shepherdess of sheep.

She holds her little thoughts in sight,
Though gay they run and leap.
She is so circumspect and right; 15
She has her soul to keep.
She walks — the lady of my delight —
A shepherdess of sheep. (1894)

THE LADY POVERTY

The Lady Poverty was fair;
But she has lost her looks of late,
With change of times and change of air.
Ah, slattern! she neglects her hair,
Her gown, her shoes; she keeps no state 5
As once when her pure feet were bare.

Or — almost worse, if worse can be —
She scolds in parlors, dusts and trims, Watches and counts. Oh, is this she Whom Francis met, whose step was free, 10
Who with obedience caroled hymns,
In Umbria walked with Chastity?

Where is her ladyhood? Not here,
Not among modern kinds of men;
But in the stony fields, where clear 15
Through the thin trees, the skies appear,
In delicate spare soil and fen,
And slender landscape and austere. (1894)

"I AM THE WAY"

Thou art the Way.
Hadst Thou been nothing but the goal,
I cannot say
If Thou hadst ever met my soul

The Lady Poverty 9-12 Oh . . . Chastity. St Francis (1182-1226), identified with the town of Assisi, in Umbria, Italy, vowed himself to chastity, obedience, and poverty, and founded the great Franciscan order of friars
"I Am the Way" The title is quoted from John, 14 6 —
"Jesus saith unto him, I am the way, and the truth, and the life no one cometh unto the Father, but by me"

I cannot see — 5
 I, child of process — if there lies
 An end for me,
 Full of repose, full of replies.

I'll not reproach
 The road that winds, my feet that err. 10
 Access, Approach
 Art Thou, Time, Way, and Wayfarer. (1896)

ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON (1850-1894)

TO ALISON CUNNINGHAM

FROM HER BOY

For the long nights you lay awake
 And watched for my unworthy sake;
 For your most comfortable hand
 That led me through the uneven land;
 For all the story-books you read; 5
 For all the pains you comforted;
 For all you pitied, all you bore,
 In sad and happy days of yore;
 My second Mother, my first Wife,
 The angel of my infant life — 10
 From the sick child, now well and old,
 Take, nurse, the little book you hold!

And grant it, Heaven, that all who read
 May find as dear a nurse at need,
 And every child who lists my rime, 15
 In the bright, fireside, nursery clime,
 May hear it in as kind a voice
 As made my childish days rejoice! (1885)

BED IN SUMMER

In winter I get up at night
 And dress by yellow candle-light.
 In summer, quite the other way,
 I have to go to bed by day.

I have to go to bed and see 5
 The birds still hopping on the tree,
 Or hear the grown-up people's feet
 Still going past me in the street.

And does it not seem hard to you,
 When all the sky is clear and blue, 10
 And I should like so much to play,
 To have to go to bed by day? (1885)

6 Of process, in the meshes of life—queer, changing, ordered, yet apparently meaningless
 To Alison Cunningham. This is the dedicatory poem to A Child's Garden of Verses, from which the following lyrics through The Little Land (page 805) are taken, Alison Cunningham, or "Cummy," had been Stevenson's nurse during his sickly childhood

WHOLE DUTY OF CHILDREN

A child should always say what's true
 And speak when he is spoken to,
 And behave mannerly at table —
 At least as far as he is able. (1885)

PIRATE STORY

Three of us afloat in the meadow by the swing,
 Three of us aboard in the basket on the lea Winds are in the air, they are blowing in the
 spring,
 And waves are on the meadow like the waves that are at sea

Where shall we adventure, today that we're afloat, 5
 Wary of the weather and steering by a star?

Shall it be to Africa, a-steering of the boat,
 To Providence, or Babylon, or off to Malabar? 5

Hi! but here's a squadron a-rowing on the
 sea —

Cattle on the meadow a-charging with a roar! 10

Quick, and we'll escape them, they're as mad
 as they can be,
 The wicket is the harbor, and the garden is the shore. (1885)

FOREIGN LANDS

Up into the cherry tree
 Who should climb but little me?
 I held the trunk with both my hands
 And looked abroad on foreign lands.

I saw the next door garden lie, 5
 Adorned with flowers, before my eye,
 And many pleasant places more
 That I had never seen before.

I saw the dimpling river pass 5
 And be the sky's blue looking-glass;
 The dusty roads go up and down
 With people tramping into town 10

If I could find a higher tree
 Farther and farther I should see,
 To where the grown-up river slips
 Into the sea among the ships, 15

To where the roads on either hand
 Lead onward into fairyland,

TRAVEL

I should like to rise and go
Where the golden apples grow; —
Where below another sky
Parrot islands anchored lie,
And, watched by cockatoos and goats, 5
Lonely Crusoes building boats, —
Where in sunshine reaching out
Eastern cities, miles about,
Are with mosque and minaret
Among sandy gardens set, 10
And the rich goods from near and far
Hang for sale in the bazaar; —
Where the Great Wall round China goes,
And on one side the desert blows,
And with bell and voice and drum, 15
Cities on the other hum; —
Where are forests, hot as fire,
Wide as England, tall as a spire,
Full of apes and cocoanuts
And the negro hunters' huts; — 20
Where the knotty crocodile
Lies and blinks in the Nile,
And the red flamingo flies
Hunting fish before his eyes; —
Where in jungles, near and far, 25
Man-devouring tigers are,
Lying close and giving ear,
Lest the hunt be drawing near,
Or a comer-by be seen
Swinging in a palanquin; — 30
Where among the desert sands
Some deserted city stands,
All its children, sweep and prince,
Grown to manhood ages since,
Not a foot in street or house, 35
Not a stir of child or mouse,
And when kindly falls the night,
In all the town no spark of light.
There I'll come when I'm a man
With a camel caravan; 40
Light a fire in the gloom
Of some dusty dining-room;
See the pictures on the walls,
Heroes, fights and festivals;
And in a corner find the toys 45
Of the old Egyptian boys. (1885)

LOOKING FORWARD

When I am grown to man's estate
I shall be very proud and great,
And tell the other girls and boys
Not to meddle with my toys (1885)

AUNTIE'S SKIRTS

Whenever Auntie moves around,
Her dresses make a curious sound;
They trail behind her up the floor,
And trundle after through the door. (1885)

THE LAND OF COUNTERPANE

When I was sick and lay a-bed,
I had two pillows at my head,
And all my toys beside me lay
To keep me happy all the day.

And sometimes for an hour or so 5
I watched my leaden soldiers go,
With different uniforms and drills,
Among the bedclothes, through the hills, 20

And sometimes sent my ships in fleets 10
All up and down among the sheets;
Or brought my trees and houses out,
And planted cities all about. 25

I was the giant great and still
That sits upon the pillow-hill,
And sees before him, dale and plain, 15
The pleasant Land of Counterpane. (1885)

THE LAND OF NOD

From breakfast on through all the day
At home among my friends I stay,
But every night I go abroad
Far into the Land of Nod.

All by myself I have to go, 5
With none to tell me what to do —
All alone beside the streams
And up the mountain-sides of dreams.

The strangest things are there for me, 10
Both things to eat and things to see,
And many frightening sights abroad
Till morning in the Land of Nod.

Try as I like to find the way,
I never can get back by day,
Nor can remember plain and clear 15
The curious music that I hear. (1885)

MY SHADOW

I have a little shadow that goes in and out
with me,
And what can be the use of him is more than
I can see.
He is very, very like me from the heels up to the head;
And I see him jump before me, when I jump into my bed.

The funniest thing about him is the way he likes to grow — 5
Not at all like proper children, which is always very slow;
For he sometimes shoots up taller like an india-rubber ball,
And he sometimes gets so little that there's none of him at all

He hasn't got a notion of how children ought to play,
And can only make a fool of me in every sort of way. 10
He stands so close beside me, he's a coward
you can see;
I'd think shame to stick to nurse as that shadow sticks to me!

One morning, very early, before the sun was
up,
I rose and found the shining dew on every buttercup;
But my lazy little shadow, like an arrant
sleepy-head, 15
Had stayed at home behind me and was fast asleep in bed.

(1885)

SYSTEM

Every night my prayers I say,
And get my dinner every day;
And every day that I've been good,
I get an orange after food.

The child that is not plain and neat, 5
With lots of toys and things to eat,
He is a naughty child, I'm sure —
Or else his dear papa is poor.

ESCAPE AT BEDTIME

The lights from the parlor and kitchen shone
out
Through the blinds and the windows and
bars,
And high overhead and all moving about,
There were thousands of millions of stars.
There ne'er were such thousands of leaves on a tree, 5
Nor of people in church or the Park,

As the crowds of the stars that looked down upon me,
And that glittered and winked in the dark.

The Dog, and the Plow, and the Hunter, and
all,
And the star of the sailor, and Mars, 10
These shone in the sky, and the pail by the wall
Would be half full of water and stars.
They saw me at last, and they chased me
with cries,
And they soon had me packed into bed;
But the glory kept shining and bright in my
eyes, 15
And the stars going round in my head.

THE COW

The friendly cow all red and white,
I love with all my heart —
She gives me cream with all her might,
To eat with apple-tart.

She wanders lowing here and there, 5
And yet she cannot stray,
All in the pleasant open air,
The pleasant light of day;

And blown by all the winds that pass
And wet with all the showers, 10
She walks among the meadow grass
And eats the meadow flowers. (1885)

HAPPY THOUGHT

The world is so full of a number of things,
I'm sure we should all be as happy as kings.
(1885)

THE WIND

I saw you toss the kites on high
And blow the birds about the sky;
And all around I heard you pass,
Like ladies' skirts across the grass —
O wind, a-blowing all day long, 5
O wind, that sings so loud a song!

I saw the different things you did,
But always you yourself you hid.
I felt you push, I heard you call,
I could not see yourself at all — 10
O wind, a-blowing all day long,
O wind, that sings so loud a song!

O you that are so strong and cold,
O blower, are you young or old?

9 Dog, Plow, Hunter, names of familiar constellations
10 star of the sailor, the North Star

Are you a beast of field and tree, 15
Or just a stronger child than me?
O wind, a-blowing all day long,
O wind, that sings so loud a song! (1885)

GOOD AND BAD CHILDREN

Children, you are very little,
And your bones are very brittle;
If you would grow great and stately,
You must try to walk sedately.

You must still be bright and quiet, 5
And content with simple diet;
And remain, through all bewild'ring,
Innocent and honest children.

Happy hearts and happy faces, 10
Happy play in grassy places —
That was how, in ancient ages,
Children grew to kings and sages.

But the unkind and the unruly, 15
And the sort who eat unduly,
They must never hope for glory —
Theirs is quite a different story!

Cruel children, crying babies,
All grow up as geese and gabies,
Hated, as their age increases,
By their nephews and their nieces. (1885)

THE LAMPLIGHTER

My tea is nearly ready, and the sun has left
the sky;
It's time to take the window to see Leerie going by;
For every night at teatime and before you take your seat,
With lantern and with ladder he comes posting up the street.

Now Tom would be a driver and Maria go 5
to sea,
And my papa's a banker and as rich as he can be;
But I, when I am stronger and can choose what I'm to do,
O Leerie, I'll go round at night and light the lamps with you!

For we are very lucky, with a lamp before
the door,
And Leerie stops to light it as he lights so many more; 10
And O! before you hurry by with ladder and
with light,
O Leerie, see a little child and nod to him
tonight! (1885)

Good and Bad Children 18 gabies, dunces

TIME TO RISE

A birdie with a yellow bill
Hopped upon the window-sill, Cocked his shining eye and said:
"Ain't you 'shamed, you sleepy-head!" (1885)

THE LAND OF STORY-BOOKS

At evening when the lamp is lit,
Around the fire my parents sit,
They sit at home and talk and sing,
And do not play at anything.

Now, with my little gun, I crawl 5
All in the dark along the wall,
And follow round the forest track
Away behind the sofa back.

There, in the night, where none can spy, 10
All in my hunter's camp I lie,
And play at books that I have read
Till it is time to go to bed.

These are the hills, these are the woods, 15
These are my starry solitudes,
And there the river by whose brink
The roaring lions come to drink.

I see the others far away
As if in firelit camp they lay,
And I, like to an Indian scout,
Around their party prowled about. 20

So, when my nurse comes in for me,
Home I return across the sea,
And go to bed with backward looks
At my dear Land of Story-books. (1885)

THE LITTLE LAND

When at home alone I sit
And am very tired of it,
I have just to shut my eyes
To go sailing through the skies — 5
To go sailing far away
To the pleasant Land of Play;
To the fairy land afar
Where the Little People are;
Where the clover-tops are trees,
And the rain-pools are the seas, 10
And the leaves like little ships
Sail about on tiny trips;
And above the daisy tree
Through the grasses,
High o'erhead the Bumble Bee 15
Hums and passes.

In that forest to and fro
I can wander, I can go;
See the spider and the fly,

And the ants go marching by 20
 Carrying parcels with their feet
 Down the green and grassy street.
 I can in the sorrel sit
 Where the ladybird alit
 I can climb the jointed grass; 25
 And on high
 See the greater swallows pass
 In the sky,
 And the round sun rolling by Heeding no such things as I. 30

Through the forest I can pass
 Till, as in a looking-glass,
 Humming fly and daisy tree
 And my tiny self I see,
 Painted very clear and neat 35
 On the rain-pool at my feet.
 Should a leaflet come to land
 Drifting near to where I stand,
 Straight I'll board that tiny boat
 Round the rain-pool sea to float. 40

Little thoughtful creatures sit
 On the grassy coasts of it;
 Little things with lovely eyes
 See me sailing with surprise.
 Some are clad in armor green 45
 (These have sure to battle been!);
 Some are pied with ev'ry hue,
 Black and crimson, gold and blue;
 Some have wings and swift are gone; —
 But they all look kindly on 50
 When my eyes I once again
 Open, and see all things plain.
 High bare walls, great bare floor;
 Great big knobs on drawer and door;
 Great big people perched on chairs,
 Stitching tucks and mending tears,
 Each a hill that I could climb,
 And talking nonsense all the time —
 O dear me,
 That I could be 60
 A sailor on the rain-pool sea,
 A climber in the clover tree,
 And just come back, a sleepy-head,
 Late at night to go to bed. (1885)

A SONG OF THE ROAD

The gauger walked with willing foot,
 And aye the gauger played the flute;
 And what would Master Gauger play
 But Over the hills and far away?

Whene'er I buckle on my pack 5
 And foot it gayly in the track,

O pleasant gauger, long since dead,
 I hear you fluting on ahead.

You go with me the selfsame way —
 The selfsame air for me you play; 10
 For I do think and so do you
 It is the tune to travel to.

For who would gravely set his face
 To go to this or t'other place?
 There's nothing under heav'n so blue 15
 That's fairly worth the traveling to.

On every hand the roads begin,
 And people walk with zeal therein,
 But wheresoe'er the highways tend, 20
 Be sure there's nothing at the end.

Then follow you wherever hie
 The traveling mountains of the sky,
 Or let the streams of civil mode
 Direct your choice upon the road; 40

For one and all, or high or low, 25
 Will lead you where you wish to go,
 And one and all go night and day
Over the hills and far away! (1887)

THE HOUSE BEAUTIFUL

*A naked house, a naked moor,
 A shivering pool before the door,
 A garden bare of flowers and fruit
 And poplars at the garden foot;
 Such is the place that I live in,
 Bleak without and bare within* 5

Yet shall your ragged moor receive
 The incomparable pomp of eve,
 And the cold glories of the dawn
 Behind your shivering trees be drawn, 10
 And when the wind from place to place
 Doth the unmoored cloud-galleons chase,
 Your garden gloom and gleam again,
 With leaping sun, with glancing rain
 Here shall the wizard moon ascend 15
 The heavens, in the crimson end
 Of day's declining splendor; here
 The army of the stars appear.
 The neighbor hollows dry or wet,
 Spring shall with tender flowers beset, 20
 And oft the morning muser see
 Larks rising from the broomy lea,
 And every fairy wheel and thread
 Of cobweb dew-bediamonded.
 When daisies go, shall winter time 25
 Silver the simple grass with rime;

A Song of the Road 1 gauger, a revenue officer who measures the contents of casks 4 Over . . . away, the refrain of a popular 17th century song It is found in Farquhar's The Recruiting Officer, in Gay's The Beggars' Opera, and elsewhere Cf. Henley's Where Forlorn Sunsets, p. 793

The House Beautiful The title was suggested by the way-side palace in Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress 22 broomy lea, a field covered with broom, a shrub with stiff green branches

Autumnal frosts enchant the pool
 And make the cart-ruts beautiful,
 And when snow-bright the moor expands,
 How shall your children clap their hands! 30
 To make this earth our hermitage,
 A cheerful and a changeful page,
 God's bright and intricate device
 Of days and seasons doth suffice. (1887)

TO ANDREW LANG

Dear Andrew, with the brindled hair,
 Who glory to have thrown in air,
 High over arm, the trembling reed,
 By Ale and Kail, by Till and Tweed —
 An equal craft of hand you show 5
 The pen to guide, the fly to throw.
 I count you happy-starred; for God,
 When He with inkpot and with rod
 Endowed you, bade your fortune lead
 Forever by the crooks of Tweed, 10
 Forever by the woods of song
 And lands that to the Muse belong;
 Or if in peopled streets, or in
 The abhorred pedantic sanhedrin,
 It should be yours to wander, still 15
 Airs of the morn, airs of the hill,
 The plovery forest and the seas
 That break about the Hebrides,
 Should follow over field and plain
 And find you at the window-pane; 20
 And you again see hill and peel,
 And the bright springs gush at your heel.
 So went the fiat forth, and so
 Garrulous like a brook you go,
 With sound of happy mirth and sheen 25
 Of daylight — whether by the green
 You fare that moment, or the gray;
 Whether you dwell in March or May;
 Or whether treat of reels and rods
 Or of the old unhappy gods — 30
 Still like a brook your page has shone,
 And your ink sings of Helicon. (1887)

THE CELESTIAL SURGEON

If I have faltered more or less
 In my great task of happiness;
 If I have moved among my race
 And shown no glorious morning face;
 If beams from happy human eyes 5
 Have moved me not; if morning skies,
 Books, and my food, and summer rain
 Knocked on my sullen heart in vain —
 Lord, thy most pointed pleasure take
 And stab my spirit broad awake; 10
 Or, Lord, if too obdurate I,
 Choose thou, before that spirit die,
 A piercing pain, a killing sin,
 And to my dead heart run them in! (1887)

IN THE STATES

With half a heart I wander here
 As from an age gone by,
 A brother — yet though young in years,
 An elder brother, I.
 You speak another tongue than mine, 5
 Though both were English born.
 I toward the night of time decline,
 You mount into the morn.
 Youth shall grow great and strong and free,
 But age must still decay; 10
 Tomorrow for the States — for me,
 England and Yesterday. (1887)

CHRISTMAS AT SEA

The sheets were frozen hard, and they cut the naked hand;

The decks were like a slide, where a seaman scarce could stand;

The wind was a nor'-wester, blowing squally off the sea;

And cliffs and spouting breakers were the only things a-lee.

They heard the surf a-roaring before the break of day; 5

But 'twas only with the peep of light we saw how ill we lay.

We tumbled every hand on deck instanter, with a shout,

And we gave her the maintops'l, and stood by to go about.

All day we tacked and tacked between the South Head and the North;

All day we hauled the frozen sheets, and got no further forth; 10

7 claes, clothes 14. Gin, if. kye, cows 15 pree, taste

Christmas at Sea This poem is not autobiographical, although it is connected with many lighthouse-inspection trips which Stevenson made with his father

All day as cold as charity, in bitter pain and dread,

For very life and nature we tacked from head to head.

We gave the South a wider berth, for there the tide-race roared,

But every tack we made we brought the North Head close aboard.

So's we saw the cliff and houses and the breakers running high, 15

And the coastguard in his garden, with his glass against his eye.

The frost was on the village roofs as white as ocean foam;

The good red fires were burning bright in every longshore home;

The windows sparkled clear, and the chimneys volleyed out;

And I vow we sniffed the victuals as the vessel went about 20

The bells upon the church were rung with a mighty jovial cheer;

For it's just that I should tell you how (of all days in the year)

This day of our adversity was blessed Christmas morn,

And the house above the coastguard's was the house where I was born

O well I saw the pleasant room, the pleasant faces there, 25

My mother's silver spectacles, my father's silver hair;

And well I saw the firelight, like a flight of homely elves,

Go dancing round the china plates that stand upon the shelves.

And well I knew the talk they had, the talk that was of me,

Of the shadow on the household and the son that went to sea; 30

And O the wicked fool I seemed, in every kind of way,

To be here and hauling frozen ropes on blessed Christmas Day.

They lit the high sea-light, and the dark began to fall.

"All hands to loose topgallant sails," I heard the captain call.

"By the Lord, she'll never stand it," our first mate, Jackson, cried. 35

... "It's the one way or the other, Mr. Jackson," he replied.

She staggered to her bearings, but the sails were new and good,

And the ship smelt up to windward just as though she understood;
As the winter's day was ending, in the entry
of the night,
We cleared the weary headland, and passed below the light 40

And they heaved a mighty breath, every soul
on board but me,
As they saw her nose again pointing handsome out to sea;
But all that I could think of, in the darkness
and the cold,
Was just that I was leaving home and my folks were growing old. (1888)

I WILL MAKE YOU BROOCHES

I will make you brooches and toys for your
delight
Of bird-song at morning and star-shine at
night.
I will make a palace fit for you and me
Of green days in forests and blue days at sea.

I will make my kitchen, and you shall keep your room, 5
Where white flows the river and bright blows
the broom,
And you shall wash your linen and keep your body white
In rainfall at morning and dewfall at night

And this shall be for music when no one else is near,
The fine song for singing, the rare song to
hear! 10
That only I remember, that only you admire,
Of the broad road that stretches and the roadside fire. (1895)

BRIGHT IS THE RING OF WORDS

Bright is the ring of words
When the right man rings them,
Fair the fall of songs
When the singer sings them.
Still they are caroled and said — 5
On wings they are carried —
After the singer is dead
And the maker buried.

Low as the singer lies
In the field of heather, 10
Songs of his fashion bring
The swains together.
And when the west is red

With the sunset embers,
The lover lingers and sings,
And the maid remembers. (1895)

SING ME A SONG

Sing me a song of a lad that is gone,
Say, could that lad be I?
Merry of soul he sailed on a day
Over the sea to Skye.

Mull was astern, Rum on the port, 5
Egg on the starboard bow;
Glory of youth glowed in his soul —
Where is that glory now?

Sing me a song of a lad that is gone,
Say, could that lad be I? 10
Merry of soul he sailed on a day
Over the sea to Skye.

Give me again all that was there,
Give me the sun that shone!
Give me the eyes, give me the soul, 15
Give me the lad that's gone!

Sing me a song of a lad that is gone,
Say, could that lad be I?
Merry of soul he sailed on a day
Over the sea to Skye. 20

Billow and breeze, islands and seas,
Mountains of rain and sun,
All that was good, all that was fair,
All that was me is gone. (1895)

EVENSONG

The embers of the day are red
Beyond the murky hill
The kitchen smokes; the bed
In the darkling house is spread.
The great sky darkens overhead, 5
And the great woods are shrill.
So far have I been led,
Lord, by thy will;
So far I have followed, Lord, and wondered
still.
The breeze from the embalméd land 10
Blows sudden toward the shore,
And claps my cottage door.
I hear the signal, Lord — I understand.
The night at thy command Comes. I will eat and sleep and will not question more. (1895)

Sing Me a Song 4-6 Skye . . . Egg, islands on the western coast of Scotland. The route from Mull to Skye is due north and passes, at the half-way point, between Rum on the left and Egg (or Eigg) on the right, the distance is about forty miles. OF LORD B.

A GRIEVANCE

Dear Mr Editor. I wish to say —

If you will not be angry at my writing it —
But I've been used, since childhood's happy
day,

When I have thought of something, to inditing it —

I seldom think of things, and, by the way, 5

Although this meter may not be exciting, it Enables one to be extremely terse,
Which is not what one always is in verse

I used to know a man — such things befall
The observant wayfarer through Fate's domain. 10

He was a man, take him for all in all,

We shall not look upon his like again —

I know that statement's not original,
What statement is, since Shakspeare? or,
since Cain,

What murder? I believe 'twas Shakspeare said it, or 15

Perhaps it may have been your Fighting
Editor.

Though why an Editor should fight, or why

A Fighter should abase himself to edit,
Are problems far too difficult and high

For me to solve with any sort of credit, 20

Some greatly more accomplished man than I Must tackle them. Let's say then Shakspeare said it,

And, if he did not, Lewis Morris may (Or even if he did). Some other day,

When I have nothing pressing to impart, 25

I should not mind dilating on this matter,
I feel its import both in head and heart,

And always did — especially the latter.

I could discuss it in the busy mart

Or on the lonely housetop; hold! this chatter 30

Diverts me from my purpose. To the point.
The time, as Hamlet said, is out of joint,

And I perhaps was born to set it right,

A fact I greet with perfect equanimity.

Of Lord B This is a satiric parody of Lord Byron's di-gressive, consciously careless style in Beppo and Don Juan 11-12 He was a man, etc Said by Hamlet of his father—Hamlet, I, 2, 187-188 23 Lewis Morris, Welch poet (1833-1907), author of The Song of Two Worlds and The Epic of Hodes 32-33 The time . . . right. From Hamlet, I, 5, 188-189 —

The time is out of joint O curséd spite,
That ever I was born to set it right!"

I do not put it down to "curséd spite" — 35
I don't see any cause for cursing in it;
I

Have always taken very great delight

In such pursuits since first I read divinity —

Whoever will may write a nation's songs

As long as I'm allowed to right its wrongs 40

What's Eton but a nursery of wrong-right-
ers,

A mighty mother of effective men,

A training-ground for amateur reciters,

A sharpener of the sword as of the pen,

A factory of orators and fighters, 45

A forcing-house of genius? Now and then,
The world at large shrinks back, abashed and beaten,

Unable to endure the glare of Eton

I think I said I knew a man, what then?

I don't suppose such knowledge is forbid, 50

We nearly all do, more or less, know men —

Or think we do; nor will a man get rid

Of that delusion, while he wields a pen

But who this man was, what, if aught, he did,

Nor why I mentioned him, I do not know, 55

Nor what I "wished to say" a while ago (1889)

TO R. K.

Will there never come a season

Which shall rid us from the curse

Of a prose which knows no reason

And an unmelodious verse;

When the world shall cease to wonder 5

At the genius of an ass,

And a boy's eccentric blunder

Shall not bring success to pass;

When mankind shall be delivered

From the clash of magazines, 10

And the inkstand shall be shivered

Into countless smithereens;

When there stands a muzzled stripling,

Mute, beside a muzzled bore;

When the Rudyards cease from kipling 15

And the Haggards ride no more.

(1891)

39-40 Whoever . . . wrongs Cf Andrew Fletcher, Letter to the Marquis of Montrose, 1703 "I knew a very wise man that believed that if a man were permitted to make all the ballads, he need not care who should make the laws of the nation" 41 Eton, an English "public school," somewhat like an American preparatory school, near Windsor on the Thames, it has a multitude of famous men among its graduates

as She and King Solomon's Mines

A SONNET

Two voices are there: one is of the deep,
 It learns the storm-cloud's thunderous melody,
 Now roars, now murmurs with the changing sea,
 Now bird-like pipes, now closes soft in sleep,
 And one is of an old half-witted sheep 5
 Which bleats articulate monotony,
 And indicates that two and one are three,
 That grass is green, lakes damp, and mountains steep:
 And, Wordsworth, both are thine, at certain times,
 Forth from the heart of thy melodious rimes
 The form and pressure of high thoughts will burst; 11
 At other times — good Lord! I'd rather be Quite unacquainted with the A. B. C.
 Than write such hopeless rubbish as thy worst.

OSCAR WILDE (1856-1900)

IMPRESSIONS

I. LES SILHOUETTES

The sea is flecked with bars of gray,
 The dull dead wind is out of tune,
 And like a withered leaf the moon
 Is blown across the stormy bay.
 Etched clear upon the pallid sand 5
 Lies the black boat; a sailor boy
 Clambers aboard in careless joy
 With laughing face and gleaming hand.
 And overhead the curlews cry,
 Where through the dusky upland grass 10
 The young brown-throated reapers pass,
 Like silhouettes against the sky. (1877)

2. LA FUITE DE LA LUNE

To outer senses there is peace,
 A dreamy peace on either hand,
 Deep silence in the shadowy land,
 Deep silence where the shadows cease —

Save for a cry that echoes shrill 5
 From some lone bird disconsolate,

A Sonnet This sonnet sparkles with recollections from Wordsworth. See especially his sonnets beginning "Two Voices are there — one is of the sea," and "A flock of sheep that leisurely pass by." With lines 11-12, compare The World Is Too Much with Us, lines 9-10 —

"Great God! I'd rather be A Pagan suckled in a creed outworn"

Impressions Les Silhouettes means The Silhouettes La Fuite de la Lune means The Flight of the Moon

A corncrake calling to its mate;
 The answer from the misty hill.

And suddenly the moon withdraws
 Her sickle from the lightening skies, 10
 And to her somber cavern flies,
 Wrapped in a veil of yellow gauze.

(1877)

THE GRAVE OF KEATS

Rid of the world's injustice, and his pain,
 He rests at last beneath God's veil of blue,
 Taken from life when life and love were new
 The youngest of the martyrs here is lain,
 Fair as Sebastian, and as early slain 5
 No cypress shades his grave, no funeral yew
 But gentle violets weeping with the dew
 Weave on his bones an ever-blossoming chain
 O proudest heart that broke for misery!
 O sweetest lips since those of Mitylene! 10
 O poet-painter of our English Land!
 Thy name was writ in water — it shall stand,
 And tears like mine will keep thy memory
 green,
 As Isabella did her Basil-tree (1877)

HÉLAS!

To drift with every passion till my soul
 Is a stringed lute on which all winds can play,
 Is it for this that I have given away
 Mine ancient wisdom and austere control?
 Methinks my life is a twice-written scroll 5
 Scrawled over on some boyish holiday
 With idle songs for pipe and vielay,
 Which do but mar the secret of the whole
 Surely there was a time I might have trod
 The sunlit heights, and from life's dissonance
 Struck one clear chord to reach the ears of God. 11
 Is that time dead? lo! with a little rod
 I did but touch the honey of romance —
 And must I lose a soul's inheritance? (1881)

The Grave of Keats Keats, like Shelley, is buried in the lovely English Cemetery at Rome

Hélas! The title means Alas!

REQUIESCAT

Tread lightly, she is near
Under the snow;
Speak gently, she can hear
The daisies grow.

All her bright golden hair
Tarnished with rust,
She that was young and fair
Fallen to dust.

Lily-like, white as snow,
She hardly knew
She was a woman, so
Sweetly she grew.

Coffin-board, heavy stone,
Lie on her breast;
I vex my heart alone,
She is at rest.

Peace, Peace, she cannot hear
Lyre or sonnet,
All my life's buried here,
Heap earth upon it. (1881)

IMPRESSION: LE RÉVEILLON

The sky is laced with fitful red;
The circling mists and shadows flee;
The dawn is rising from the sea,
Like a white lady from her bed.

And jagged brazen arrows fall
Athwart the feathers of the night,
And a long wave of yellow light
Breaks silently on tower and hall,

And spreading wide across the wold
Wakes into flight some fluttering bird,
And all the chestnut tops are stirred,
And all the branches streaked with gold (1881)

APOLOGIA

Is it thy will that I should wax and wane,
Barter my cloth of gold for hodden gray,
And at thy pleasure weave the web of pain
Whose brightest threads are each a wasted
day?

Is it thy will — Love that I love so well —
That my Soul's House should be a tortured spot

Requiescat The title means Let Her Rest Impression: Le Réveillon Le Réveillon is a term used in painting to designate a strong light-effect against a somber background.

Apologia The title means Apology—a self-justification, as in Newman's Apologia pro Vita Sua, Wilde's most complete apologia is his De Profundis

Wherein, like evil paramours, must dwell
The quenchless flame, the worm that dieth
not?

Nay, if it be thy will, I shall endure,
And sell ambition at the common mart, 10
And let dull failure be my vestiture,
And sorrow dig its grave within my heart.

Perchance it may be better so — at least
I have not made my heart a heart of stone,
Nor starved my boyhood of its goodly feast,
Nor walked where Beauty is a thing unknown. 16

Many a man hath done so; sought to fence
In straitened bonds the soul that should be
free,
Trodden the dusty road of common sense,
While all the forest sang of liberty, 20

Not marking how the spotted hawk in flight
Passed on wide pinion through the lofty
air,
To where some steep untrodden mountain
height
Caught the last tresses of the Sun God's
hair;

Or how the little flower he trod upon, 25
The daisy, that white-feathered shield of
gold,
Followed with wistful eyes the wandering sun,
Content if once its leaves were aureoled.

But surely it is something to have been
The best beloved for a little while, 30
To have walked hand in hand with Love,
and seen
His purple wings flit once across thy smile.

Aye! though the gorgéd asp of passion feed
On my boy's heart, yet have I burst the
bars,
Stood face to face with Beauty, known indeed
The Love which moves the Sun and all the stars! (1881)

THE BALLAD OF READING GAOL

I

He did not wear his scarlet coat,
For blood and wine are red,
And blood and wine were on his hands

24 Sun God, Apollo, to whom the daisy (day's eye) was sacred 25-28 little flower . . . aureoled. Cf Browning's Rudel to the Lady of Tripoli, 6-18, page 191
The Ballad of Reading Gaol The background of the ballad is the jail at Reading, Berkshire, where Wilde was imprisoned, 1896-97, the central event is the execution, for murder, of a trooper in the Royal Horse Guards, July 7, 1896. The ballad was written at Berneval, France, after Wilde's release

When they found him with the dead,
The poor dead woman whom he loved,
And murdered in her bed.

He walked amongst the Trial Men
In a suit of shabby gray;
A cricket cap was on his head,
And his step seemed light and gay;
But I never saw a man who looked
So wistfully at the day.

I never saw a man who looked
With such a wistful eye
Upon that little tent of blue
Which prisoners call the sky,
And at every drifting cloud that went
With sails of silver by.

I walked, with other souls in pain,
Within another ring,
And was wondering if the man had done
A great or little thing,
When a voice behind me whispered low,
"That fellow's got to swing."

Dear Christ! the very prison walls
Suddenly seemed to reel,
And the sky above my head became
Like a casque of scorching steel;
And, though I was a soul in pain,
My pain I could not feel.

I only knew what hunted thought
Quickened his step, and why
He looked upon the garish day
With such a wistful eye;
The man had killed the thing he loved,
And so he had to die.

Yet each man kills the thing he loves,
By each let this be heard,
Some do it with a bitter look,
Some with a flattering word,
The coward does it with a kiss,
The brave man with a sword!

Some kill their love when they are young,
And some when they are old;
Some strangle with the hands of Lust,
Some with the hands of Gold.
The kindest use a knife, because
The dead so soon grow cold.

Some love too little, some too long,
Some sell, and others buy;
Some do the deed with many tears,
And some without a sigh;
For each man kills the thing he loves,
Yet each man does not die.

He does not die a death of shame 55
On a day of dark disgrace,
Nor have a noose about his neck,
Nor a cloth upon his face,
Nor drop feet foremost through the floor
Into an empty space. 60

He does not sit with silent men
Who watch him night and day;
Who watch him when he tries to weep,
And when he tries to pray;
Who watch him lest himself should rob 65
The prison of its prey.

He does not wake at dawn to see
Dread figures throng his room —
The shivering chaplain robed in white,
The sheriff stern with gloom, 70
And the governor all in shiny black,
With the yellow face of Doom.

He does not rise in piteous haste
To put on convict-clothes,
While some coarse-mouthed doctor gloats,
and notes 75
Each new and nerve-twitched pose,
Fingering a watch whose little ticks
Are like horrible hammer-blows.

He does not know that sickening thirst
That sands one's throat before 80
The hangman with his gardener's gloves
Slips through the padded door,
And binds one with three leathern thongs,
That the throat may thirst no more.

He does not bend his head to hear 85
The burial office read,
Nor, while the terror of his soul
Tells him he is not dead,
Cross his own coffin, as he moves
Into the hideous shed. 90

He does not stare upon the air
Through a little roof of glass;
He does not pray with lips of clay
For his agony to pass;
Nor feel upon his shuddering cheek 95
That kiss of Caiaphas.

2

Six weeks our guardsman walked the yard,
In the suit of shabby gray.
His cricket cap was on his head,
And his step seemed light and gay, 100
But I never saw a man who looked
So wistfully at the day.

7 Trial Men, men sentenced by a preliminary court the verdict of which might be appealed.

96 kiss of Caiaphas, the kiss of Judas bought with the money received from Caiaphas, the high priest, for the betrayal of Christ See Matthew, 26.

- I never saw a man who looked
With such a wistful eye
Upon that little tent of blue 105
Which prisoners call the sky,
And at every wandering cloud that trailed
Its raveled fleeces by.
- He did not wring his hands, as do
Those witless men who dare 110
To try to rear the changeling Hope
In the cave of black Despair;
He only looked upon the sun,
And drank the morning air.
- He did not wring his hands nor weep, 115
Nor did he peek or pine,
But he drank the air as though it held
Some healthful anodyne;
With open mouth he drank the sun
As though it had been wine! 120
- And I and all the souls in pain,
Who tramped the other ring,
Forgot if we ourselves had done
A great or little thing,
And watched with gaze of dull amaze 125
The man who had to swing.
- And strange it was to see him pass
With a step so light and gay,
And strange it was to see him look
So wistfully at the day, 130
And strange it was to think that he Had such a debt to pay.
- For oak and elm have pleasant leaves
That in the springtime shoot;
But grim to see is the gallows-tree, 135
With its adder-bitten root,
And, green or dry, a man must die
Before it bears its fruit!
- The loftiest place is that seat of grace
For which all wordlings try; 140
But who would stand in hempen band
Upon a scaffold high,
And through a murderer's collar take
His last look at the sky?
- It is sweet to dance to violins 145
When love and life are fair;
To dance to flutes, to dance to lutes
Is delicate and rare;
But it is not sweet with nimble feet
To dance upon the air! 150
- So with curious eyes and sick surmise
We watched him day by day,
- And wondered if each one of us
Would end the self-same way,
For none can tell to what red hell 155
His sightless soul may stray.
- At last the dead man walked no more
Amongst the Trial Men,
And I knew that he was standing up
In the black dock's dreadful pen, 160
And that never would I see his face
In God's sweet world again.
- Like two doomed ships that pass in storm
We had crossed each other's way;
But we made no sign, we said no word — 165
We had no word to say —
For we did not meet in the holy night,
But in the shameful day
- A prison wall was round us both,
Two outcast men we were. 170
The world had thrust us from its heart,
And God from out His care;
And the iron gin that waits for Sin
Had caught us in its snare.

3

- In Debtors' Yard the stones are hard, 175
And the dripping wall is high,
So it was there he took the air
Beneath the leaden sky,
And by each side a warder walked, 180
For fear the man might die

- Or else he sat with those who watched
His anguish night and day,
Who watched him when he rose to weep,
And when he crouched to pray,
Who watched him lest himself should rob 185
Their scaffold of its prey.

- The governor was strong upon
The Regulations Act;
The doctor said that death was but
A scientific fact; 190
And twice a day the chaplain called,
And left a little tract.

- And twice a day he smoked his pipe,
And drank his quart of beer.
His soul was resolute, and held 195
No hiding-place for fear;
He often said that he was glad
The hangman's hands were near.

So with curious eyes and sick surmise
We watched him day by day,

118. anodyne, a drug that kills pain

173 gin, trap. 175 Debtors' Yard, a division of the exercise ground in Reading Gaol, formerly set apart for debtors 188 Regulations Act, a law placing all prisons under governmental supervision and prescribing humane treatment for prisoners

But why he said so strange a thing
 No warder dared to ask, 200
 For he to whom a watcher's doom
 Is given at his task,
 Must set a lock upon his lips,
 And make his face a mask.

Or else he might be moved, and try 205
 To comfort or console —
 And what should human Pity do
 Pent up in Murderers' Hole?
 What word of grace in such a place
 Could help a brother's soul? 210

With slouch and swing around the ring
 We trod the Fools' Parade!
 We did not care — we knew we were
 The Devil's Own Brigade;
 And shaven head and feet of lead 215
 Make a merry masquerade

We tore the tarry rope to shreds
 With blunt and bleeding nails;
 We rubbed the doors, and scrubbed the floors,
 And cleaned the shining rails, 220
 And, rank by rank, we soaped the plank,
 And clattered with the pails.

We sewed the sacks, we broke the stones,
 We turned the dusty drill;
 We banged the tins, and bawled the hymns,
 And sweated on the mill; 226
 But in the heart of every man Terror was lying still.

So still it lay that every day
 Crawled like a weed-clogged wave; 230
 And we forgot the bitter lot
 That waits for fool and knave,
 Till once, as we tramped in from work,
 We passed an open grave

With yawning mouth the yellow hole 235
 Gaped for a living thing;
 The very mud cried out for blood
 To the thirsty asphalt ring
 And we knew that ere one dawn grew fair
 Some prisoner had to swing 240

Right in we went, with soul intent
 On Death and Dread and Doom.
 The hangman, with his little bag,
 Went shuffling through the gloom;
 And each man trembled as he crept 245
 Into his numbered tomb

That night the empty corridors
 Were full of forms of Fear,

And up and down the iron town
 Stole feet we could not hear, 250
 And through the bars that hide the stars
 White faces seemed to peer.

He lay as one who lies and dreams
 In a pleasant meadow-land,
 The watchers watched him as he slept, 255
 And could not understand
 How one could sleep so sweet a sleep
 With a hangman close at hand.

But there is no sleep when men must weep
 Who never yet have wept; 260
 So we — the fool, the fraud, the knave —
 That endless vigil kept,
 And through each brain on hands of pain
 Another's terror crept.

Alas! it is a fearful thing 265
 To feel another's guilt!
 For, right within, the sword of Sin
 Pierced to its poisoned hilt,
 And as molten lead were the tears we shed
 For the blood we had not spilt. 270

The warders with their shoes of felt Crept by each padlocked door,
 And peeped and saw, with eyes of awe,
 Gray figures on the floor,
 And wondered why men knelt to pray 275
 Who never prayed before.

All through the night we knelt and prayed,
 Mad mourners of a corse!
 The troubled plumes of midnight were
 The plumes upon a hearse; 280
 And bitter wine upon a sponge
 Was the savor of Remorse.

The gray cock crew, the red cock crew,
 But never came the day,
 And crooked shapes of Terror crouched, 285
 In the corners where we lay,
 And each evil sprite that walks by night
 Before us seemed to play.

They glided past, they glided fast,
 Like travelers through a mist; 290
 They mocked the moon in a rigadoun
 Of delicate turn and twist,
 And with formal pace and loathsome grace
 The phantoms kept their tryst.

With mop and mow, we saw them go, 295
 Slim shadows hand and hand;
 About, about, in ghostly rout
 They trod a saraband,

217 We . shreds Prisoners sentenced to hard labor, as Wilde was, were forced to tear ropes to shreds to make oakum for calking vessels.

291 rigadoun, a gay, lively dance. 298 saraband, a stately Spanish dance

And the damned grotesques made arabesques,
Like the wind upon the sand! 300

With the pirouettes of marionettes,
They tripped on pointed tread;
But with flutes of Fear they filled the ear,
As their grisly masque they led,
And loud they sang, and long they sang, 305
For they sang to wake the dead.

"Oho!" they cried, "*the world is wide,
But fettered limbs go lame!
And once, or twice, to throw the dice
Is a gentlemanly game,* 310
*But he does not win who plays with Sin
In the secret House of Shame.*"

No things of air these antics were,
That frolicked with such glee;
To men whose lives were held in gyves, 315
And whose feet might not go free,
Ah! wounds of Christ! they were living things,
Most terrible to see.

Around, around, they waltzed and wound;
Some wheeled in smirking pairs; 320
With the mincing step of a demirep
Some sidled up the stairs;
And with subtle sneer, and fawning leer,
Each helped us at our prayers.

The morning wind began to moan, 325
But still the night went on;
Through its giant loom the web of gloom
Crept till each thread was spun,
And, as we prayed, we grew afraid
Of the Justice of the Sun. 330

The moaning wind went wandering round
The weeping prison-wall;
Till like a wheel of turning steel
We felt the minutes crawl.
O moaning wind! what had we done 335
To have such a seneschal?

At last I saw the shadowed bars,
Like a lattice wrought in lead,
Move right across the whitewashed wall
That faced my three-plank bed, 340
And I knew that somewhere in the world
God's dreadful dawn was red

At six o'clock we cleaned our cells,
At seven all was still,
But the sough and swing of a mighty wing 345
The prison seemed to fill,
For the Lord of Death with icy breath,
Had entered in to kill.

299 arabesques, interlaced lines and curves 301 pirouettes of marionettes, whirling on their toes, like dancing puppets

He did not pass in purple pomp,
Nor ride a moon-white steed. 350
Three yards of cord and a sliding board
Are all the gallows' need,
So with rope of shame the Herald came
To do the secret deed.

We were as men who through a fen 355
Of filthy darkness grope —
We did not dare to breathe a prayer,
Or to give our anguish scope;
Something was dead in each of us,
And what was dead was Hope. 360

For man's grim Justice goes its way,
And will not swerve aside.
It slays the weak, it slays the strong,
It has a deadly stride;
With iron heel it slays the strong, 365
The monstrous parricide!

We waited for the stroke of eight;
Each tongue was thick with thirst.
For the stroke of eight is the stroke of Fate
That makes a man accursed, 370
And Fate will use a running noose
For the best man and the worst.

We had no other thing to do,
Save to wait for the sign to come;
So, like things of stone in a valley lone, 375
Quiet we sat and dumb;
But each man's heart beat thick and quick,
Like a madman on a drum!

With sudden shock the prison-clock
Smote on the shivering air, 380
And from all the gaol rose up a wail
Of impotent despair,
Like the sound that frightened marshes hear
From some leper in his lair.

And as one sees most fearful things 385
In the crystal of a dream,
We saw the greasy hempen rope
Hooked to the blackened beam,
And heard the prayer the hangman's snare
Strangled into a scream. 390

And all the woe that moved him so
That he gave that bitter cry,
And the wild regrets, and the bloody sweats,
None knew so well as I;
For he who lives more lives than one 395
More deaths than one must die.

4

There is no chapel on the day
On which they hang a man;

386 crystal . . . dream, in a dream where, as in the ball of the crystal-gazer, move uncanny shapes

The chaplain's heart is far too sick,
Or his face is far too wan,
Or there is that written in his eyes
Which none should look upon.

400

So they kept us close till nigh on noon,
And then they rang the bell,
And the warders with their jingling keys
Opened each listening cell,
And down the iron stair we tramped,
Each from his separate hell.

405

Out into God's sweet air we went,
But not in wonted way,
For this man's face was white with fear,
And that man's face was gray,
And I never saw sad men who looked
So wistfully at the day.

410

I never saw sad men who looked
With such a wistful eye
Upon that little tent of blue
We prisoners called the sky,
And at every careless cloud that passed
In happy freedom by.

415

420

But there were those amongst us all
Who walked with downcast head,
And knew that, had each got his due,
They should have died instead;
He had but killed a thing that lived,
Whilst they had killed the dead.

425

For he who sins a second time
Wakes a dead soul to pain,
And draws it from its spotted shroud,
And makes it bleed again,
And makes it bleed great gouts of blood,
And makes it bleed in vain!

430

Like ape or clown, in monstrous garb
With crooked arrows starred,
Silently we went round and round
The slippery asphalt yard;
Silently we went round and round,
And no man spoke a word.

435

Silently we went round and round,
And through each hollow mind
The Memory of dreadful things
Rushed like a dreadful wind,
And Horror stalked before each man,
And Terror crept behind.

440

The warders strutted up and down,
And kept their herd of brutes;
Their uniforms were spick and span,
And they wore their Sunday suits,

445

But we knew the work they had been at,
By the quicklime on their boots.

450

For where a grave had opened wide,
There was no grave at all —
Only a stretch of mud and sand
By the hideous prison-wall,
And a little heap of burning lime,
That the man should have his pall.

455

For he has a pall, this wretched man,
Such as few men can claim;
Deep down below a prison-yard,
Naked for greater shame,
He lies, with fetters on each foot,
Wrapt in a sheet of flame!

460

And all the while the burning lime
Eats flesh and bone away —
It eats the brittle bone by night,
And the soft flesh by day,
It eats the flesh and bone by turns,
But it eats the heart away.

465

For three long years they will not sow
Or root or seedling there;
For three long years the unblessed spot
Will sterile be and bare,
And look upon the wondering sky
With unreproachful stare.

470

They think a murderer's heart would taint
Each simple seed they sow
It is not true! God's kindly earth
Is kindlier than men know,
And the red rose would but blow more red,
The white rose whiter blow.

476

480

Out of his mouth a red, red rose!
Out of his heart a white!
For who can say by what strange way,
Christ brings His will to light,
Since the barren staff the pilgrim bore
Bloomed in the great Pope's sight?

485

But neither milk-white rose nor red
May bloom in prison air —
The shard, the pebble, and the flint,
Are what they give us there;
For flowers have been known to heal
A common man's despair.

490

So never will wine-red rose or white,
Petal by petal, fall

456 pall, the cloth thrown over a coffin 485-86 barren sight, a reference to the old German legend of Tannhauser, which Wagner made the basis for an opera Tannhauser, guilty of heinous sin, besought Pope Urban IV (1261-64) for forgiveness, the pope declared that pardon was as impossible as for roses to bloom on the pilgrim's staff, after Tannhauser left, the staff burst into bloom. Compare Swinburne's Laus Veneris, page 664, and Ave Atque Vale, line 157 and note, page 692, and line 166 and note, page 692

434 arrows. The garb of English convicts was marked with arrows

On that stretch of mud and sand that lies 495
 By the hideous prison-wall,
 To tell the men who tramp the yard
 That God's Son died for all

Yet though the hideous prison-wall
 Still hems him round and round, 500
 And a spirit may not walk by night
 That is with fetters bound,
 And a spirit may but weep that lies
 In such unholy ground,

He is at peace — this wretched man — 505
 At peace, or will be soon,
 There is no thing to make him mad,
 Nor does Terror walk at noon,
 For the lampless Earth in which he lies
 Has neither Sun nor Moon. 510

They hanged him as a beast is hanged;
 They did not even toll
 A requiem that might have brought
 Rest to his startled soul,
 But hurriedly they took him out, 515
 And hid him in a hole.

They stripped him of his canvas clothes,
 And gave him to the flies,
 They mocked the swollen purple throat,
 And the stark and staring eyes, 520
 And with laughter loud they heaped the shroud
 In which their convict lies

The chaplain would not kneel to pray
 By his dishonored grave,
 Nor mark it with that blessed Cross 525
 That Christ for sinners gave,
 Because the man was one of those Whom Christ came down to save.

Yet all is well; he has but passed
 To Life's appointed bourne, 530
 And alien tears will fill for him
 Pity's long-broken urn,
 For his mourners will be outcast men,
 And outcasts always mourn

5

I know not whether laws be right, 535
 Or whether laws be wrong,
 All that we know who lie in jail
 Is that the wall is strong;
 And that each day is like a year,
 A year whose days are long 540

But this I know, that every law
 That men have made for man,
 Since first man took his brother's life,
 And the sad world began,

But straws the wheat and saves the chaff 545
 With a most evil fan

This too I know — and wise it were
 If each could know the same —
 That every prison that men build
 Is built with bricks of shame, 550
 And bound with bars lest Christ should see
 How men their brothers maim.

With bars they blur the gracious moon,
 And blind the goodly sun;
 And they do well to hide their hell, 555
 For in it things are done
 That Son of God nor son of Man
 Ever should look upon!

The vilest deeds like poison weeds
 Bloom well in prison-air; 560
 It is only what is good in man
 That wastes and withers there.
 Pale Anguish keeps the heavy gate,
 And the warder is Despair

For they starve the little frightened child 565
 Till it weeps both night and day,
 And they scourge the weak, and flog the fool,
 And gibe the old and gray,
 And some grow mad, and all grow bad,
 And none a word may say 570

Each narrow cell in which we dwell
 Is a foul and dark latrine,
 And the fetid breath of living Death
 Chokes up each grated screen,
 And all, but Lust, is turned to dust 575
 In Humanity's machine.

The brackish water that we drink
 Creeps with a loathsome slime,
 And the bitter bread they weigh in scales
 Is full of chalk and lime, 580
 And Sleep will not lie down, but walks
 Wild-eyed, and cries to Time

But though lean Hunger and green Thirst
 Like asp and adder fight,
 We have little care of prison fare, 585
 For what chills and kills outright
 Is that every stone one lifts by day
 Becomes one's heart at night

With midnight always in one's heart,
 And twilight in one's cell, 590
 We turn the crank, or tear the rope,
 Each in his separate hell,
 And the silence is more awful far
 Than the sound of a brazen bell.

And never a human voice comes near 595
 To speak a gentle word,
 And the eye that watches through the door
 Is pitiless and hard,
 And by all forgot, we rot and rot,
 With soul and body marred 600

And thus we rust Life's iron chain,
 Degraded and alone,
 And some men curse, and some men weep,
 And some men make no moan;
 But God's eternal laws are kind 605
 And break the heart of stone

And every human heart that breaks,
 In prison-cell or yard,
 Is as that broken box that gave
 Its treasure to the Lord, 610
 And filled the unclean leper's house
 With the scent of costliest nard

Ah! happy they whose hearts can break
 And peace of pardon win!
 How else may man make straight his plan 615
 And cleanse his soul from sin?
 How else but through a broken heart
 May Lord Christ enter in?

And he of the swollen purple throat,
 And the stark and staring eyes, 620
 Waits for the holy hands that took
 The Thief to Paradise;
 And a broken and a contrite heart
 The Lord will not despise.

The man in red who reads the law 625
 Gave him three weeks of life,
 Three little weeks in which to heal
 His soul of his soul's strife,
 And cleanse from every blot of blood
 The hand that held the knife. 630

And with tears of blood he cleansed the hand,
 The hand that held the steel —
 For only blood can wipe out blood,
 And only tears can heal —
 And the crimson stain that was of Cain 635
 Became Christ's snow-white seal.

609-12 box . nard See Mark, 14 3-9 While Christ was dining with Simon the leper, a woman came with an alabaster box, broke it open, and poured the contents—the precious ointment, nard—over Christ's head 621-22 holy . Paradise See Luke, 23 39-43 Christ said to the repentant thief on the cross "Today shalt thou be with me in Paradise." 623-24 broken . . despise From Psalms, 51 17—"A broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise" 625 man in red, the judge who passed sentence of death upon the prisoner Cf. Carlyle's Sartor Resartus, I, 9—"Has not your Red hanging-individual a boreshair wig, squirrel skins, and plush gown, whereby all mortals know that he is a judge?" 635-36 stain . . seal See Isaiah, 1 18—"Come now, and let us reason together, saith the Lord, though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow, though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool"

 In Reading gaol by Reading town
 There is a pit of shame,
 And in it lies a wretched man
 Eaten by teeth of flame, 640
 In a burning winding-sheet he lies,
 And his grave has got no name.

And there, till Christ call forth the dead,
 In silence let him lie.
 No need to waste the foolish tear, 645
 Or heave a windy sigh,
 The man had killed the thing he loved,
 And so he had to die.

And all men kill the thing they love,
 By all let this be heard, 650
 Some do it with a bitter look,
 Some with a flattering word,
 The coward does it with a kiss,
 The brave man with a sword! (1896, 1898)

WHAT THE SONNET IS

Fourteen small brodered berries on the hem
 Of Circe's mantle, each of magic gold,
 Fourteen of lone Calypso's tears that rolled
 Into the sea, for pearls to come of them,
 Fourteen clear signs of omen in the gem 5
 With which Medea human fate foretold;
 Fourteen small drops, which Faustus, growing old,
 Craved of the Fiend, to water Life's dry stem
 It is the pure white diamond Dante brought
 To Beatrice, the sapphire Laura wore 10
 When Petrarch cut it sparkling out of thought;
 The ruby Shakespeare hewed from his heart's core,
 The dark, deep emerald that Rossetti wrought
 For his own soul, to wear for evermore. (1894)

SONNET GOLD

We get it from Etruscan tombs, hid deep Beneath the passing plowshare, or from caves
 Known but to Prospero, where pale-green
 waves
 Have rolled the wreck-gold, which the mermaids keep,
 And from the caverns, where the gnomes up-
 heap,
 The secret treasures, which the Earth's dwarf
 slaves
 Coin in her bosom, till the red gold paves
 Her whole great heart, where only poets peep,
 Or from old missals, where the gold defies Time's hand, in saints' bright aureoles, and keeps,
 In angels' long straight trumpets, all its flash,
 But chiefly from the crucible, where lies
 The alchemist's pure dream-gold. — While he sleeps
 The poet steals it, leaving him the ash. (1894)

EPILOGUE

I wrought them like a targe of hammered gold
 On which all Troy is battling round and
 round;
 Or Circe's cup, embossed with snakes that wound
 Through buds and myrtles, fold on scaly fold,
 Or like gold coins, which Lydian tombs may
 hold,
 Stamped with winged racers, in the old red
 ground,
 Or twined gold armlets from the funeral mound
 Of some great viking, terrible of old.
 I know not in what metal I have wrought,
 Nor whether what I fashion will be thrust
 Beneath the clods that hide forgotten thought,
 But if it is of gold it will not rust;
 And when the time is ripe it will be brought Into the sun, and glitter through its dust.

THE DEATH OF PUCK

I

I fear that Puck is dead — it is so long Since men last saw him — dead with all the rest
 Of that sweet elfin crew that made their nest
 In hollow nuts, where hazels sing their song,
 Dead and forever, like the antique throng
 The elves replaced: the Dryad that you guessed
 Behind the leaves; the Naiad weed-bedressed,
 The leaf-eared Faun that loved to lead you
 wrong.
 Tell me, thou hopping Robin, hast thou met
 A little man no bigger than thyself,
 Whom they call Puck, where woodland bells are wet?
 Tell me, thou Wood-Mouse, hast thou seen an elf
 Whom they call Puck, and is he seated
 yet,
 Capped with a snail-shell, on his mushroom shelf?

2

The Robin gave three hops, and chirped, and
 said:
 "Yes, I knew Puck, and loved him, though I
 trow
 He mimicked oft my whistle, chuckling low,
 Yes, I knew cousin Puck; but he is dead.
 We found him lying on his mushroom bed —
 The Wren and I — half covered up with
 snow,
 As we were hopping where the berries grow.
 We think he died of cold Aye, Puck is
 fled."
 And then the Wood-Mouse said: "We made the Mole
 Dig him a little grave beneath the moss,
 And four big Dormice placed him in the hole.
 The Squirrel made with sticks a little cross,
 Puck was a Christian elf, and had a soul;
 And all we velvet jackets mourn his loss."

THE NIGHT HAS A THOUSAND EYES

The night has a thousand eyes,
 And the day but one;
 Yet the light of the bright world dies
 With the dying sun.

The Death of Puck Puck was the goblin of English folklore, adapted by Shakespeare for his Midsummer Night's Dream

6 Dryad, a wood-nymph 7 Naiad, a water-nymph 8 Faun, a goat-footed woodland creature, follower of Pan

The mind has a thousand eyes, 5
And the heart but one;
Yet the light of a whole life dies
When love is done. (1890)

LATET ANGUIS

Ah! full of purest influence
On human mind and mood,
Of holiest joy to human sense,
Are river, field, and wood;
And better must all childhood be 5
That knows a garden and a tree.

For where can one diviner gleam
On leagues of houses lie?
And what of Heaven can childhood dream,
That scarce has seen the sky? 10
Yet sin and sorrow's pedigree
Springs from a Garden and a Tree. (1890)

SURSUM CORDA

How can the outworn heart
To earth that clings
From self-spun cerements start
On rainbow wings?

How from its husk had flown 5
The butterfly
Save with its wings were grown
Love of the sky? (1890)

HONEY-LAND

Where should the poet wander
To garnish his golden cells?
'Tis in Yesterday and Yonder
The honey of dreamland dwells.

For him in the rainbow's resting, 5
And the talking of wind and tree,
And the star in the still pool nesting,
And the moon-path over the sea
(1902)

TO A PAINTER

Whoever opens me
The secret of the earth, the sky, the sea,
In the soft trance of song,
Or painter's mirror-magic yet more strong;

Latet Anguis. The title is quoted from Virgil's Eclagues, 3, 93 Latet anguis in herba—There is a snake in the grass.
Sursum Corda. The title means Lift up Your Hearts. It is one of the lines spoken alternately by priest and people in the Preface to the Roman Catholic Mass.
3 cerements, grave clothes

That voice, that hand I bless. 5
For 'tis my heart's faith, to bring loveliness
Is more than to bring ease,
To make a soul more than to mend disease

WILLIAM SHARP ("Fiona Macleod")*
(1856-1905)

THE LAST ABORIGINAL

I see him sit, wild-eyed, alone,
Amidst gaunt, spectral, moonlit gums;
He waits for death: not once a moan
From out his rigid fixed lips comes;
His lank hair falls adown a face 5
Haggard as any wave-worn stone,
And in his eyes I dimly trace
The memory of a vanished race.

The lofty ancient gum-trees stand,
Each gray and ghostly in the moon, 10
The giants of an old strange land
That was exultant in its noon
When all our Europe was o'erturned
With deluge and with shifting sand,
With earthquakes that the hills inurned 15
And central fires that fused and burned.

The moon moves slowly through the vast
And solemn skies, the night is still,
Save when a warrigal springs past
With dismal howl, or when the shrill 20
Scream of a parrot rings which feels
A twining serpent's fangs fixed fast,
Or when a gray opossum squeals—
Or long iguana, as it steals

From bole to bole, disturbs the leaves. 25
But hushed and still he sits—who knows
That all is o'er for him who weaves
With inner speech, malign, morose,
A curse upon the whites who came
And gathered up his race like sheaves 30
Of thin wheat, fit but for the flame—
Who shot or spurned them without shame.

He knows he shall not see again
The creeks whereby the lyre-birds sing;

*"Fiona Macleod" is the pseudonym which Sharp adopted after 1894 to distinguish his more romantic poetry from that written under his own name, which had preceded. The name is feminine, Fiona is the diminutive of Fionnaghal, meaning a fair maid, and had been borne by the daughter of a Highland clergyman whom Sharp knew.

The Last Aboriginal This poem is connected with Sharp's voyage to Australia in 1876. This and the following four poems are signed "William Sharp."

11-16 The giants . . . burned Geologists regard Australia as the earliest formed of the continents and the least affected by pre-historic disturbances. 19 warrigal, the Australian wild-dog. 24 iguana, a large lizard. 25 bole, tree-trunk.

He shall no more upon the plain, 35
 Sun-scorched, and void of water-spring,
 Watch the dark cassowaries sweep
 In startled flight, or, with spear lain
 In ready poise, glide, twist, and creep
 Where the brown kangaroo doth leap. 40

No more in silent dawns he'll wait
 By still lagoons, and mark the flight
 Of black swans near; no more elate
 Whirl high the boomerang aright
 Upon some foe. He knows that now 45
 He too must share his race's night —
 He scarce can know the white man's plow
 Will one day pass above his brow.

Last remnant of the Austral race,
 He sits and stares, with failing breath; 50
 The shadow deepens on his face,
 For 'midst the spectral gums waits death.
 A dingo's sudden howl swells near —
 He stares once with a startled gaze,
 As half in wonder, half in fear, 55
 Then sinks back on his unknown bier (1884)

THE COVES OF CRAIL

The moon-white waters wash and leap,
 The dark tide floods the Coves of Crail,
 Sound, sound he lies in dreamless sleep,
 Nor hears the sea-wind wail.

The pale gold of his oozy locks 5
 Doth hither drift and thither wave,
 His thin hands plash against the rocks,
 His white lips nothing crave.

Afar away she laughs and sings —
 A song he loved, a wild sea-strain — 10
 Of how the mermen weave their rings
 Upon the reef-set main.

Sound, sound he lies in dreamless sleep,
 Nor hears the sea-wind wail, 14
 Though with the tide his white hands creep
 Amid the Coves of Crail. (1888)

HIGH NOON AT MIDSUMMER ON THE CAMPAGNA

High noon,
 And from the purple-veiled hills
 To where Rome lies in azure mist,
 Scarce any breath of wind

49. Austral race, Australian aborigines, steadily diminishing in number. 53 dingo, the Australian wild-dog.
The Coves of Crail Crail is a seaport on the east coast of Scotland, near St Andrews. With this poem compare Ariel's song in Shakespeare's The Tempest, 1, 2, 396 ff.
High Noon at Midsummer on the Campagna The Campagna is the plain surrounding Rome, see Browning's Two in the Campagna, page 231

Upon this vast and solitary waste, 5
 These leagues of sunscorched grass
 Where 't the dawn the scrambling goats maintain

A hardy feast,
 And where, when the warm yellow moonlight
 floods the flats,
 Gaunt laggard sheep browse spectrally for
 hours 10

While not less gaunt and spectral shepherds
 stand

Brooding, or with hollow vacant eyes
 Stare down the long perspectives of the dusk.
 Now not a breath:

No sound, 15
 No living thing,
 Save where the beetle jars his cracklings hards,
 Or where the hoarse cicada fills
 The heavy heated hour with palpitant whirr.
 Yet hark! 20

Comes not a low deep whisper from the ground,

A sigh as though the immemorial past
 Breathed here a long, slow, breath?
 Hushed nations sleep below; lost empires here
 Are dust, and deeper still, 25

Dim shadowy peoples are the mold that warms

The roots of every flower that blooms and blows

Even as we, too, bloom and fade,
 Who are so fain

To be as the Night that dies not, but forever
 Weaves her immortal web of starry fires, 31

To be as Time itself,
 Time, whose vast holocausts

Lie here, deep buried from the ken of men,
 Here, where no breath of wind 35

Ruffles the brooding heat,
 The breathless blazing heat
 Of Noon. (1891)

THE WHITE PEACOCK

Here where the sunlight
 Floodeth the garden,
 Where the pomegranate
 Reareth its glory

Of gorgeous blossom; 5
 Where the oleanders

Dream through the noontides;
 And, like surf o' the sea
 Round cliffs of basalt,

The thick magnolias 10
 In billowy masses

Front the somber green of the ilexes,
 Here where the heat lies

Pale blue in the hollows,

Where blue are the shadows 15
 On the fronds of the cactus,
 Where pale blue the gleaming
 Of fir and cypress,
 With the cones upon them
 Amber or glowing 20
 With virgin gold;
 Here where the honey-flower
 Makes the heat fragrant,
 As though from the gardens
 Of Gulistan, 25
 Where the bulbul singeth
 Through a mist of roses
 A breath were borne;
 Here where the dream-flowers
 The cream-white poppies 30
 Silently waver,
 And where the Sirocco,
 Faint in the hollows,
 Foldeth his soft white wings in the sunlight,
 And lieth sleeping 35
 Deep in the heart of
 A sea of white violets —
 Here, as the breath, as the soul of this beauty
 Moveth in silence, and dreamlike, and slowly,
 White as a snow-drift in mountain valleys 40
 When softly upon it the gold light lingers,
 White as the foam o' the sea that is driven
 O'er billows of azure agleam with sun-yellow,
 Cream-white and soft as the breasts of a girl,
 Moves the White Peacock, as though through the noontide 45
 A dream of the moonlight were real for a moment.
 Dim on the beautiful fan that he spreadeth,
 Foldeth and spreadeth abroad in the sunlight,
 Dim on the cream-white are blue adumbrations,
 Shadows so pale in their delicate blueness 50
 That visions they seem as of vanishing violets,
 The fragrant white violets veined with azure,
 Pale, pale as the breath of blue smoke in far woodlands.
 Here, as the breath, as the soul of this beauty,
 White as a cloud through the heats of the noontide, 55
 Moves the White Peacock. (1891)

ON A NIGHTINGALE IN APRIL

The yellow moon is a dancing phantom
 Down secret ways of the flowing shade,
 And the waveless stream has a murmuring whisper
 Where the alders wave.

24-25 gardens Of Gulistan Gulistan is a town in British Afghanistan, but Sharp associated the term with the Gulistan, or Rose-Garden, a collection of tales and aphorisms made by the Persian poet Sadi in 1258 26 bulbul, the Persian nightingale 32 Sirocco, a hot, dry wind from the desert

Not a breath, not a sigh, save the slow stream's whisper; 5
 Only the moon is a dancing blade
 That leads a host of the Crescent warriors
 To a phantom raid.
 Out of the lands of Faerie a summons,
 A long strange cry that thrills through the
 glade — 10
 The gray-green glooms of the elm are stirring,
 Newly afraid.
 Last heard, white music, under the olives
 Where once Theocritus sang and played —
 Thy Thracian song is the old new wonder —
 O moon-white maid! 16

THE WHITE PEACE

It lies not on the sunlit hill
 Nor on the sunlit plain;
 Nor ever on any running stream
 Nor on the unclouded main —
 But sometimes, through the Soul of Man, 5
 Slow moving o'er his pain,
 The moonlight of a perfect peace
 Floods heart and brain. (1894)

SHULE, SHULE, SHULE, AGRAH!

His face was glad as dawn to me,
 His breath was sweet as dusk to me,
 His eyes were burning flames to me,
Shule, shule, shule, agrah!
 The broad noon-day was night to me, 5
 The full-moon night was dark to me,
 The stars whirled and the poles span
 The hour that God took him far from me.
 Perhaps he dreams in heaven now,
 Perhaps he doth in worship bow, 10
 A white flame round his foam-white brow,
Shule, shule, shule, agrah!
 I laugh to think of him like this,
 Who once found all his joy and bliss
 Against my heart, against my kiss, 15
Shule, shule, shule, agrah!

Star of my joy, art still the same
 Now thou hast gotten a new name?

THE ROSE OF FLAME

Oh, fair immaculate rose of the world, rose of my dream, my Rose!
 Beyond the ultimate gates of dream I have heard thy mystical call:
 It is where the rainbow of hope suspends and the river of rapture flows —
 And the cool sweet dew from the wells of peace forever fall.

And all my heart is aflame because of the rapture and peace, 5
 And I dream, in my waking dreams and deep in the dreams of sleep,
 Till the high sweet wonderful call that shall be the call of release Shall ring in my ears as I sink from gulf to gulf and from deep to deep —

Sink deep, sink deep beyond the ultimate dreams of all desire — Beyond the uttermost limit of all that the craving spirit knows; 10
 Then, then, oh, then I shall be as the inner flame of thy fire,
 O fair immaculate rose of the world, rose of
 my dream, my Rose! (1896)

THE WASHER OF THE FORD

There is a lonely stream in a lone dim land;
 It hath white dust for shore it has, white bones bestrew the strand:
 The only thing that liveth there is a naked
 leaping sword;
 But I, who a seer am, have seen the whirling
 hand
 Of the Washer of the Ford. 5

A shadowy shape of cloud and mist, of gloom
 and dusk, she stands,
 The Washer of the Ford.
 She laughs, at times, and strews the dust
 through the hollow of her hands.
 She counts the sins of all men there, and slays
 the red-stained horde —
 The ghosts of all the sins of men must know the whirling sword 10
 Of the Washer of the Ford.

She stoops and laughs when in the dust she sees a writhing limb:

The Rose of Flame Cf Yeats's The Rose of the World,
 page 861

"Go back into the ford," she says, "and
 hither and thither swim;
 Then I shall wash you white as snow, and shall take you by the hand,
 And slay you there in silence with this my whirling brand, 15
 And trample you into the dust of this white, windless sand" —
 This is the laughing word
 Of the Washer of the Ford
 Along that silent strand. (1896)

THE VALLEY OF WHITE POPPIES

Between the gray pastures and the dark
 wood
 A valley of white poppies is lit by the low
 moon;
 It is the grave of dreams, a holy rood.
 It is quiet there; no wind doth ever fall.
 Long, long ago a wind sang once a heart-sweet rune. 5
 Now the white poppies grow, silent and tall.

A white bird floats there like a drifting leaf;
 It feeds upon faint sweet hopes and perishing
 dreams
 And the still breath of unremembering grief.
 And as a silent leaf the white bird passes, 10
 Winnowing the dusk by dim forgetful streams.
 I am alone now among the silent grasses.
 (1901)

THE VALLEY OF PALE BLUE FLOWERS

In a hidden valley a pale blue flower grows
 It is so pale that in the moonshine it is dim-mer than dim gold,
 And in the starshine paler than the palest
 rose.

It is the flower of dream. Who holds it is never old
 It is the flower of forgetfulness — and oblivion is youth; 5
 Breathing it, flame is not empty air, dust is not cold.

Lift it, and there is no memory of sorrow or any ruth;
 The gray monotone of the low sky is filled
 with light;
 The dim, terrible, impalpable lie wears the raiment of truth.

The Valley of White Poppies The poppy is the flower of oblivion
 5 rune, a song of magic—from association of the primitive Teutonic runic characters with magic spells and incantations

I lift it, now, for somewhat in the heart of
the night 10
Fills me with dread. It may be that, as a tiger in his lair,
Memory, crouching, waits to spring into the light.

No, I will clasp it close to my heart, over-droop with my hair,
I will breathe thy frail faint breath, O pale blue flower,
And then . . . and then . . . nothing shall take me unaware! 15

Nothing: no thought; no fear; only the invisible power
Of the vast deeps of night, wherein down a shadowy star
My soul slowly, slowly, slowly, will sink to its ultimate hour. (1901)

THE VALLEY OF SILENCE

In the secret Valley of Silence
No breath doth fall;
No wind stirs in the branches;
No bird doth call.
As on a white wall 5
A breathless lizard is still,
So silence lies in the valley
Breathlessly still.

In the dusk-grown heart of the valley
An altar rises white. 10
No rapt priest bends in awe
Before its silent light;
But sometimes a flight
Of breathless words of prayer
White-winged enclose the altar, 15
Eddies of prayer. (1901)

DIM FACE OF BEAUTY

Dim face of Beauty haunting all the world,
Fair face of Beauty all too fair to see,
Where the lost stars adown the heavens are hurled,
There, there alone for thee
May white peace be. 5
For here where all the dreams of men are whirled
Like sear torn leaves of autumn to and fro,
There is no place for thee in all the world,
Who driftest as a star,
Beyond, afar. 10

Beauty, sad face of Beauty, Mystery, Wonder,
What are these dreams to foolish babbling
men? —

Who cry with little noises 'neath the thunder
Of ages ground to sand,
To a little sand. 15
(1907)

VALE, AMOR!

We do not know this thing
By the spoken word,
It is as though in a dim wood
One heard a bird
Suddenly sing — 5
Then in the twinkling of an eye
A shadow glooms the earth and sky,
And we stand silent, startled, in a changed
mood.

It is but a little thing
The leaping sword, 10
When in the startled silence of changed mood
It comes as when a bird
Doth suddenly sing.
But thrust of sword or agony of soul
Are alike swift and terrible and strong 15
And no foot stirs the dead leaves of that silent wood.
(1907)

THE WEAVER OF SNOW

In Polar noons when the moonshine glimmers,
And the frost-fans whirl,
And whiter than moonlight the ice-flowers
grow,
And the lunar rainbow quivers and shimmers,
And the Silent Laughters dance to and fro, 5
A stooping girl
As pale as pearl
Gathers the frost-flowers where they blow
And the fleet-foot fairies smile, for they know
The Weaver of Snow. 10

And she climbs at last to a berg set free,
That drifteth slow;
And she sails to the edge of the world we
see,
And waits till the wings of the north wind lean
Like an eagle's wings o'er a lochan of green,
And the pale stars glow 16
On berg and floe .
Then down on our world with a wild laugh
of glee
She empties her lamp full of shimmer and sheen.
And that is the way in a dream I have seen 20
The Weaver of Snow.
(1907)

Vale, Amor! The title means Farewell, Love
The Weaver of Snow 15 lochan, pond

DREAMS WITHIN DREAMS

I have gone out and seen the lands of Faery
And have found sorrow and peace and beauty there,
And have not known one from the other, but found each
Lovely and gracious alike, delicate and fair.

"They are children of one mother, she that is called Longing, 5
Desire, Love," one told me; and another,
"Her secret name
Is Wisdom"; and another, "They are not three but one";
And another, "Touch them not, seek them not; they are wind and flame"

I have come back from the hidden, silent lands of Faery
And have forgotten the music of its ancient streams; 10
And now flame and wind and the long, gray, wandering wave
And beauty and peace and sorrow are dreams within dreams. (1907)

LIONEL JOHNSON (1867-1902)

BY THE STATUE OF KING CHARLES AT CHARING CROSS

Somber and rich, the skies;
Great glooms, and starry plains
Gently the night wind sighs;
Else a vast silence reigns.

The splendid silence clings 5
Around me, and around
The saddest of all kings
Crowned, and again disrowned.

Comely and calm, he rides 10
Hard by his own Whitehall.
Only the night wind glides;
No crowds, nor rebels, brawl

Gone too, his Court; and yet,
The stars his courtiers are — 15
Stars in their stations set,
And every wandering star.

Alone he rides, alone,
The fair and fatal king,

By the Statue of King Charles at Charing Cross At Charing Cross, close to Trafalgar Square in London, stands an equestrian statue of King Charles I, who was beheaded by the Parliamentary party at the close of the Civil War, 1649.

10 Whitehall, the royal palace near Charing Cross, now only the banquet-hall is left standing Dark night is all his own,

That strange and solemn thing 20

Which are more full of fate —
The stars, or those sad eyes?
Which are more still and great —
Those brows, or the skies?

Although his whole heart yearn 25
In passionate tragedy,
Never was face so stern
With sweet austerity

Vanquished in life, his death
By beauty made amends; 30
The passing of his breath
Won his defeated ends.

Brief life, and hapless? Nay,
Through death, life grew sublime.
Speak after sentence? Yea — 35
And to the end of time.

Armored he rides, his head
Bare to the stars of doom;
He triumphs now, the dead,
Beholding London's gloom 40

Our wearier spirit faints,
Vexed in the world's employ,
His soul was of the saints,
And art to him was joy

King, tried in fires of woe! 45
Men hunger for thy grace;
And through the night I go,
Loving thy mournful face

Yet, when the city sleeps,
When all the cries are still, 50
The stars and heavenly deeps
Work out a perfect will

THE LAST MUSIC

Calmly, breathe calmly all your music, maids!
Breathe a calm music over my dead queen
All your lives long, you have nor heard, nor
seen,
Fairer than she, whose hair in somber braids
With beauty overshades 5
Her brow, broad and serene

31-32 passing . . . ends Popular feeling was so stirred by the dignity and patience with which Charles met his end that the power of Parliament was shaken and the restoration of the monarchy was soon assured 35 Speak after sentence. After Charles had been sentenced to death, he asked permission to speak, but John Bradshaw, the president of the court, refused the request because Charles had not recognized the right of the court to try him. 44 art joy In his palaces at Richmond and Whitehall, Charles made one of the finest collections of paintings in Europe

Surely she hath lain so an hundred years;
 Peace is upon her, old as the world's heart
 Breathe gently, music! Music done, depart,
 And leave me in her presence to my tears, 10
 With music in mine ears;
 For sorrow hath its art.

Music, more music, sad and slow! she lies
 Dead — and more beautiful than early morn.
 Discrowned am I, and of her looks forlorn, 15
 Alone, vain memories immortalize
 The way of her soft eyes,
 Her musical voice low-borne.

The balm of gracious death now laps her
 round, 19
 As once life gave her grace beyond her peers
 Strange! that I loved this lady of the spheres,
 To sleep by her at last in common ground,
 When kindly sleep hath bound
 Mine eyes, and sealed mine ears.

Maidens! make a low music; merely make 25
 Silence a melody, no more This day,
 She travels down a pale and lonely way;
 Now, for a gentle comfort, let her take
 Such music, for her sake,
 As mourning love can play. 30

Holy my queen lies in the arms of death;
 Music moves over her still face, and I
 Lean breathing love over her. She will lie
 In earth thus calmly, under the wind's
 breath —
 The twilight wind, that saith: 35
 Rest! worthy found, to die. (1889)

THE CHURCH OF A DREAM

Sadly the dead leaves rustle in the whistling
 wind,
 Around the weather-worn, gray church, low down the vale;
 The Saints in golden vesture shake before the gale;
 The glorious windows shake, where still they dwell enshrined,
 Old Saints by long dead, shriveled hands, long since designed: 5
 There still, although the world autumnal be,
 and pale,
 Still in their golden vesture the old saints
 prevail;
 Alone with Christ, desolate else, left by mankind
 Only one ancient Priest offers the Sacrifice,
 Murmuring holy Latin immemorial: 10

The Last Music 15 forlorn, robbed

Swaying with tremulous hands the old censer
 full of spice,
 In gray, sweet incense clouds; blue, sweet clouds mystical:
 To him, in place of men, for he is old, suffice
 Melancholy remembrances and vespéral.

TO MORFYDD

A voice on the winds,
 A voice by the waters,
 Wanders and cries:
Oh! what are the winds?
And what are the waters? 5
 Mine are your eyes!

Western the winds are,
 And western the waters,
 Where the light lies:
Oh! what are the winds? 10
And what are the waters?
 Mine are your eyes!

Cold, cold, grow the winds,
 And wild grow the waters,
 Where the sun dies: 15
Oh! what are the winds?
And what are the waters?
 Mine are your eyes!

And down the night winds,
 And down the night waters, 20
 The music flies:
Oh! what are the winds?
And what are the waters?
Cold be the winds,
And wild be the waters, 25
 So mine be your eyes!

LONDON TOWN

Let others chaunt a country praise,
 Fair river walks and meadow ways;
 Dearer to me my sounding days
 In London Town;
 To me the tumult of the street 5
 Is no less music than the sweet
 Surge of the wind among the wheat,
 By dale or down.

Three names mine heart with rapture hails,
 With homage: Ireland, Cornwall, Wales — 10

The Church of a Dream 14 vespéral, pertaining to the evening
To Morfydd. Morfydd was an Irish girl to whom a number of Johnson's lyrics are addressed
London Town 10 Ireland . Wales Johnson made vacation tours in all of these regions, to their influence he attributed a Celtic strain in his poetry.

Lands of lone moor, and mountain gales,
 And stormy coast;
 Yet London's voice upon the air
 Pleads at mine heart, and enters there;
 Sometimes I well-nigh love and care 15
 For London most

Listen upon the ancient hills —
 All silence! save the lark, who trills
 Through sunlight, save the rippling rills;
 There peace may be. 20
 But listen to great London! loud,
 As thunder from the purple cloud,
 Comes the deep thunder of the crowd,
 And heartens me.

O gray, O gloomy skies! What then? 25
 Here is a marvelous world of men;
 More wonderful than Rome was, when
 The world was Romel
 See the great stream of life flow by!
 Here thronging myriads laugh and sigh, 30
 Here rise and fall, here live and die —
 In this vast home.

In long array they march toward death,
 Armies, with proud or piteous breath;
 Forward! the spirit in them saith,
 Spirit of life. 35
 Here the triumphant trumpets blow;
 Here mourning music sorrows low;
 Victors and vanquished, still they go
 Forward in strife. 40

Who will not heed so great a sight?
 Greater than marshaled stars of night,
 That move to music and with light —
 For these are men!
 These move to music of the soul, 45
 Passions, that madden or control;
 These hunger for a distant goal,
 Seen now and then

Is mine too tragical a strain,
 Chaunting a burden full of pain, 50
 And labor, that seems all in vain?
 I sing but truth.
 Still, many a merry pleasure yet,
 To many a merry measure set,
 Is ours, who need not to forget 55
 Summer and youth

Do London birds forget to sing?
 Do London trees refuse the spring?
 Is London May no pleasant thing?
 Let country fields, 60
 To milking maid and shepherd boy,
 Give flowers, and song, and bright employ;

42-43 stars . . . music The ancients believed that the stars made music as they revolved in their spheres

Her children also can enjoy,
 What London yields.

Gleaming with sunlight, each soft lawn 65
 Lies fragrant beneath dew of dawn;
 The spires and towers rise, far withdrawn,
 Through golden mist.
 At sunset, linger beside Thames;
 See now, what radiant lights and flames! 70
 That ruby burns, that purple shames
 The amethyst.

Winter was long and dark and cold;
 Chill rains! grim fogs, black fold on fold,
 Rough street, and square, and river rolled! 75
 Ah, let it be;
 Winter is gone! Soon comes July,
 With wafts from hayfields by-and-by,
 While in the dingiest courts you spy
 Flowers fair to see. 80

Take heart of grace, and let each hour
 Break gently into bloom and flower;
 Winter and sorrow have no power
 To blight all bloom.
 One day, perchance, the sun will see 85
London's entire felicity,
 And all her loyal children be Clear of all gloom.

A dream? Dreams often dreamed come true,
 Our world would seem a world made new 90
 To those, beneath the churchyard yew
 Laid long ago!
 When we beneath like shadows bide,
 Fair London, throned upon Thames' side,
 May be our children's children's pride; 95
 And we shall know

CADGWITH

I

Man is a shadow's dream!
 Opulent Pindar saith;
 Yet man may win a gleam
 Of glory, before death.

Saith golden Shakespeare Man 5
Is a dream's shadow! Yet,
 Though death do all death can,
 His soul toward life is set.

91 yew, a tree, symbolic of sorrow, often planted in graveyards
Cadgwith Cadgwith is a fishing village in Cornwall The poem is dedicated to Lawrence Binyon, a contemporary British poet

1-2 Man . . . saith. From Pindar's eighth Pythian Ode, lines 95-96 "Man is but a dream of a shadow" Pindar (522-443 B.C.) was a Greek writer of choral odes famous for their elaborate harmonies 5-6 Man shadow From Hamlet, II, 2, 265 — "A dream itself is but a shadow"

I, living with delight
This rich autumnal day,
Mark the gulls' curving flight
Across the black-girt bay.

10

And the sea's working men,
The fisher-folk, I mark
Haul down their boats, and then
Launch for the deep sea dark.

15

Far out the strange ships go,
Their broad sails flashing red
As flame, or white as snow.
The ships, as David said.

20

Winds rush and waters roll;
Their strength, their beauty, brings
Into mine heart the whole
Magnificence of things:

That men are counted worth
A part upon this sea,
A part upon this earth,
Exalts and heartens me.

25

Ah, Glaucus, soul of man!
Encrusted by each tide,
That, since the seas began,
Hath surged against thy side:

30

Encumbering thee with weed,
And tangle of the wave!
Yet canst thou rise at need,
And thy strong beauty save!

35

Tides of the world in vain
Desire to vanquish thee;
Prostrate, thou canst again
Rise, lord of earth and sea!

40

Rise, lord of sea and earth,
And winds, and starry night.
Thine is the greater birth
And origin of light.

2

My windows open to the autumn night,
In vain I watched for sleep to visit me;
How should sleep dull mine ears, and dim my
sight,
Who saw the stars, and listened to the sea?

20 David said See Psalms, 104 24-26 — "O Lord, how manifold are thy works! in wisdom hast thou made them all the earth is full of thy riches So is this great and wide sea, wherein are things creeping innumerable, both small and great beasts. There go the ships there is that leviathan, whom thou hast made to play therein" Cf Psalms, 107 23-30 29 Glaucus, in Greek mythology a fisherman and diver who leaped into the sea and rose from it changed into a sea-god, see Ovid, Metamorphoses, 13 906

Section 2 See Revelation, 21 23—"And the city had no need of the sun, neither of the moon, to shine in it, for the glory of God did lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof"

Ah, how the City of our God is fair!
If, without sea, and starless though it be,
For joy of the majestic beauty there,
Men shall not miss the stars nor mourn the
sea.

5

3

Mary Star of the sea!
Look on this little place;
Bless the kind fisher race,
Mary Star of the sea!

Send harvest from the deep,
Mary Star of the Sea!
Mary Star of the Sea!
Let not these women weep.

5

Mary Star of the Sea!
Give wife and mother joy
In husband and in boy,
Mary Star of the Sea!

10

With intercession save,
Mary Star of the Sea!
Mary Star of the Sea!
These children of the wave.

15

Mary Star of the Sea!
Pour peace upon the wild
Waves, make their murmurs mild,
Mary Star of the Sea!

20

Now in thy mercy pray,
Mary Star of the Sea!
Mary Star of the Sea!
For sailors far away.

Mary Star of the Sea!
Now be thy great prayers said
For all poor seamen dead,
Mary Star of the Sea!

THE PRECEPT OF SILENCE

I know you: solitary griefs,
Desolate passions, aching hours!
I know you: tremulous beliefs,
Agonized hopes, and ashen flowers!

The winds are sometimes sad to me,
The starry spaces, full of fear;
Mine is the sorrow on the sea,
And mine the sigh of places drear

5

Some players upon plaintive strings
Publish their wistfulness abroad;
I have not spoken of these things,
Save to one man, and unto God.

THE DARK ANGEL

Dark Angel, with thine aching lust
To rid the world of penitence;
Malicious Angel, who still dost
My soul such subtle violence!

Because of thee, no thought, no thing, 5
Abides for me undesecrate.
Dark Angel, ever on the wing,
Who never reachest me too late!

When music sounds, then changest thou
Its silvery to a sultry fire, 10
Nor will thine envious heart allow Delight untortured by desire

Through thee, the gracious Muses turn
To Furies, O mine Enemy!
And all the things of beauty burn 15
With flames of evil ecstasy.

Because of thee, the land of dreams
Becomes a gathering place of fears,
Until tormented slumber seems 20
One vehemence of useless tears.

When sunlight glows upon the flowers,
Or ripples down the dancing sea,
Thou, with thy troop of passionate powers,
Beleaguerest, bewilderest, me

Within the breath of autumn woods, 25
Within the wintry silences,
Thy venomous spirit stirs and broods,
O Master of impieties!

The ardor of red flame is thine,
And thine the steely soul of ice; 30
Thou poisonest the fair design
Of nature, with unfair device.

Apples of ashes, golden bright;
Waters of bitterness, how sweet!
O banquet of a foul delight, 35
Prepared by thee, dark Paraclete!

Thou art the whisper in the gloom,
The hinting tone, the haunting laugh;
Thou art the adorer of my tomb,
The minstrel of mine epitaph. 40

I fight thee, in the Holy Name!
Yet, what thou dost, is what God saith,

The Dark Angel 4 subtle, insidious 13-14 Muses
... Furies See note on Meredith's Hard Weather, 29-30, page 603 36 Paraclete, advocate—a term applied by St
John to the Holy Spirit as man's guardian angel, but by Johnson to his dark angel

Tempter! should I escape thy flame,
Thou wilt have helped my soul from Death —

The second Death, that never dies, 45
That cannot die, when time is dead;
Live Death, wherein the lost soul cries,
Eternally uncomforted.

Dark Angel, with thine aching lust!
Of two defeats, of two despairs: 50
Less dread, a change to drifting dust,
Than thine eternity of cares.

Do what thou wilt, thou shalt not so,
Dark Angel! triumph over me
Lonely, unto the Lone I go; 55
Divine, to the Divinity. (1893)

THE RED WIND

Red Wind from out the East,
Red Wind of blight and blood!
Ah, when wilt thou have ceased
Thy bitter, stormy flood?

Red Wind from over sea, 5
Scourging our lonely land!
What Angel loosened thee
Out of his iron hand?

Red Wind! whose word of might Winged thee with wings of flame? 10
O fire of mournful night,
What is thy master's name?

Red Wind! who bade thee burn,
Branding our hearts? Who bade
Thee on and never turn, 15
Till waste our souls were laid?

Red Wind! from out the West
Pour winds of Paradise,
Winds of eternal rest,
That weary souls entice. 20

Wind of the East! Red Wind!
Thou witherest the soft breath
Of Paradise the kind,
Red Wind of burning death!

O Red Wind! hear God's voice; 25
Hear thou, and fall, and cease.
Let Inisfail rejoice
In her Hesperian peace. (1894)

ERNEST DOWSON
(1867-1900)

NUNS OF THE PERPETUAL ADORATION

Calm, sad, secure, behind high convent walls,
These watch the sacred lamp, these watch
and pray

And it is one with them when evening falls,
And one with them the cold return of
day.

These heed not time, their nights and days
they make 5

Into a long, returning rosary,
Whereon their lives are threaded for Christ's sake;
Meekness and vigilance and chastity.

A vowed patrol, in silent companies,
Life-long they keep before the living
Christ. 10

In the dim church, their prayers and penances
Are fragrant incense to the Sacrificed.

Outside, the world is wild and passionate,
Man's weary laughter and his sick despair

Entreat at their impenetrable gate; 15
They heed no voices in their dream of prayer.

They saw the glory of the world displayed,
They saw the bitter of it, and the sweet,
They knew the roses of the world should fade,
And be trod under by the hurrying feet 20

Therefore they rather put away desire,
And crossed their hands and came to sanctuary

And veiled their heads and put on coarse attire
Because their comeliness was vanity.

And there they rest, they have serene in-
sight

Of the illuminating dawn to be, 26
Mary's sweet Star dispels for them the night,
The proper darkness of humanity

Calm, sad, secure, with faces worn and mild:

Surely their choice of vigil is the best? 30
Yea! for our roses fade, the world is wild,
But there, beside the altar, there, is rest

VITÆ SUMMA BREVIS SPEM NOS
VETAT INCOHARE LONGAM

They are not long, the weeping and the
laughter,
Love and desire and hate,
I think they have no portion in us after
We pass the gate.

They are not long, the days of wine and roses; 5
Out of a misty dream
Our path emerges for a while, then closes
Within a dream.

NON SUM QUALIS ERAM BONÆ SUB
REGNO CYNARÆ

Last night, ah, yesternight, betwixt her lips and mine

There fell thy shadow, Cynara! thy breath was shed

Upon my soul between the kisses and the
wine,

And I was desolate and sick of an old passion, Yea, I was desolated and bowed my
head — 5

I have been faithful to thee, Cynara! in my
fashion.

All night upon mine heart I felt her warm heart beat,

Night-long within mine arms in love and sleep she lay;

Surely the kisses of her bought red mouth
were sweet,

But I was desolate and sick of an old passion,
When I awoke and found the dawn was
gray — 11

I have been faithful to thee, Cynara! in my fashion.

I have forgot much, Cynara! gone with the wind,

Flung roses, roses riotously with the throng,
Dancing, to put thy pale, lost lilies out of
mind; 15

But I was desolate and sick of an old passion, Yea, all the time, because the dance was
long —

I have been faithful to thee, Cynara! in my fashion.

The title means The Short Span of Life Forbids Us to Encourage Prolonged Hope (Horace, Odes, Book 1, Ode 4, line 15) Non Sum Qualis Eram Bonæ Sub Regno Cynaræ The title means I Am Not What Once I Was in Kind Cynara's Day (Horace, Odes, Book 4, Ode 1, lines 3-4) Dowson takes the name of the lady from Horace, but develops a wholly different idea

I cried for madder music and for stronger
 wine,
 But when the feast is finished and the lamps
 expire, 20
 Then falls thy shadow, Cynara! the night
 is thine;
 And I am desolate and sick of an old passion
 Yea, hungry for the lips of my desire —
 I have been faithful to thee, Cynara! in my
 fashion. (1896)

AMOR PROFANUS

Beyond the pale of memory,
 In some mysterious dusky grove,
 A place of shadows utterly,
 Where never coos the turtle-dove,
 A world forgotten of the sun, 5
 I dreamed we met when day was done,
 And marveled at our ancient love.

Met there by chance, long kept apart,
 We wandered through the darkling glades;
 And that old language of the heart 10
 We sought to speak — alas! poor shades!
 Over our pallid lips had run
 The waters of oblivion,
 Which crown all loves of men or maids.

In vain we stammered, from afar 15
 Our old desire shone cold and dead.
 That time was distant as a star,
 When eyes were bright and lips were red.
 And still we went with downcast eye
 And no delight in being nigh, 20
 Poor shadows most uncomfortable.

Ah, Lalage! while life is ours,
 Hoard not thy beauty rose and white,
 But pluck the pretty, fleeting flowers
 That deck our little path of light; 25
 For all too soon we twain shall tread
 The bitter pastures of the dead —
 Estranged, sad specters of the night.

YVONNE OF BRITTANY

In your mother's apple orchard,
 Just a year ago, last spring —
 Do you remember, Yvonne!

Amor Profanus The title means Profane Love. The distinction between sacred and profane love—the spiritual and the physical—is one made by Plato and Spenser. It is the theme of one of Titian's famous paintings.

22 Lalage, a lady who is the subject of Horace's fifth Ode, Book 2. 23-24 Hoard . . . flowers. Cf. Herrick's Gather Ye Rosebuds While Ye May and the Carpe Diem of Horace, Odes, Book 1, Ode 11.

Yvonne of Brittany Brittany is a province in the north-western part of France, originally a Celtic kingdom.

The dear trees lavishing
 Rain of their starry blossoms 5
 To make you a coronet?
 Do you remember, Yvonne?
 As I remember yet

In your mother's apple orchard,
 When the world was left behind; 10
 You were shy, so shy, Yvonne!
 But your eyes were calm and kind.
 We spoke of the apple harvest,
 When the cider press is set,
 And such-like trifles, Yvonne! 15
 That doubtless you forget.

In the still, soft Breton twilight,
 We were silent, words were few,
 Till your mother came out chiding,
 For the grass was bright with dew. 20
 But I know your heart was beating,
 Like a fluttered, frightened dove.
 Do you ever remember, Yvonne?
 That first faint flush of love?

In the fullness of midsummer, 25
 When the apple-bloom was shed,
 Oh, brave was your surrender,
 Though shy the words you said
 I was so glad, so glad, Yvonne!
 To have led you home at last; 30
 Do you ever remember, Yvonne!
 How swiftly the days passed?

In your mother's apple orchard
 It is grown too dark to stray,
 There is none to chide you, Yvonne! 35
 You are over-far away.
 There is dew on your grave grass, Yvonne!
 But your feet it shall not wet —
 No, you never remember, Yvonne!
 And I shall soon forget. 40

YOU WOULD HAVE UNDERSTOOD ME

Ah, dans ces mornes séjours
 Les jamais sont les toujours
 — Paul Verlaine.

You would have understood me, had you waited;
 I could have loved you, dear! as well as he —
 Had we not been impatient, dear! and fated
 Always to disagree.

17 Breton, of Brittany
You Would Have Understood Me Ah, toujours, "In these dreary regions, never is forever" Paul Verlaine was a French lyric poet (1844-96) much admired by Dowson, the quotation is from Reversibilité

What is the use of speech? Silence were fitter, 5
Lest we should still be wishing things unsaid.

Though all the words we ever spake were bitter,
Shall I reproach you dead?

Nay, let this earth, your portion, likewise
cover

All the old anger, setting us apart 10
Always, in all, in truth was I your lover;
Always, I held your heart.

I have met other women who were tender,
As you were cold, dear! with a grace as rare Think you I turned to them, or made surrender, 15
I who had found you fair?

Had we been patient, dear! ah, had you
waited,
I had fought death for you, better than
he;
But from the very first, dear! we were fated
Always to disagree. 20

Late, late, I come to you, now death dis-closes
Love that in life was not to be our part;
On your low lying mound between the roses,
Sadly I cast my heart.

I would not waken you — nay! this is fitter; 25
Death and the darkness give you unto me, Here we who loved so, were so cold and
bitter,
Hardly can disagree. (1896)

BEATA SOLITUDO

What land of Silence
Where pale stars shine
On apple-blossom
And dew-drenched vine,
Is yours and mine? 5

The silent valley
That we will find,
Where all the voices
Of humankind
Are left behind. 10

There all forgetting,
Forgotten quite,
We will repose us,
With our delight
Hid out of sight. 15

Beata Solitudo The title means Blessed Solitude

The world forsaken,
And out of mind
Honor and labor,
We shall not find
The stars unkind. 20

And men shall travail,
And laugh and weep;
But we have vistas
Of gods asleep,
With dreams as deep. 25

A land of Silence,
Where pale stars shine
On apple-blossoms
And dew-drenched vine,
Be yours and mine! (1896) 30

GRAY NIGHTS

A while we wandered (thus it is I dream!)
Through a long, sandy track of No Man's
Land,
Where only poppies grew among the sand,
The which we, plucking, cast with scant esteem,
And ever sadder, into the sad stream, 5
Which followed us, as we went, hand in hand,
Under the estranged stars, a road unplanned,
Seeing all things in the shadow of a dream.
And ever sadder, as the stars expired,
We found the poppies rarer, till thine eyes 10
Grown all my light, to light me were too tired,
And at their darkening, that no surmise
Might haunt me of the lost days we desired,
After them all I flung those memories! (1896)

CHANSON SANS PAROLES

In the deep violet air,
Not a leaf is stirred,
There is no sound heard,
But afar, the rare
Trilled voice of a bird. 5

Is the wood's dim heart,
And the fragrant pine,
Incense, and a shrine
Of her coming? Apart,
I wait for a sign 10

She will hear, and forsake,

Gray Nights 3 poppies The poppy is the flower of
oblivion
Chanson sans Paroles The title means A Song without Words It was frequently given by Mendelssohn (1809-47), famous German musical composer, to his compositions

Swift, for my sake,
Her green, grassy bed —
She will hear and awake! 15

She will hearken and glide,
From her place of deep rest,
Dove-eyed, with the breast
Of a dove, to my side,
The pines bow their crest. 20

I wait for a sign:
The leaves to be waved,
The tall tree-tops laved
In a flood of sunshine,
This world to be saved! 25

Not a leaf is stirred;
There is no sound heard,
But afar, the rare
Trilled voice of a bird.* (1896)

CARTHUSIANS

Through what long heaviness, assayed in what strange fire,
Have these white monks been brought into the way of peace,
Despising the world's wisdom and the world's
desire,
Which from the body of this death bring no release?

Within their austere walls no voices penetrate, 5
A sacred silence only, as of death, obtains, Nothing finds entry here of loud or passionate,
This quiet is the exceeding profit of their pains.

From many lands they came, in divers fiery
ways,
Each knew at last the vanity of earthly joys; 10
And one was crowned with thorns, and one was crowned with bays,
And each was tired at last of the world's foolish noise.

It was not theirs with Dominic to preach
God's holy wrath,

Carthusians The Carthusians are an order of monks founded by St Bruno in 1084, they wear white robes, observe strict discipline, and live as hermits in separate dwellings within the common walls

11 bays, laurel wreaths emblematic of fame won in the world before entrance into the monastery 13 Dominic, founder (1216) of the Dominican order of Black Friars, distinguished for their ability as preachers and theologians.

They were too stern to bear sweet Francis'
gentle sway;
Theirs was a higher calling and a steeper
path, 15
To dwell alone with Christ, to meditate
and pray.

A cloistered company, they are companion-
less,
None knoweth here the secret of his brother's heart:
They are but come together for more loneliness,
Whose bond is solitude and silence all their part. 20

O beatific life! Who is there shall gainsay,
Your great refusal's victory, your little loss,
Deserting vanity for the more perfect way,
The sweeter service of the most dolorous Cross.

Ye shall prevail at last! Surely ye shall prevail! 25
Your silence and austerity shall win at
last;
Desire and mirth, the world's ephemeral
lights shall fail,
The sweet star of your queen is never overcast.

We fling up flowers and laugh, we laugh
across the wine;
With wine we dull our souls and careful strains of art, 30
Our cups are polished skulls round which the roses twine.
None dares to look at Death who leers
and lurks apart.

Move on, white company, whom that has not sufficed!
Our viols cease, our wine is death, our roses fail:
Pray for our heedlessness, O dwellers with the Christ! 35
Though the world fall apart, surely ye shall prevail. (1899)

VILLANELLE OF THE POET'S ROAD

Wine and woman and song,
Three things garnish our way;
Yet is day over long.

14 Francis, St Francis of Assisi, founder (1210) of the Franciscan order of Grey Friars, who vow themselves to the imitation of Christ in gentleness and poverty
Villanelle of the Poet's Road A villanelle is an old French lyric form characterized by the set repetition of lines, compare Dobson's On a Nankin Plate, page 766

Lest we do our youth wrong,
Gather them while we may: 5
Wine and woman and song.

Three things render us strong,
Vine leaves, kisses, and bay;
Yet is day over long.

Unto us they belong, 10
Us the bitter and gay,
Wine and woman and song.

We, as we pass along,
Are sad that they will not stay;
Yet is day over long. 15

Fruits and flowers among,
What is better than they:
Wine and woman and song?
Yet is day over long. (1899)

TO ONE IN BEDLAM

With delicate, mad hands, behind his sordid
bars,
Surely he hath his posies, which they tear
and twine;
Those scentless wisps of straw, that miserably
line
His strait, caged universe, whereat the dull world stares,
Pedant and pitiful. Oh, how his rapt gaze wars
With their stupidity! Know they what dreams divine 6
Lift his long, laughing reveries like enchanted
wine,
And make his melancholy germane to the
stars?
O lamentable brother! if those pity thee,
Am I not fain of all thy lone eyes promise
me; 10
Half a fool's kingdom, far from men who sow and reap,
All their days, vanity? Better than mortal
flowers,
Thy moon-kissed roses seem: better than love or sleep,
The star-crowned solitude of thine oblivious
hours! (1899)

A LAST WORD

Let us go hence — the night is now at hand,
The day is overworn, the birds all flown;
And we have reaped the crops the gods
have sown,
Despair and death; deep darkness o'er the
land, 4

8 bay, the laurel-wreath won for excellence in song

Broods like an owl; we cannot understand
Laughter or tears, for we have only known
Surpassing vanity: vain things alone
Have driven our perverse and aimless band

Let us go hence, somewhither strange and
cold,
To Hollow Lands where just men and unjust 10
Find end of labor, where's rest for the old,
Freedom to all from love and fear and lust.
Twine our torn hands! O pray the earth enfold
Our life-sick hearts and turn them into dust. (1899)

JOHN DAVIDSON (1857-1909)

TO THE NEW WOMEN

Free to look at fact,
Free to come and go,
Free to think and act,
Now you surely know
The wrongs of womanhead 5
At last are fairly dead.

Abler than man to vex,
Less able to be good,
Fiercer in your sex,
Wilder in your mood, 10
Seeking — who knows what?
About the world you grope;
Some of you have thought
Man may be your hope.

Soon again you'll see, 15
Love and love alone,
As simple as can be,
Can make this life atone.

Be bold and yet be bold,
But be not overbold, 20
Although the knell is tolled
Of the tyranny of old.

And meet your splendid doom,
On heaven-scaling wings,
Women, from whose bright womb 25
The radiant future springs! (1894)

TO THE NEW MEN

Heat the furnace hot;
Smelt the things of thought
Into dross and dew;
Mold the world anew.

To the New Women 19-20 Be bold . . . overbold "Be bold, be bold, but not too bold" is the inscription over the door of the robber's castle in the old English folk-tale Mr Fox

More than earth and sea 5
Is a heart and eye;
Gird yourselves, and try
All the powers that be.

Wicked, cease at once
Troubling; wearied eyes, 10
Rest you now, while suns
Dawn and moons arise

'Stablish heaven today;
Cleanse the beast-marked brow;
Wipe all tears away. 15
Do it — do it now!

Love, and hope, and know;
Man — you must adore him.
Let the whole past go,
Think God's thought before Him. 20

Knowledge is power? Above
All else, knowledge is love.

Heat the furnace hot;
Smelt the world-old thought
Into dross and dew; 25
Mold the earth anew. (1894)

A BALLAD OF HEAVEN

He wrought at one great work for years;
The world passed by with lofty look
Sometimes his eyes were dashed with tears,
Sometimes his lips with laughter shook

His wife and child went clothed in rags, 5
And in a windy garret starved;
He trod his measures on the flags,
And high in heaven his music carved

Wistful he grew, but never feared;
For always on the midnight skies 10
His rich orchestral score appeared
In stars and zones and galaxies.

He thought to copy down his score;
The moonlight was his lamp; he said,
"Listen, my love"; but on the floor 15
His wife and child were lying dead.

Her hollow eyes were open wide;
He deemed she heard with special zest:
Her death's-head infant coldly eyed
The desert of her shrunken breast. 20

14 beast-marked, marked by Antichrist See Revelation, 19 20 — "And the beast was taken, and with him the false prophet that wrought miracles before him, with which he deceived them that had received the mark of the beast, and them that worshipped his image"
A Ballad of Heaven. 7 flags, paving stones 12 zones, divisions of the heavens by astronomical parallels. galaxies, such swarms of stars as the Milky Way.

"Listen, my love: my work is done,
I tremble as I touch the page
To sign the sentence of the sun
And crown the great eternal age.

"The slow adagio begins; 25
The winding-sheets are raveled out
That swathe the minds of men, the sins
That wrap their rotting souls about

"The dead are heralded along
With silver trumps and golden drums, 30
And flutes and oboes, keen and strong,
My brave andante singing comes

"Then like a python's sumptuous dress
The frame of things is cast away,
And out of Time's obscure distress, 35
The thundering scherzo crashes Day.

"For three great orchestras I hope
My mighty music shall be scored;
On three high hills they shall have scope
With heaven's vault for a sounding-board

"Sleep well, love; let your eyelids fall; 41
Cover the child; good-night, and if . . .
What? Speak . . . the traitorous end of all!
Both . . . cold and hungry . . . cold and stiff!

"But no, God means us well, I trust. 45
Dear ones, be happy, hope is nigh;
We are too young to fall to dust,
And too unsatisfied to die "

He lifted up against his breast
The woman's body, stark and wan; 50
And to her withered bosom pressed
The little skin-clad skeleton.

"You see you are alive," he cried
He rocked them gently to and fro
"No, no, my love, you have not died; 55
Nor you, my little fellow; no "

Long in his arms he strained his dead
And crooned an antique lullaby;
Then laid them on the lowly bed,
And broke down with a doleful cry 60

"The love, the hope, the blood, the brain,
Of her and me, the budding life,
And my great music — all in vain!
My unscored work, my child, my wife!

"We drop into oblivion, 65
And nourish some suburban sod;

25, 32, 36 adagio, andante, scherzo, movements in a symphony slow, moderately rapid, and quick, cf Henley's London Voluntaries, page 788 64 unscored work, unwritten music

My work, this woman, this my son,
Are now no more: there is no God.

"The world's a dustbin; we are due,
And death's cart waits: be life accurst!" 70
He stumbled down beside the two,
And clasping them, his great heart burst.

Straightway he stood at heaven's gate,
Abashed and trembling for his sin;
I trow he had not long to wait, 75
For God came out and let him in.

And then there ran a radiant pair,
Ruddy with haste and eager-eyed,
To meet him first upon the stair —
His wife and child beatified. 80

They clad him in a robe of light,
And gave him heavenly food to eat;
Great seraphs praised him to the height,
Archangels sat about his feet.

God, smiling, took him by the hand, 85
And led him to the brink of heaven;
He saw where systems whirling stand,
Where galaxies like snow are driven.

Dead silence reigned; a shudder ran Through space; Time furled his wearied 90
wings;
A slow adagio then began,
Sweetly resolving troubled things.

The dead were heralded along;
As if with drums and trumps of flame,
And flutes and oboes keen and strong, 95
A brave andante singing came

Then like a python's sumptuous dress,
The frame of things was cast away,
And out of Time's obscure distress
The conquering scherzo thundered Day. 100

He doubted; but God said, "Even so;
Nothing is lost that's wrought with tears.
The music that you made below
Is now the music of the spheres "

(1894)

A BALLAD OF HELL

"A letter from my love today!
Oh, unexpected, dear appeal!"
She struck a happy tear away,
And broke the crimson seal.

83 seraphs, angels of a superior order 104 music.
spheres The ancients believed that the stars made music
as their spheres revolved.

"My love, there is no help on earth, 5
No help in heaven; the dead-man's bell
Must toll our wedding; our first hearth
Must be the well-paved floor of hell "

The color died from out her face,
Her eyes like ghostly candles shone; 10
She cast dread looks about the place,
Then clenched her teeth and read right on.

"I may not pass the prison door;
Here must I rot from day to day,
Unless I wed whom I abhor, 15
My cousin, Blanche of Valencay.

"At midnight with my dagger keen,
I'll take my life; it must be so.
Meet me in hell tonight, my queen,
For weal and woe." 20

She laughed although her face was wan;
She girded on her golden belt;
She took her jeweled ivory fan,
And at her glowing missal knelt.

Then rose, "And am I mad?" she said. 25
She broke her fan, her belt untied;
With leather girt herself instead,
And stuck a dagger at her side.

She waited, shuddering in her room,
Till sleep had fallen on all the house. 30
She never flinched; she faced her doom:
The two must sin to keep their vows

Then out into the night she went,
And stooping crept by hedge and tree,
Her rose-bush flung a snare of scent, 35
And caught a happy memory

She fell, and lay a minute's space;
She tore the sward in her distress;
The dewy grass refreshed her face;
She rose and ran with lifted dress. 40

She started like a morn-caught ghost
Once when the moon came out and stood
To watch; the naked road she crossed,
And dived into the murmuring wood.

The branches snatched her streaming cloak,
A live thing shrieked; she made no stay! 46
She hurried to the trysting-oak —
Right well she knew the way

Without a pause she bared her breast,
And drove her dagger home and fell, 50

24 missal, a book of the Mass 41 morn-caught ghost. According to folk-belief, spirits may wander abroad in the hours of darkness, but must return to their graves before dawn on penalty of infinite torture See the folk-ballad The Wife of Usher's Well

And lay like one that takes her rest,
And died and wakened up in hell.

She bathed her spirit in the flame,
And near the center took her post;
From all sides to her ears there came, 55
The dreary anguish of the lost.

The devil started at her side,
Comely, and tall, and black as jet.
"I am young Malespina's bride;
Has he come hither yet?" 60

"My poppet, welcome to your bed "
"Is Malespina here?"
"Not he! Tomorrow he must wed
His cousin Blanche, my dear!"

"You lie, he died with me tonight " 65
"Not he! it was a plot " "You lie."
"My dear, I never lie outright "
"We died at midnight, he and I "

The devil went. Without a groan
She, gathered up in one fierce prayer, 70
Took root in hell's midst all alone,
And waited for him there.

She dared to make herself at home
Amidst the wall, the uneasy stir
The blood-stained flame that filled the dome,
Scentless and silent, shrouded her 76

How long she stayed I cannot tell,
But when she felt his perfidy,
She marched across the floor of hell;
And all the damned stood up to see. 80

The devil stopped her at the brink.
She shook him off, she cried, "Away!"
"My dear, you have gone mad, I think."
"I was betrayed;— I will not stay."

Across the weltering deep she ran; 85
A stranger thing was never seen.
The damned stood silent to a man,
They saw the great gulf set between

To her it seemed a meadow fair,
And flowers sprang up about her feet, 90
She entered heaven; she climbed the stair,
And knelt down at the mercy-seat.

Seraphs and saints with one great voice
Welcomed that soul that knew not fear;
Amazed to find it could rejoice, 95
Hell raised a hoarse half-human cheer.

THIRTY BOB A WEEK

I couldn't touch a stop and turn a screw,
And set the blooming world a-work for me,
Like such as cut their teeth — I hope, like
you —

On the handle of a skeleton gold key;
I cut mine on a leek, which I eat it every week; 5
I'm a clerk at thirty bob, as you can see

But I don't allow it's luck and all a toss;
There's no such thing as being starved and
crossed;
It's just the power of some to be a boss,
And the bally power of others to be bossed.
I face the music, sir; you bet I ain't a cur; 11
Strike me lucky if I don't believe I'm lost!

For like a mole I journey in the dark,
A-traveling along the underground
From my Pillared Halls and broad Suburban
Park, 15

To come the daily dull official round,
And home again at night with my pipe all alight,
A-scheming how to count ten bob a pound

And it's often very cold and wet,
And my missis stitches towels for a hunks,
And the Pillared Halls is half of it to let — 21
Three rooms about the size of traveling trunks

And we cough, my wife and I, to dislocate a
sigh,
When the noisy little kids are in their bunks.

But you never hear her do a growl or whine,
For she's made of flint and roses, very odd,
And I've got to cut my meaning rather fine,
Or I'd blubber, for I'm made of greens and sod.

So p'r'aps we are in Hell for all that I can tell,
And lost and damned and served up hot to
God. 30

I ain't blaspheming, Mr. Silver-tongue;
I'm saying things a bit beyond your art
Of all the rummy starts you ever sprung,
Thirty bob a week's the rummiest start!
With your science and your books and your the'ries about spooks, 35
Did you ever hear of looking in your heart?

I didn't mean your pocket, Mr , no —
I mean that having children and a wife,

Thirty Bob a Week A bob is a shilling—about twenty-five cents

10 bally, an intensifying adjective without definite meaning 18 count pound, make ten shillings go as far as a pound (twenty shillings) 20 hunks, stingy old man

With thirty bob on which to come and go,
 Isn't dancing to the tabor and the fife; 40
 When it doesn't make you drink, by Heaven!
 it makes you think,
 And notice curious items about life.

I step into my heart and there I meet
 A god-almighty devil singing small,
 Who would like to shout and whistle in the
 street, 45
 And squelch the passers flat against the wall;
 If the whole world was a cake he had the power to take,
 He would take it, ask for more, and eat
 it all.

And I meet a sort of simpleton beside,
 The kind that life is always giving beans;
 With thirty bob a week to keep a bride 51
 He fell in love and married in his teens.
 At thirty bob he stuck; but he knows it isn't luck;
 He knows the seas are deeper than tureens

And the god-almighty devil and the fool 55
 That meet me in the High Street on the strike,
 When I walk about my heart a-gathering
 wool,
 Are my good and evil angels if you like.
 And both of them together in every kind of weather
 Ride me like a double-seated bike. 60

That's rough a bit and needs its meaning
 curled
 But I have a high old hot un in my mind —
 A most engrugious notion of the world,
 That leaves your lightning 'rithmetic behind:
 I give it at a glance when I say "There ain't no chance, 65
 Nor nothing of the lucky-lottery kind "

And it's this way that I make it out to be:
 No fathers, mothers, countries, climates —
 none;
 Not Adam was responsible for me,
 Nor society, nor systems, nary one; 70
 A little sleeping seed, I woke — I did, indeed —
 A million years before the blooming sun.

I woke because I thought the time had come,
 Beyond my will there was no other cause,
 And everywhere I found myself at home, 75
 Because I chose to be the thing I was;

And in whatever shape of mollusc or of ape
 I always went according to the laws.

I was the love that chose my mother out, 79
 I joined two lives and from the union burst,
 My weakness and my strength without a doubt
 Are mine alone forever from the first,
 It's just the very same with a difference in the
 name
 As "Thy will be done " You say it if you durst!

They say it daily up and down the land 85
 As easy as you take a drink, it's true;
 But the difficultest go to understand,
 And the difficultest job a man can do,
 Is to come it brave and meek with thirty bob
 a week,
 And feel that that's the proper thing for
 you. 90

It's a naked child against a hungry wolf,
 It's playing bowls upon a splitting wreck,
 It's walking on a string across a gulf
 With millstones fore-and-aft about your
 neck;
 But the thing is daily done by many and many a one, 95
 And we fall, face downward, fighting, on the deck.

LONDON

Athwart the sky a lowly sigh
 From west to east the sweet wind carried,
 The sun stood still on Primrose Hill;
 His light in all the city tarried;
 The clouds on viewless columns bloomed 5
 Like smoldering lilies unconsumed.

"Oh, sweetheart, see! How shadowy,
 Of some occult magician's rearing,
 Or swung in space of heaven's grace
 Dissolving, dimly reappearing, 10
 Afloat upon ethereal tides
 St Paul's above the city rides!"

A rumor broke through the thin smoke,
 Enwreathing abbey, tower, and palace,
 The parks, the squares, the thoroughfares, 15
 The million-peopled lanes and alleys,
 An ever-muttering prisoned storm,
 The heart of London beating warm.

MIDSUMMER DAY

BASIL SANDY HERBERT

Sandy. I cannot write, I cannot think;
'Tis half delight and half distress:
My memory stumbles on the brink
Of some unfathomed happiness —

Of some old happiness divine. 5
What haunting scent, what haunting note,
What word, or what melodious line,
Sends my heart throbbing to my throat?

Basil. What? thrilled with happiness today,
The longest day in all the year, 10
Which we must spend in making hay
By thrashing straw in Fleet Street here!

What scent? what sound? The odor stale
Of watered streets; the bruit loud
Of hoof and wheel on road and rail, 15
The rush and trample of the crowd!

Herbert. Humming the song of many a lark,
Out of the sea, across the shires,
The west wind blows about the park,
And faintly stirs the Fleet Street wires 20

Perhaps it sows the happy seed
That blossoms in your memory;
Certain of many a western mead,
And hill and stream it speaks to me.

With rosy showers of apple-bloom 25
The orchard sward is mantled deep;
Shaded in some sequestered coomb
The red deer in the Quantocks sleep.

Basil. Go on; of rustic visions tell
Till I forget the wilderness 30
Of sooty brick, the dusty smell,
The jangle of the printing-press.

Herbert. I hear the woodman's measured
stroke;
I see the amber streamlet glide —
Above, the green gold of the oak 35
Fledges the gorge on either side.

A thatched roof shines athwart the gloom
Of the high moorland's darksome ground,
Far off the surging rollers boom,
And fill the shadowy wood with sound 40

Basil. You have pronounced the magic sign!
The city with its thousand years,

Like some embodied mood of mine
Uncouth, prodigious, disappears.

I stand upon a lowly bridge, 45
Moss-grown beside the old Essex home;
Over the distant purple ridge
The clouds arise in sultry foam;

In many a cluster, wreath, and chain,
A silvery vapor hangs on high, 50
And snowy scarfs of silken grain
Bedeck the blue slopes of the sky;

The wandering water sighs and calls,
And breaks into a chant that rings
Beneath the vaulted bridge, then falls 55
And under heaven softly sings;

A light wind lingers here and there,
And whispers in an unknown tongue
The passionate secrets of the air,
That never may by man be sung 60

Low, low, it whispers; stays; and goes;
It comes again; again takes flight;
And like a subtle presence grows
And almost gathers into sight.

Sandy. The wind that stirs the Fleet Street wires, 65
And roams and quests about the park,
That wanders all across the shires,
Humming the song of many a lark —

The wind — it is the wind, whose breath,
Perfumed with roses, wakes in me 70
From shrouded slumbers deep as death
A yet unfaded memory.

Basil. About midsummer, every hour
Ten thousand rosebuds opening blush,
The land is all one rosy bower, 75
And rosy odors haunt and flush

The winds of heaven up and down.
On the top-gallant of the air
The lark, the pressman in the town
Breathe only rosy incense rare. 80

Sandy. And I, enchanted by the rose,
Remember when I first began
To know what in its bosom glows
Exhaling scent ambrosian.

A child, at home in streets and quays, 85
The city tumult in my brain,
I only knew of tarnished trees,
And skies corroding vapors stain.

One summer — Time upon my head
Had showered the curls of years eleven —
Me, for a month, good fortune led 91
Where trees are green and hills kiss heaven.

Midsummer Day 12 Fleet Street, a London thoroughfare, see Henley's London Voluntaries, page 788 14 bruit, noise, clamor. 27. coomb, a narrow valley between rocky hills 28 Quantocks, the Quantock Hills, a low range in Somersetshire, southwestern England, associated with the early poems of Wordsworth and Coleridge

By glen and mountain, moor and lawn,
Burn-side and sheep-path, day and night,
I wandered, a belated faun, 95
All sense, all wonder, all delight.

And once at eve I climbed a hill,
Burning to see the sun appear,
And watched the jeweled darkness fill
With lamps and clustered tapers clear. 100

At last the strongest stars were spent;
A glimmering shadow overcame
The swarthy-purple firmament,
And throbbed and kindled into flame;

The pallid day, the trembling day 105
Put on her saffron wedding-dress,
And watched her bridegroom far away
Soar through the starry wilderness.

I clasped my hands and closed my eyes,
And tears relieved my ecstasy. 110
I dared not watch the sun arise,
Nor knew what magic daunted me,

And yet the roses seemed to tell
More than the morn, had I but known
The meaning of the fragrant smell 115
That bound me with a subtle zone.

But in the gloaming when we played
At hide-and-seek, and I with her
Behind a rose-bush hid, afraid
To meet her gaze, to breathe, or stir, 120

The dungeon of my sense was riven,
The beauty of the world laid bare,
A great wind caught me up to heaven
Upon a cloud of golden hair,

And mouth touched mouth; and love was
born; 125
And when our wondering vision blent,
We found the meaning of the morn,
The meaning of the rose's scent.

Ah me! ah me! since then! since then!

Herbert. Nay, nay; let self-reproaches be!
Now that this thought is throned again, 131
Be zealous for its sovereignty.

Basil. And brave, great Nature must be thanked
And we must worship on our knees,
And hold forever sacrosanct 135
Such dewy memories as these. (1895)

ECLOGUE: THE MERCHANTMAN

The Markethaunters

Now, while our money is piping hot
From the mint of our toil that coins the
sheaves,
Merchantman, merchantman, what have you got
In your tabernacle hung with leaves?
What have you got? 5
The sun rides high;
Our money is hot;
We must buy, buy, buy!

The Merchantman

I come from the elfin king's demesne
With chrysolite, hyacinth, tourmaline, 10
I have emeralds here of living green;
I have rubies, each like a cup of wine;
And diamonds, diamonds that never have
been
Outshone by eyes the most divine!

The Markethaunters

Jewelry? — Baubles; bad for the soul; 15
Desire of the heart and lust of the eye!
Diamonds, indeed! We wanted coal.
What else do you sell? Come, sound your cry!
Our money is hot;
The night draws nigh, 20
What have you got
That we want to buy?

The Merchantman

I have here enshrined the soul of the rose
Exhaled in the land of the daystar's birth,
I have casks whose golden staves enclose 25
Eternal youth, eternal mirth;
And cordials that bring repose,
And the tranquil night, and the end of the earth.

The Markethaunters

Rapture of wine? But it never pays;
We must keep our common-sense alert 30
Raisins are healthier, medicine says —
Raisins and almonds for dessert.
But we want to buy;
For our money is hot,
And age draws nigh. 35
What else have you got?

The Merchantman

I have lamps that gild the luster of noon;
Shadowy arrows that pierce the brain,

A RUNNABLE STAG

When the pods went pop on the broom, green
 broom,

And apples began to be golden-skinned,
 We harbored a stag in the Priory coomb,
 And we feathered his trail up-wind, up-
 wind,

We feathered his trail up-wind — 5

A stag of warrant, a stag, a stag,

A runnable stag, a kingly crop,

Brow, bay and tray and three on top,

A stag, a runnable stag.

Then the huntsman's horn rang yap, yap, 10

And "Forwards" we heard the harborer
 shout;

But 'twas only a brocket that broke a gap

In the beechen underwood, driven out,

From the underwood antlered out

By warrant and might of the stag, the stag, 15

The runnable stag, whose lordly mind
 Was bent on sleep, though beamed and tined

He stood, a runnable stag.

So we tufted the covert till afternoon

With Tinkerman's Pup and Bell-of-the-North; 20

39, 40. Dulcimers, Psalteries, stringed musical instruments

A Runnable Stag A stag, the male of the red deer, is runnable when of age and size sufficient for the chase, having at least two times at the top of the horn

1 broom, a stiff shrub with yellow flowers and stiff green branches 3 harbored, started from cover coomb, a narrow valley between rocky hills 4 feathered, set the hounds on the trail. 6. of warrant, of a sufficient age to be hunted 7 kingly crop, noble set of horns 8 Brow
 . . . top. The brow is the first branch from the central beam, the bay and tray horns, the second and third, the three times above would give this stag a total of six branches on each antler 12 brocket, a stag in its second year with un-branched antlers 17 beamed and tined, fully antlered
 19 tufted, beat—in an effort to start the stag

And hunters were sulky and hounds out of tune

Before we tufted the right stag forth,

Before we tufted him forth,

The stag of warrant, the wily stag,

The runnable stag with his kingly crop,

Brow, bay and tray and three on top, 26

The royal and runnable stag.

It was Bell-of-the-North and Tinkerman's
 Pup

That stuck to the scent till the copse was
 drawn. 29

"Tally ho! tally ho!" and the hunt was up,

The tufters whipped and the pack laid on,

The resolute pack laid on,

And the stag of warrant away at last,

The runnable stag, the same, the same,

His hoofs on fire, his horns like flame, 35

A stag, a runnable stag.

"Let your gelding be — if you check or chide
 He stumbles at once and you're out of the hunt;

For three hundred gentlemen, able to ride,

On hunters accustomed to bear the brunt,

Accustomed to bear the brunt, 41

Are after the runnable stag, the stag,

The runnable stag with his kingly crop,

Brow, bay and tray and three on top,

The right, the runnable stag." 45

By perilous paths in coomb and dell,

The heather, the rocks, and the river-bed,

The pace grew hot, for the scent lay well,

And a runnable stag goes right ahead.

The quarry went right ahead — 50

Ahead, ahead, and fast and far;

His antlered crest, his cloven hoof,

Brow, bay and tray and three aloof,

The stag, the runnable stag.

For a matter of twenty miles and more, 55

By the densest hedge and the highest wall,

Through herds of bullocks he baffled the lore

Of harborer, huntsman, hounds and all,

Of harborer, hounds and all —

The stag of warrant, the wily stag, 60

For twenty miles, and five and five,

He ran, and he never was caught alive,

This stag, this runnable stag.

When he turned at bay in the leafy gloom,

In the emerald gloom where the brook ran
 deep 65

He heard in the distance the rollers boom,

And he saw in a vision of peaceful sleep

In a wonderful vision of sleep,

29 copse was drawn, thicket was searched

A stag of warrant, a stag, a stag,
A runnable stag in a jeweled bed, 70
Under the sheltering ocean dead,
A stag, a runnable stag.

So a fateful hope lit up his eye,
And he opened his nostrils wide again,
And he tossed his branching antlers high 75
As he headed the hunt down the Charlock glen,
As he raced down the echoing glen —
For five miles more, the stag, the stag,
For twenty miles, and five and five,
Not to be caught now, dead or alive, 80
The stag, the runnable stag.

Three hundred gentlemen, able to ride,
Three hundred horses as gallant and free,
Beheld him escape on the evening tide,
Far out till he sank in the Severn Sea, 85
Till he sank in the depths of the sea —
The stag, the buoyant stag, the stag
That slept at last in a jeweled bed
Under the sheltering ocean spread,
The stag, the runnable stag 90

SONG

Closes and courts and lanes,
Devious, clustered thick,
The thoroughfare, mains and drains,
People and mortar and brick,
Wood, metal, machinery, brains, 5
Pen and composing stick:
Fleet Street, but exquisite flame
In the nebula once ere day and night
Began their travail, or earth became,
And all was passionate light. 10

Networks of wire overland,
Conduits under the sea,
Aerial message from strand to strand
By lightning that travels free,
Hither in haste to hand 15
Tidings of destiny
These tingling nerves of the world's affairs
Deliver remorseless, rendering still
The fall of empires, the price of shares,
The record of good and ill 20

Tidal the traffic goes
Citywards out of the town;
Townwards the evening ebb o'erflows
This highway of old renown,

85 Severn Sea, the Bristol Channel, at the mouth of the Severn River
Song 1 Closes, enclosed plots of ground 7 Fleet
Street, a short but very busy street in the heart of London.

When the fog-woven curtains close, 25
And the urban night comes down,
Where souls are split and intellects spent
O'er news vociferant near and far,
From Hesperus hard to the Orient,
From dawn to the evening star 30

This is the royal refrain
That burdens the boom and the thud
Of omnibus, mobus, wain,
And the hoofs on the beaten mud,
From the Griffin at Chancery Lane 35
To the portal of old King Lud —
Fleet Street, diligent night and day,
Of news the mart and the burnished hearth,
Seven hundred paces of narrow way,
A notable bit of the earth (1909)

THE POPPY

TO MONICA

Summer set lip to earth's bosom bare,
And left the flushed print in a poppy there,
Like a yawn of fire from the grass it came,
And the fanning wind puffed it to flapping
flame.

With burnt mouth, red like a lion's, it drank s
The blood of the sun as he slaughtered sank,
And dipped its cup in the purpurate shine
When the eastern conduits ran with wine,

Till it grew lethargied with fierce bliss,
And hot as a swinkéd gypsy is, 10
And drowsed in sleepy savageries,
With mouth wide a-pout for a sultry kiss

A child and man paced side by side,
Treading the skirts of eventide;
But between the clasp of his hand and hers
Lay, felt not, twenty withered years. 16

She turned, with the rout of her dusk South
hair,
And saw the sleeping gypsy there,
And snatched and snapped it in swift child's whim,
With — "Keep it, long as you live!" — to
him 20

The Poppy Monica is the daughter of Wilfred and Alice Meynell, Thompson's benefactors
7 purpurate, purple 10 swinkéd, wearied with toil.

And his smile, as nymphs from their laving
 meres,
 Trembled up from a bath of tears;
 And joy, like a mew sea-rocked apart,
 Tossed on the wave of his troubled heart

For he saw what she did not see, 25
 That — as kindled by its own fervency —
 The verge shriveled inward smolderingly;

And suddenly 'twixt his hand and hers
 He knew the twenty withered years —
 No flower, but twenty shriveled years 30

“Was never such thing until this hour,”
 Low to his heart he said, “the flower
 Of sleep brings waking to me,
 And of oblivion, memory.

“Was never this thing to me,” he said, 35 “Though with bruised poppies my feet are red!”

And again to his own heart very low:
 “O child! I love, for I love and know;

“But you, who love nor know at all
 The diverse chambers in Love's guest-hall, 40
 Where some rise early, few sit long.
 In how differing accents hear the throng
 His great Pentecostal tongue;

“Who know not love from amity,
 Nor my reported self from me, 45
 A fair fit gift is this, meseems,
 You give — this withering flower of dreams

“O frankly fickle, and fickle true,
 Do you know what the days will do to you?
 To your Love and you what the days will do,
 O frankly fickle, and fickle true? 51

“You have loved me, Fair, three lives — or
 days;

'Twill pass with the passing of my face
 But where I go, your face goes too,
 To watch lest I play false to you. 55

“I am but, my sweet, your foster-lover,
 Knowing well when certain years are over
 You vanish from me to another,
 Yet I know, and love, like the foster-mother.

“So, frankly fickle, and fickle true! 60
 For my brief life-while I take from you
 This token, fair and fit, meseems,
 For me — this withering flower of dreams ”

The sleep-flower sways in the wheat its
 head,
 Heavy with dreams, as that with bread, 65
 The goodly grain and the sun-flushed sleeper
 The reaper reaps, and Time the reaper

I hang 'mid men my needless head,
 And my fruit is dreams, as theirs is bread.
 The goodly men and the sun-hazed sleeper 70
 Time shall reap; but after the reaper
 The world shall glean of me, me the sleeper!

Love, love! your flower of withered dream
 In leaved rime lies safe, I deem,
 Sheltered and shut in a nook of rime, 75
 From the reaper man, and his reaper Time

Love! I fall into the claws of Time;
 But lasts within a leaved rime
 All that the world of me esteems —
 My withered dreams, my withered dreams.

THE MAKING OF VIOLA

I

The Father of Heaven

Spin, daughter Mary, spin,
 Twirl your wheel with silver din,
 Spin, daughter Mary, spin,
 Spin a tress for Viola.

Angels

Spin, Queen Mary, a 5
 Brown tress for Viola!

The Father of Heaven

Weave, hands angelical,
 Weave a woof of flesh to pall —
 Weave, hands angelical —
 Flesh to pall our Viola. 10

Angels

Weave, singing brothers, a Velvet flesh for Viola!

3

The Father of Heaven

Scoop, young Jesus, for her eyes,
 Wood-browned pools of Paradise —
 Young Jesus, for the eyes, 15
 For the eyes of Viola.

Angels

Tint, Prince Jesus, a
 Duskéd eye for Viola!

43 Pentecostal, referring to the gift of speaking in many languages bestowed upon the apostles as they were celebrating the Jewish feast of the Pentecost, (Acts, 2 5).

4

The Father of Heaven

Cast a star therein to drown,
Like a torch in cavern brown, 20
Sink a burning star to drown
Whelmed in eyes of Viola.

Angels

Lave, Prince Jesus, a
Star in eyes of Viola!

The Father of Heaven

Breathe, Lord Paraclete, 25

Child-angels, from your wings
Fall the roseal hoverings,

All things being accomplished, saith the Father of Heaven:

Bear her down, and bearing, sing,
Bear her down on spyless wing,
Bear her down, and bearing, sing,
With a sound of Viola. 40

Angels

Music as her name is, a Sweet sound of Viola!

8

Wheeling angels, past espial,
Danced her down with sound of viol, 45
Wheeling angels, past espial,
Descanting on "Viola."

Angels

Sing, in our footing, a Lovely lilt of "Viola!"

9

Baby smiled, mother wailed,
Earthward while the sweetling sailed, 50
Mother smiled, baby wailed,
When to earth came Viola.

And her elders shall say:

So soon have we taught you a Way to weep, poor Viola!

10

Smile, sweet baby, smile, 55
For you will have weeping-while;
Native in your heaven is smile —
But your weeping, Viola?

Whence your smiles, we know, but ah!
Whence your weeping, Viola? — 60
Our first gift to you is a Gift of tears, my Viola! (1893)

LITTLE JESUS

Ex ore infantum Deus et lactentium perfectisti laudem.

Little Jesus, wast Thou shy
Once, and just so small as I?
And what did it feel like to be
Out of heaven, and just like me?
Didst Thou sometimes think of there, 5
And ask where all the angels were?

I should think that I would cry
For my house all made of sky;
I would look about the air,
And wonder where my angels were; 10
And at waking 'twould distress me —
Not an angel there to dress me!

Hadst Thou ever any toys,
Like us little girls and boys?
And didst Thou play in heaven with all 15
The angels, that were not too tall,
With stars for marbles? Did the things
Play Can you see me? through their wings?

Didst Thou kneel at night to pray,
And didst Thou join Thy hands, this way? 20
And did they tire sometimes, being young,
And make the prayer seem very long?
And dost Thou like it best, that we Should join our hands to pray to Thee?
I used to think, before I knew, 25
The prayer not said unless we do.
And did Thy Mother at the night

25 Paraclete, Christ, see note on Johnson's The Dark Angel, 36, page 830 35 reflex, reflection—from the glorious wings of the angels 46 Descanting, singing

Little Jesus Ex . . . laudem, the Vulgate version of Psalms, 8 2, the Authorized Version has "Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings hast thou ordained strength."

Kiss Thee, and fold the clothes in right?
And didst Thou feel quite good in bed,
Kissed, and sweet, and Thy prayers said? 30

Thou canst not have forgotten all
That it feels like to be small,
And Thou know'st I cannot pray
To thee in my father's way —
When Thou wast so little, say, 35
Couldst Thou talk Thy Father's way?

So, a little Child, come down
And hear a child's tongue like Thy own;
Take me by the hand and walk,
And listen to my baby-talk. 40
To Thy Father show my prayer
(He will look, Thou art so fair),
And say: "O Father, I, Thy Son,
Bring the prayer of a little one."

And He will smile, that children's tongue 45
Has not changed since Thou wast young!

THE HOUND OF HEAVEN

I fled Him, down the nights and down the
days;

I fled Him, down the arches of the years,
I fled Him, down the labyrinthine ways
Of my own mind; and in the mist of tears
I hid from Him, and under running laughter
Up vistaed hopes I sped; 6
And shot, precipitated,

Adown Titanic glooms of chasmed fears,
From those strong Feet that followed, followed after.

But with unhurrying chase, 10
And unperturbed pace,
Deliberate speed, majestic instancy,
They beat — and a Voice beat
More instant than the Feet —

"All things betray thee, who betrayest
Me" 15

I pleaded, outlaw-wise,
By many a hearted casement, curtained red,
Trellised with intertwining charities
(For, though I knew His love Who followed,
Yet was I sore adread 20
Lest, having Him, I must have naught be-
side);

But, if one little casement parted wide,
The gust of His approach would clash it to Fear wist not to evade, as Love wist to pursue.

The Hound of Heaven. "As the hound follows the hare, never ceasing in its running, ever drawing nearer in the chase so does God follow the fleeing soul by his Divine grace" (O'Connor, A Study of Francis Thompson's "Hound of Heaven," 1912, page 7)

24 wist, knew.

Across the margent of the world I fled, 25
And troubled the gold gateways of the stars,

Smiting for shelter on their clangéd bars,
Fretted to dulcet jars
And silvern chatter the pale ports o' the moon
I said to dawn, Be sudden; to eve, Be soon, 30
With thy young skyey blossoms heap me over

From this tremendous Lover!
Float thy vague veil about me, lest He see!
I tempted all His servitors, but to find
My own betrayal in their constancy, 35
In faith to Him their fickleness to me,
Their traitorous trueness, and their loyal deceit.

To all swift things for swiftness did I sue;
Clung to the whistling mane of every wind
But whether they swept, smoothly
fleet, 40

The long savannahs of the blue;
Or whether, Thunder-driven,
They clangéd his chariot 'thwart a
heaven

Plashy with flying lightnings round the spurn
o' their feet —

Fear wist not to evade as Love wist to pursue. 45

Still with unhurrying chase,
And unperturbed pace,
Deliberate speed, majestic instancy,
Came on the following Feet,
And a Voice above their beat — 50
"Naught shelters thee, who wilt not shelter Me"

I sought no more that after which I strayed
In face of man or maid;

But still within the little children's eyes
Seems something, something that replics,
They at least are for me, surely for me! 56

I turned me to them very wistfully;
But, just as their young eyes grew sudden
fair

With dawning answers there,
Their angel plucked them from me by the
hair. 60

"Come then, ye other children, Nature's — share

With me" (said I) "your delicate fellowship,
Let me greet you lip to lip,

Let me twine with you caresses,
Wantoning 65

With our Lady-Mother's vagrant tresses,
Banqueting

With her in her wind-walled palace,
Underneath her azured daïs,

25 margent, edge, boundary 28-29 Fretted
moon, troubled the doors of the moon until they vibrated with sweet sounds 41 savannahs, open, level regions

Quaffing, as your taintless way is, 70
 From a chalice
 Lucent-weeping out of the dayspring "
 So it was done;
I in their delicate fellowship was one —
 Drew the bolt of Nature's secrecies 75
I knew all the swift importings
 On the willful face of skies;
 I knew how the clouds arise
 Spuméd of the wild sea-snortings;
 All that's born or dies 80
 Rose and drooped with — made them
 shapers
 Of mine own moods, or wailful or divine —
 With them joyed and was bereaven
 I was heavy with the even,
 When she lit her glimmering tapers 85
 Round the day's dead sanctities
 I laughed in the morning's eyes.
 I triumphed and I saddened with all weather,
 Heaven and I wept together,
 And its sweet tears were salt with mortal
 mine, 90
 Against the red throb of its sunset-heart
 I laid my own to beat,
 And share commingling heat;
 But not by that, by that, was eased my human smart.
 In vain my tears were wet on Heaven's gray
 cheek. 95
 For ah! we know not what each other says,
 These things and I, in sound I speak —
 Their sound is but their stir, they speak by silences
 Nature, poor stepdame, cannot slake my
 drouth,
 Let her, if she would owe me, 100
 Drop yon blue bosom-veil of sky, and show
 me
 The breasts o' her tenderness,
 Never did any milk of hers once bless
 My thirsting mouth
 Nigh and nigh draws the chase, 105
 With unperturbéd pace,
 Deliberate speed, majestic instancy;
 And past those noiséd Feet
 A voice comes yet more fleet —
 "Lo! naught contents thee, who content'st not Me." 110
 Naked I wait Thy love's uplifted stroke!
 My harness piece by piece Thou hast hewn
 from me,
 And smitten me to my knee;
 I am defenseless utterly
 I slept, me thinks, and woke, 115
 And, slowly gazing, find me stripped in
 sleep.
 In the rash lustihead of my young powers,

I shook the pillaring hours
 And pulled my life upon me, grimed with smears,
 I stand amid the dust o' the mounded years —
 My mangled youth lies dead beneath the
 heap. 121
 My days have crackled and gone up in smoke,
 Have puffed and burst as sun-starts on a
 stream.
 Yea, faileth now even dream
 The dreamer, and the lute the lutanist; 125
 Even the linked fantasies, in whose blossomy twist
 I swung the earth a trinket at my wrist,
 Are yielding, cords of all too weak account
 For earth with heavy griefs so overplussed
 Ah! is Thy love indeed 130
 A weed, albeit an amaranthine weed,
 Suffering no flowers except its own to mount?
 Ah! must —
 Designer infinite! —
 Ah! must Thou char the wood ere Thou canst
 limn with it? 135
 My freshness spent its wavering shower i' the
 dust,
 And now my heart is as a broken fount,
 Wherein tear-drippings stagnate, spilt down
 ever
 From the dank thoughts that shiver
 Upon the sighful branches of my mind. 140
 Such is; what is to be?
 The pulp so bitter, how shall taste the rind?
 I dimly guess what Time in mists confounds,
 Yet ever and anon a trumpet sounds
 From the hid battlements of Eternity; 145
 Those shaken mists a space unsettle, then Round the half-glimpséd turrets slowly wash
 again
 But not ere him who summoneth
 I first have seen, enwound
 With glooming robes purpureal, cypress-crowned; 150
 His name I know, and what his trumpet saith
 Whether man's heart or life it be which yields
 Thee harvest, must Thy harvest fields
 Be dunged with rotten death?
 Now of that long pursuit 155
 Comes on at hand the bruit;
 That Voice is round me like a bursting
 sea:
 "And is thy earth so marred,
 Shattered in shard on shard?
 Lo, all things fly thee, for thou fleest Me!

118-119 shook . . . me, as Samson shook the pillars of the temple at Gaza and pulled down the roof on his head, see Judges, 16 29-30 131 amaranthine, immortal, like the amaranth, which grows in the fields of Heaven 135. limn; draw—as with charcoal 150 purpureal, purple, as of royalty cypress-crowned, as a symbol of sorrow and death. 156 bruit, noise, clamor 159 shard, fragment

Strange, piteous, futile thing, 161
Wherefore should any set thee love apart?
Seeing none but I makes much of naught"
(He said),

"And human love needs human meriting,
How hast thou merited — 165
Of all man's clotted clay the dingiest clot?
Alack, thou knowest not
How little worthy of any love thou art!
Whom wilt thou find to love ignoble thee
Save Me, save only Me? 170
All which I took from thee I did but take,
Not for thy harms,
But just that thou might'st seek it in My arms.

All which thy child's mistake
Fancies as lost, I have stored for thee at
home, 175
Rise, clasp My hand, and come!"

Halts by me that footfall;
Is my gloom, after all,
Shade of His hand, outstretched caress-
ingly?
"Ah, fondest, blindest, weakest, 180
I am He Whom thou seekest!
Thou dravest love from thee, who dravest
Me." (1891, 1893)

TO THE DEAD CARDINAL OF WESTMINSTER

I will not perturbate
Thy Paradisal state
With praise
Of thy dead days;

To the new-heavened say, 5
"Spirit, thou wert fine clay" —
This do,
Thy praise who knew.

Therefore my spirit clings
Heaven's porter by the wings, 10
And holds
Its gated golds

Apart, with thee to press
A private business —
Whence, 15
Deign me audience.

Anchorite, who didst dwell
With all the world for cell,
My soul
Round me doth roll 20

A sequestration bare.
Too far alike we were,
Too far Dissimilar.

For its burning fruitage I 25
Do climb the tree o' the sky;
Do prize
Some human eyes.

You smelt the heaven-blossoms,
And all the sweet embosoms 30
The dear
Uranian year.

Those Eyes my weak gaze shuns,
Which to the suns are Suns,
Did 35
Not affray your lid.

The carpet was let down
(With golden moltings strown)
For you
Of the angels' blue. 40

But I, ex-Paradised,
The shoulder of your Christ
Find high
To lean thereby

So flaps my helpless sail, 45
Bellying with neither gale,
Of Heaven
Nor Orcus even

Life is coquetry
Of Death, which wearies me, 50
Too sure
Of the amour;

A tiring-room where I
Death's divers garments try,
Till fit 55
Some fashion sit.

It seemeth me too much
I do rehearse for such
A mean
And single scene. 60

The sandy glass hence bear —
Antique remembrancer;
My veins
Do spare its pains.

With secret sympathy 65
My thoughts repeat in me

To the Dead Cardinal of Westminster The Cardinal was Henry Edward Manning (1808-92), a great preacher and social reformer

17 Anchorite, hermit

21 sequestration, medium of separation—i.e., it separated me from the world 32 Uranian year, a year in heaven
(from Urania, the muse of astronomy), equal to 365,000 earthly years (2 Peter, 3 8) 48 Orcus, the underworld

Infirm
The turn o' the worm
Beneath my appointed sod;
The grave is in my blood; 70
I shake
To winds that take
Its grasses by the top;
The rains thereon that drop
Perturb 75
With drip acerb
My subtly answering soul;
The feet across its knoll
Do jar
Me from afar. 80
As sap foretastes the spring;
As Earth ere blossoming
Thrills
With far daffodils,
And feels her breast turn sweet 85
With the unconceived wheat;
So doth
My flesh foreloathe
The abhorred spring of Dis,
With seething presciences 90
Affirm
The preparete worm.
I have no thought that I,
When at the last I die,
Shall reach 95
To gain your speech.
But you, should that be so,
May very well, I know,
May well
To me in hell 100
With recognizing eyes
Look from your Paradise —
"God bless Thy hopelessness!"
Call, holy soul, O call 105
The hosts angelical,
And say —
"See, far away
"Lies one I saw on earth;
One stricken from his birth 110
With curse
Of destinate verse.

"What place doth He ye serve
For such sad spirit reserve —
Given, 115
In dark lieu of Heaven,
"The impitiable Dæmon,
Beauty, to adore and dream on,
To be Perpetually 120
"Hers, but she never his?
He reapeth miseries;
Foreknows
His wages woes;
"He lives detachéd days; 125
He serveth not for praise;

FIELD-FLOWER

A PHANTASY

God took a fit of Paradise-wind,
A slip of cœrule weather,
A thought as simple as Himself,
And raveled them together.
Unto His eyes He held it there, 5
To teach it gazing debonair
With memory of what, perdie,
A God's young innocences were
His fingers pushed it through the sod —
It came up redolent of God, 10
Garrulous of the eyes of God
To all the breezes near it;
Musical of the mouth of God
To all had ears to hear it;
Mystical with the mirth of God, 15
That glow-like did ensphere it
And — "Babb! babb! babb!" said;
"I'll tell the whole world one day!"
There was no blossom half so glad,
Since sun of Christ's first Sunday. 20

A poet took a flaw of pain,
A hap of skyeey pleasure,
A thought had in his cradle lain,
And mingled them in measure
That chrism he laid upon his eyes, 25
And lips, and heart, for euphrasies,
That he might see, feel, sing, perdie,
The simple things that are the wise.
Beside the flower he held his ways,

Field-Flower 1 fit, strain, as of music 2 cœrule, heavenly (deep-blue) 7 perdie, indeed (originally an Old French oath, par Dieu, by God) 22 hap, a chance bit 25 chrism, sacred oil, used in the administration of Roman Catholic sacraments 26 euphrasies, magic restoratives, as of the herb euphrasy (eye-bright), fabled to make old eyes young

And leaned him to it gaze for gaze — 30
He took its meaning, gaze for gaze,
As baby looks on baby;
Its meaning passed into his gaze,
Native as meaning may be;
He rose with all his shining gaze 35
As children's eyes at play be.
And — "Babb! babb! babb!" said;
"I'll tell the whole world one day!"
There was no poet half so glad,
Since man grew God that Sunday 40

ENVOY

Go, songs, for ended is our brief, sweet play;
Go, children of swift joy and tardy sorrow,
And some are sung, and that was yesterday,
And some unsung, and that may be to-morrow.

Go forth; and if it be o'er stony way, 5
Old joy can lend what newer grief must borrow;
And it was sweet, and that was yesterday,
And sweet is sweet, though purchaséd with sorrow.

Go, songs, and come not back from your far way;
And if men ask you why ye smile and sorrow, 10
Tell them ye grieve, for your hearts know Today,
Tell them ye smile, for your eyes know Tomorrow. (1897)

THE KINGDOM OF GOD

"IN NO STRANGE LAND"

O world invisible, we view thee,
O world intangible, we touch thee,
O world unknowable, we know thee,
Inapprehensible, we clutch thee!

Does the fish soar to find the ocean, 5
The eagle plunge to find the air —
That we ask of the stars in motion
If they have rumor of thee there?

Not where the wheeling systems darken,
And our benumbed conceiving soars! — 10

Envoy This poem was printed at the end of a volume of poems entitled New Poems (1897)

1 Go, songs, a common literary convention, used by Chaucer, Spenser, Southey, and others

The Kingdom of God This poem was found among Thompson's papers at his death "In . land." See Exodus, 2 22 — Zipporah bore Moses a son, "and he called his name Gershom, for he said, 'I have been a stranger in a strange land'"

The drift of pinions, would we hearken,
Beats at our own clay-shuttered doors.

The angels keep their ancient places —
Turn but a stone and start a wing!
'Tis ye, 'tis your estrangéd faces, 15
That miss the many-splendored thing.

But (when so sad thou canst not sadder)
Cry — and upon thy so sore loss
Shall shine the traffic of Jacob's ladder Pitched betwixt Heaven and Charing Cross.

Yea, in the night, my Soul, my daughter, 21
Cry — clinging Heaven by the hems;
And lo, Christ walking on the water,
Not of Genesareth, but Thames! (1913)

ELEGY

The wood is bare: a river-mist is steeping
The trees that winter's chill of life bereaves;
Only their stiffened boughs break silence,
weeping
Over their fallen leaves,

That lie upon the dank earth brown and rotten, 5
Miry and matted in the soaking wet —
Forgotten with the spring, that is forgotten
By them that can forget.

Yet it was here we walked when ferns were springing,
And through the mossy bank shot bud and blade — 10
Here found in summer, when the birds were
singing,

A green and pleasant shade.

'Twas here we loved in sunnier days and greener,
And now, in this disconsolate decay,
I come to see her where I most have seen
her, 15
And touch the happier day

For on this path, at every turn and corner,
The fancy of her figure on me falls,
Yet walks she with the slow step of a mourner,
Nor hears my voice that calls. 20

19 Jacob's ladder, that on which Jacob saw angels going up and down between heaven and earth (Genesis, 28 12) 20 Charing Cross, a locality near Trafalgar Square, in the heart of London 24 Genesareth, the Sea of Gallilee, the incident of Christ's walking on the sea is recorded in Matthew, 14 25-33
*Only the early work of Bridges is here represented

So through my heart there winds a track of feeling,

A path of memory, that is all her own,
Whereto her phantom beauty ever stealing
Haunts the sad spot alone.

About her steps the trunks are bare, the branches 25
Drip heavy tears upon her downcast head,
And bleed from unseen wounds that no sun
staunches,
For the year's sun is dead.

And dead leaves wrap the fruits that summer planted;
And birds that love the South have taken
wing 30
The wanderer, loitering o'er the scene
enchanted,
Weeps, and despairs of spring (1873)

I WILL NOT LET THEE GO

I will not let thee go
Ends all our month-long love in this?
Can it be summed up so,
Quit in a single kiss?
I will not let thee go. 5

I will not let thee go.
If thy words' breath could scare thy deeds,
As the soft south can blow
And toss the feathered seeds,
Then might I let thee go. 10

I will not let thee go.
Had not the great sun seen, I might;
Or were he reckoned slow
To bring the false to light,
Then might I let thee go. 15

I will not let thee go.
The stars that crowd the summer skies
Have watched us so below
With all their million eyes,
I dare not let thee go. 20

I will not let thee go.
Have we not chid the changeful moon,
Now rising late, and now
Because she set too soon,
And shall I let thee go? 25

I will not let thee go
Have not the young flowers been content,
Plucked ere their buds could blow,
To seal our sacrament?
I cannot let thee go. 30

I Will Not Let Thee Go 28. blow, bloom.

I will not let thee go.
 I hold thee by too many bands,
 Thou sayest farewell, and lo!
 I have thee by the hands,
 And will not let thee go. 35

A POPPY GROWS UPON THE SHORE

A poppy grows upon the shore,
 Bursts her twin cup in summer late;
 Her leaves are glaucous-green and hoar,
 Her petals yellow, delicate.

Oft to her cousins turns her thought, 5
 In wonder if they care that she
 Is fed with spray for dew, and caught
 By every gale that sweeps the sea.

She has no lovers like the red,
 That dances with the noble corn; 10
 Her blossoms on the waves are shed,
 Where she stands shivering and forlorn

TRIOLET

When first we met we did not guess
 That Love would prove so hard a master;
 Of more than common friendliness
 When first we met we did not guess
 Who could foretell this sore distress 5
 This ir retrievable disaster
 When first we met? — We did not guess
 That Love would prove so hard a master.

TRIOLET

All women born are so perverse
 No man need boast their love possessing
 If naught seem better, nothing's worse;
 All women born are so perverse.
 From Adam's wife, that proved a curse 5
 Though God had made her for a blessing,
 All women born are so perverse
 No man need boast their love possessing.

From THE GROWTH OF LOVE

4

The very names of things beloved are Jear,
 And sounds will gather beauty from their
 sense,
 As many a face through love's long residence

A Poppy Grows upon the Shore 3 glaucous-green, bluish green 10 corn, wheat
Triplet See note on Rose-Leaves, page 762
The Growth of Love This is a series of sixty-nine sonnets

Groweth to fair instead of plain and sear,
 But when I say thy name it hath no peer, 5
 And I suppose fortune determined thence
 Her dower, that such beauty's excellence
 Should have a perfect title for the ear.
 Thus may I think the adopting Muses chose Their sons by name, knowing none would be
 heard 10

Or writ so oft in all the world as those — Dan Chaucer, mighty Shakespeare, then for third
 The classic Milton, and to us arose
 Shelley with liquid music in the word.
 (1876)

8

For beauty being the best of all we know
 Sums up the unsearchable and secret aims
 Of nature, and on joys whose earthly names
 Were never told can form and sense bestow,
 And man has sped his instinct to outgo 5
 The step of science; and against her shames
 Imagination stakes out heavenly claims,
 Building a tower above the head of woe
 Nor is there fairer work for beauty found
 Than that she win in nature her release 10
 From all the woes that in the world abound,
 Nay with his sorrow may his love increase,
 If from man's greater need beauty redound,
 And claims his tears for homage of his peace
 (1876)

16

This world is unto God a work of art,
 Of which the unaccomplished heavenly plan
 Is hid in life within the creature's heart,
 And for perfection looketh unto man.
 Ah me! those thousand ages: with what
 slow 5
 Pains and persistence were his idols made,
 Destroyed and made, ere ever he could know
 The mighty mother must be so obeyed.
 For lack of knowledge and through little skill
 His childish mimicry outwent his aim, 10
 His effort shaped the genius of his will;
 Till through distinction and revolt he came,
 True to his simple terms of good and ill,
 Seeking the face of Beauty without blame.
 (1876)

20

The world still goeth about to show and hide,
 Befeoled of all opinion, fond of fame,
 But he that can do well taketh no pride,
 And see'th his error, undisturbed by shame:
 So poor's the best that longest life can do, 5
 The most so little, diligently done;
 So mighty is the beauty that doth woo,
 So vast the joy that love from love hath
 won.

God's love to win is easy, for He loveth
Desire's fair attitude, nor strictly weighs 10
The broken thing, but all alike approveth Which love hath aim'd at Him — that is heaven's praise;
And if we look for any praise on earth,
'Tis in man's love — all else is nothing worth.
(1876)

23

O weary pilgrims, chanting of your woe,
That turn your eyes to all the peaks that
shine,
Hailing in each the citadel divine
The which ye thought to have entered long
ago;
Until at length your feeble steps and slow
Falter upon the threshold of the shrine,
And your hearts overburdened doubt in fine
Whether it be Jerusalem or no:
Disheartened pilgrims, I am one of you;
For, having worshiped many a barren face
I scarce now greet the goal I journeyed to;
I stand a pagan in the holy place;
Beneath the lamp of truth I am found untrue,
And question with the God that I embrace (1876)

35

All earthly beauty hath one cause and proof,
To lead the pilgrim soul to beauty above;
Yet lieth the greater bliss so far aloof,
That few there be are weaned from earthly
love
Joy's ladder it is, reaching from home to
home, 5
The best of all the work that all was good,
Whereof 'twas writ the angels aye upclomb,
Down sped, and at the top the Lord God
stood.
But I my time abuse, my eyes by day Centered on thee, by night my heart on
fire — 10
Letting my numbered moments run away —
Nor e'en 'twixt night and day to heaven aspire —
So true it is that what the eye seeth not
But slow is loved, and loved is soon forgot.
(1889)

62

I will be what God made me, nor protest
Against the bent of genius in my time,
That science of my friends robs all the best,
While I love beauty, and was born to rime.

Sonnet 35 7-8 angels— stood, a reference to Jacob's ladder, Genesis, 28 12-13—"And he dreamed, and behold a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven, and behold the angels of God ascending and descending on it And, behold, the Lord stood above it"
 "The argument is partly from Michael Angelo's Madrigals, 19" (Bridges's note)

Be they our mighty men, and let me dwell 5
In shadow among the mighty shades of old,
With love's forsaken palace for my cell,
Whence I look forth and all the world be-
hold,
And say, These better days, in best things
worse,
This bastardy of time's magnificence, 10
Will mend in fashion and throw off the curse,
To crown new love with higher excellence.
Cursed though I be to live my life alone,
My toil is for man's joy, his joy my own (1880)

A PASSER-BY

Whither, O splendid ship, thy white sails
 crowding,
 Leaning across the bosom of the urgent
 West,
That fearest nor sea rising, nor sky clouding,
 Whither away, fair rover, and what thy
 quest?
 Ah! soon, when Winter has all our vales
 opprest,
When skies are cold and misty, and hail is hurling,
 Wilt thou glide on the blue Pacific, or rest
In a summer haven asleep, thy white sails furling.

I there before thee, in the country that well
thou knowest,
Already arrived am inhaling the odorous
air. 10
I watch thee enter unerringly where thou goest,
And anchor queen of the strange shipping
there,
Thy sails for awnings spread, thy masts
bare;
Nor is aught from the foaming reef to the snow-capped, grandest Peak, that is over the feathery palms more fair 15
Than thou, so upright, so stately, and still thou standest.

And yet, O splendid ship, unhailed and nameless,
I know not if, aiming a fancy, I rightly
divine
That thou hast a purpose joyful, a courage
blameless,
Thy port assured in a happier land than
mine. 20
But for all I have given thee, beauty enough is thine,
As thou, aslant with trim tackle and shroud-
ing,

From the proud nostril curve of a prow's
line
In the offing scatterest foam, thy white sails
crowding

I HAVE LOVED FLOWERS THAT FADE

I have loved flowers that fade,
Within those magic tents
Rich hues have marriage made
With sweet unmemoried scents:
A honeymoon delight —
A joy of love at sight,
That ages in an hour —
My song be like a flower!

5

I have loved airs, that die
Before their charm is writ
Along a liquid sky
Trembling to welcome it.
Notes, that with pulse of fire
Proclaim the spirit's desire,
Then die, and are nowhere —
My song be like an air!

10

15

Die, song, die like a breath,
And wither as a bloom;
Fear not a flowery death,
Dread not an airy tomb!
Fly with delight, fly hence!
'Twas thine love's tender sense
To feast, now on thy bier
Beauty shall shed a tear.

THERE IS A HILL BESIDE THE SILVER THAMES

There is a hill beside the silver Thames,
Shady with birch and beech and odorous pine,
And brilliant underfoot with thousand gems
Steeply the thickets to his floods decline.

5

Straight trees in every place
Their thick tops interlace,
And pendant branches trail their foliage fine
Upon his watery face.

Swift from the sweltering pasturage he flows;
His stream, alert to seek the pleasant shade, 10
Pictures his gentle purpose, as he goes Straight to the caverned pool his toil has made.

His winter floods lay bare
The stout roots in the air;
His summer streams are cool, when they have played
Among their fibrous hair.

15

A rushy island guards the sacred bower,
And hides it from the meadow, where in peace
The lazy cows wrench many a scented flower,
Robbing the golden market of the bees; 20
And laden barges float
By banks of myosote,
And scented flag and golden flower-de-lys
Delay the loitering boat.

And on this side the island, where the pool 25
Eddies away, are tangled mass on mass
The water-weeds, that net the fishes cool,
And scarce allow a narrow stream to pass,
Where spreading crowfoot mars
The drowning nenuphars, 30
Waving the tassels of her silken grass
Below her silver stars.

But in the purple pool there nothing grows,
Not the white water-lily spoked with gold,
Though best she loves the hollows, and well knows 35
On quiet streams her broad shields to unfold —
Yet should her roots but try
Within these deeps to lie,
Not her long reaching stalk could ever hold
Her waxen head so high. 40

Sometimes an angler comes, and drops his hook
Within its hidden depths, and 'gainst a tree
Leaning his rod, reads in some pleasant book,
Forgetting soon his pride of fishery;
And dreams, or falls asleep, 45
While curious fishes peep
About his nibbled bait, or scornfully
Dart off and rise and leap.

And sometimes a slow figure 'neath the trees
In ancient-fashioned smock, with tottering
care 50
Upon a staff propping his weary knees,
May by the pathway of the forest fare:
As from a buried day
Across the mind will stray
Some perishing mute shadow — and unaware 55
He passeth on his way.

Else, he that wishes solitude is safe,
Whether he bathe at morning in the stream;
Or lead his love there when the hot hours
chafe
The meadows, busy with a blurring steam, 60
Or watch, as fades the light,
The gibbous moon grow bright,

22 myosote, a plant of the forget-me-not family 30 nenuphars, water-lilies 62 gibbous, convex, as the moon is when three-fourths full

Until her magic rays dance in a dream,
And glorify the night

Where is this bower beside the silver Thames?
O pool and flowery thickets, hear my vow! 66
O trees of freshest foliage and straight stems,
No sharer of my secret I allow —
Lest ere I come the while Strange feet your shades defile; 70
Or lest the burly oarsman turn his prow
Within your guardian isle. (1879)

LONDON SNOW

When men were all asleep the snow came flying,
In large white flakes falling on the city brown, Stealthily and perpetually settling and loosely lying,
Hushing the latest traffic of the drowsy
town;
Deadening, muffling, stifling its murmurs failing; 5
Lazily and incessantly floating down and
down;
Silently sifting and veiling road, roof, and railing,
Hiding difference, making unevenness even,
Into angles and crevices softly drifting and sailing.
All night it fell, and when full inches
seven 10
It lay in the depth of its uncompacted
lightness,
The clouds blew off from a high and frosty
heaven;
And all woke earlier for the unaccustomed brightness
Of the winter dawning, the strange un-heavenly glare
The eye marveled — marveled at the dazzling whiteness; 15
The ear harkened to the stillness of the solemn air;
No sound of wheel rumbling nor of foot falling,
And the busy morning cries came thin and
spare.
Then boys I heard, as they went to school,
calling;
They gathered up the crystal manna to freeze 20
Their tongues with tasting, their hands with snowballing;
Or rioted in a drift, plunging up to the
knees;
Or peering up from under the white-mossed
wonder,
“O look at the trees!” they cried, “O look at the trees!”

With lessened load a few carts creak and blunder, 25
Following along the white deserted way,
A country company long dispersed asunder;
When now already the sun, in pale display
Standing by Paul's high dome, spread forth
below
His sparkling beams, and awoke the stir of the day. 30
For now doors open, and war is waged with the snow,
And trains of somber men, past tale of number,
Tread along brown paths, as toward their toil they go;
But even for them awhile no cares en-cumber
Their minds diverted; the daily word is unspoken, 35
The daily thoughts of labor and sorrow slumber
At the sight of the beauty that greets them, for the charm they have broken (1880)

THE VOICE OF NATURE

I stand on the cliff and watch the veiled sun paling
A silver field afar in the mournful sea,
The scourge of the surf, and plaintive gulls
sailing
At ease on the gale that smites the shudder-ing lea;
Whose smile severe and chaste 5
June never hath stirred to vanity, nor age defaced.
In lofty thought strive, O spirit, forever,
In courage and strength pursue thine own endeavor.
Ah! if it were only for thee, thou restless ocean
Of waves that follow and roar, the sweep of the tides; 10
Wer't only for thee, impetuous wind, whose motion
Precipitate all o'errides, and turns, nor abides;
For you, sad birds and fair,
Or only for thee, bleak cliff, erect in the
air —
Then well could I read wisdom in every feature, 15
O well should I understand the voice of
Nature

29 Paul's high dome, the dome of St Paul's Cathedral,
London. 32. tale, count.

But far away, I think, in the Thames valley,
The silent river glides by flowery banks,
And birds sing sweetly in branches that arch
an alley

Of cloistered trees, moss-grown in their ancient ranks: 20

Where if a light air stray,
'Tis laden with hum of bees and scent of
may.

Love and peace be thine, O spirit, forever;
Serve thy sweet desire; despise endeavor.

And if it were only for thee, entranced river, 25
That scarce dost rock the lily on her airy stem,

Or stir a wave to murmur, or a rush to quiver;
Wer't but for the woods, and summer asleep
in them:

For you my bowers green,
My hedges of rose and woodbine, with walks between, 30

Then well could I read wisdom in every
feature,

O well should I understand the voice of Nature. (1880)

THE CLOUDS HAVE LEFT THE SKY

The clouds have left the sky,
The wind hath left the sea,
The half-moon up on high
Shrinketh her face of dree.

She lightens on the comb 5
Of leaden waves, that roar
And thrust their hurried foam
Up on the dusky shore.

Behind the western bars 10
The shrouded day retreats,
And unperceived the stars
Steal to their sovran seats.

And whiter grows the foam,
The small moon lightens more;
And as I turn me home, 15
My shadow walks before. (1890)

THE SNOW LIES SPRINKLED ON THE BEACH

The snow lies sprinkled on the beach,
And whitens all the marshy lea;
The sad gulls wail adown the gale;
The day is dark and black the sea.
Shorn of their crests the blighted waves 5
With driven foam the offing fleck,

The ebb is low and barely laves
The red rust of the giant wreck.

On such a stony, breaking beach
My childhood chanced and chose to be; 10
'Twas here I played, and musing made
My friend the melancholy sea.

He from his dim enchanted caves
With shuddering roar and onrush wild
Fell down in sacrificial waves 15
At feet of his exulting child.

Unto a spirit too light for fear
His wrath was mirth, his wail was glee —
My heart is now too fixed to bow
Though all his tempests howl at me; 20
For to the gain life's summer saves,
My solemn joy's increasing store,
The tossing of his mournful waves
Makes sweetest music evermore.

(1890)

I LOVE ALL BEAUTEOUS THINGS

I love all beauteous things,
I seek and adore them;
God hath no better praise,
And man in his hasty days 5
Is honored for them.

I too will something make
And joy in the making,
Although tomorrow it seem
Like the empty words of a dream 10
Remembered on waking (1890)

NIGHTINGALES

Beautiful must be the mountains whence ye
come,
And bright in the fruitful valleys the streams,
wherefrom

Ye learn your song.
Where are those starry woods? Oh, might I wander there,
Among the flowers, which in that heavenly 5
air

Bloom the year long!
Nay, barren are those mountains and spent the streams,
Our song is the voice of desire, that haunts our
dreams,

A throe of the heart,
Whose pining visions dim, forbidden hopes
profound, 10
No dying cadence nor long sign can sound,
For all our art

Alone, aloud in the raptured ear of men
We pour our dark nocturnal secret, and then,

As night is withdrawn 15
 From these sweet-springing meads and bursting boughs of May,
 Dream, while the innumerable choir of day
 Welcome the dawn. (1893)

SO SWEET LOVE SEEMED

So sweet love seemed that April morn,
 When first we kissed beside the thorn,
 So strangely sweet, it was not strange
 We thought that love could never change.

But I can tell — let truth be told — 5
 That love will change in growing old;
 Though day by day is naught to see,
 So delicate his motions be.

And in the end 'twill come to pass 10
 Quite to forget what once he was,
 Nor even in fancy to recall
 The pleasure that was all in all.

His little spring, that sweet we found,
 So deep in summer floods is drowned,
 I wonder, bathed in joy complete, 15
 How love so young could be so sweet. (1893)

WINTER NIGHTFALL

The day begins to droop —
 Its course is done;
 But nothing tells the place
 Of the setting sun.

The hazy darkness deepens, 5
 And up the lane
 You may hear, but cannot see,
 The homing wain.

An engine pants and hums
 In the farm hard by; 3
 Its lowering smoke is lost
 In the lowering sky.

The soaking branches drip,
 And all night through
 The dropping will not cease 15
 In the avenue.

A tall man there in the house
 Must keep his chair;
 He knows he will never again
 Breathe the spring air. 20

His heart is worn with work;
 He is giddy and sick
 If he rise to go as far
 As the nearest rick.

Winter Nightfall 8 wain, wagon. 24 rick, stack of hay.

He thinks of his morn of life, 25
 His hale, strong years;
 And braves as he may the night
 Of darkness and tears (1899)

MY DELIGHT AND THY DELIGHT

My delight and thy delight
 Walking, like two angels white,
 In the gardens of the night,

My desire and thy desire
 Twining to a tongue of fire, 5
 Leaping live, and laughing higher;
 Through the everlasting strife
 In the mystery of life.

Love, from whom the world begun,
 Hath the secret of the sun.

Love can tell, and love alone,
 Whence the million stars were strewn,
 Why each atom knows its own,
 How, in spite of woe and death, 15
 Gay is life, and sweet is breath;

This he taught us, this we knew,
 Happy in his science true,
 Hand in hand as we stood
 'Neath the shadows of the wood,
 Heart to heart as we lay 20
 In the dawning of the day. (1899)

PATER FILIO

Sense with keenest edge unused,
 Yet unsteeled by scathing fire;
 Lovely feet as yet unbruised
 On the ways of dark desire;
 Sweetest hope that lookest smiling 5
 O'er the wilderness defiling!

Why such beauty, to be blighted
 By the swarm of foul destruction?
 Why such innocence delighted,
 When sin stalks to thy seduction? 10
 All the litanies e'er chaunted
 Shall not keep thy faith undaunted.

I have prayed the sainted Morning
 To unclasp her hands to hold thee;
 From resignful Eve's adorning 15
 Stol'n a robe of peace to enfold thee,
 With all charms of man's contriving
 Armed thee for thy lonely striving.

Pater Filio The title means Father to Son.

Me too once unthinking Nature
— Whence Love's timeless mockery took
me —

Fashioned so divine a creature,
Yea, and like a beast forsook me.
I forgave, but tell the measure
Of her crime in thee, my treasure.

A MOMENT

The clouds had made a crimson crown
About the mountains high.
The stormy sun was going down
In a stormy sky.

Why did you let your eyes so rest on me, 5
And hold your breath between?
In all the ages this can never be
As if it had not been.

(1896)

"HE KNOWETH NOT THAT THE DEAD ARE THINE"

The weapon that you fought with was a word,
And with that word you stabbed me to the
heart
Not once but twice you did it, for the sword
Made no blood start.

They have not tried you for your life You go
Strong in such innocence as men will boast 6
They have not buried me. They do not know
Life from its ghost (1896)

GIFTS

I tossed my friend a wreath of roses, wet
With early dew, the garland of the morn
He lifted it — and on his brow he set
A crackling crown of thorn.

Against my foe I hurled a murderous dart 5
He caught it in his hand — I heard him laugh —

I saw the thing that should have pierced his
heart
Turn to a golden staff.

(1896)

"He Knoweth Not That the Dead Are Thine" See Proverbs, 9 18 Of the simple-minded man who listens to the call of a foolish woman, the writer says "He knoweth not that the dead are there, and that her guests are in the depths of hell"

THE WITCH

I have walked a great while over the snow,
And I am not tall nor strong
My clothes are wet, and my teeth are set,
And the way was hard and long.
I have wandered over the fruitful earth, 5
But I never came here before.
Oh, lift me over the threshold, and let me in
at the door!

The cutting wind is a cruel foe;
I dare not stand in the blast.
My hands are stone, and my voice a groan,
And the worst of death is past. 11
I am but a little maiden still;
My little white feet are sore.
Oh, lift me over the threshold, and let me in
at the door!

Her voice was the voice that women have, 15
Who plead for their heart's desire.
She came — she came — and the quivering
flame
Sank and died in the fire.
It never was lit again on my hearth
Since I hurried across the floor, 20
To lift her over the threshold, and let her in
at the door! (1896)

A HUGUENOT

Oh, a gallant set were they,
As they charged on us that day,
A thousand riding like one!
Their trumpets crying,
And their white plumes flying, 5
And their sabers flashing in the sun.

Oh, a sorry lot were we,
As we stood beside the sea,
Each man for himself as he stood!
We were scattered and lonely — 10
A little force only
Of the good men fighting for the good.

But I never loved more
On sea or on shore
The ringing of my own true blade. 15
Like lightning it quivered,
And the hard helms shivered,
As I sang, "None maketh me afraid!" (1896)

L'OISEAU BLEU

The lake lay blue below the hill
 O'er it, as I looked, there flew Across the waters, cold and still,
 A bird whose wings were palest blue.

The sky above was blue at last, 5
 The sky beneath me blue in blue.
 A moment, ere the bird had passed
 It caught his image as he flew. (1897)

JEALOUSY

"The myrtle bush grew shady Down by the ford" —
 "Is it even so?" said my lady.
 "Even so!" said my lord.
 "The leaves are set too thick together 5
 For the point of a sword."

"The arras in your room hangs close,
 No light between!
 You wedded one of those
 That see unseen" — 10
 "Is it even so?" said the King's Majesty
 "Even so!" said the Queen (1897)

SHADOW

Child of my love! though thou be bright as
 day,
 Though all the sons of joy laugh and adore
 thee,
 Thou canst not throw thy shadow self away.
 Where thou dost come, the earth is darker
 for thee.

When thou dost pass, a flower that saw the
 sun 5
 Sees him no longer.
 The hosts of darkness are, thou radiant one,
 Through thee made stronger. (1897)

UNWELCOME

We were young, we were merry, we were very very wise,
 And the door stood open at our feast,
 When there passed us a woman with the West in her eyes,
 And a man with his back to the East.

Oh, still grew the hearts that were beating so
 fast, 5
 The loudest voice was still

L'Oiseau Bleu. The title means The Blue-Bird

The jest died away on our lips as they passed,
 And the rays of July struck chill.

The cups of red wine turned pale on the board,
 The white bread black as soot. 10
 The hound forgot the hand of her lord,
 She fell down at his foot.

Low let me lie, where the dead dog lies,
 Ere I sit me down again at a feast,
 When there passes a woman with the West
 in her eyes, 15
 And a man with his back to the East (1898)

IMPRESSION DE NUIT: LONDON

See what a mass of gems the city wears
 Upon her broad live bosom! row on row
 Rubies and emeralds and amethysts glow.
 See! that huge circle, like a necklace, stares
 With thousands of bold eyes to heaven, and 5
 dares 5
 The golden stars to dim the lamps below,
 And in the mirror of the mire I know
 The moon has left her image unawares.
 That's the great town at night: I see her
 breasts;
 Pricked out with lamps they stand like huge black towers, 10
 I think they move! I hear her panting breath.
 And that's her head where the tiara rests
 And in her brain, through lanes as dark as
 death,
 Men creep like thoughts . . . The lamps are like pale flowers. (1894; 1894)

A SONG

Steal from the meadows, rob the tall green hills,
Ravish my orchard's blossoms, let me bind
A crown of orchard flowers and daffodils,
Because my love is fair and white and kind

Today the thrush has trilled her daintiest phrases,
Flowers with their incense have made drunk the air,
God has bent down to gild the hearts of daisies,
Because my love is kind and white and fair.

Today the sun has kissed the rose-tree's daughter,
And sad Narcissus, Spring's pale acolyte, 10
Hangs down his head and smiles into the water,
Because my love is kind and fair and white.

PLAINTE ETERNELLE

The sun sinks down, the tremulous daylight dies.
(Down their long shafts the weary sun-beams glide)
The white-winged ships drift with the falling tide;
Come back, my love, with pity in your eyes!

The tall white ships drift with the falling tide.
(Far, far away I hear the seamews' cries) 6
Come back, my love, with pity in your eyes!
There is no room now in my heart for pride.

Come back, come back! with pity in your eyes,
(The night is dark, the sea is fierce and wide.) 10
There is no room now in my heart for pride,
Though I become the scorn of all the wise

I have no place now in my heart for pride
(The moon and stars have fallen from the skies.)
Though I become the scorn of all the wise,
Thrust, if you will, sharp arrows in my side. 16

Let me become the scorn of all the wise.
(Out of the East I see the morning ride)
Thrust, if you will, sharp arrows in my side,
Play with my tears and feed upon my sighs 20

Wound me with swords, put arrows in my side
(On the white sea the haze of noon-day lies)

But come, my love, before my heart has died.

Drink my salt tears and feed upon my sighs.
(Westward the evening goes with one red stride.) 26
Come back, my love, before my heart has died,
Down sinks the sun, the tremulous daylight dies.

Come back! my love, before my heart has died.
(Out of the South I see the pale moon rise.)
Down sinks the sun, the tremulous daylight dies, 31
The white-winged ships drift with the falling tide.

THE DEAD POET

I dreamed of him last night, I saw his face
All radiant and unshadowed of distress,
And as of old, in music measureless,
I heard his golden voice and marked him trace
Under the common thing the hidden grace, 5
And conjure wonder out of emptiness,
Till mean things put on beauty like a dress
And all the world was an enchanted place
And then methought outside a fast locked gate

I mourned the loss of unrecorded words, 10
Forgotten tales and mysteries half said,
Wonders that might have been articulate,
And voiceless thoughts like murdered singing birds.

And so I woke and knew that he was dead.
(1901)

THE GREEN RIVER

I know a green grass path that leaves the field,
And like a running river, winds along
Into a leafy wood where is no throng
Of birds at noon-day, and no soft throats yield

Their music to the moon. The place is sealed,
An unclaimed sovereignty of voiceless song, 6
And all the unravished silences belong
To some sweet singer lost or unrevealed.
So is my soul become a silent place.
Oh, may I wake from this uneasy night 10

The Dead Poet This poem was written about Oscar Wilde a year after his death Cf Keats's sonnet When I Have Fears That I May Cease to Be

To find a voice of music manifold.
 Let it be shape of sorrow with wan face,
 Or Love that swoons on sleep, or else delight
 That is as wide-eyed as a marigold. (c. 1907)

THE STOLEN CHILD

Where dips the rocky highland
 Of Sleuth Wood in the lake,
 There lies a leafy island
 Where flapping herons wake
 The drowsy water rats;
 There we've hid our faery vats,
 Full of berries,
 And of reddest stolen cherries.
Come away, O human child!
To the waters and the wild
With a faery, hand in hand,
For the world's more full of weeping than
you can understand.

Where the wave of moonlight glosses
 The dim gray sands with light,
 Far off by furthest Rosses
 We foot it all the night,
 Weaving olden dances,
 Mingling hands and mingling glances
 Till the moon has taken flight,
 To and fro we leap
 And chase the frothy bubbles,
 While the world is full of troubles
 And is anxious in its sleep
Come away, O human child!
To the waters and the wild
With a faery, hand in hand,
For the world's more full of weeping than
you can understand.

Where the wandering water gushes
 From the hills above Glen-Car,
 In pools among the rushes
 That scarce could bathe a star,
 We seek for slumbering trout
 And whispering in their ears
 Give them unquiet dreams,
 Leaning softly out
 From ferns that drop their tears
 Over the young streams.

To the waters and the wild

Away with us he's going,
 The solemn-eyed;
 He'll hear no more the lowing
 Of the calves on the warm hillside
 Or the kettle on the hob
 Sing peace into his breast,
 Or see the brown mice bob
 Round and round the oatmeal-chest.
For he comes, the human child,
To the waters and the wild
With a faery, hand in hand,
From a world more full of weeping than he can understand.

THE ROSE OF THE WORLD

Who dreamed that beauty passes like a dream?
 For these red lips, with all their mournful pride,
 Mournful that no new wonder may betide,
 Troy passed away in one high funeral gleam,
 And Usna's children died.

We and the laboring world are passing by;
 Amid men's souls, that waver and give place,
 Like the pale waters in their wintry race,
 Under the passing stars, foam of the sky,
 Lives on this lonely face.

Bow down, archangels, in your dim abode.
 Before you were, or any hearts to beat,
 Weary and kind, one lingered by His seat;
 He made the world to be a grassy road
 Before her wandering feet.

THE LAKE ISLE OF INNISFREE

I will arise and go now, and go to Innisfree,
 And a small cabin build there, of clay and wattles made,

The Rose of the World Before Yeats, the Rose had been used as a symbol of love, as in the medieval Romance of the Rose, of the Virgin Mary, called "the mystic rose", and of Ireland, as in Mangan's Dark Rosaleen, page 12. Yeats feels that the beauty of a woman suggests all other beautiful things and concepts in the world, and is hence infinitely important

4 Troy . . . gleam. Helen's beauty brought about the Trojan War and the burning of Troy, cf. Symonds's Modern Beauty, line 8, page 876 5 Usna's children The three sons of Usna died for the love of Deirdre, as related in the old Irish epic tales of Cuchulain

The Lake Isle of Innisfree Innisfree is an island in Lough Gill, a lake in the county of Sligo, Ireland.

2 wattles, interwoven rods and twigs.

Nine bean rows will I have there, a hive for the honey bee,
And live alone in the bee-loud glade.

And I shall have some peace there, for peace comes dropping slow, 5
Dropping from the veils of the morning to where the cricket sings;
There midnight's all a glimmer, and noon a purple glow,
And evening full of the linnet's wings.

I will arise and go now, for always night and
day
I hear lake water lapping with low sounds
by the shore, 10
While I stand on the roadway, or on the pavements gray,
I hear it in the deep heart's core. (1893)

WHEN YOU ARE OLD

When you are old and gray and full of sleep,
And nodding by the fire, take down this book,
And slowly read, and dream of the soft look
Your eyes had once, and of their shadows
deep,

How many loved your moments of glad
grace, 5
And loved your beauty with love false or true,
But one man loved the pilgrim soul in you,
And loved the sorrows of your changing face

And bending down beside the glowing bars
Murmur, a little sadly, how love fled 10
And paced upon the mountains overhead
And hid his face amid a crowd of stars.

CUCHULAIN'S FIGHT WITH THE SEA

A man came slowly from the setting sun,
To Emer, raddling raiment in her dun,
And said, "I am that swineherd whom you bid
Go dwell upon the cliffs and watch the tide;
But now I have no need to watch it more." 5

Cuchulain's Fight with the Sea Cuchulain is the chief hero of the Ulster or Red Branch cycle of Irish epic lays, dating from the beginning of the Christian era, and preserved in manuscripts of a much later date or in folk tradition. The poem relates one of the later incidents of the hero's career. Emer, who long before the opening of the poem had borne a son to Cuchulain, is made angry by the news that Cuchulain has deserted her for a princess, to whom Yeats gives no name, she sends her son, now grown to manhood, to avenge her wrong; she instructs him to seek a battle with Cuchulain but to keep his identity a secret. As a result, the son is slain by the father. Cf. Arnold's Sohrab and Rustum, page 459.

In the older versions of the story, such as those in Curtin's Myths and Folk-Lore of Ireland (which Yeats called his source) and Lady Gregory's Cuchulain of Muirthemne, Emer is not the name of the jealous queen whom Cuchulain has deserted, but that of his faithful wife

2. raddling, coloring with red dye dun, a hill-fort

Then Emer cast the web upon the floor,
And raising arms all raddled with the dye,
Parted her lips with a loud sudden cry.

That swineherd stared upon her face and said,
"Not any god alive, nor mortal dead, 10
Has slain so mighty armies, so great kings,
Nor won the gold that now Cuchulain brings."

"Why do you tremble thus from feet to crown?"

He caught his breath and cast him weeping
down
Upon the web-heaped floor, and thus his
word: 15
"With him is one sweet-throated like a bird."

"You dare me to my face," and thereupon
She smote with raddled fist, and where her son
Herded the cattle came with stumbling feet,
And cried with angry voice, "It is not meet 20
To idle life away with flocks and herds."

"I have long waited, mother, for those words,
But wherefore now?"

"There is a man to die,
You have the heaviest arm under the sky "

"No, somewhere under daylight or the stars 25
My father stands amid his battle cars."

"But you have grown to be the taller man."

"Yet somewhere under starlight or the sun
My father stands amid his battle cars."

"But he is old and sad with many wars." 30

"I only ask what way my journey lies
For He who made you bitter, made you wise "

"The Red Branch gather a great company
Between the game and the horses of the sea
Go there, and camp upon the forest's rim, 35
But tell your name and lineage to him Whose blade compels, and bid them send you one
Who has a like vow from their triple dun."

Among those feasting kings Cuchulain dwelt,
And his young dear one close beside him knelt;
Stared like the spring upon the ancient
skies, 41
Upon the mournful wonder of his eyes,

33 Red Branch, the men of Ulster 34 Between . . .
sea, between the forest and the ocean 38 like vow, a vow not to disclose his name until compelled by force of arms.
triple dun, group of three forts

And pondered on the glory of his days,
And all around the harp-string told his praise,
And Concobar, the Red Branch king of kings,
With his own fingers touched the brazen
strings 46

Atlast Cuchulain spake, "Some man has made
His evening fire amid the leafy shade.
I have often heard him singing to and fro,
I have often heard the sweet sound of his bow; 50
Seek out what man he is "

One went and came
"He bade me let all know he gives his name
At the sword point, and bade me bring him
one
Who had a like vow from our triple dun "

"I only of the Red Branch hosted now," 55 Cuchulain cried, "have made and keep that vow."

After short fighting in the leafy shade,
He spake to the young man, "Is there no maid
Who loves you, no white arms to wrap you
round,
Or do you long for the dim sleepy ground, 60
That you have come and dared me to my
face?"

"The dooms of men are in God's hidden
place "

"Your head a while seemed like a woman's
head
That I loved once."

Again the fighting sped,
But now the war rage in Cuchulain woke, 65
And through that new blade's guard the old blade broke,
And pierced him.

"Speak before your breath is done "
"Cuchulain I, mighty Cuchulain's son "

"I put you from your pain I can no more "

While day its burden on to evening bore, 70
With head bowed on his knees Cuchulain
stayed,
Then Concobar sent that sweet-throated
maid,
And she, to win him, his gray hair caressed,
In vain her arms, in vain her soft white breast
Then Concobar, the subtlest of all men, 75

45 Concobar, king of Ulster 55 hosted, present in the army 62 dooms, fates

Ranking his Druids round him ten by ten, Spake thus, "Cuchulain will dwell there and
brood,
For three days more in dreadful quietude,
And then arise, and raving slay us all.
Chaunt in his ear delusions magical, 80
That he may fight the horses of the sea."
The Druids took them to their mystery,
And chanted for three days.

Cuchulain stirred,
Stared on the horses of the sea, and heard
The cars of battle and his own name cried; 85
And fought with the invulnerable tide (1893)

THE LAND OF HEART'S DESIRE

O Rose, thou art sick.
— William Blake

PERSONS OF THE PLAY

MAURTEEN BRUIN	MARY BRUIN
BRIDGET BRUIN	FATHER HART
SHAWN BRUIN	A FAERY CHILD

The Scene is laid in the Barony of Kilmacowen, in the County of Sligo, and at a remote time

SCENE.—A room with a hearth on the floor in the middle of a deep alcove to the Right. There are benches in the alcove and a table; and a crucifix on the wall. The alcove is full of a glow of light from the fire. There is an open door facing the audience to the Left, and to the left of this a bench. Through the door one can see the forest. It is night, but the moon or a late sunset glimmers through the trees and carries the eye far off into a vague, mysterious world. MAURTEEN BRUIN, SHAWN BRUIN, and BRIDGET BRUIN sit in the alcove at the table or about the fire. They are dressed in the costume of some remote time, and near them sits an old priest, FATHER HART. He may be dressed 76 Druids, priests of the ancient Celts 86 fought . . . tide. Other versions relate that Cuchulain fought in frenzy with the waves for three days and nights until he fell from hunger and exhaustion.

The Land of Heart's Desire "The Land of Heart's Desire" is the Celtic Otherworld, sometimes called the Isle of Avalon or the Blessed Isles, it is a land of perpetual youth and happiness. Irish legends tell of men who have seen it on the horizon or who have dwelt there, Welsh legends relate that Arthur is waiting there his time for returning.

O . . . sick, from William Blake's The Sick Rose (Songs of Experience, 1794)

"O Rose, thou art sick!
The invisible worm,
That flies in the night,
In the howling storm,

Has found out thy bed
Of crimson joy,
And his dark secret love,

as a friar. There is food and drink upon the table. MARY BRUIN stands by the door reading a book. If she looks up she can see through the door into the wood.

BRIDGET. Because I bid her clean the pots for supper
She took that old book down out of the thatch,
She has been doubled over it ever since.
We should be deafened by her groans and moans

Had she to work as some do, Father Hart; 5
Get up at dawn like me and mend and scour
Or ride abroad in the boisterous night like you,
The pyx and blessed bread under your arm.

SHAWN. Mother, you are too cross.

BRIDGET. You've married her,
And fear to vex her and so take her part 10
MAURTEEN [to FATHER HART] It is but right that youth should side with youth,
She quarrels with my wife a bit at times,
And is too deep just now in the old book!
But do not blame her greatly. she will grow
As quiet as a puff-ball in a tree 15
When but the moons of marriage dawn and die

For half a score of times.

FATHER HART. Their hearts are wild,
As be the hearts of birds, till children come

BRIDGET. She would not mind the kettle, milk the cow,
Or even lay the knives and spread the cloth 20

SHAWN. Mother, if only —

MAURTEEN. Shawn, this is half empty;
Go, bring up the best bottle that we have

FATHER HART. I never saw her read a book before;

What can it be?

MAURTEEN [to SHAWN]. What are you waiting for?

You must not shake it when you draw the cork, 25

It's precious wine, so take your time about it
[To Priest] [SHAWN goes]

There was a Spaniard wrecked at Ocris Head,
When I was young, and I have still some bottles.

He cannot bear to hear her blamed, the book
Has lain up in the thatch these fifty years, 30
My father told me my grandfather wrote it,
And killed a heifer for the binding of it —

But supper's spread, and we can talk and eat.
It was little good he got out of the book,
Because it filled his house with rambling fiddlers, 35

And rambling ballad-makers and the like.
The griddle-bread is there in front of you.
Colleen, what is the wonder in that book,
That you must leave the bread to cool?

Had I

Or had my father read or written books 40
There were no stockings stuffed with yellow guineas

To come when I am dead to Shawn and you FATHER HART. You should not fill your head with foolish dreams.

What are you reading?

MARY. How a Princess Edane,
A daughter of a King of Ireland, heard 45
A voice singing on a May Eve like this,
And followed half awake and half asleep,
Until she came into the Land of Faery,
Where nobody gets old and godly and grave,
Where nobody gets old and crafty and wise, 50
Where nobody gets old and bitter of tongue.
And she is still there, busied with a dance
Deep in the dewy shadow of a wood,
Or where stars walk upon a mountain-top

MAURTEEN. Persuade the colleen to put down the book, 55
My grandfather would mutter just such
things,

And he was no judge of a dog or a horse,
And any idle boy could blarney him;
Just speak your mind

FATHER HART. Put it away, my colleen, God spreads the heavens above us like great
wings 60

And gives a little round of deeds and days,
And then come the wrecked angels and set snares,

And bait them with light hopes and heavy
dreams,

Until the heart is puffed with pride and goes Half shuddering and half joyous from God's peace, 65

For it was some wrecked angel, blind with
tears,

Who flattered Edane's heart with merry
words

My colleen, I have seen some other girls
Restless and ill at ease, but years went by
And they grew like their neighbors and were glad 70

In minding children, working at the churn,
And gossiping of weddings and of wakes,
For life moves out of a red flare of dreams
Into a common light of common hours,
Until old age bring the red flare again 75

38 Colleen, girl 44 Princess Edane The story is found in Lady Wilde's Ancient Legends of Ireland (1880-88) Edane is the King of Munster's daughter, she is lured to the Land of Heart's Desire by Midir, king of the fairies 46 May Eve According to Irish folk-lore, the fairies are especially powerful on May Eve and frequently steal away newly married mortal women to be their own brides 72 wakes, feasts which precede Irish funerals

8 pyx, the vessel which contains the consecrated bread used in the Roman Catholic Mass 27 Spaniard, Spanish ship Ocris Head, a promontory that separates Sligo Bay from the ocean

MAURTEEN. That's true — but she's too young to know it's true

BRIDGET. She's old enough to know that it is wrong

To mope and idle.

MAURTEEN. I've little blame for her, She's dull when my big son is in the fields, And that and maybe this good woman's tongue 80

Have driven her to hide among her dreams Like children from the dark under the bed-clothes.

BRIDGET. She'd never do a turn if I were silent.

MAURTEEN. And maybe it is natural upon May Eve

To dream of the good people. But tell me, girl, 85

If you've the branch of blessed quicken wood That women hang upon the post of the door That they may send good luck into the house?

Remember they may steal new-married brides After the fall of twilight on May Eve, 90 Or what old women mutter at the fire Is but a pack of lies.

FATHER HART. It may be truth.

We do not know the limit of those powers God has permitted to the evil spirits For some mysterious end. You have done right [to MARY], 96 It's well to keep old innocent customs up.

[MARY BRUIN has taken a bough of quicken wood from a seat and hung it on a nail in the door-post. A girl child strangely dressed, perhaps in faery green, comes out of the wood and takes it away]

MARY. I had no sooner hung it on the nail Before a child ran up out of the wind, She has caught it in her hand and fondled it, Her face is pale as water before dawn. 100

FATHER HART. Whose child can this be?

MAURTEEN. No one's child at all.

She often dreams that some one has gone by, When there was nothing but a puff of wind

MARY. They have taken away the blessed quicken wood,

They will not bring good luck into the house; 105

Yet I am glad that I was courteous to them, For are not they, likewise, children of God?

FATHER HART. Colleen, they are the children of the fiend,

And they have power until the end of Time,

When God shall fight with them a great pitched battle 110

And hack them into pieces.

MARY. He will smile, Father, perhaps, and open His great door.

FATHER HART. Did but the lawless angels see that door

They would fall, slain by everlasting peace; And when such angels knock upon our doors, 115

Who goes with them must drive through the same storm.

[An arm comes around the door-post and knocks and beckons. It is clearly seen in the silvery light. MARY BRUIN goes to door and stands in it for a moment. MAURTEEN BRUIN is busy filling FATHER HART's plate. BRIDGET BRUIN stirs the fire.]

MARY [coming to table]. There's somebody out there that beckoned me And raised her hand as though it held a cup, And she was drinking from it, so it may be That she is thirsty.

[She takes milk from the table and carries it to the door]

FATHER HART. That will be the child 120 That you would have it was no child at all.

BRIDGET. And maybe, Father, what he said was true,

For there is not another night in the year So wicked as tonight

MAURTEEN. Nothing can harm us 124 While the good Father's underneath our roof

MARY. A little queer old woman dressed in green

BRIDGET. The good people beg for milk and fire

Upon May Eve — woe to the house that gives, For they have power upon it for a year

MAURTEEN. Hush, woman, hush!

BRIDGET. She's given milk away. 130 I knew she would bring evil on the house.

MAURTEEN. Who was it?

MARY. Both the tongue and face were strange.

MAURTEEN. Some strangers came last week to Clover Hill;

She must be one of them

BRIDGET. I am afraid

FATHER HART. The Cross will keep all evil from the house 135 While it hangs there.

85. good people, fairies—so called lest they take offense and do mortals injury 86 blessed . . . wood, mountain ash, hung on the door-post to protect the household from the power of the fairies.

128 woe . . . gives. It was formerly said that Irish peasants never give away fire, water, milk, or salt on May Eve for fear of falling under a fairy spell

MAURTEEN. Come, sit beside me, colleen,
And put away your dreams of discontent,
For I would have you light up my last days,
Like the good glow of the turf, and when I die You'll be the wealthiest hereabout, for, colleen, 140

I have a stocking full of yellow guineas
Hidden away where nobody can find it.

BRIDGET. You are the fool of every pretty face,
And I must spare and pinch that my son's
wife

May have all kinds of ribbons for her head

MAURTEEN. Do not be cross, she is a right good girl!

The butter is by your elbow, Father Hart.

My colleen, have not Fate and Time and Change

Done well for me and for old Bridget there?

We have a hundred acres of good land, 150

And sit beside each other at the fire

I have this reverend Father for my friend,

I look upon your face and my son's face —

We've put his plate by yours — and here he comes,

And brings with him the only thing we have lacked, 155

Abundance of good wine [SHAWN comes in]

Stir up the fire,

And put new turf upon it till it blaze,

To watch the turf-smoke coiling from the fire,

And feel content and wisdom in your heart,

This is the best of life, when we are young 160

Welong to tread a way none trod before,

But find the excellent old way through love,

And through the care of children, to the hour

For bidding Fate and Time and Change good-by

[MARY stands for a moment in the door, and then takes a sod of turf from the fire and goes out through the door. SHAWN follows her and meets her coming in.

SHAWN. What is it draws you to the chill
o' the wood? 165

There is a light among the stems of the trees
That makes one shiver

MARY. A little queer old man
Made me a sign to show he wanted fire
To light his pipe.

BRIDGET. You've given milk and fire Upon the unluckiest night of the year and
brought, 170

For all you know, evil upon the house.

Before you married you were idle and fine

And went about with ribbons on your head,

And now — no, Father, I will speak my
mind —

She is not a fitting wife for any man — 175

SHAWN. Be quiet, mother!

MAURTEEN. You are much too cross.

MARY. What do I care if I have given this house,

Where I must hear all day a bitter tongue,
Into the power of faeries!

BRIDGET. You know well
How calling the good people by that name, 180
Or talking of them over much at all,
May bring all kinds of evil on the house

MARY. Come, faeries, take me out of this dull house!

Let me have all the freedom I have lost,
Work when I will and idle when I will! 185

Faeries, come take me out of this dull world,

For I would ride with you upon the wind,

Run on the top of the dishevelled tide,

And dance upon the mountains like a flame

FATHER HART. You cannot know the meaning of your words. 190

MARY. Father, I am right weary of four tongues.

A tongue that is too crafty and too wise,

A tongue that is too godly and too grave,

A tongue that is more bitter than the tide,

And a kind tongue too full of drowsy love, 195
Of drowsy love and my captivity.

[SHAWN BRUIN leads her to a seat at the left of the door

SHAWN. Do not blame me, I often lie
awake

Thinking that all things trouble your bright
head.

How beautiful it is — your broad pale forehead 199

Under a cloudy blossoming of hair!

Sit down beside me here — these are too old,

And have forgotten they were ever young

MARY. Oh, you are the great door-post of this house,

And I the branch of blessed quicken wood,

And if I could I'd hang upon the post, 205

Till I had brought good luck into the house

[She would put her arms about him, but looks shyly at the priest and lets her arms
fall.

FATHER HART. My daughter, take his hand — by love alone

God binds us to Himself and to the hearth,

That shuts us from the waste beyond His
peace,

From maddening freedom and bewildering
light. 210

SHAWN. Would that the world were mine
to give it you,

And not its quiet hearths alone, but even

All that bewilderment of light and freedom,
If you would have it.

MARY. I would take the world
And break it into pieces in my hands 215
To see you smile watching it crumble away

SHAWN. Then I would mould a world of fire and dew,

With no one bitter, grave or over-wise,
And nothing marred or old to do you wrong,
And crowd the enraptured quiet of the sky 220
With candles burning to your lonely face

MARY Your looks are all the candles that I need

SHAWN. Once a fly dancing in a beam of
the sun,

Or the light wind blowing out of the dawn,
Could fill your heart with dreams none other
knew, 225

But now the indissoluble sacrament
Has mixed your heart that was most proud and cold

With my warm heart forever, the sun and moon
Must fade and heaven be rolled up like a scroll; 229

But your white spirit still walks by my spirit
[A Voice singing in the wood]

MAURTEEN. There's some one singing.
Why, it's but a child
It sang, "The lonely of heart is withered away."
A strange song for a child, but she sings sweetly.

Listen, listen! [Goes to door.]

MARY. Oh, cling close to me,
Because I have said wicked things tonight 235

THE VOICE. The wind blows out of the gates of the day,

The wind blows over the lonely of heart,
And the lonely of heart is withered away.

While the faeries dance in a place apart,
Shaking their milk-white feet in a ring, 240

Tossing their milk-white arms in the air,
For they hear the wind laugh and murmur
and sing

Of a land where even the old are fair,
And even the wise are merry of tongue,

But I heard a reed of Coolaney say, 245
"When the wind has laughed and murmured
and sung

The lonely of heart is withered away!"

MAURTEEN Being happy, I would have all others happy,

So I will bring her in out of the cold.
[He brings in the faery child]

Revelation (6 12, 14)—"the sun became black . . . and the moon became as blood . . . And the heaven departed as a

According to folk-lore, evil spirits were not able to cross a mortal threshold without being helped. See S. T. Coleridge's Christabel, also Mary Coleridge's The Witch, p 858

THE CHILD I tire of winds and waters and pale lights 250

MAURTEEN. And that's no wonder, for when night has fallen

The wood's a cold and a bewildering place,
But you are welcome here

THE CHILD. I am welcome here.
For when I tire of this warm little house,

But there is one here that must away, away 255

MAURTEEN O, listen to her dreamy and strange talk

Are you not cold?
THE CHILD. I will crouch down beside
you,

For I have run a long, long way this night.
BRIDGET. You have a comely shape.

MAURTEEN. Your hair is wet.
BRIDGET. I'll warm your chilly feet

MAURTEEN You have come indeed 260
A long, long way—for I have never seen Your pretty face—and must be tired and hungry,

Here is some bread and wine.

THE CHILD The wine is bitter
Old mother, have you no sweet food for me?

BRIDGET I have some honey.
[She goes into the next room]

MAURTEEN You have coaxing ways, 265
The mother was quite cross before you came.

[BRIDGET returns with the honey and fills a porringer with milk]

BRIDGET She is the child of gentle people,
look

At her white hands and at her pretty dress
I've brought you some new milk, but wait a while

And I will put it to the fire to warm, 270
For things well fitted for poor folk like us

Would never please a high-born child like you

THE CHILD From dawn, when you must blow the fire ablaze,

You work your fingers to the bone, old
mother

The young may lie in bed and dream and
hope, 275

But you must work your fingers to the bone
Because your heart is old

BRIDGET The young are idle
THE CHILD Your memories have made you wise, old father,

The young must sigh through many a dream
and hope,

But you are wise because your heart is old 280

[BRIDGET gives her more bread and honey]

MAURTEEN Oh, who would think to find so young a girl

Loving old age and wisdom?

THE CHILD. No more, mother.

MAURTEEN. What a small bite! The milk is ready now. [Hands it to her] What a small sip!

THE CHILD Put on my shoes, old mother For I would like to dance now I have eaten, 285 The reeds are dancing by Coolaney lake, And I would like to dance until the reeds And the white waves have danced themselves asleep [BRIDGET puts on the shoes, and the CHILD is about to dance, but suddenly sees the crucifix and shrieks and covers her eyes.

What is the ugly thing on the black cross?

FATHER HART You cannot know how naughty your words are!

That is our Blessed Lord

THE CHILD Hide it away! 291

BRIDGET. I have begun to be afraid again

THE CHILD. Hide it away!

MAURTEEN That would be wickedness!

BRIDGET. That would be sacrilege!

THE CHILD. The tortured thing! Hide it away!

MAURTEEN. Her parents are to blame. 295

FATHER HART. That is the image of the Son of God.

THE CHILD [caressing him] Hide it away, hide it away!

MAURTEEN No, no.

FATHER HART. Because you are so young and like a bird,

That must take fright at every stir of the leaves,

I will go take it down.

THE CHILD. Hide it away! 300

And cover it out of sight and out of mind!

[FATHER HART takes crucifix from wall and carries it towards inner room.

FATHER HART Since you have come into this barony,

I will instruct you in our blessed faith;

And being so keen-witted you'll soon learn

[To the others

We must be tender to all budding things, 305

Our Maker let no thought of Calvary

Trouble the morning stars in their first song

[Puts crucifix in inner room

THE CHILD. Here is level ground for dancing; I will dance. [Sings]

The wind blows out of the gates of the day,

The wind blows over the lonely of heart, 310

And the lonely of heart is withered away

[She dances

MARY [to SHAWN] Just now when she came near I thought I heard

Other small steps beating upon the floor,

And a faint music blowing in the wind,

Invisible pipes giving her feet the tune. 315

SHAWN. I heard no steps but hers.

MARY.

I hear them now,

The unholy powers are dancing in the house.

MAURTEEN. Come over here, and if you promise me

Not to talk wickedly of holy things

I will give you something 320

THE CHILD. Bring it me, old father.

MAURTEEN. Here are some ribbons that I bought in the town

For my son's wife — but she will let me give them

To tie up that wild hair the winds have tumbled.

THE CHILD. Come, tell me, do you love me? 325

MAURTEEN. Yes, I love you.

THE CHILD. Ah, but you love this fireside.

Do you love me?

FATHER HART. When the Almighty puts so great a share

Of His own ageless youth into a creature,

To look is but to love.

THE CHILD. But you love Him?

BRIDGET. She is blaspheming.

THE CHILD. And do you love me too? 330

MARY I do not know.

THE CHILD. You love that young man there,

Yet I could make you ride upon the winds,

Run on the top of the dishevelled tide,

And dance upon the mountains like a flame.

MARY. Queen of Angels and kind saints, defend us! 335

Some dreadful thing will happen. A while ago

She took away the blessed quicken wood.

FATHER HART You fear because of her unmeasured prattle;

She knows no better. Child, how old are you?

THE CHILD. When winter sleep is abroad my hair grows thin, 340

My feet unsteady. When the leaves awaken

My mother carries me in her golden arms,

I'll soon put on my womanhood and marry

The spirits of wood and water, but who can tell

When I was born for the first time? I think I am much older than the eagle cock 346

That blinks and blinks on Ballygawley Hill,

And he is the oldest thing under the moon.

FATHER HART. Oh, she is of the faery people

THE CHILD. Once called,

307. morning stars . . . song. From Job, 38 7 — "When the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy", the creation of the world is described

347. Ballygawley Hill, a mountain in Tyrone, Ulster.

I sent my messengers for milk and fire, 350
She called again and after that I came.

[All except SHAWN and MARY BRUIN gather behind the priest for protection.]

SHAWN [rising] Though you have made all these obedient,
You have not charmed my sight and won
from me

A wish or gift to make you powerful:
I'll turn you from the house. 355

FATHER HART. No, I will face her.

THE CHILD. Because you took away the crucifix

I am so mighty that there's none can pass,
Unless I will it, where my feet have danced
Or where I've whirled my finger-tops.

[SHAWN tries to approach her and cannot]

MAURTEEN Look, look! 360
There something stops him — look how he moves his hands

As though he rubbed them on a wall of glass!
FATHER HART. I will confront this mighty spirit alone;

Be not afraid, the Father is with us,
The Holy Martyrs and the Innocents, 365
The adoring Magi in their coats of mail,
And He who died and rose on the third day,
And all the nine angelic hierarchies.

[THE CHILD kneels upon the settle beside MARY and pulls her arm about her.]

Cry, daughter, to the Angels and the Saints
THE CHILD. You shall go with me, newlymarried bride, 370

And gaze upon a merrier multitude
White-armed Nuala, Aengus of the Birds,
Fearra of the hurtling foam, and him
Who is the ruler of the Western Host,
Finvarra, and their Land of Heart's Desire, 375
Where beauty has no ebb, decay no flood,
But joy is wisdom, Time an endless song.
I kiss you and the world begins to fade

SHAWN Awake out of that trance — and cover up
Your eyes and ears.

FATHER HART. She must both look and listen, 380
For only the soul's choice can save her now.

Come over to me, daughter; stand beside
me;

Think of this house and of your duties in it.
THE CHILD. Stay and come with me,
newly-married bride,

For if you hear him you grow like the rest; 385 Bear children, cook, and bend above the churn,

And wrangle over butter, fowl, and eggs,
Until at last, grown old and bitter of tongue, You're crouching there and shivering at the
grave

FATHER HART. Daughter, I point you out the way to Heaven 390

THE CHILD. But I can lead you, newly-
married bride,

Where nobody gets old and crafty and wise,
Where nobody gets old and godly and grave,
Where nobody gets old and bitter of tongue,
And where kind tongues bring no captivity;
For we are but obedient to the thoughts 396
That drift into the mind at a wink of the eye.

FATHER HART. By the dear Name of the One crucified,
I bid you, Mary Bruin, come to me.

THE CHILD. I keep you in the name of your own heart. 400

FATHER HART. It is because I put away
the crucifix
That I am nothing, and my power is nothing
I'll bring it here again.

MAURTEEN [clinging to him] No.

BRIDGET. Do not leave us

FATHER HART Oh, let me go before it is too late;

It is my sin alone that brought it all. 405
[Singing outside.]

THE CHILD I hear them sing, "Come,
newly-married bride,
Come to the woods and waters and pale lights."

MARY. I will go with you.

FATHER HART. She is lost, alas!

THE CHILD [standing by the door]. But clinging mortal hope must fall from you,
For we who ride the winds, run on the
waves, 410

And dance upon the mountains are more
light

Than dewdrops on the banner of the dawn.

MARY. Oh, take me with you

SHAWN. Beloved, I will keep you.
I've more than words, I have these arms to hold you,

Nor all the faery host, do what they please, 415
Shall ever make me loosen you from these arms.

MARY Dear face! Dear voice!

THE CHILD. Come, newly-married bride

MARY I always loved her world — and yet — and yet —

THE CHILD White bird, white bird, come with me, little bird. 420
 MARY. She calls me!
 THE CHILD. Come with me, little bird

[Distant dancing figures appear in the wood.]

MARY. I can hear songs and dancing.

SHAWN Stay with me

MARY. I think that I would stay — and
 yet — and yet —

THE CHILD Come, little bird with crest
 of gold

MARY [very softly]. And yet —

THE CHILD Come, little bird with silver
 feet!

[MARY BRUIN dies, and the CHILD goes.]

SHAWN. She is dead!

BRIDGET Come from that image; body and soul are gone 425

You have thrown your arms about a drift of
 leaves,

Or bole of an ash-tree changed into her image.

FATHER HART. Thus do the spirits of evil
 snatch their prey,

Almost out of the very hand of God,

And day by day their power is more and
 more, 430

And men and women leave old paths, for pride

Comes knocking with thin knuckles on the
 heart.

*[Outside there are dancing figures and, it may be a white bird, and many voices
 singing:]*

The wind blows out of the gates of the day,
 The wind blows over the lonely of heart,

And the lonely of heart is withered away; 435
 While the faeries dance in a place apart,

Shaking their milk-white feet in a ring,
 Tossing their milk-white arms in the air;

For they hear the wind laugh and murmur
 and sing

Of a land where even the old are fair, 440
 And even the wise are merry of tongue;

But I heard a reed of Coolaney say —
 "When the wind has laughed and murmured

and sung,
 The lonely of heart is withered away." (1894)

INTO THE TWILIGHT

Out-worn heart, in a time out-worn,
 Come clear of the nets of wrong and right;
 Laugh heart again in the gray twilight,
 Sigh, heart, again in the dew of the morn

420. White bird, the symbol of the soul

Your mother Eire is always young, 5
 Dew ever shining and twilight gray,
 Though hopes fall from you and love decay,
 Burning in fires of a slanderous tongue.

Come, heart, where hill is heaped upon hill,
 For there the mystical brotherhood 10
 Of sun and moon and hollow and wood
 And river and stream work out their will;

And God stands winding His lonely horn,
 And time and the world are ever in flight;
 And love is less kind than the gray twilight, 15
 And hope is less dear than the dew of the morn

THE HOST OF THE AIR

O'Driscoll drove with a song
 The wild duck and the drake
 From the tall and the tufted reeds
 Of the drear Hart Lake.

And he saw how the reeds grew dark 5
 At the coming of night tide,
 And dreamed of the long dim hair
 Of Bridget his bride.

He heard while he sang and dreamed
 A piper piping away, 10
 And never was piping so sad,
 And never was piping so gay

And he saw young men and young girls
 Who danced on a level place
 And Bridget his bride among them, 15
 With a sad and a gay face.

The dancers crowded about him,
 And many a sweet thing said,
 And a young man brought him red wine
 And a young girl white bread. 20

But Bridget drew him by the sleeve,
 Away from the merry bands,
 To old men playing at cards
 With a twinkling of ancient hands.

The bread and the wine had a doom, 25
 For these were the host of the air;
 He sat and played in a dream
 Of her long dim hair.

5 Eire, Ireland

The Host of the Air "This poem is founded on an old Gaelic ballad that was sung and translated for me by a woman at Ballisodare in County Sligo" (Yeats's note)

The "Host of the Air" is an especially malignant branch of the fairy race

4 Hart Lake, "a gloomy and tree-bordered pond" five miles south of Sligo.

He played with the merry old men
And thought not of evil chance, 30
Until one bore Bridget his bride
Away from the merry dance.

He bore her away in his arms,
The handsomest young man there,
And his neck and his breast and his arms 35
Were drowned in her long dim hair.

O'Driscoll scattered the cards
And out of his dream awoke:
Old men and young men and young girls
Were gone like a drifting smoke, 40

But he heard high up in the air
A piper piping away,
And never was piping so sad,
And never was piping so gay. (1899)

HE REMEMBERS FORGOTTEN BEAUTY

When my arms wrap you round I press
My heart upon the loveliness
That has long faded from the world;
The jeweled crowns that kings have hurled
In shadowy pools, when armies fled; 5
The love-rites wrought with silken thread
By dreaming ladies upon cloth
That has made fat the murderous moth;
The roses that of old time were Woven by ladies in their hair; 10
The dew-cold lilies ladies bore
Through many a sacred corridor
Where such gray clouds of incense rose
That only the gods' eyes did not close:
For that pale breast and lingering hand 15
Come from a more dream-heavy land,
A more dream-heavy hour than this,
And when you sigh from kiss to kiss
I hear white Beauty sighing, too,
For hours when all must fade like dew; 20
But flame on flame, deep under deep,
Throne over throne, where in half sleep
Their swords upon their iron knees
Brood her high lonely mysteries.

DORA SIGERSON SHORTER (1866-1918)

IRELAND

'Twas the dream of a God,
And the mold of His hand,
That you shook 'neath His stroke,
That you trembled and broke
To this beautiful land

5

Here He loosed from His hold
A brown tumult of wings,
Till the wind on the sea
Bore the strange melody
Of an island that sings. 10

He made you all fair,
You in purple and gold,
You in silver and green,
Till no eye that has seen
Without love can behold. 15

I have left you behind
In the path of the past,
With the white breath of flowers,
With the best of God's hours,
I have left you at last. (1893)

THE GYPSIES' ROAD

I shall go on the gypsies' road,
The road that has no ending;
For the sedge is brown on the lone lake side,
The wild geese eastward tending.

I shall go as the unfettered wave, 5
From shore to shore, forgetting
The grief that lies 'neath a roof-tree's shade,
The years that bring regretting.

No law shall dare my wandering stay,
No man my acres measure; 10
The world was made for the gypsies' feet,
The winding road for pleasure.

And I shall drift as the pale leaf strayed,
Whither the wild wind listed,
I shall sleep in the dark of the hedge, 15
'Neath rose and thorn entwisted.

This was a call in the heart of the night,
A whispering dream's dear treasure.
"The world was made for the nomads' feet,
The winding road for pleasure" 20

I stole at dawn from my roof-tree's shade,
And the cares that it did cover;
I flew to the heart of the fierce north wind,
As a maid will greet her lover.

But a thousand hands did draw me back 25
And bid me to their tending;
I may not go on the gypsies' road —
The road that has no ending (1893)

CEAN DUV DEELISH

Cean duv declish, beside the sea
I stand and stretch my hands to thee
Across the world

Cean Duv Deelish The title is Gaelic for Dear Black Head

The riderless horses race to shore
With thundering hoofs and shuddering, hoar,
Blow manes uncurled. 6

Cean duv deelish, I cry to thee
Beyond the world, beneath the sea,
Thou being dead.
Where hast thou hidden from the beat 10
Of crushing hoofs and tearing feet
Thy dear black head?

Cean duv deelish, 'tis hard to pray
With breaking heart from day to day,
And no reply; 15
When the passionate challenge of sky is cast
In the teeth of the sea and an angry blast Goes keening by.

God bless the woman, whoever she be,
From the tossing waves will recover thee 20
And lashing wind.
Who will take thee out of the wind and storm,
Dry thy wet face on her bosom warm
And lips so kind?

I not to know. It is hard to pray, 25
But I shall for this woman from day to day,
"Comfort my dead,
The sport of the winds and the play of the
sea."
I loved thee too well for this thing to be,
O dear black head! (1893)

THE KINE OF MY FATHER

The kine of my father, they are straying from my keeping;
The young goat's at mischief, but little can
I do,
For all through the night did I hear the ban-
shee keening;
O youth of my loving, and is it well with
you?

All through the night sat my mother with my sorrow, 5
"Whisht, it is the storm, O one childeen of my heart!"
My hair with the wind, and my two hands
clapsed in anguish;
Black head of my darling! too long are we
apart
Were your grave at my feet, I would think it half a blessing,
I could herd then the cattle, and drive the goats away, 10

18 keening, moaning—as for the dead
The Kine of My Father 3 banshee keening In the folk-lore of Ireland and Scotland, the wailing of a banshee, a fairy creature, foretold death

Many a Paternoster I would say for your safe-
keeping;
I could sleep above your heart until the dawn of day.

I see you on the prairie, hot with thirst and faint with hunger,
The head that I love lying low upon the
sand.
The vultures shriek impatient, and the coyote dogs are howling, 15
Till the blood is pulsing cold within your clenching hand

I see you on the waters, so white, so still,
forsaken,
Your dear eyes unclosing beneath a foreign
rain —
A plaything of the winds, you turn and drift
unceasing;
No grave for your resting, oh, mine the bitter pain! 20

All through the night did I hear the banshee
keening:
Somewhere you are dying, and nothing can
I do;
My hair with the wind, and my two hands
clapsed in anguish,
Bitter is your trouble — and I am far from
you. (1898)

THE COMFORTERS

When I crept over the hill, broken with tears,
When I crouched down on the grass, dumb
in despair,
I heard the soft croon of the wind bend to
my ears,
I felt the light kiss of the wind touching
my hair.

When I stood lone on the height my sorrow
did speak, 5
As I went down the hill, I cried and I cried,
The soft little hands of the rain stroking my
cheek,
The kind little feet of the rain ran by my
side.

When I went to thy grave, broken with tears,
When I crouched down in the grass, dumb
in despair, 10
I heard the sweet croon of the wind soft in
my ears,
I felt the kind lips of the wind touching
my hair.

11 Paternoster, the Lord's prayer in Latin, so-called from the opening words

When I stood by thy cross, sorrow did speak.
 When I went down the long hill, I cried and I cried
 The soft little hands of the rain stroked my pale cheek, 15
 The kind little feet of the rain ran by my side. (1918)

ARTHUR SYMONS (1865-)

JAVANESE DANCERS

Twitched strings, the clang of metal, beaten drums,
 Dull, shrill, continuous, disquieting,
 And now the stealthy dancer comes Undulantly with cat-like steps that cling,

Smiling between her painted lids a smile, 5
 Motionless, unintelligible, she twines
 Her fingers into mazy lines;
 The scarves across her fingers twine the while.

One, two, three, four glide forth, and, to and fro, 10
 Delicately and imperceptibly,
 Now swaying gently in a row,
 Now interthreading slow and rhythmically,

Still, with fixed eyes, monotonously still,
 Mysteriously, with smiles inanimate,
 With lingering feet that undulate, 15
 With sinuous fingers, spectral hands that thrill

In measure while the gnats of music whirr,
 The little amber-colored dancers move,
 Like painted idols seen to stir
 By the idolators in a magic grove 20
 (1889; 1892)

ON THE BEACH

Night, a gray sky, a ghostly sea,
 The soft beginning of the rain,
 Black on the horizon, sails that wane
 Into the distance mistily.

The tide is rising, I can hear 5
 The soft roar broadening far along;
 It cries and murmurs in my ear
 A sleepy old forgotten song.

Softly the stealthy night descends,
 The black sails fade into the sky. 10
 Is not this, where the sea-line ends,
 The shore-line of infinity?

I cannot think or dream; the gray
 Unending waste of sea and night,

Dull, impotently infinite, 15
 Blots out the very hope of day.
 (1890; 1892)

BEFORE THE SQUALL

The wind is rising on the sea,
 The windy white foam-dancers leap;
 And the sea moans uneasily,
 And turns to sleep and cannot sleep.

Ridge after rocky ridge uplifts 5
 Wild hands, and hammers at the land,
 Scatters in liquid dust, and drifts
 To death among the dusty sand.

On the horizon's nearing line,
 Where the sky rests, a visible wall, 10
 Gray in the offing, I divine
 The sails that fly before the squall
 (1890; 1892)

EMMY

Emmy's exquisite youth and her virginal air,
 Eyes and teeth in the flash of a musical smile,
 Come to me out of the past, and I see her
 there
 As I saw her once for a while.

Emmy's laughter rings in my ears, as bright,
 Fresh, and sweet as the voice of a mountain brook, 6
 And still I hear her telling us tales that night,
 Out of Boccaccio's book.

There, in the midst of the villainous dancing-
 hall,
 Leaning across the table, over the beer, 10
 While the music maddened the whirling skirts
 of the ball,
 As the midnight hour drew near,

There with the women, haggard, painted, and
 old,
 One fresh bud in a garland withered and stale,
 She, with her innocent voice and her clear eyes, told 15
 Tale after shameless tale.

And ever the witching smile, to her face beguiled,
 Paused and broadened, and broke in a ripple
 of fun,
 And the soul of a child looked out of the eyes of a child,
 Or ever the tale was done 20

Emmy 8 Boccaccio's book, the Decameron (1353), a collection of a hundred tales, some of them "shameless"

O my child, who wronged you first, and began
First the dance of death that you dance so well?

Soul for soul and I think the soul of a man
Shall answer for yours in hell. (1891; 1892)

AT CARBIS BAY

Out of the night of the sea,
Out of the turbulent night,
A sharp and hurrying wind
Scourges the waters white
The terror by night. 5

Out of the doubtful dark,
Out of the night of the land,
What is it breathes and broods,
Hoveringly at hand?
The menace of land. 10

Out of the night of heaven,
Out of the delicate sky,
Pale and serene the stars
In their silence reply
The peace of the sky. (1893; 1895)

EPILOGUE CREDO

Each, in himself, his hour to be and cease
Endures alone, yet few there be who dare,
Sole with themselves, their single burden bear,
All the long day until the night's release

Yet, ere the night fall, and the shadows close,
This labor of himself is each man's lot, 6
All a man hath, yet living, is forgot,
Himself he leaves behind him when he goes

If he have any valiancy within,
If he have made his life his very own, 10
If he have loved or labored, and have known
A strenuous virtue, or a strenuous sin,

Then, being dead, his life was not all vain,
For he has saved what most desire to lose, 14
And he has chosen what the few must choose,
Since life, once lived, returns no more again.

For of our time we lose so large a part
In serious trifles, and so oft let slip
The wine of every moment, at the lip
Its moment, and the moment of the heart 20

We are awake so little on the earth,
And we shall sleep so long, and rise so late,

If there is any knocking at that gate
Which is the gate of death, the gate of birth (1894; 1895)

THE WANDERERS

Wandering, ever wandering,
Their eyelids freshened with the wind of the
sea
Blown up the cliffs at sunset, their cheeks cooled
With meditative shadows of hushed leaves
That have been drowsing in the woods all day
And certain fires of sunrise in their eyes. 6

They wander, and the white roads under them
Crumble into fine dust behind their feet,
For they return not; life, a long white road,
Winds ever from the dark into the dark, 10
And they, as days, return not, they go on Forever, with the traveling stars; the night
Curtains them, being wearied, and the dawn
Awakens them unwearied, they go on They know the winds of all the earth, they
know 15

The dust of many highways, and the stones
Of cities set for landmarks on the road
Theirs is the world, and all the glory of it,
Theirs, because they forego it, passing on
Into the freedom of the elements, 20
Wandering, ever wandering,
Because life holds not anything so good
As to be free of yesterday, and bound
Toward a newborn tomorrow, and they go
Into a world of unknown faces, where 25
It may be there are faces waiting them,
Faces of friendly strangers, not the long
Intolerable monotony of friends.

The joy of earth is yours, O wanderers,
The only joy of the old earth, to wake, 30
As each new dawn is patiently renewed,
With foreheads fresh against a fresh young
sky,
To be a little further on the road,
A little nearer somewhere, some few steps
Advanced into the future, and removed 35
By some few counted milestones from the
past;
God gives you this good gift, the only gift
That God, being repentant, has to give

Wanderers, you have the sunrise and the stars;
And we, beneath our comfortable roofs, 40
Lamplight, and daily fire upon the hearth,
And four walls of a prison, and sure food
But God has given you freedom, wanderers!
(1895; 1897)

ARQUES — AFTERNOON

Gently a little breeze begins to creep
 Into the valley, and the sleeping trees
 Are stirred, and breathe a little in their sleep,
 And nod, half-wakened, to the breeze.

Cool little quiet shadows wander out 5
 Across the fields, and dapple with dark trails
 The snake-gray road coiled stealthily about
 The green hill climbing from the vales.

And faintlier, in this cooler peace of things,
 My brooding thoughts, a scattered flock grown few, 10
 Withdrawn upon their melancholy wings,
 Float farther off against the blue

(1896; 1897)

OPALS

My soul is like this cloudy, flaming opal ring.
 The fields of earth are in it, green and glimmering,

The waves of the blue sky, night's purple flower of noon,

The vanishing cold scintillations of the moon,
 And the red heart that is a flame within a flame. 5

And as the opal dies, and is reborn the same,
 And all the fire that is its life-blood seems to dart

Through the veined variable intricacies of its
 heart,

And ever wandering ever wanders back again,
 So must my swift soul constant to itself remain 10

Opal, have I not been as variable as you?
 But, cloudy opal flaming green and red and
 blue,

Are you not ever constant in your varying,
 Even as my soul, O captive opal of my ring? 15
 (1896; 1899)

THE OLD WOMEN

They pass upon their old, tremulous feet,
 Creeping with little satchels down the street,
 And they remember, many years ago,
 Passing that way in silks They wander, slow
 And solitary, through the city ways, 5
 And they alone remember those old days
 Men have forgotten In their shaking heads
 A dancer of old carnivals yet treads
 The measure of past waltzes, and they see
 The candles lit again, the patchouli 10
 Sweeten the air, and the warm cloud of musk

Arques—Afternoon Arques is a French village in Normandy, north of the Seine River
The Old Women 10 patchouli, a perfume extracted from an East-Indian mint

Enchant the passing of the passionate dusk
 Then you will see a light begin to creep
 Under the earthen eyelids, dimmed with sleep.
 And a new tremor, happy and uncouth, 15
 Jerking about the corners of the mouth
 Then the old head drops down again, and shakes,

Muttering
 Sometimes, when the swift gaslight wakes
 The dreams and fever of the sleepless town,
 A shaking huddled thing in a black gown 21
 Will steal at midnight, carrying with her
 Violet little bags of lavender,

Into the tap-room full of noisy light;
 Or, at the crowded earlier hour of night, 25
 Sidle, with matches, up to some who stand
 About a stage-door, and, with furtive hand, Appealing: "I too was a dancer, when Your fathers would have been young gentlemen!"

And sometimes, out of some lean ancient throat, 30

A broken voice, with here and there a note
 Of unspoilt crystal, suddenly will arise
 Into the night, while a cracked fiddle cries
 Pantingly after, and you know she sings
 The passing of light, famous, passing things,
 And sometimes, in the hours past midnight, 35 reels

Out of an alley upon staggering heels,
 Or into the dark keeping of the stones
 About a doorway, a vague thing of bones
 And dragged hair. 40

And all these have been loved
 And not one ruinous body has not moved
 The heart of man's desire, nor has not seemed Immortal in the eyes of one who dreamed
 The dream that men call love. This is the
 end 45

Of much fair flesh; it is for this you tend
 Your delicate bodies many careful years,
 To be this thing of laughter and of tears,
 To be this living judgment of the dead,
 An old gray woman with a shaking head 50
 (1900)

THE UNLOVED

These are the women whom no man has loved.

Year after year, day after day has moved
 These hearts with many longings, and with
 tears,

And with content; they have received the
 years

With empty hands, expecting no good thing, 5
 Life has passed by their doors, not entering
 In solitude, and without vain desire,
 They have warmed themselves beside a lonely
 fire,

And, without scorn, beheld as in a glass

The blown and painted leaves of Beauty pass.
Their souls have been made fragrant with the spice 11

Of costly virtues lit for sacrifice;
They have accepted Life, the unpaid debt,
And looked for no vain day of reckoning

Yet 15
They too in certain windless summer hours
Have felt the stir of dreams, and dreamed the powers

And the exemptions and the miracles
And the cruelty of Beauty. Citadels
Of many-walled and deeply-moated hearts 20
Have suddenly surrendered to the arts
Of so compelling magic, entering,
They have esteemed it but a little thing
To have won so great a conquest, and with haste

They have cast down, and utterly laid waste,
Tower upon tower, and sapped their roots with flame; 26

And passed on that eternity of shame
Which is the way of Beauty on the earth
And they have shaken laughter from its mirth,
To be a sound of trumpets and of horns 30
Crying the battle-cry of those red morns
Against a sky of triumph

On some nights
Of delicate Springtide, when the hesitant lights 34

Begin to fade, and glimmer, and grow warm,
And all the softening air is quick with storm,
And the ardors of the young year, entering in,
Flush the gray earth with buds; when the trees begin

To feel a trouble mounting from their roots,
And all their green life blossoming into shoots,
They too, in some obscure, unblossoming
strife, 41

Have felt the stirring of the sap of life.
And they have wept, with bowed head; in the street

They hear the twittering of little feet,
The rocking of the cradles in their hearts 45

This is a mood, and, as a mood, departs
With the dried tears; and they resume the tale

Of the dropt stitches; these must never fail
For a dream's sake; nor, for a memory,
The telling of a patient rosary 50

(1896; 1900)

IN THE BAY

The seagulls whiten and dip,
Crying their lonely cry,
At noon in the blue of the bay,
And I hear the slow oars drip,

As the fisherman's boat drifts by, 5
And the cuckoo calls from the hillside far
away.

The white birds cry for the foam,
O white birds crying to me
The cry of my heart evermore,
By perilous seas to roam 10
To a shore far over the sea,
And I would that my ship went down within sight of the shore! (1896)

IN THE WOOD OF FINVARRA

I have grown tired of sorrow and human tears;
Life is a dream in the night, a fear among fears,

A naked runner lost in a storm of spears.

I have grown tired of rapture and love's
desire;

Love is a flaming heart, and its flames aspire
Till they cloud the soul in the smoke of a windy fire. 6

I would wash the dust of the world in a soft green flood;

Here, between sea and sea, in the fairy wood,
I have found a delicate, wave-green solitude.

Here, in a fairy wood, between sea and sea, 10
I have heard the song of a fairy bird in a tree,
And the peace that is not in the world has flown to me. (1896; 1900)

MODERN BEAUTY

I am the torch, she saith, and what to me
If the moth die of me? I am the flame
Of Beauty, and I burn that all may see
Beauty, and I have neither joy nor shame,
But live with that clear life of perfect fire 5
Which is to men the death of their desire

I am Yseult and Helen, I have seen
Troy burn, and the most loving knight lie
dead

In the Wood of Finvarra This is the last of a group of five poems under the general title In Ireland. The scene of the poem is a forest on a point of land, near the village of Finvarra, extending into the Bay of Galway on the western coast of Ireland. Symons visited the spot in August, 1896. Finvarra is the name of the king of the Connaught faeries, cf. Yeats's The Land of Heart's Desire, 375, page 869.

Modern Beauty 7 Yseult . . . Helen. The beauty of Yseult, wife of King Mark of Cornwall, made Sir Tristram her devoted lover for his lifetime, that of Helen induced Paris to steal her from her husband and caused the Trojan War. See Arnold's Tristram and Yseult, page 442, Swinburne's Tristram of Lyonesse, page 707, and note on Browning's Development, 3, page 355. 8 Troy burn. The burning of Troy by the victorious Greeks is described in Virgil's Aeneid, Book 2. 8 most . . . dead. When Tristram lay mortally wounded in Brittany, Yseult sailed from Cornwall to help him, on her arrival she found him dead.

The world has been my mirror, time has been
My breath upon the glass; and men have said,
Age after age, in rapture and despair, 11
Love's poor few words, before mine image
there.

I live, and am immortal; in mine eyes
The sorrow of the world, and on my lips
The joy of life, mingle to make me wise; 15
Yet now the day is darkened with eclipse:
Who is there lives for beauty? Still am I
The torch, but where's the moth that still dares die? (1899; 1900)

THE LOOM OF DREAMS

I broider the world upon a loom,
I broider with dreams my tapestry;
Here in a little lonely room
I am master of earth and sea, 5
And the planets come to me.

I broider my life into the frame,
I broider my love, thread upon thread;
The world goes by with its glory and shame,
Crowns are bartered and blood is shed;
I sit and broider my dreams instead. 10

And the only world is the world of my dreams,
And my weaving the only happiness;
For what is the world but what it seems?
And who knows but that God, beyond our guess, 15
Sits weaving worlds out of loneliness? (1900; 1901)

LOVE SONG

O woman of my love, I am walking with you on the sand,
And the moon's white on the sand and the
foam's white in the sea;
And I am thinking my own thoughts, and your hand is on my hand,
And your heart thinks by my side, and it's not thinking of me

O woman of my love, the world is narrow and
wide, 5
And I wonder which is the lonelier of us two
You are thinking of one who is near to your heart, and far from your side;
I am thinking my own thoughts, and they are all thoughts of you. (1903; 1906)

TO A SEA-GULL

Bird of the fierce delight,
Brother of foam as white
And winged as foam is,

Wheeling again from flight
To some unfooted height 5
Where your blithe home is;

Bird of the wind and spray,
Crying by night and day
Sorrowful laughter,
How shall man's thought survey 10
Your will or your wings' way,
Or follow after?

What pride is man's, and why,
Angel of air, should I
Joy to be human? 15
You walk and swim and fly,
Laugh like a man and cry
Like any woman.

I would your spirit were mine
When your wings dip and shine 20
Smoothly advancing;
I drink a breathless wine
Of speed in your divine
Aerial dancing.

(1904; 1906)

NIGHT

The night's held breath,
And the stars' steady eyes:
Is it sleep, is it death,
In the earth, in the skies?

In my heart of hope, 5
In my restless will,
There is that should not stop
Though the earth stood still,

Though the heavens shook aghast,
As the frost shakes a tree, 10
And a strong wind cast
The stars in the sea.

(1905; 1906)

AMENDS TO NATURE

I have loved colors, and not flowers,
Their motion, not the swallow's wings;
And wasted more than half my hours
Without the comradeship of things.

How is it, now, that I can see, 5
With love and wonder and delight,
The children of the hedge and tree,
The little lords of day and night?

How is it that I see the roads,
No longer with usurping eyes, 10
A twilight meeting-place for toads,
A midday mart for butterflies?

I feel, in every midge that hums,
Life, fugitive and infinite,
And suddenly the world becomes 15
A part of me and I of it.

RUDYARD KIPLING (1865-)

THE BALLAD OF EAST AND WEST

*Oh, East is East, and West is West, and never the twain shall meet,
Till Earth and Sky stand presently at God's great Judgment Seat;
But there is neither East nor West, Border,
nor Breed, nor Birth,
When two strong men stand face to face, though they come from the ends of the earth!*

Kamal is out with twenty men to raise the Border side, 5
And he has lifted the Colonel's mare that is the Colonel's pride.
He has lifted her out of the stable-door between the dawn and the day,
And turned the calkins upon her feet, and ridden her far away.
Then up and spoke the Colonel's son that led a troop of the Guides.
"Is there never a man of all my men can say where Kamal hides?" 10
Then up and spoke Mohammed Khan, the son of the Ressaldar
"If ye know the track of the morning-mist, ye know where his pickets are
"At dusk he harries the Abazai — at dawn he is into Bonair,
"But he must go by Fort Bukloh to his own place to fare,
"So if ye gallop to Fort Bukloh as fast as a bird can fly, 15
"By the favour of God ye may cut him off
ere he win to the Tongue of Jagai.
"But if he be past the Tongue of Jagai, right swiftly turn ye then,
"For the length and the breadth of that grusly plain is sown with Kamal's men.

The Ballad of East and West From Departmental Duties, copyright 1892, 1893, and 1899 by Rudyard Kipling
The scene of the ballad is the border between Afghanistan and the Northwest Frontier Province of India, it concerns a raid made by the Afghans into British territory and a pursuit into the hostile Afghan wilderness It is modeled, to a certain extent, on the old ballads of the Scottish border, such as Kimment Willie, see Sir Walter Scott's Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border

5 Kamal, chief of an Afghan tribe 6 lifted, stolen
8 calkins, shoes 9 Guides, the Queen's Own Corps of Guides, a corps of 1400 men recruited from many different races, stationed at Mardan, on the border between India and Afghanistan 11 Ressaldar, native captain in an East-Indian troop 13 Abazai . . . Bonair, villages on the Indian frontier, about forty miles apart 14 Fort Bukloh, a British fort on the border 16 Tongue of Jagai, a mountain ridge in Eastern Afghanistan, see Kipling's The Drums of the Fore and Aft

"There is rock to the left, and rock to the right, and low lean thorn between,
"And ye may hear a breech-bolt snick where never a man is seen " 20
The Colonel's son has taken a horse, and a raw rough dun was he,
With the mouth of a bell and the heart of Hell, and the head of the gallows-tree.
The Colonel's son to the Fort has won, they bid him stay to eat —
Who rides at the tail of a Border thief, he sits not long at his meat
He's up and away from Fort Bukloh as fast as he can fly, 25
Till he was aware of his father's mare in the gut of the Tongue of Jagai,
Till he was aware of his father's mare with Kamal upon her back,
And when he could spy the white of her eye,
he made the pistol crack.
He has fired once, he has fired twice, but the whistling ball went wide.
"Ye shoot like a soldier," Kamal said "Show
now if ye can ride!" 30
It's up and over the Tongue of Jagai, as blown dust-devils go,
The dun he fled like a stag of ten, but the mare like a barren doe
The dun he leaned against the bit and slugged
his head above,
But the red mare played with the snafflebars, as a maiden plays with a glove
There was rock to the left and rock to the right, and low lean thorn between, 35
And thrice he heard a breech-bolt snick tho'
never a man was seen.
They have ridden the low moon out of the sky, their hoofs drum up the dawn,
The dun he went like a wounded bull, but the mare like a new-roused fawn
The dun he fell at a water-course — in a woeful heap fell he,
And Kamal has turned the red mare back,
and pulled the rider free. 40
He has knocked the pistol out of his hand — small room was there to strive,
" 'Twas only by favour of mine," quoth he,
"ye rode so long alive:
"There was not a rock for twenty mile, there was not a clump of tree,
"But covered a man of my own men with his rifle cocked on his knee.
"If I had raised my bridle-hand, as I have held it low, 45
"The little jackals that flee so fast were feasting all in a row.

20 hear a breech-bolt snick, hear a breech-bolt click as it is pulled back ready for firing 32 stag of ten, a stag with ten branches on his horns 34 snaffle-bars, the two sections of a jointed bit 42 "Twas alive Compare the similar situation in Scott's The Lady of the Lake, Canto V, Sections 8-12 (lines 170-318).

"If I had bowed my head on my breast, as I have held it high,
 "The kite that whistles above us now were gorged till she could not fly."
 Lightly answered the Colonel's son: "Do good to bird and beast,
 "But count who come for the broken meats before thou makest a feast. 50
 "If there should follow a thousand swords to carry my bones away,
 "Belike the price of a jackal's meal were more than a thief could pay.
 "They will feed their horse on the standing crop, their men on the garnered grain,
 "The thatch of the byres will serve their fires when all the cattle are slain.
 "But if thou thinkest the price be fair, — thy brethren wait to sup, 55
 "The hound is kin to the jackal-spawn, — howl, dog, and call them up!
 "And if thou thinkest the price be high, in steer and gear and stack,
 "Give me my father's mare again, and I'll fight my own way back!"
 Kamal has gripped him by the hand and set him upon his feet.
 "No talk shall be of dogs," said he, "when wolf and grey wolf meet 60
 "May I eat dirt if thou hast hurt of me in deed or breath;
 "What dam of lances brought thee forth to jest at the dawn with Death?"
 Lightly answered the Colonel's son: "I hold by the blood of my clan:
 "Take up the mare for my father's gift — by God, she has carried a man!"
 The red mare ran to the Colonel's son, and nuzzled against his breast; 65
 "We be two strong men," said Kamal then, "but she loveth the younger best
 "So she shall go with a lifter's dower, my turquoise-studded rein,
 "My 'broidered saddle and saddle-cloth, and silver stirrups twain."
 The Colonel's son a pistol drew, and held it muzzle-end,
 "Ye have taken the one from a foe," said he; "Will ye take the mate from a friend?" 70
 "A gift for a gift," said Kamal straight, "a limb for the risk of a limb.
 "Thy father has sent his son to me, I'll send my son to him!"
 With that he whistled his only son, that dropped from a mountain-crest —
 He trod the ling like a buck in spring, and he looked like a lance in rest.
 "Now here is thy master," Kamal said, "who leads a troop of the Guides, 75

54 byres, cow-stables 57 gear, equipment 67
 lifter's, horse-thief's 74 ling, barren mountain-side

"And thou must ride at his left side as shield on shoulder rides.
 "Till Death or I cut loose the tie, at camp and board and bed,
 "Thy life is his — thy fate it is to guard him with thy head.
 "So, thou must eat the White Queen's meat, and all her foes are thine,
 "And thou must harry thy father's hold for the peace of the Border-line. 80
 "And thou must make a trooper tough and hack thy way to power —
 "Belike they will raise thee to Ressaldar when I am hanged in Peshawur "

They have looked each other between the eyes, and there they found no fault,
 They have taken the Oath of the Brother-in-Blood on leavened bread and salt:
 They have taken the Oath of the Brother-in-Blood on fire and fresh-cut sod, 85
 On the hilt and the haft of the Khyber knife, and the Wondrous Names of God.
 The Colonel's son he rides the mare and Kamal's boy the dun,
 And two have come back to Fort Bukloh where there went forth but one.
 And when they drew to the Quarter-Guard, full twenty swords flew clear —
 There was not a man but carried his feud with the blood of the mountaineer. 90
 "Ha' done! ha' done!" said the Colonel's son.
 "Put up the steel at your sides!"
 "Last night ye had struck at a Border thief — to-night 'tis a man of the Guides!"

*Oh, East is East, and West is West, and never the twain shall meet, Till Earth and Sky stand presently at God's great Judgment Seat;
 But there is neither East nor West, Border, nor Breed, nor Birth, 95
 When two strong men stand face to face, though they come from the ends of the earth.*

DANNY DEEVER L

"What are the bugles blowin' for?" said Files-on-Parade.
 "To turn you out, to turn you out," the Colour-Sergeant said
 "What makes you look so white, so white?" said Files-on-Parade.

TOMMY

"I'm dreadin' what I've got to watch," the Colour-Sergeant said.

For they're hangin' Danny Deever, you can hear the Dead March play,⁵
The regiment's in 'ollow square — they're hangin' him to-day,
They've taken of his buttons off an' cut his stripes away,
An' they're hangin' Danny Deever in the mornin'.

"What makes the rear-rank breathe so 'ard?"
said Files-on-Parade.

"It's bitter cold, it's bitter cold," the Colour-Sergeant said.¹⁰

"What makes that front-rank man fall down?" said Files-on-Parade.

"A touch o' sun, a touch o' sun," the Colour-Sergeant said.

They are hangin' Danny Deever, they are marchin' of 'im round,
They 'ave 'alted Danny Deever by 'is coffin on the ground,
An' 'c'll swing in 'arf a minute for a sneak-in' shootin' hound —¹⁵
O they're hangin' Danny Deever in the mornin'!

"'Is cot was right-'and cot to mine," said
Files-on-Parade.

"'E's sleepin' out an' far to-night," the Colour-Sergeant said.

"I've drunk 'is becr a score o' times," said
Files-on-Parade.

"'E's drinkin' bitter beer alone," the Colour-Sergeant said.²⁰

They are hangin' Danny Deever, you must mark 'im to 'is place,
For 'e shot a comrade sleepin' — you must look 'im in the face;
Nine 'undred of 'is county an' the Regiment's disgrace,
While they're hangin' Danny Deever in the mornin'.

"What's that so black agin the sun?" said
Files-on-Parade.²⁵

"It's Danny fightin' 'ard for life," the Colour-Sergeant said.

"What's that that whimpers over'ead?"
said Files-on-Parade.

"It's Danny's soul that's passin' now," the Colour-Sergeant said

For they're done with Danny Deever, you can 'ear the quickstep play,
The regiment's in column, an' they're marchin' us away;³⁰
Ho! the young recruits are shakin', an'
they'll want their beer to-day,
After hangin' Danny Deever in the mornin'

(1890)

I went into a public-'ouse to get a pint o'
beer,

The publican 'e up an' sez, "We serve no
red-coats here."

The girls be'ind the bar they laughed an'
giggled fit to die,

I outs into the street again an' to myself sez
I:

O it's Tommy this, an' Tommy that, an'
"Tommy, go away";⁵

But it's "Thank you, Mister Atkins," when
the band begins to play,

The band begins to play, my boys, the band begins to play —

O it's "Thank you, Mister Atkins," when
the band begins to play.

I went into a theatre as sober as could be,
They gave a drunk civilian room, but 'adn't
none for me;¹⁰

They sent me to the gallery or round the music-'alls,

But when it comes to fightin', Lord! they'll shove me in the stalls!

For it's Tommy this, an' Tommy that,
an' "Tommy, wait outside";

But it's "Special train for Atkins" when the
trooper's on the tide —

The troopship's on the tide, my boys, the troopship's on the tide,¹⁵

O it's "Special train for Atkins" when the
trooper's on the tide.

Yes, makin' mock o' uniforms that guard you while you sleep

Is cheaper than them uniforms, an' they're starvation cheap;

An' hustlin' drunken soldiers when they're goin' large a bit

Is five times better business than paradin' in full kit.²⁰

Then it's Tommy this, an' Tommy that, an' "Tommy, 'ow's yer soul?"

But it's "Thin red line of 'eroes" when the drums begin to roll —

The drums begin to roll, my boys, the drums
begin to roll,

O it's "Thin red line of 'eroes" when the drums begin to roll.

We aren't no thin red 'eroes, nor we aren't

Why, single men in barracks don't grow into plaster saints;
While it's Tommy this, an' Tommy that,
an' "Tommy, fall be'ind,"
But it's "Please to walk in front, sir," when there's trouble in the wind — 30
There's trouble in the wind, my boys,
there's trouble in the wind,
O it's "Please to walk in front, sir," when
there's trouble in the wind.

You talk o' better food for us, an' schools, an'

We'll wait for extry rations if you treat us rational.
Don't mess about the cook-room slops, but prove it to our face 35

"FUZZY-WUZZY"

(SOUDAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCE)

We've fought with many men acrost the seas,
An' some of 'em was brave an' some was
not:
The Paythan an' the Zulu an' Burmese;
But the Fuzzy was the finest o' the lot.
We never got a ha'porth's change of 'im: 5

36 Widow, an affectionate nickname applied to Queen Victoria by her soldiers

"Fuzzy-Wuzzy" From Departmental Duties, copyright 1892, 1893, and 1899 by Rudyard Kipling

In 1881 the tribesmen of the Soudan, a territory along the southern border of the Sahara Desert and the upper waters of the Nile, rebelled against English and Egyptian rule. Under the leadership of a prophet called the Mahdi, they defeated an army under General Hicks in 1883, besieged and massacred General Gordon at Khartum in 1885, and remained unconquered until 1898. Because of their long, curly hair, they were called "Fuzzy-Wuzzies" by the British troops.

Soudan . . . Force, an army, under the leadership of General Graham, sent in 1884 to relieve General Gordon, who was besieged by the Soudanese at Khartum

3 Paythan, the Afghans, see The Ballad of East and West, page 878 Zulu, natives of southeast Africa, against whom the British conducted a campaign in 1879. Burmese Because of outrages against British subjects in Burma, England conquered and annexed Burma after a brief campaign in 1885, see note on Mandalay, page 883 5 ha'porth's change A half-penny's worth of change would be reckoned in fractions of a cent

'E squatted in the scrub an' 'ocked our
'orses,
'E cut our sentries up at Suakim,
An' 'e played the cat an' banjo with our forces
So 'ere's to you, Fuzzy-Wuzzy, at your
'ome in the Soudan,
You're a pore benighted 'eathen but a
first-class fightin' man; 10
We gives you your certificate, an' if you want it signed
We'll come an' 'ave a romp with you whenever you're inclined

We took our chanst among the Kyber 'ills,
The Boers knocked us silly at a mile,
The Burman give us Irriwaddy chills, 15
An' a Zulu impi dished us up in style:
But all we ever got from such as they
Was pop to what the Fuzzymade us swaller;
We 'eld our bloomin' own, the papers say,
But man for man the Fuzzy knocked us
'oller. 20
Then 'ere's to you, Fuzzy-Wuzzy, an'
the missis and the kid,
Our orders was to break you, an' of course we went an' did.
We sloshed you with Martinis, an' it wasn't 'ardly fair;
But for all the odds agin' you, Fuzzy-
Wuz, you broke the square.

'E 'asn't got no papers of 'is own, 25
'E 'asn't got no medals nor rewards,
So we must certify the skill 'e's shown
In usin' of 'is long two-'anded swords:
When 'e's 'oppin' in an' out among the bush
With 'is coffin-'eaded shield an' shovel-spear, 30
An' appy day with Fuzzy on the rush
Will last an' 'ealthy Tommy for a year.
So 'ere's to you, Fuzzy-Wuzzy, an' your friends which are no more,
If we 'adn't lost some messmates we would 'elp you to deplore.
But give an' take's the gospel, an' we'll call the bargain fair, 35
For if you 'ave lost more than us, you crumpled up the square!

'E rushes at the smoke when we let drive,
 An', before we know, 'e's 'ackin' at our 'ead,
 'E's all 'ot sand an' ginger when alive,
 An' 'e's generally shammin' when 'e's
 dead 40
 'E's a daisy, 'e's a ducky, 'e's a lamb!
 'E's a injia-rubber idiot on the spree,
 'E's the on'y thing that doesn't give a damn
 For a Regiment o' British Infantee!
 So 'ere's to you, Fuzzy-Wuzzy, at your
 'ome in the Soudan, 45
 You're a pore benighted 'eathen but a
 first-class fightin' man,
 An' 'ere's to you, Fuzzy-Wuzzy, with your 'ayrick 'cad of 'air —
 You big black boundin' beggar — for you broke a British square!

GUNGA DIN

You may talk o' gin and beer
 When you're quartered safe out 'ere,
 An' you're sent to penny-fights an' Aldershot
 it;
 But when it comes to slaughter
 You will do your work on water, 5
 An' you'll lick the bloomin' boots of 'im
 that's got it.
 Now in Injia's sunny clime,
 Where I used to spend my time
 A-servin' of 'Er Majesty the Queen,
 Of all them black-faced crew 10
 The finest man I knew
 Was our regimental bhisti, Gunga Din
 He was "Din! Din! Din!"
 "Youlimpin' lump o' brick-dust, Gunga Din!"
 "Hi! Slippery hitherao! 15
 "Water, get it! Panee lao!
 "You squidgy-nosed old idol, Gunga Din!"

The uniform 'e wore
 Was nothin' much before,
 An' rather less than 'arf o' that be'ind, 20
 For a piece o' twisty rag
 An' a goatskin water-bag
 Was all the field-equipment 'e could find.
 When the sweatin' troop-train lay
 In a sidin' through the day, 25
 Where the 'eat would make your bloomin' eyebrows crawl,
 We shouted "Harry By!"
 Till our throats were bricky-dry,
 Then we wopped 'im 'cause 'e couldn't serve us all.

 "You 'eathen, where the mischief 'ave you
 been?"
 "You put some juldee in it
 "Or I'll marrow you this minute
 "If you don't fill up my helmet, Gunga
 Din!"

'E would dot an' carry one 35
 Till the longest day was done;
 An' 'e didn't seem to know the use o' fear.
 If we charged or broke or cut,
 You could bet your bloomin' nut,
 'E'd be waitin' fifty paces right flank rear 40
 With 'is mussick on 'is back,
 'E would skip with our attack,
 An' watch us till the bugles made "Retire,"
 An' for all 'is dirty 'ide
 'E was white, clear white, inside 45
 When 'e went to tend the wounded under
 fire!

It was "Din! Din! Din!"
 With the bullets kickin' dust-spots on the
 green.
 When the cartridges ran out,
 You could 'ear the front-ranks shout, 50
 "Hi! ammunition-mules an' Gunga Din!"

I sha'n't forgit the night
 When I dropped be'ind the fight
 With a bullet where my belt-plate should 'a'
 been.
 I was chokin' mad with thirst, 55
 An' the man that spied me first
 Was our good old grinnin', gruntin' Gunga
 Din
 'E lifted up my 'ead,
 An' 'e plugged me where I bled,
 An' 'e guv me 'arf-a-pint o' water green. 60
 It was crawlin' and it stunk,
 But of all the drinks I've drunk,
 I'm gratefulest to one from Gunga Din.

It was "Din! Din! Din!"
 "'Ere's a beggar with a bullet through 'is spleen; 65
 "'E's chawin' up the ground,
 "An' 'e's kickin' all around:
 "For Gawd's sake, git the water, Gunga Din!"

'E carried me away
 To where a dooli lay, 70
 An' a bullet come an' drilled the beggar clean
 'E put me safe inside,
 An' just before 'e died,
 "I 'ope you liked your drink," sez Gunga Din
 So I'll meet 'im later on 75
 In the place where 'e is gone —

32 juldee, speed 33 marrow, hit. 41 mussick, water-skin 70 dooli, stretcher for conveying the wounded

Where it's always double drill and no canteen.

'E'll be squattin' on the coals
Givin' drink to poor damned souls,
An' I'll get a swig in hell from Gunga Din! so Yes, Din! Din! Din!

You Lazarushian-leather Gunga Din!
Though I've belted you an' flayed you,
By the livin' God that made you,
You're a better man than I am, Gunga
Din!

MANDALAY

By the old Moulmein Pagoda, lookin' eastward to the sea,
There's a Burma girl a-settin', and I know
she thinks o' me;
For the wind is in the palm-trees, and the temple-bells they say:
"Come you back, you British soldier; come you back to Mandalay!"

Come you back to Mandalay, 5
Where the old Flotilla lay:
Can't you 'ear their paddles chunkin'
from Rangoon to Mandalay?
On the road to Mandalay,
Where the flyin'-fishes play,
An' the dawn comes up like thunder outer China 'crost the Bay! 10

'Er petticoat was yaller an' 'er liddle cap was
green,
An' 'er name was Supi-yaw-lat — jes' the same as Theebaw's Queen,
An' I seed her first a-smokin' of a whackin'
white cheroot,
An' a-wastin' Christian kisses on an 'eathen
idol's foot:

Bloomin' idol made o' mud — 15
Wot they called the Great Gawd Budd — Plucky lot she cared for idols when I kissed 'er where she stud!

Law! wot do they understand? 40

cleaner, greener land!

THE CONUNDRUM OF THE WORKSHOPS

When the flush of a new-born sun fell first on Eden's green and gold,
Our father Adam sat under the Tree and scratched with a stick in the mould;
And the first rude sketch that the world had seen was joy to his mighty heart,
Till the Devil whispered behind the leaves,
"It's pretty, but is it Art?"

Wherefore he called to his wife, and fled to fashion his work anew —⁵
The first of his race who cared a fig for the first, most dread review;
And he left his lore to the use of his sons —
and that was a glorious gain
When the Devil chuckled "Is it Art?" in the ear of the branded Cain.

They bullded a tower to shiver the sky and wrench the stars apart,
Till the Devil grunted behind the bricks:
"It's striking, but is it Art?"¹⁰
The stone was dropped at the quarry-side and the idle derrick swung,
While each man talked of the aims of Art,
and each in an alien tongue

They fought and they talked in the North and the South; they talked and they fought in the West,
Till the waters rose on the pitiful land, and the poor Red Clay had rest —
Had rest till the dank blank-canvas dawn
when the dove was preened to start,¹⁵
And the Devil bubbled below the keel: "It's human, but is it Art?"

The tale is as old as the Eden Tree — and new as the new-cut tooth —
For each man knows ere his lip-thatch grows
he is master of Art and Truth;
And each man hears as the twilight nears, to the beat of his dying heart,
The Devil drum on the darkened pane: "You did it, but was it Art?"²⁰

9 tower, the tower of Babel, the bullders of which were punished by being forced to talk in different languages, see Genesis, 11 4-9 14 waters rose, the Flood; see Genesis, 7 10-12 15 dove, the one sent out by Noah to discover dry land (Genesis, 8 8-12).

We have learned to whittle the Eden Tree to the shape of a surplice-peg,
We have learned to bottle our parents twain
in the yelk of an addled egg,
We know that the tail must wag the dog, for the horse is drawn by the cart;
But the Devil whoops, as he whooped of old.
"It's clever, but is it Art?"

When the flicker of London sun falls faint on the Club-room's green and gold,²⁵
The sons of Adam sit them down and scratch with their pens in the mould —
They scratch with their pens in the mould of their graves, and the ink and the anguish
start,
For the Devil mutters behind the leaves:
"It's pretty, but is it Art?"

Now, if we could win to the Eden Tree where the Four Great Rivers flow,
And the Wreath of Eve is red on the turf as she left it long ago,³⁰
And if we could come when the sentry slept and softly scurry through,
By the favour of God we might know as much
— as our father Adam knew!

ENVOY

There's a whisper down the field where the year has shot her yield,
And the ricks stand grey to the sun, Singing: "Over then, come over, for the bee has quit the clover,
"And your English summer's done."

You have heard the beat of the off-shore wind,⁵
And the thresh of the deep-sea rain,
You have heard the song — how long?
how long?
Pull out on the trail again!
Ha' done with the Tents of Shem, dear lass,
We've seen the seasons through,¹⁰
And it's time to turn on the old trail, our
own trail, the out trail,
Pull out, pull out, on the Long Trail — the trail that is always new!

Envoy From Departmental Dithes, copyright 1892, 1893, and 1899 by Rudyard Kipling

This poem is sometimes published under the title The Long Trail

1 shot her yield, harvested her crop of grain 9 Tents of Shem, houses with servants, Genesis, 9 27 — "God shall enlarge Japheth, and he shall dwell in the tents of Shem, and Canaan shall be his servant"

It's North you may run to the rime-ringed
sun,

Or South to the blind Horn's hate;
Or East all the way into Mississippi Bay, 15
Or West to the Golden Gate —

Where the blindest bluffs hold good, dear lass,
And the wildest tales are true,
And the men bulk big on the old trail, our
own trail, the out trail,
And life runs large on the Long Trail — the trail that is always new. 20

The days are sick and cold, and the skies are grey and old,

And the twice-breathed airs blow damp;
And I'd sell my tired soul for the bucking beam-sea roll

Of a black Bilbao tramp,
With her load-line over her hatch, dear lass,
And a drunken Dago crew, 26
And her nose held down on the old trail, our
own trail, the out trail,
From Cadiz south on the Long Trail — the trail that is always new.

There be triple ways to take, of the eagle or the snake,

Or the way of a man with a maid; 30
But the sweetest way to me is a ship's upon
the sea

In the heel of the North-East Trade.
Can you hear the crash on her bows, dear lass,
And the drum of the racing screw,
As she ships it green on the old trail, our own trail, the out trail, 35
As she lifts and 'scends on the Long Trail —
the trail that is always new?

See the shaking funnels roar, with the Peter at the fore,

And the fenders grind and heave,
And the derricks clack and grate, as the tackle
hooks the crate,

14 blind Horn, Cape Horn, at the extremity of South America, dangerous for mariners because of storms 23 beam-sea, waves coming at right angles to the ship's course 24 Bilbao tramp, a slow freight vessel hailing from Bilbao, a port on the northern coast of Spain. A tramp picks up cargo wherever it can be found. 25 load-line . . hatch The load-line is a line on the side of the ship to mark the depth to which the cargo causes her to sink. The hatch, or opening to the hold, is above the level of the deck. The load-line is normally at or just above the water-line, hence a roll bringing the load-line above the hatch would happen only in a very rough sea 26 Dago, a term applied by the British sailor to Latin peoples—French, Spanish, Italian, etc 28 Cadiz, a peninsula which forms the harbor of Cadiz in Spain 29 triple ways. See Proverbs, 30 18-19—"There be three things which are too wonderful for me, yea, four which I know not: the way of an eagle in the air, the way of a serpent upon a rock, the way of a ship in the midst of the sea, and the way of a man with a maid" 32 North-East Trade, the regular wind which, in the northern hemisphere, blows toward the equator 37 the Peter at the fore, the Blue Peter, a blue flag with a white square in the center, hoisted on the foremost head to indicate that the ship is about to sail

And the fall-rope whines through the sheave, 40

It's "Gang-plank up and in," dear lass,
It's "Hawsers warp her through!"
And it's "All clear aft" on the old trail, our
own trail, the out trail,
We're backing down on the Long Trail — the trail that is always new.

O the mutter overside, when the port-fog holds us tied, 45

And the sirens hoot their dread!
When foot by foot we creep o'er the hueless viewless deep

To the sob of the questing lead!
It's down by the Lower Hope, dear lass,
With the Gunfleet Sands in view, 50
Till the Mouse swings green on the old trail,
our own trail, the out trail,
And the Gull Light lifts on the Long Trail
— the trail that is always new.

O the blazing tropic night, when the wake's
a welt of light

That holds the hot sky tame,
And the steady fore-foot snores through the planet-powdered floors 55

Where the scared whale flukes in flame!
Her plates are scarred by the sun, dear lass,
And her ropes are taut with the dew,
For we're booming down on the old trail, our
own trail, the out trail,
We're sagging south on the Long Trail — the trail that is always new. 60

Then home, get her home, where the drunken rollers comb,

And the shouting seas drive by,
And the engines stamp and ring, and the wet
bows reel and swing,

And the Southern Cross rides high!
Yes, the old lost stars wheel back, dear lass,
That blaze in the velvet blue. 66
They're all old friends on the old trail, our
own trail, the out trail,

They're God's own guides on the Long Trail
— the trail that is always new.

Fly forward, O my heart, from the Foreland to the Start —

We're steaming all too slow, 70

40 fall-rope . . sheave The fall-rope passes from the hoisting winch through a pulley, or sheave, at the head of the derrick employed in loading cargo 49-52 Lower Hope Gull Light, points on the route from the London docks, down the Thames River, into the English Channel, the Mouse is a lightship marking the course 56 whale . . flame. When in tropic seas a whale beats its tail (flukes) on the water as it dives, the spray thrown up shines in a brilliant phosphorescent glow 61 comb, break 64 Southern Cross, a constellation visible only in the southern hemisphere 69 Foreland Start, capes at the northern and southern extremities of the Devon coast on the English Channel

And it's twenty thousand mile to our little lazy isle

Where the trumpet-orchids blow!
You have heard the call of the off-shore wind
And the voice of the deep-sea rain,
You have heard the song How long? how
long? 75

Pull out on the trail again!

The Lord knows what we may find, dear lass,
And The Deuce knows what we may do—
But we're back once more on the old trail,
our own trail, the out trail,
We're down, hull-down, on the Long Trail—
the trail that is always new. 80

TOMLINSON

Now Tomlinson gave up the ghost in his house in Berkeley Square,
And a Spirit came to his bedside and gripped him by the hair —
A Spirit gripped him by the hair and carried him far away,
Till he heard as the roar of a rain-fed ford
the roar of the Milky Way.
Till he heard the roar of the Milky Way die down and drone and cease, 5
And they came to the Gate within the Wall where Peter holds the keys “Stand up, stand up now, Tomlinson, and answer loud and high
“The good that ye did for the sake of men or ever ye came to die —
“The good that ye did for the sake of men in little earth so lone!”
And the naked soul of Tomlinson grew white as a rain-washed bone. 10

“O I have a friend on earth,” he said, “that was my priest and guide,
“And well would he answer all for me if he were by my side ”
— “For that ye strove in neighbour-love it shall be written fair,
But now ye wait at Heaven's Gate and not
in Berkeley Square:
“Though we called your friend from his bed
this night, he could not speak for you, 15 “For the race is run by one and one and never by two and two.”
Then Tomlinson looked up and down, and little gain was there,
For the naked stars grinned overhead, and he saw that his soul was bare.

Tomlinson From Departmental Ditties, copyright 1892,
1893, and 1899 by Rudyard Kipling

1 Berkeley Square, a residential section in London, distinguished by its eminent respectability

The Wind that blows between the Worlds, it cut him like a knife,
And Tomlinson took up the tale and spoke of his good in life. 20

“O this I have read in a book,” he said,
“and that was told to me,

“And this I have thought that another man thought of a Prince in Muscovy ”

The good souls flocked like homing doves and bade him clear his path,

And Peter twirled the jangling keys in weariness and wrath.

“Ye have read, ye have heard, ye have thought,” he said, “and the tale is yet to run: 25

“By the worth of the body that once ye had,
give answer — what ha' ye done?”

Then Tomlinson looked back and forth, and little good it bore,

For the Darkness stayed at his shoulder-blade and Heaven's Gate before: —

“O this I have felt, and this I have guessed, and this I have heard men say,

“And thus they wrote that another man wrote of a carl in Norrway ” 30

“Ye have read, ye have felt, ye have guessed, good lack! Ye have hampered Heaven's Gate,

“There's little room between the stars in idleness to prate!

“O none may reach by hired speech of neighbour, priest, and kin

“Through borrowed deed to God's good meed that lies so fair within;

“Get hence, get hence to the Lord of Wrong, for the doom has yet to run, 35

“And . . . the faith that ye share with Berkeley Square uphold you, Tomlinson!”

The Spirit gripped him by the hair, and sun
by sun they fell

Till they came to the belt of Naughty Stars that run the mouth of Hell.

The first are red with pride and wrath, the next are white with pain,

But the third are black with clinkered sin that cannot burn again: 40

They may hold their path, they may leave their path, and never a soul to mark,

They may burn or freeze, but they must not cease in the Scorn of the Outer Dark.

The Wind that blows between the Worlds, it
nipped him to the bone,

22 Muscovy, Russia. The Prince is sometimes identified with Count Leo Tolstoy (1828-1910), noted for his mildly radical social doctrines. 30 carl in Norrway. This has been taken to refer to Henrik Ibsen (1828-1906), whose plays, dealing frankly with social problems, were much discussed in Tomlinson's England. A carl in early times was a man of the peasantry, or common people. 35 doom, judgment

And he yearned to the flare of Hell-gate there as the light of his own hearth-stone.
 The Devil he sat behind the bars, where the desperate legions drew, 45
 But he caught the hasting Tomlinson and would not let him through "Wot ye the price of good pit-coal that I must pay?" said he,
 "That ye rank yoursel' so fit for Hell and ask no leave of me?
 "I am all o'er-sib to Adam's breed that ye should give me scorn,
 "For I strove with God for your First Father
 the day that he was born. 50
 "Sit down, sit down upon the slag, and answer loud and high
 "The harm that ye did to the Sons of Men or ever you came to die."
 And Tomlinson looked up and up, and saw against the night
 The belly of a tortured star blood-red in Hell-Mouth light,
 And Tomlinson looked down and down, and saw beneath his feet 55
 The frontlet of a tortured star milk-white in Hell-Mouth heat.
 "O I had a love on earth," said he, "that kissed me to my fall;
 "And if ye would call my love to me I know she would answer all "
 — "All that ye did in love forbid it shall be written fair,
 "But now ye wait at Hell-Mouth Gate and not
 in Berkeley Square: 60
 "Though we whistled your love from her bed
 to-night, I trow she would not run,
 "For the sin ye do by two and two ye must pay for one by one!"
 The Wind that blows between the Worlds,
 it cut him like a knife,
 And Tomlinson took up the tale and spoke of his sin in life: —
 "Once I ha' laughed at the power of Love and twice at the grip of the Grave, 65
 "And thrice I ha' patted my God on the head that men might call me brave "
 The Devil he blew on a brandered soul and set it aside to cool —
 "Do ye think I would waste my good pit-coal on the hide of a brain-sick fool?
 "I see no worth in the hobnailed mirth or the jolthead jest ye did
 "That I should waken my gentlemen that are sleeping three on a grid " 70
 Then Tomlinson looked back and forth, and there was little grace.
 For Hell-Gate filled the houseless soul with the Fear of Naked Space

"Nay, this I ha' heard," quo' Tomlinson,
 "and this was noised abroad;
 "And this I ha' got from a Belgian book on the word of a dead French lord."
 — "Ye ha' heard, ye ha' read, ye ha' got,
 good lack' and the tale begins afresh —
 "Have ye sinned one sin for the pride o' the eye or the sinful lust of the flesh?" 76 Then Tomlinson he gripped the bars and yammered, "Let me in —
 "For I mind that I borrowed my neighbour's wife to sin the deadly sin "
 The Devil he grinned behind the bars, and banked the fires high.
 "Did ye read of that sin in a book?" said he,
 and Tomlinson said "Ay!" 80
 The Devil he blew upon his nails, and the little devils ran,
 And he said, "Go husk this whimpering thief that comes in the guise of a man:
 "Winnow him out 'twixt star and star, and sieve his proper worth
 There's sore decline in Adam's line if this be spawn of earth "
 Empusa's crew, so naked-new they may not face the fire, 85
 But weep that they bin too small to sin to the height of their desire,
 Over the coal they chased the Soul, and racked it all abroad,
 As children rifle a caddis-case or the raven's foolish hoard.
 And back they came with the tattered Thing,
 as children after play,
 And they said: "The soul that he got from God he had bartered clean away. 90
 "We have threshed a stook of print and book,
 and winnowed a chattering wind
 "And many a soul wherefrom he stole, but his we cannot find.
 "We have handled him, we have dandled him,
 we have seared him to the bone,
 "And Sire, if tooth and nail show truth he has no soul of his own "
 The Devil he bowed his head on his breast and rumbled deep and low: — 95
 "I'm all o'er-sib to Adam's breed that I should bid him go.
 "Yet close we lie, and deep we lie, and if I gave him place,
 "My gentlemen that are so proud would flout
 me to my face;
 "They'd call my house a common stews and me a careless host,
 "And — I would not anger my gentlemen for the sake of a shiftless ghost." 100

 88 caddis-case, a covering made of sticks or stones by the

The Devil he looked at the mangled Soul that prayed to feel the flame,
 And he thought of Holy Charity, but he thought of his own good name —
 "Now ye could haste my coal to waste, and sit ye down to fry.
 "Did ye think of that theft for yourself?" said he; and Tomlinson said "Ay!"
 The Devil he blew an outward breath, for his heart was free from care: — 105
 "Ye have scarce the soul of a louse," he said,
 "but the roots of sin are there.
 "And for that sin should ye come in were I the lord alone.
 "But sinful pride has rule inside — ay, mightier than my own.
 "Honour and Wit, fore-damned they sit, to each his Priest and Whore;
 "Nay, scarce I dare myself go there, and you they'd torture sore 110
 "Ye are neither spirit nor spirk," he said, "ye are neither book nor brute —
 "Go, get ye back to the flesh again for the sake of Man's repute.
 "I'm all o'er-sib to Adam's breed that I should mock your pain,
 "But look that ye win to worthier sin ere ye come back again.
 "Get hence, the hearse is at your door — the grim black stallions wait — 115
 "They bear your clay to place to-day Speed, lest ye come too late!
 "Go back to Earth with a lip unsealed — go back with an open eye,
 "And carry my word to the Sons of Men or ever ye come to die:
 "That the sin they do by two and two they must pay for one by one, 119
 "And . . . the God that you took from a printed book be with you, Tomlinson!"

ENVOY

When Earth's last picture is painted and the tubes are twisted and dried,
 When the oldest colours have faded, and the youngest critic has died,
 We shall rest, and, faith, we shall need it — lie down for an æon or two,
 Till the Master of All Good Workmen shall put us to work anew.

And those that were good shall be happy.
 they shall sit in a golden chair; 5
 They shall splash at a ten-league canvas with brushes of comets' hair.

Envoy Copyright 1892 by Rudyard Kipling

They shall find real saints to draw from —
 Magdalene, Peter, and Paul,
 They shall work for an age at a sitting and never be tired at all!

And only the Master shall praise us, and only the Master shall blame;
 And no one shall work for money, and no one shall work for fame, 10
 But each for the joy of the working, and each, in his separate star,
 Shall draw the Thing as he sees It for the God of Things as They are!

THE LAST CHANTEY

"And there was no more sea."

Thus said the Lord in the Vault above the Cherubim,
 Calling to the Angels and the Souls in their degree:
 "Lo! Earth has passed away
 On the smoke of Judgment Day.
 That Our word may be established shall We gather up the sea?" 5

Loud sang the souls of the jolly, jolly mariners.

"Plague upon the hurricane that made us
 furl and flee!
 But the war is done between us,
 In the deep the Lord hath seen us —
 Our bones we'll leave the barracout', and God may sink the sea!" 10

Then said the soul of Judas that betrayed
 Him:

"Lord, hast Thou forgotten Thy covenant
 with me?
 How once a year I go
 To cool me on the floe?
 And Ye take my day of mercy if Ye take away the sea." 15

Then said the soul of the Angel of the Offshore Wind:

(He that bits the thunder when the bullmouthed breakers flee):
 "I have watch and ward to keep

O'er Thy wonders on the deep,
And Ye take mine honour from me if Ye

Loud sang the souls of the jolly, jolly mariners:

"Nay, but we were angry, and a hasty folk are we.

If we worked the ship together
Till she foundered in foul weather,
Are we babes that we should clamour for a vengeance on the sea?" 25

Then said the souls of the slaves that men
threw overboard:

"Kennelled in the picaroon a weary band were we;

But Thy arm was strong to save,
And it touched us on the wave,
And we drownded the long tides idle till Thy Trumpets tore the sea." 30

Then cried the soul of the stout Apostle Paul to God:

"Once we frapped a ship, and she laboured
woundily.

There were fourteen score of these,
And they blessed Thee on their knees,
When they learned Thy Grace and Glory
under Malta by the sea!" 35

Loud sang the souls of the jolly, jolly mariners,

Plucking at their harps, and they plucked unhandily:

"Our thumbs are rough and tarred,
And the tune is something hard —
May we lift a Deepsea Chantey such as seamen use at sea?" 40

Then said the souls of the gentlemen-adventurers —

Fettered wrist to bar all for red iniquity:

"Ho, we revel in our chains
O'er the sorrow that was Spain's;
Heave or sink it, leave or drink it, we were masters of the sea!" 45

Up spake the soul of a grey Gothavn 'speckshioner —

(He that led the fenching in the fleets of fair Dundee):

"Oh, the ice-blink white and near,
And the bowhead breaching clear!
Will Ye whelm them all for wantonness that wallow in the sea?" 50

Loud sang the souls of the jolly, jolly mariners, Crying: "Under Heaven, here is neither lead nor lee!

Must we sing for evermore
On the windless, glassy floor?
Take back your golden fiddles and we'll beat to open sea!" 55

Then stooped the Lord, and He called the good sea up to Him,
And 'stablished His borders unto all eternity,

That such as have no pleasure
For to praise the Lord by measure,
They may enter into galleons and serve Him on the sea. 60

Sun, Wind, and Cloud shall fail not from the face of it,

Stinging, ringing spindrift, nor the fulmar flying free;

*And the ships shall go abroad

THE SONG OF THE BANJO

You couldn't pack a Broadwood half a mile—
 You mustn't leave a fiddle in the damp—
 You couldn't raft an organ up the Nile,
 And play it in an Equatorial swamp.
 I travel with the cooking-pots and pails—5
 I'm sandwiched 'tween the coffee and the pork—

And when the dusty column checks and tails,
 You should hear me spur the rearguard to a walk!

With my "Pilly-willy-winky-winky popp!" [Oh, it's any tune that comes into my
 head!] 10
 So I keep 'em moving forward till they
 drop,
 So I play 'em up to water and to bed.

In the silence of the camp before the fight,
 When it's good to make your will and say your prayer,
 You can hear my strumpty-tumpty over-
 night, 15
 Explaining ten to one was always fair.
 I'm the Prophet of the Utterly Absurd,
 Of the Patently Impossible and Vain—
 And when the Thing that Couldn't has occurred,

Give me time to change my leg and go
 again 20

In the desert where the dung-fed campsmoke curled
 There was never voice before us till I led our lonely chorus,
 I—the war-drum of the White Man round
 the world!

By the bitter road the Younger Son must
 tread, 25
 Ere he win to hearth and saddle of his
 own,—

'Mid the riot of the shearers at the shed,
 In the silence of the herder's hut alone—
 In the twilight, on a bucket upside down, Hear me babble what the weakest won't confess— 30

I am Memory and Torment—I am Town!
 I am all ever went with evening dress!

With my "Tunka-tunka-tunka-tunka-tunk!"
 [So the lights—the London Lights—grow near and plain!]
 So I rowel 'em afresh towards the Devil and
 the Flesh, 35
 Till I bring my broken rankers home again.

 Where the new-raised tropic city sweats
 and roars,
 I have sailed with Young Ulysses from the asqueal.

Where the trestle groans and quivers in the
snow,

Where the many-shedded levels loop and twine,

Hear me lead my reckless children from below 55

Till we sing the Song of Roland to the pine!

With my "Tinka-tinka-tinka-tinka-tink!"
[Oh the axe has cleared the mountain, croup and crest!]

And we ride the iron stallions down to drink,
Through the cañons to the waters of the
West! 60

And the tunes that mean so much to you
alone—

Common tunes that make you choke and blow your nose,

Vulgar tunes that bring the laugh that brings the groan—

I can rip your very heartstrings out with those,

With the feasting, and the folly, and the fun— 65

And the lying, and the lusting, and the
drink,

And the merry play that drops you, when you're done,
To the thoughts that burn like ions if you think.

With my "Plunka-lunka-lunka-lunka-lunk!"
Here's a trifle on account of pleasure past, 70
Ere the wit that made you win gives you eyes to see your sin
And—the heavier repentance at the last!

Let the organ moan her sorrow to the roof—
I have told the naked stars the Grief of
Man

Let the trumpet snare the foeman to the proof— 75

I have known Defeat, and mocked it as we ran!

My bray ye may not alter nor mistake
When I stand to jeer the fatted Soul of
Things,

But the Song of Lost Endeavour that I make,

Is it hidden in the twanging of the strings?

With my "Ta-ra-ra-ra-ra-ra-ra-rrr!" 81
[Is it naught to you that hear and pass me by?]

But the word—the word is mine, when the order moves the line

And the lean, locked ranks go roaring down to die!

The grandam of my grandam was the
Lyre— 85

[O the blue below the little fisher-huts!]
That the Stealer stooping beachward filled with fire,

Till she bore my iron head and ringing guts!

By the wisdom of the centuries I speak— 89

To the tune of yestermorn I set the truth—
I, the joy of life unquestioned—I, the Greek—
I, the everlasting Wonder-song of Youth!

With my "Tinka-tinka-tinka-tinka-tink!"
[What d' ye lack, my noble masters? What d' ye lack?]

So I draw the world together link by link: 95

THE LAW OF THE JUNGLE

*Now this is the Law of the Jungle — as old and as true as the sky,
And the Wolf that shall keep it may prosper,
but the Wolf that shall break it must die*

*As the creeper that girdles the tree-trunk the Law runneth forward and back —
For the strength of the Pack is the Wolf, and the strength of the Wolf is the Pack.*

Wash daily from nose-tip to tail-tip, drink deeply, but never too deep, ⁵
And remember the night is for hunting, and forget not the day is for sleep.

The Jackal may follow the Tiger, but, Cub,
when thy whiskers are grown,
Remember the Wolf is a hunter — go forth and get food of thine own.

Keep peace with the Lords of the Jungle —
the Tiger, the Panther, the Bear,
And trouble not Hathi the Silent, and mock not the Boar in the lair. ¹⁰

When Pack meets with Pack in the Jungle,
and neither will go from the trail,
Lie down till the leaders have spoken — it may be fair words shall prevail.

When ye fight with a Wolf of the Pack, ye must fight him alone and afar,
Lest others take part in the quarrel, and the Pack be diminished by war.

The Lair of the Wolf is his refuge, and where he has made him his home, ¹⁵
Not even the Head Wolf may enter, not even the Council may come.

The Lair of the Wolf is his refuge, but where he has digged it too plain,
The Council shall send him a message, and so he shall change it again.

If ye kill before midnight, be silent, and wake not the woods with your bay, Lest ye frighten the deer from the crops, and the brothers go empty away. ²⁰

Ye may kill for yourselves, and your mates,
and your cubs as they need, and ye can;
But kill not for pleasure of killing, and seven times never kill Man!

10. Hathi the Silent, the elephant

If ye plunder his Kill from a weaker, devour not all in thy pride,
Pack-Right is the right of the meanest; so leave him the head and the hide.

The Kill of the Pack is the meat of the Pack.
Ye must eat where it lies; ²⁵
And no one may carry away of that meat to his lair, or he dies.

The Kill of the Wolf is the meat of the Wolf.
He may do what he will,
But, till he has given permission, the Pack
may not eat of that Kill.

Cub-Right is the right of the Yearling. From all of his Pack he may claim Full-gorge when the killer has eaten; and none may refuse him the same. ³⁰

Lair-Right is the right of the Mother. From all of her year she may claim
One haunch of each kill for her litter; and none may deny her the same.

Cave-Right is the right of the Father — to hunt by himself for his own:
He is freed of all calls to the Pack; he is judged by the Council alone.

Because of his age and his cunning, because of his gripe and his paw, ³⁵
In all that the Law leaveth open, the word of the Head Wolf is Law.

*Now these are the Laws of the Jungle, and many and mighty are they;
But the head and the hoof of the Law and the haunch and the hump is — Obey!*

SESTINA OF THE TRAMP-ROYAL

Speakin' in general, I 'ave tried 'em all — The 'appy roads that take you o'er the
world

Speakin' in general, I 'ave found them good
For such as cannot use one bed too long,
But must get 'ence, the same as I 'ave done, ⁵
An' go observin' matters till they die.

What do it matter where or 'ow we die,
So long as we've our 'ealth to watch it all —

Sestina of the Tramp-Royal From The Seven Seas, copyright 1896 and 1905 by Rudyard Kipling

A sestina is a poem of six stanzas of six lines each with a closing envoy. The line-endings of the first stanza recur in the other stanzas but in different order. The form was first used by the troubadours, a class of lyric poets who flourished in southeastern France from the 11th to the 13th centuries.

The different ways that different things are
done,
An' men an' women lovin' in this world; 10
Takin' our chances as they come along,
An' when they ain't, pretendin' they are good?

In cash or credit — no, it aren't no good;
You 'ave to 'ave the 'abit or you'd die,
Unless you lived your life but one day long, 15
Nor didn't prophesy nor fret at all,
But drew your tucker some'ow from the
world,
An' never bothered what you might ha' done.

But, Gawd, what things are they I 'aven't
done!

I've turned my 'and to most, an' turned it good, 20
In various situations round the world —
For 'im that doth not work must surely die,
But that's no reason man should labour all
'Is life on one same shift — life's none so long

Therefore, from job to job I've moved along. 25 Pay couldn't 'old me when my time was
done,
For something in my 'ead upset it all,
Till I 'ad dropped whatever 't was for good,
An', out at sea, be'eld the dock-lights die,
An' met my mate — the wind that tramps the
world! 30

It's like a book, I think, this bloomin' world,
Which you can read and care for just so long,
But presently you feel that you will die
Unless you get the page you're readin' done,
An' turn another — likely not so good; 35
But what you're after is to turn 'em all.

Gawd bless this world! Whatever she 'ath done —

Excep' when awful long — I've found it good
So write, before I die, "'E liked it all!"

RECESSIONAL

God of our fathers, known of old,
Lord of our far-flung battle-line,
Beneath whose awful Hand we hold

22 work . . . die See 2 Thessalonians, 3 10 — "If any would not work, neither should he eat"
Recessionall From The Five Nations, copyright 1903 by Rudyard Kipling

A recessionall is a hymn sung while the clergy and the choir leave the church in procession at the close of a service
Kipling's poem was written as the celebration of Queen Victoria's Diamond Jubilee (the end of her sixtieth year as queen) was drawing to a close. The poem served as an appropriate warning at a time when the British people were

Dominion over palm and pine —
Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet, 5
Lest we forget — lest we forget!

The tumult and the shouting dies,
The Captains and the Kings depart:
Still stands Thine ancient sacrifice,
An humble and a contrite heart. 10
Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet,
Lest we forget — lest we forget!

Far-called, our navies melt away,
On dune and headland sinks the fire:
Lo, all our pomp of yesterday 15
Is one with Nineveh and Tyre!
Judge of the Nations, spare us yet,
Lest we forget — lest we forget!

If, drunk with sight of power, we loose
Wild tongues that have not Thee in awe, 20
Such boastings as the Gentiles use,
Or lesser breeds without the Law —
Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet,
Lest we forget — lest we forget!

For heathen heart that puts her trust 25
In reeking tube and iron shard,
All valiant dust that builds on dust,
And guarding, calls not Thee to guard,
For frantic boast and foolish word —
Thy Mercy on Thy People, Lord!

THE WHITE MAN'S BURDEN

Take up the White Man's burden —
Send forth the best ye breed —
Go bind your sons to exile
To serve your captives' need;
To wait in heavy harness, 5
On fluttered folk and wild —
Your new-caught, sullen peoples,
Half-devil and half-child.

dazzled by the pomp and power of empire. Cf. Newbolt's

Shropshire Lad*, page 906

4. palm and pine, a reference to the wide extent of the Empire. 6 Lest we forget. See Deuteronomy, 6 12 —
"Then beware lest thou forget the Lord." 8 Captains . . .
depart. Cf. Watson's Lachryma Musarum, 107-08, page 903. 9-10 sacrifice . . . heart. See Psalms, 51 17 —
"The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit, a broken and a contrite heart. O God, thou wilt not despise." 16 Nineveh and Tyre. Nineveh was the famous capital of ancient Assyria, it is now buried under sand. Tyre, in Phœnicia, once a great maritime city, is now an unimportant cotton-shipping port. 21-22 Gentiles . . . Law. See Romans, 2 14 — "For when the Gentiles, which have not the law, do by nature the things contained in the law, these, having not the law, are a law unto themselves." In Kipling's mind a Gentile may be anyone not English. 26 shard, shell-

The White Man's Burden Copyright 1899 by Rudyard Kipling

This phrase was used at the close of the Spanish-American War, 1898, to describe the responsibility of the United States in caring for Cuba and the Philippines, it thus became the watchword of imperialism

Take up the White Man's burden —
 In patience to abide, 10
 To veil the threat of terror
 And check the show of pride,
 By open speech and simple,
 An hundred times made plain,
 To seek another's profit, 15
 And work another's gain.

Take up the White Man's burden —
 The savage wars of peace —
 Fill full the mouth of Famine
 And bid the sickness cease, 20
 And when your goal is nearest
 The end for others sought,
 Watch Sloth and heathen Folly
 Bring all your hope to nought

Take up the White Man's burden — 25
 No tawdry rule of kings,
 But toil of serf and sweeper —
 The tale of common things
 The ports ye shall not enter,
 The roads ye shall not tread, 30
 Go make them with your living,
 And mark them with your dead.

Take up the White Man's burden —
 And reap his old reward:
 The blame of those ye better, 35
 The hate of those ye guard —
 The cry of hosts ye humour
 (Ah, slowly!) toward the light —
 "Why brought ye us from bondage,
 "Our loved Egyptian night?" 40

Take up the White Man's burden —
 Ye dare not stoop to less —
 Nor call too loud on Freedom
 To cloak your weariness;
 By all ye cry or whisper, 45
 By all ye leave or do,
 The silent, sullen peoples
 Shall weigh your Gods and you

Take up the White Man's burden —
 Have done with childish days — 50
 The lightly proffered laurel,
 The easy, ungrudged praise.
 Comes now, to search your manhood
 Through all the thankless years,
 Cold, edged with dear-bought wisdom, 55
 The judgment of your peers!

There's no discharge in the war!

Seven — six — eleven — five — nine-an'-

There's no discharge in the war! 20

We — can — stick — out — 'unger, thirst,

But — not — not — not — not the chronic

THE EXPLORER

"There's no sense in going further — it's the edge of cultivation,"
 So they said, and I believed it — broke my land and sowed my crop — Built my barns and strung my fences in the little border station
 Tucked away below the foothills where the trails run out and stop.

Till a voice, as bad as Conscience, rang interminable changes 5
 On one everlasting Whisper day and night repeated — so:
 "Something hidden. Go and find it. Go and look behind the Ranges — Something lost behind the Ranges. Lost and waiting for you. Go!"

So I went, worn out of patience; never told my nearest neighbours —
 Stole away with pack and ponies — left 'em drinking in the town; 10
 And the faith that moveth mountains didn't seem to help my labours
 As I faced the sheer main-ranges, whipping up and leading down.

March by march I puzzled through 'em, turning flanks and dodging shoulders, Hurried on in hope of water, headed back for lack of grass;
 Till I camped above the tree-line — drifted snow and naked boulders — 15 Felt free air astrir to windward — knew I'd stumbled on the Pass.

Thought to name it for the finder: but that night the Norther found me —
 Froze and killed the plains-bred ponies, so I called the camp Despair

(It's the Railway Gap to-day, though). Then my Whisper waked to hound me: —
 "Something lost behind the Ranges. Over yonder! Go you there!" 20

Then I knew, the while I doubted — knew
 His Hand was certain o'er me.
 Still — it might be self-delusion — scores of better men had died —
 I could reach the township living, but . . .
 He knows what terrors tore me . . .
 But I didn't . . . but I didn't. I went down the other side,

Till the snow ran out in flowers, and the flowers turned to aloes, 25
 And the aloes sprung to thickets and a brimming stream ran by,
 But the thickets dwined to thorn-scrub, and the water drained to shallows,
 And I dropped again on desert — blasted earth, and blasting sky. . . .

I remember lighting fires; I remember sitting by 'em,
 I remember seeing faces, hearing voices,
 through the smoke; 30
 I remember they were fancy — for I threw a stone to try 'em.
 "Something lost behind the Ranges" was the only word they spoke.

I remember going crazy I remember that I knew it
 When I heard myself hallooing to the funny folk I saw.
 'Very full of dreams that desert, but my two legs took me through it. . . . 35
 And I used to watch 'em moving with the toes all black and raw.

But at last the country altered — White Man's country past disputing —
 Rolling grass and open timber, with a hint of hills behind —
 There I found me food and water, and I lay a week recruiting.
 Got my strength and lost my nightmares
 Then I entered on my find. 40

Thence I ran my first rough survey — chose my trees and blazed and ringed 'em —
 Week by week I pried and sampled — week
 by week my findings grew.
 Saul he went to look for donkeys, and by God he found a kingdom!
 But by God, who sent His Whisper, I had struck the worth of two!

 and strength, chose him as their king (1 Samuel, 9 3-37,

Up along the hostile mountains, where the hair-poised snow-slide shivers — 45
Down and through the big fat marshes that the virgin ore-bed stains, Till I heard the mile-wide mutterings of unimagined rivers,
And beyond the nameless timber saw illimitable plains!

'Plotted sites of future cities, traced the easy
grades between 'em,
Watched unharnessed rapids wasting fifty thousand head an hour, 50 Counted leagues of water-frontage through the axe-ripe woods that screen 'em — Saw the plant to feed a people — up and waiting for the power!

Well I know who'll take the credit — all the clever chaps that followed —
Came, a dozen men together — never knew my desert fears;
Tracked me by the camps I'd quitted, used the water-holes I'd hollowed. 55 They'll go back and do the talking. They'll be called the Pioneers!

They will find my sites of townships — not the cities that I set there.
They will rediscover rivers — not my rivers heard at night.
By my own old marks and bearings they will show me how to get there,
By the lonely cairns I bulded they will guide my feet aright 60

Have I named one single river? Have I claimed one single acre?
Have I kept one single nugget — (barring samples)? No, not I!
Because my price was paid me ten times over by my Maker
But you wouldn't understand it. You go up and occupy.

Ores you'll find there; wood and cattle, water-transit sure and steady 65
(That should keep the railway rates down), coal and iron at your doors
God took care to hide that country till He judged His people ready,
Then He chose me for His Whisper, and
I've found it, and it's yours!

Yes, your "Never-never country" — yes, your
"edge of cultivation"
And "no sense in going further" — till I crossed the range to see. 70

50 head, a unit of water-power 69 "Never-never country," a term applied to the little-known districts in central and northern Australia, from which early explorers never came back.

God forgive me! No, I didn't. It's God's present to our nation.
Anybody might have found it but — His Whisper came to Me!

IF —

If you can keep your head when all about you
Are losing theirs and blaming it on you,
If you can trust yourself when all men doubt
you,
But make allowance for their doubting
too,
If you can wait and not be tired by waiting, s
Or being lied about, don't deal in lies,
Or being hated don't give way to hating,
And yet don't look too good, nor talk too
wise:

If you can dream — and not make dreams
your master;
If you can think — and not make thoughts your aim; 10
If you can meet with Triumph and Disaster
And treat those two impostors just the
same;
If you can bear to hear the truth you've spoken
Twisted by knaves to make a trap for fools,
Or watch the things you gave your life to,
broken, 15
And stoop and build 'em up with worn-out tools:

If you can make one heap of all your winnings
And risk it on one turn of pitch-and-toss,
And lose, and start again at your beginnings
And never breathe a word about your loss,
If you can force your heart and nerve and snew 21
To serve your turn long after they are gone,
And so hold on when there is nothing in you
Except the Will which says to them:
"Hold on!"

If you can talk with crowds and keep your virtue, 25
Or walk with Kings — nor lose the common touch,
If neither foes nor loving friends can hurt you,
If all men count with you, but none too
much,
If you can fill the unforgiving minute 29
With sixty seconds' worth of distance run, Yours is the Earth and everything that's in
it,
And — which is more — you'll be a Man,
my son! (1910)

WILLIAM WATSON (185 -)

WORDSWORTH'S GRAVE

I

The old rude church, with bare, bald tower,
is here;

Beneath its shadow high-born Rotha flows;
Rotha, remembering well who slumbers near,
And with cool murmur lulling his repose.

Rotha, remembering well who slumbers near.
His hills, his lakes, his streams are with him yet 6

Surely the heart that read her own heart clear
Nature forgets not soon; 'tis we forget.

We that with vagrant soul his fixity
Have slighted, faithless, done his deep faith
wrong, 10

Left him for poorer loves, and bowed the knee
To misbegotten strange new gods of song.

Yet, led by hollow ghost or beckoning elf
Far from her homestead to the desert bourn,
The vagrant soul returning to herself 15
Wearily wise, must needs to him return

To him and to the powers that with him
dwell —

Inflowings that divulged not whence they came,

And that secluded Spirit unknowable,
The mystery we make darker with a name;

The Somewhat which we name but cannot
know, 21

Ev'n as we name a star and only see
His quenchless flashings forth, which ever
show

And ever hide him, and which are not he

2

Poet who sleepest by this wandering wave! 25
When thou wast born, what birth-gift hadst thou then?

To thee what wealth was that the Immortals
gave,

The wealth thou gavest in thy turn to men?

Not Milton's keen, translunar music thine;
Not Shakespeare's cloudless, boundless human view, 30

Not Shelley's flush of rose on peaks divine,
Nor yet the wizard twilight Coleridge knew

Wordsworth's Grave Wordsworth is buried in the churchyard of St Oswald's, a 13th century church, at Grasmere

What hadst thou that could make so large amends

For all thou hadst not and thy peers possessed,
Motion and fire, swift means to radiant
ends? — 35

Thou hadst, for weary feet, the gift of rest.

From Shelley's dazzling glow or thunderous
haze,

From Byron's tempest-anger, tempest-
mirth,

Men turned to thee and found — not blast
and blaze,

Tumult of tottering heavens, but peace on
earth. 40

Nor peace that grows by Lethe, scentless
flower,

There in white languors to decline and
cease;

But peace whose names are also rapture,
power,

Clear sight, and love for these are parts of peace

3

I hear it vouched the Muse is with us still —
If less divinely frenzied than of yore. 46

In lieu of feeling she has wondrous skill
To simulate emotion felt no more.

Not such the authentic Presence pure, that made

This valley vocal in the great days gone! —
In his great days, while yet the spring-time played 51

About him, and the mighty morning shone

No word-mosaic artificer, he sang
A lofty song of lowly weal and dole

Right from the heart, right to the heart it sprang, 55

Or from the soul leapt instant to the soul

He felt the charm of childhood, grace of youth,
Grandeur of age, insisting to be sung

The impassioned argument was simple truth
Half-wondering at its own melodious
tongue. 60

Impassioned? ay, to the song's ecstatic core!
But far removed were clangor, storm, and feud;

For plenteous health was his, exceeding store
Of joy, and an impassioned quietude.

underworld, gave to those who drank, forgetfulness of past

 And donned a modish dress to charm the Town.

Thenceforth she but festooned the porch of
 things,
 Apt at life's lore, incurious what life meant Dextrous of hand, she struck her lute's few
 strings; 71
 Ignobly perfect, barrenly content.

Unflushed with ardor and unblanched with
 awe,
 Her lips in profitless derision curled,
 She saw with dull emotion — if she saw — 75
 The vision of the glory of the world.

The human masque she watched, with dream-less eyes
 In whose clear shallows lurked no trembling
 shade.
 The stars, unkennd by her, might set and rise,
 Unmarked by her, the daisies bloom and
 fade. 80

The age grew sated with her sterile wit.
 Herself waxed weary on her loveless throne
 Men felt life's tide, the sweep and surge of it,
 And craved a living voice, a natural tone.

For none the less, though song was but half
 true, 85
 The world lay common, one abounding
 theme.

Man joyed and wept, and fate was ever new,
 And love was sweet, life real, death no
 dream.

In sad, stern verse the rugged scholar-sage Bemoaned his toil unvalued, youth un-
 cheered. 90

His numbers wore the vesture of the age,
 But, 'neath it beating, the great heart was
 heard.

From dewy pastures, uplands sweet with
 thyme,
 A virgin breeze freshened the jaded day

65-84 A hundred . . . tone The period described is the 18th century, the neo-classic era of English literature, when poetry shared with prose the qualities of urbanity, clarity, correctness, poise, and wit, as illustrated by the verse of Pope and Prior 89 rugged scholar-sage, Dr Samuel Johnson (1709-84), whose London contains the couplet "This mournful truth is every where confessed, / Slow rises worth, by poverty depressed." Johnson had his own struggles in mind

It wafted Collins' lonely vesper-chime, 95
 It breathed abroad the frugal note of Gray.

It fluttered here and there, nor swept in vain
 The dusty haunts where futile echoes
 dwell —
 Then, in a cadence soft as summer rain,
 And sad from Auburn voiceless, drooped and fell. 100

It drooped and fell, and one 'neath northern
 skies,
 With southern heart, who tilled his father's field,
 Found Poesy a-dying, bade her rise
 And touch quick Nature's hem and go forth healed.

On life's broad plain the plowman's conquering share 105
 Upturned the fallow lands of truth anew,
 And o'er the formal garden's trim parterre
 The peasant's team a ruthless furrow drew.

Bright was his going forth, but clouds ere long Whelmed him; in gloom his radiance set,
 and those 110
 Twin morning stars of the new century's
 song,
 Those morning stars that sang together,
 rose.

In elvish speech the Dreamer told his tale
 Of marvelous oceans swept by fateful
 wings. —

The Seer strayed not from earth's human pale, 115
 But the mysterious face of common things

He mirrored as the moon in Rydal Mere Is mirrored, when the breathless night hangs blue.

Strangely remote she seems and wondrous
 near,
 And by some nameless difference born
 anew 120

95 Collins, William Collins (1721-59), whose Ode to Evening is a sensitive record of twilight impressions 96 Gray, Thomas Gray (1716-71), who wrote, with infinite care, only a few poems, including Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard 100 sad from Auburn, a reference to Oliver Goldsmith's Deserted Village (1770), which describes the depopulation of "Sweet Auburn, loveliest village of the plain" 101-02 one . . . field, Robert Burns (1759-96), Scottish plowman-poet, whose songs achieve his desire that his "Muse, though hamely in attire, May touch the heart" 107 parterre, flower-beds arranged in geometric patterns 111 Twin . . . stars, Wordsworth and Coleridge, whose Lyrical Ballads (1798) is taken as the beginning of the Romantic Movement in English literature, in writing the poems that comprise this volume, Coleridge ("the Dreamer") was to make the supernatural appear real, whereas Wordsworth ("the Seer") was to make the real appear supernatural by showing common things in an uncommon light 113 tale, The Rime of the Ancient Mariner, which Coleridge contributed to the Lyrical Ballads

5

Peace — peace — and rest! Ah, how the lyre is loath,
Or powerless now, to give what all men
seek!

Either it deadens with ignoble sloth
Or deafens with shrill tumult, loudly weak.

Where is the singer whose large notes and
clear 125
Can heal, and arm, and plenish, and sus-tain?

Lo, one with empty music floods the ear,
And one, the heart refreshing, tires the brain

And idly tuneful, the loquacious throng
Flutter and twitter, prodigal of time, 130
And little masters make a toy of song
Till grave men weary of the sound of rime

And some go pranked in faded antique dress,
Abhorring to be hale and glad and free,
And some parade a conscious naturalness —
The scholar's, not the child's, simplicity. 136

Enough; — and wisest who from words forbear.

The gentle river rails not as it glides;
And suave and charitable, the winsome air
Chides not at all, or only him who chides.

6

Nature! we storm thine ear with choric notes
Thou answerest through the calm great nights and days,
"Laud me who will: not tuneless are your
throats;
Yet if ye paused I should not miss the praise"

We falter, half-rebuked, and sing again. 145
We chant thy desertness and haggard
gloom,
Or with thy splendid wrath inflate the strain,
Or touch it with thy color and perfume.

One, his melodious blood aflame for thee,
Wooded with fierce lust, his hot heart worlddefiled. 150
One, with the upward eye of infancy,
Looked in thy face, and felt himself thy
child

Thee he approached without distrust or dread —

Beheld thee throned, an awful queen,
above —
Climbed to thy lap and merely laid his head Against thy warm wild heart of mother-
love. 156

He heard that vast heart beating — thou didst press
Thy child so close, and lov'dst him unaware
Thy beauty gladdened him; yet he scarce less
Had loved thee, had he never found thee
fair! 160

For thou wast not as legendary lands
To which with curious eyes and ears we roam.
Nor wast thou as a fane 'mid solemn sands,
Where palmers halt at evening Thou wast
home.

And here, at home, still bides he; but he sleeps; 165
Not to be wakened even at thy word,
Though we, vague dreamers, dream he somewhere keeps
An ear still open to thy voice still heard —

Thy voice, as heretofore, about him blown,
Forever blown about his silence now; 170
Thy voice, though deeper, yet so like his
own
That almost, when he sang, we deemed
'twas thou!

7

Behind Helm Crag and Silver Howe the sheen
Of the retreating day is less and less
Soon will the lordlier summits, here unseen,
Gather the night about their nakedness. 176

The half-heard bleat of sheep comes from the hill.
Faint sounds of childish play are in the air
The river murmurs past. All else is still.
The very graves seem stiller than they were

Afar though nation be on nation hurled, 181
And life with toil and ancient pain depressed,
Here one may scarce believe the whole wide
world
Is not at peace, and all man's heart at rest.

Rest! 'twas the gift he gave; and peace! the
shade 185
He spread, for spirits fevered with the sun

WORLD-STRANGENESS

Strange the world about me lies,
Never yet familiar grown —
Still disturbs me with surprise,
Haunts me like a face half known.

In this house with starry dome, 5
Floored with gemlike plains and seas,
Shall I never feel at home,
Never wholly be at ease?

On from room to room I stray, 10
Yet my Host can ne'er espy,
And I know not to this day
Whether guest or captive I.

So, betwixt the starry dome
And the floor of plains and seas,
I have never felt at home, 15
Never wholly been at ease. (1889)

SHELLEY'S CENTENARY

Within a narrow span of time,
Three princes of the realm of rime,
At height of youth or manhood's prime
From earth took wing,

To join the fellowship sublime 5
Who, dead, yet sing.

He, first, his earliest wreath who wove
Of laurel grown in Latmian grove,
Conquered by pain and hapless love
Found calmer home, 10
Roofed by the heaven that glows above
Eternal Rome.

A fierier soul, its own fierce prey
And cumbered with more mortal clay,
At Missolonghi flamed away, 15
And left the air
Reverberating to this day
Its loud despair.

Alike remote from Byron's scorn
And Keat's magic as of morn 20

Shelley's Centenary Shelley was born in 1792 See Hardy's
Shelley's Skylark, page 928
7-12 earliest Rome Keats, whose first important poem, Endymion (1818), concerns a youth who kept sheep on Mount Latmus, had an unfortunate love affair with Fanny Brawn, and died of tuberculosis in Rome, 1821 13
fierier soul, Lord Byron, whose "loud despair" is recorded in the last two cantos of Childe Harold's Pilgrimage, and who died, 1824, of a fever at Missolonghi, Greece, while he was fighting for Greek independence from Turkey

Bursting forever newly-born
On forests old,
To wake a hoary world forlorn
With touch of gold,

Shelley, the cloud-begot, who grew 25
Nourished on starbeams, air, and dew,
Into that Essence whence he drew
His life and lyre
Was fittingly resolved anew
Through wave and fire. 30

And it was strangely, wildly meet,
That he, who brooked not Time's slow feet,
With passage thus abrupt and fleet
Should hurry hence,
Eager the Great Perhaps to greet 35
With Why? and Whence?

Impatient of the world's fixed way,
He ne'er could suffer God's delay,
But all the future in a day
Would build divine, 40
And the whole past in ruins lay,
An emptied shrine.

Vain vision! but the glow, the fire,
The passion of benign desire,
These peradventure lift him higher 45
Than many a soul
That mounts a million paces nigher
Its meaner goal.

And power is his, if naught besides,
In that thin ether where he rides, 50
Above the roar of human tides
To ascend afar,
Lost in a storm of light that hides
His dizzy car.

Below, the unhasting world toils on, 55
And here and there are victories won,
Some dragon slain, some justice done,
While, 'mid the skies,
A meteor rushing on the sun,
He flares and dies. 60

But, as he cleaves yon ether clear,
Notes from the unattempted sphere
He scatters to the far-off ear
Of Earth's dim throng,
Nay, from the zenith he flings sheer 65
His torrent of song.

In other shapes than he forecast,
Fate molds the Morrow. His fierce blast —
His wild assault upon the Past —

29-30 resolved fire Shelley was drowned, July 8, 1822, while sailing in the Bay of Lerici, Italy, when his body was found, it was cremated on the shore

These things are vain.
Brief is Revolt, but born to last
Was the arrowy strain,

That seems the wandering voices blent
Of every virgin element;
A sound from azure spaces sent —
An airy call
From the Uranian firmament
O'erdoming all.

And in this world of wordlings, where
Souls rush in apathy, and ne'er
A great emotion shakes the air,
And life flags tame,
And rare is noble impulse, rare
The impassioned aim,

'Tis no mean fortune to have heard
A singer who, if errors blurred
His sight, had yet a spirit stirred
By vast desire,
And ardor fledging the swift word
With plumes of fire.

A creature of impetuous breath,
Our torpor deadlier than death
He knew not; whatsoe'er he saith
Flashes with life;
He spurreth men, he quickeneth
To splendid strife.

And in his gusts of song he brings
Wild odors shaken from strange wings,
And carries secret whisperings
From far lips blown,
While all the rapturous heart of things
Throbs through his own —

His own that from the burning pyre
One who had loved his wind-swept lyre
Out of the sharp teeth of the fire
Unmolten drew,
Beside the sea that in her ire
Smote him and slew. (1892; 1892)

ENGLAND MY MOTHER

I

England my mother,
Wardress of waters,
Builder of peoples,
Maker of men —

77 Uranian, heavenly 103-06 from . drew When Shelley's body was being cremated Edward John Trelawny, a friend, snatched the heart unburned from the flames
England My Mother This poem is an excellent example of the unrimed lyric, cf Tennyson's Tears, Idle Tears, page 55 Compare the thought of the poem with that of Henley's England, My England, page 795.

Hast thou yet leisure
Left for the muses?
Heed'st thou the songsmith
Forging the rime?

Deafened with tumults,
How canst thou hearken?
Strident is faction,
Demos is loud.

Lazarus, hungry,
Menaces Dives;
Labor the giant
Chafes in his hold.

Yet do the songsmiths
Quit not their forges;
Still on life's anvil
Forge they the rime.

Still the rapt faces
Glow from the furnace:
Breath of the smithy
Scorches their brows.

Yea, and thou hear'st them?
So shall the hammers
Fashion not vainly
Verses of gold.

2

Lo, with the ancient Roots of man's nature,
Twines the eternal
Passion of song.

Ever Love fans it,
Ever Life feeds it;
Time cannot age it,
Death cannot slay.

Deep in the world-heart
Stand its foundations,
Tangled with all things,
Twin-made with all.

Nay, what is Nature's Self, but an endless
Strife toward music,
Euphony, rime?

Trees in their blooming,
Tides in their flowing,
Stars in their circling,
Tremble with song

God on His throne is Eldest of poets;

12 Demos, the crowd 13-14 Lazarus . . . Dives the beggar and the rich man in Christ's parable (Luke, 16 19 ff)

Unto His measures
Moveth the Whole.

3

Therefore deride not Speech of the muses,
England my mother,
Maker of men.

55

Nations are mortal,
Fragile is greatness;
Fortune may fly thee,
Song shall not fly.

60

Song the all-girdling,
Song cannot perish;
Men shall make music,
Man shall give ear.

Not while the choric
Chant of creation
Floweth from all things,
Poured without pause,

65

Cease we to echo
Faintly the descant
Whereto forever
Dances the world.

70

4

So let the songsmith
Proffer his rime-gift,
England my mother,
Maker of men

75

Gray grows thy count'nance,
Full of the ages;
Time on thy forehead
Sits like a dream:

80

Song is the potion
All things renewing,
Youth's one elixir,
Fountain of morn.

Thou, at the world-loom
Weaving thy future,
Fitly may'st temper
Toil with delight.

85

Deemest thou, only
Labor is earnest?
Grave is all beauty,
Sacred all joy.

90

Song is no bauble —
Slight not the songsmith,
England my mother, 95
Maker of men (1892; 1892)

LACHRYMÆ MUSARUM

Low, like another's, lies the laureled head;
The life that seemed a perfect song is o'er —
Carry the last great bard to his last bed.
Land that he loved, thy noblest voice is mute.
Land that he loved, that loved him! never-
more 5

Meadow of thune, smooth lawn or wild sea-
shore,
Gardens of odorous bloom and tremulous
fruit,
Or woodlands old, like Druid couches spread,
The master's feet shall tread.
Death's little rift hath rent the faultless lute;
The singer of undying songs is dead. 11

Lo, in this season pensive-hued and grave,
While fades and falls the doomed, reluctant
leaf

From withered Earth's fantastic coronal,
With wandering sighs of forest and of wave 15
Mingles the murmur of a people's grief
For him whose leaf shall fade not, neither fall
He hath fared forth, beyond these suns and showers.

For us, the autumn glow, the autumn flame,
And soon the winter-silence shall be ours, 20
Him the eternal spring of fadeless fame
Crowns with no mortal flowers

What needs his laurel our ephemeral tears,
To save from visitation of decay?
Not in this temporal light alone, that bay 25
Blooms, nor to perishable mundane ears
Sings he with lips of transitory clay.

Rapt though he be from us,
Virgil salutes him, and Theocritus;
Catullus, mightiest-brained Lucretius, each 30
Greets him, their brother, on the Stygian beach;

Proudly a gaunt right hand doth Dante reach;
Milton and Wordsworth bid him welcome
home;

Keats, on his lips the eternal rose of youth,

Doth in the name of Beauty that is Truth 35
 A kinsman's love beseech;
 Coleridge, his locks aspersed with fairy foam,
 Calm Spenser, Chaucer suave,
 His equal friendship crave;
 And godlike spirits hail him guest, in speech
 Of Athens, Florence, Weimar, Stratford,
 Rome. 41

Nay, he returns to regions whence he came.
 Him doth the spirit divine
 Of universal loveliness reclaim.
 All nature is his shrine. 45
 Seek him henceforward in the wind and sea,
 In earth's and air's emotion or repose,
 In every star's august serenity,
 And in the rapture of the flaming rose 49
 There seek him if ye would not seek in vain,
 There, in the rhythm and music of the Whole,
 Yea, and forever in the human soul
 Made stronger and more beauteous by his strain.

For lo! creation's self is one great choir,
 And what is nature's order but the rime 55
 Whereto in holiest chime
 All things have moved with all things from their prime?
 Who shall expound the mystery of the lyre?
 In far retreats of elemental mind
 Obscurely comes and goes 60
 The imperative breath of song, that as the wind

Is trackless, and oblivious whence it blows.
 Demand of lilies wherefore they are white,
 Extort her crimson secret from the rose,
 But ask not of the Muse that she disclose 65
 The meaning of the riddle of her might,
 Somewhat of all things sealed and recondite,
 Save the enigma of herself, she knows
 The master could not tell, with all his lore,
 Wherefore he sang, or whence the mandate
 sped; 70

Ev'n as the linnet sings, so I, he said —
 Ah, rather as the imperial nightingale,
 That held in trance the ancient Attic shore,

35 Beauty . . . Truth. See Keats's Ode on a Grecian Urn, lines 49-50

"Beauty is truth, truth beauty,"—that is all Ye know on earth, and all ye need to know"
 37 aspersed, sprinkled, fairy foam, a reference to the supernatural seas in which Coleridge's ancient mariner sailed, with perhaps a reminiscence of lines 69-70 in Keats's Ode to a Nightingale

" . . . magic casements, opening on the foam
 Of perilous seas, in faery lands forlorn"
 41 Athens . . . Rome, cities associated with great poets Athens with such as Sophocles and Euripides, Florence with Dante, Weimar with Goethe and Schiller, Stratford with Shakespeare, and Rome with Virgil, Horace, and Ovid
 54 creation's . . . choir See note on England My Mother, 65-66, page 902
 71 Ev'n I See In Memoriam, Section 21, 23-24, page 62

 And pipe but as the linnets sing"
 72 nightingale See Arnold's Phloxes, page 470, and Swinburne's Illylus, page 675.

And charms the ages with the notes that o'er
 All woodland chants immortally prevail! 75
 And now, from our vain plaudits greatly fled,
 He with diviner silence dwells instead,
 And on no earthly sea with transient roar,
 Unto no earthly airs, he sets his sail,
 But far beyond our vision and our hail 80
 Is heard forever and is seen no more.

No more, O never now,
 Lord of the lofty and the tranquil brow
 Shall men behold those wizard locks where
 Time

Let fall no wintry rime. 85
 Once, in his youth obscure,
 The weaver of this verse, that shall endure
 By splendor of its theme which cannot die,
 Beheld thee eye to eye,
 And touched through thee the hand 90
 Of every hero of thy race divine,
 Ev'n to the sire of all the laureled line,
 The sightless wanderer on the Ionian strand.
 Yea, I beheld thee, and behold thee yet;
 Thou hast forgotten, but can I forget? 95
 Are not thy words all goldenly impressed
 On memory's palimpsest?
 I hear the utterance of thy sovereign tongue,
 I tread the floor thy hallowing feet have trod,
 I see the hands a nation's lyre that strung, 100
 The eyes that looked through life and gazed on God.

The seasons change, the winds they shift
 and veer;

The grass of yesteryear
 Is dead; the birds depart, the groves decay,
 Empires dissolve and peoples disappear; 105
 Song passes not away.
 Captains and conquerors leave a little dust,
 And kings a dubious legend of their reign;
 The swords of Cæsars, they are less than rust;
 The poet doth remain. 110
 Dead is Augustus, Maro is alive;
 And thou, the Mantuan of this age and soil,
 With Virgil shalt survive,
 Enriching Time with no less honeyed spoil,

84-85 locks . . . rime Tennyson's hair never turned gray. The version of the poem sent to Tennyson by Watson in 1892 contained the phrase "wintry hair." Tennyson wrote to Watson "If by 'wintry hair' you allude to a tree whose leaves are half gone, you are right, but if you mean 'white' you are wrong, for I never had a gray hair on my head" (Memoir, II, page 398). 92-93 sire . . . strand. Homer, who tradition says was blind and a wandering minstrel in the Ionian cities along the coast of Asia Minor
 97 palimpsest, a parchment from which earlier writing has been erased to make room for new 107-08 Captains . . . reign. Cf. Kipling's Recessional, 7-8, page 893
 111-13 Dead survive. Publius Virgilius Maro, called Virgil, was a native of Mantua in Italy, his fame is said to have outlived that of Augustus Caesar, emperor of Rome during Virgil's literary career. See Dobson's Ars Virgilii, page 763. A Virgilian quality has been felt in Tennyson's poetry. See F. W. Myers's letter to Hallam Tennyson (Memoir, II, 483), in which reference is made to lines 13-14 of Tennyson's To Virgil (page 155) as the "most Virgilian of all."

The yielding sweet of every Muse's hive; 115
 Heeding no more the sound if idle praise
 In that great calm our tumults cannot reach,
 Master who crown'st our immelodious days
 With flower of perfect speech. (1892; 1892)

THE SOVEREIGN POET

He sits above the clang and dust of Time,
 With the world's secret trembling on his lip
 He asks not converse or companionship
 In the cold starlight where thou canst not clumb.

The undelivered tidings in his breast 5
 Suffer him not to rest.
 He sees afar the immemorable throng,
 And binds the scattered ages with a song

The glorious riddle of his rhythmic breath,
 His might, his spell, we know not what they
 be; 10
 We only feel, whate'er he uttereth,
 This savors not of death,
 This hath a relish of eternity. (1894; 1905)

THE WORLD IN ARMOR

I

Under this shade of crimson wings abhorred
 That never wholly leaves the sky serene,
 While Vengeance sleeps a sleep so light,
 between

Dominions that acclaim Thee overlord —
 Sadly the blast of Thy tremendous word, 5
 Whate'er its mystic purport may have been,
 Echoes across the ages, Nazarene:
Not to bring peace Mine errand, but a sword
 For lo, Thy world uprises and lies down
 In armor, and its Peace is War, in all 10
 Save the great death that weaves War's dreadful crown;
 War unennobled by heroic pain,
 War without triumph, without glorious fall,
 War that sits smiling, with the eyes of Cain.

2

When London's Plague, that day by day enrolled
 His thousands dead, nor deigned his rage to abate
 Till grass was green in silent Bishopsgate,

The World in Armor Sonnet 1 8 Not . . . sword
 From Matthew, 10 34 — "I came not to send peace, but a sword"

Sonnet 2. This sonnet refers to the "miraculous year" of 1666, when a disastrous plague in London was followed by a great fire that nearly destroyed the city but had the good result of checking the plague

3 Bishopsgate, a street in the "city," or business section, of London

Had come and passed like thunder — still, 'tis
 told,
 The monster, driven to earth, in hovels old 5
 And haunts obscure, though dormant, lingered late,
 Till the dread Fire, one roaring wave of fate,
 Rose, and swept clean his last retreat and
 hold.
 In Europe live the dregs of Plague today, Dregs of full many an ancient Plague and dire — 10
 Old wrongs, old lies of ages blind and cruel
 What if alone the world-war's world-wide fire
 Can purge the ambushed pestilence away?
 Yet woe to him that idly lights the fuel!

3

A moment's fantasy, the vision came
 Of Europe dipped in fiery death, and so
 Mounting re-born, with vestal limbs aglow,
 Splendid and fragrant from her bath of flame
 It fled; and a phantom without name, 5
 Sightless, dismembered, terrible, said: "Lo,
 I am that ravished Europe men shall know
 After the morn of blood and night of shame."
 The specter passed, and I beheld alone
 The Europe of the present, as she stands, 10
 Powerless from terror of her own vast power,
 'Neath novel stars, beside a brink unknown,
 And round her the sad Kings, with sleepless
 hands,
 Piling the fagots, hour by doomful hour
 (1894, 1894)

ODE IN MAY

Let me go forth, and share
 The overflowing Sun
 With one wise friend, or one
 Better than wise, being fair,
 Where the pewit wheels and dips 5
 On heights of bracken and ling,
 And Earth, unto her leaflet tips,
 Tingles with the Spring

What is so sweet and dear
 As a prosperous morn in May, 10
 The valiant prime of the day,
 And the dauntless youth of the year,
 When nothing that asks for bliss,
 Asking aright, is denied,
 And half of the world a bridegroom is, 15
 And half of the world a bride?

The Song of Mingling flows,
 Grave, ceremonial, pure,

The cosmic descendant rose, 20
When the temporal lord of life,
Going his golden way,
Had taken a wondrous maid to wife
That long had said him nay.

For of old the Sun, our sire, 25
Came wooing the mother of men,
Earth, that was virginal then,
Vestal fire to his fire.
Silent her bosom and coy,
But the strong god sued and pressed; 30
And born of their starry nuptial joy
Are all that drink of her breast

And the triumph of him that begot,
And the travail of her that bore, 35
Behold, they are evermore
As warp and weft in our lot.
We are children of splendor and flame,
Of shuddering, also, and tears
Magnificent out of the dust we came,
And abject from the Spheres 40

O bright irresistible lord!
We are fruit of Earth's womb, each one,
And fruit of thy love, O Sun,
For this thy spouse, thy adored. 45
To thee as our Father we bow,
Forbidden thy Father to see,
Who is older and greater than thou, as thou Art greater and older than we.

Thou art but as a word of his speech;
Thou art but as a wave of his hand, 50
Thou art brief as a glitter of sand
'Twixt tide and tide on his beach;
Thou art less than a spark of his fire,
Or a moment's mood of his soul
Thou art lost in the notes on the lips of his choir 55
That chant the chant of the Whole.

THE PLAYMATES

The Wye and the Severn are offspring
Of dark Plinlimmon's side;
And there they were nursed as playmates,
And then — they were sundered wide

Plinlimmon is a mountain in South Wales, from opposite slopes of which the Wye and Severn rivers take their rise, after taking widely separate courses, the Wye through Wales and Monmouthshire, the Severn through the western counties of England, they join at a point near the Bristol Channel

In ways far parted they travel, 5
By city and castled shore;
And at last, after great adventures,
They meet — very old — once more.

They have long grown rich in homage;
They are full of renown and pride; 10
But they babble of how they were playmates
On dark Plinlimmon's side. (1901)

THE BALLAD OF SEMMERWATER

(NORTH-COUNTRY LEGEND)

Deep asleep, deep asleep,
Deep asleep it lies,
The still lake of Semmerwater
Under the still skies.

And many a fathom, many a fathom, 5
Many a fathom below,
In a king's tower and a queen's bower
The fishes come and go.

Once there stood by Semmerwater
A mickle town and tall; 10
King's tower and queen's bower,
And the wakeman on the wall.

Came a beggar halt and sore
"I faint for lack of bread."
King's tower and queen's bower 15
Cast him forth unfed.

He knocked at the door of the herdman's cot,
The herdman's cot in the dale.
They gave him of their oatcake,
They gave him of their ale. 20

He has cursed aloud that city proud,
He has cursed it in its pride,
He has cursed it into Semmerwater
Down the brant hillside;
He has cursed it into Semmerwater, 25
There to bide.

King's tower and queen's bower,
And a mickle town and tall;
By glimmer of scale and gleam of fin,
Folk have seen them all. 30
King's tower and queen's bower,
And weed and reed in the gloom;
And a lost city in Semmerwater,
Deep asleep till Doom

LEAVETAKING

Pass, thou wild light,
 Wild light on peaks that so Grieve to let go
 The day
 Lovely thy tarrying, lovely too is night; 5
 Pass thou away.

Pass, thou wild heart,
 Wild heart of youth that still Hast half a will
 To stay. 10
 I grow too old a comrade, let us part
 Pass thou away. (1905)

THE ETERNAL SEARCH

My little maiden two years old, just able
 To tower full half a head above the table,
 With inquisition keen must needs explore
 Whatever in my dwelling hath a door,
 Whatever is behind a curtain hid, 5
 Or lurks, a rich enigma, 'neath a lid.
 So soon is the supreme desire confessed,
 To probe the unknown! So soon begins the
 quest,
 That never ends until asunder fall
 The locks and bolts of the Last Door of All 10

THOMAS HOOD

No courtier this, and naught to courts he owed,
 Fawned not on thrones, hymned not the great and callous,
 Yet, in one strain, that few remember, showed
 He had the password to King Oberon's palace

And seeing a London seamstress's gray fate, 5
 He of a human heartstring made a thread,
 And stitched him such a royal robe of state
 That Eastern Kings are poorer habited

He saw wan Woman toil with famished eyes;
 He saw her bound, and strove to sing her
 free. 10
 He saw her fall'n; and wrote "The Bridge of Sighs" —
 And on it crossed to immortality. (1915)

THE VISITOR ABHORRED

Unknowable Power is o'er me —
 The might of unknowable Mind;
 And fathomless Time is before me,
 And fathomless Time is behind

And I sit at the feast of Illusion 5
 In the Palace of Baffled Quest,
 Awaiting the loathed intrusion
 Of the silent Unbidden Guest,

Who passes the sleeping sentry,
 And leaves him to slumber on — 10
 And makes his triumphal entry,
 And casts his dart, and is gone. (1924)

ALFRED EDWARD HOUSMAN
(1859-)

A SHROPSHIRE LAD

I 1887

From Clee to heaven the beacon burns,
 The shires have seen it plain,
 From north and south the sign returns,
 And beacons burn again.

Look left, look right, the hills are bright, 5
 The dales are light between,
 Because 'tis fifty years tonight
 That God has saved the Queen.

Now, when the flame they watch not towers
 About the soil they trod, 10
 Lads, we'll remember friends of ours
 Who shared the work with God.

To skies that knit their heartstrings right,
 To fields that bred them brave,
 The saviors come not home tonight, 15
 Themselves they could not save

It dawns in Asia, tombstones show
 And Shropshire names are read;
 And the Nile spills his overflow
 Beside the Severn's dead 20

We pledge in peace by farm and town
 The Queen they served in war,

A Shropshire Lad. Shropshire is a quiet, old-fashioned county of central England, on the border of Wales, with Shrewsbury as its chief city

Lyric I 1887 The year 1887, which marked the completion of Victoria's fiftieth year as queen of England, was celebrated as the Golden Jubilee, compare Kipling's Recessional, page 893, and Newbolt's The Vigil, page 926

1 Clee, a town in the southern part of Shropshire 17 Asia From 1878 to 1886 the English fought wars in Afghanistan and Burma, compare the wars of empire referred to in Kipling's "Fuzzy-Wuzzy," page 881 19 Nile In 1882 the English put down a native revolt in Egypt, in 1881-1898 they fought in the Sudan 20 Severn, a large river flowing through Shropshire

And fire the beacons up and down
The land they perished for.

"God save the Queen" we living sing, 25
From height to height 'tis heard;
And with the rest your voices ring,
Lads of the Fifty-third

Oh, God will save her, fear you not!
Be you the men you've been, 30
Get you the sons your fathers got,
And God will save the Queen.

(2)

Loveliest of trees, the cherry now
Is hung with bloom along the bough,
And stands about the woodland ride
Wearing white for Eastertide

Now, of my threescore years and ten, 5
Twenty will not come again,
And take from seventy springs a score,
It only leaves me fifty more.

And since to look at things in bloom 10
Fifty springs are little room,
About the woodlands I will go
To see the cherry hung with snow.

3. THE RECRUIT

Leave your home behind, lad,
And reach your friends your hand,
And go, and luck go with you
While Ludlow tower shall stand

Oh, come you home of Sunday, 5
When Ludlow streets are still
And Ludlow bells are calling
To farm and lane and mill.

Or come you home of Monday, 10
When Ludlow market hums
And Ludlow chimes are playing,
"The conquering hero comes."

Come you home a hero,
Or come not home at all;
The lads you leave will mind you 15
Till Ludlow tower shall fall.

And you will list the bugle
That blows in lands of morn,
And make the foes of England 20
Be sorry you were born.

And you till trump of doomsday
On lands of morn may lie,
And make the hearts of comrades
Be heavy where you die

Leave your home behind you, 25
Your friends by field and town;
Oh, town and field will mind you
Till Ludlow tower is down

4. REVELLE

Wake! The silver dusk returning
Up the beach of darkness brims,
And the ship of sunrise burning
Strands upon the eastern rims.

Wake! The vaulted shadow shatters, 5
Trampled to the floor it spanned,
And the tent of night in tatters
Straws the sky-pavilioned land.

Up, lad, up! 'Tis late for lying.
Hear the drums of morning play; 10
Hark, the empty highways crying,
"Who'll beyond the hills away?"

Towns and countries woo together,
Forelands beacon, belfries call, 15
Never lad that trod on leather
Lived to feast his heart with all.

Up, lad, thews that lie and cumber
Sunlit pallets never thrive,
Morns abed and daylight slumber
Were not meant for man alive. 20

Clay lies still, but blood's a rover;
Breath's a ware that will not keep.
Up, lad; when the journey's over
There 'll be time enough to sleep.

5

Oh, see how thick the goldcup flowers
Are lying in field and lane,
With dandelions to tell the hours
That never are told again
Oh, may I squire you round the meads 5
And pick you posies gay?
—'Twill do no harm to take my arm,
"You may, young man, you may"

Ah, spring was sent for lass and lad, 10
'Tis now the blood runs gold,
And man and maid had best be glad
Before the world is old
What flowers today may flower tomorrow,
But never as good as new
—Suppose I wound my arm right round— 15
" 'Tis true, young man, 'tis true."

Lyric 3 The Recruit 4 Ludlow tower, the 15th century tower of St. Lawrence's church in Ludlow, a town on the southern border of Shropshire 15 mind, remember 17 list, listen to 18 lands of morn, lands of the East

Some lads there are, 'tis shame to say,
 That only court to thieve,
 And once they bear the bloom away
 'Tis little enough they leave. 20
 Then keep your heart for men like me
 And safe from trustless chaps.
 My love is true and all for you.
 "Perhaps, young man, perhaps."

Oh, look in my eyes then, can you doubt? 25
 — Why, 'tis a mile from town.
 How green the grass is all about!
 We might as well sit down
 — Ah, life, what is it but a flower?
 Why must true lovers sigh? 30
 Be kind, have pity, my own, my pretty — "Good-by, young man, good-by."

6

When the lad for longing sighs,
 Mute and dull of cheer and pale,
 If at death's own door he lies,
 Maiden, you can heal his ail.

Lovers' ills are all to buy: 5
 The wan look, the hollow tone,
 The hung head, the sunken eye —
 You can have them for your own.

Buy them, buy them; eve and morn 10
 Lovers' ills are all to sell
 Then you can lie down forlorn;
 But the lover will be well.

7

When smoke stood up from Ludlow,
 And must blew off from Teme,
 And blithe afield to plowing
 Against the morning beam
 I strode beside my team, 5

The blackbird in the coppice
 Looked out to see me stride,
 And hearkened as I whistled
 The trampling team beside,
 And fluted and replied. 10

"Lie down, lie down, young yeoman;
 What use to rise and rise?
 Rise man a thousand mornings
 Yet down at last he lies,
 And then the man is wise" 15

I heard the tune he sang me,
 And spied his yellow bill;
 I picked a stone and aimed it
 And threw it with a will.
 Then the bird was still 20

Lyric 7. 2. Teme, a river which flows by Ludlow yeoman, a land-owning farmer 11

Then my soul within me
 Took up the blackbird's strain,
 And still beside the horses
 Along the dewy lane
 It sang the song again: 25

"Lie down, lie down, young yeoman;
 The sun moves always west;
 The road one treads to labor
 Will lead one home to rest,
 And that will be the best" 30

8

"Farewell to barn and stack and tree,
 Farewell to Severn shore.
 Terence, look your last at me,
 For I come home no more.

"The sun burns on the half-mown hill, 5
 By now the blood is dried,
 And Maurice amongst the hay lies still
 And my knife is in his side.

"My mother thinks us long away;
 'Tis time the field were mown 10
 She had two sons at rising day,
 Tonight she'll be alone.

"And here's a bloody hand to shake,
 And, oh, man, here's good-by,
 We'll sweat no more on scythe and rake, 15
 My bloody hands and I.

"I wish you strength to bring you pride,
 And a love to keep you clean,
 And I wish you luck, come Lammastide,
 At racing on the green 20

 And long will wait the fold,
 And long will stand the empty plate,
 And dinner will be cold" 5

9

On moonlit heath and lonesome bank
 The sheep beside me graze,
 And yon the gallows used to clank
 Fast by the four cross ways

A careless shepherd once would keep 5
 The flocks by moonlight there,
 And high amongst the glimmering sheep
 The dead man stood on air

They hang us now in Shrewsbury jail;
 The whistles blow forlorn, 10

Lyric 8 19 Lammastide, August 1

Lyric 9 Cf Wilde's The Ballad of Reading Gaol, page 812 9 Shrewsbury, the county town of Shropshire, in its jail criminals convicted and sentenced to death at the county assizes were executed

And trains all night groan on the rail
To men that die at morn

There sleeps in Shrewsbury jail tonight,
Or wakes, as may betide,
A better lad, if things went right,
Than most that sleep outside. 15

And naked to the hangman's noose
The morning clocks will ring
A neck God made for other use
Than strangling in a string. 20

And sharp the link of life will snap,
And dead on air will stand
Heels that held up as straight a chap
As treads upon the land.

So here I'll watch the night and wait 25
To see the morning shine,
When he will hear the stroke of eight
And not the stroke of nine,

And wish my friend as sound a sleep
As lads' I did not know,
That shepherded the moonlit sheep
A hundred years ago. 30

10. MARCH

The sun at noon to higher air,
Unharnessing the silver Pair
That late before his chariot swam,
Rides on the gold wool of the Ram

So braver notes the storm-cock sings 5
To start the rusted wheel of things,
And brutes in field and brutes in pen
Leap that the world goes round again

The boys are up the woods with day
To fetch the daffodils away, 10
And home at noonday from the hills
They bring no dearth of daffodils

Afield for palms the girls repair,
And sure enough the palms are there,
And each will find by hedge or pond
Her waving silver-tufted wand 15

In farm and field through all the shire
The eye beholds the heart's desire,
Ah, let not only mine be vain,
For lovers should be loved again. 20 11

On your midnight pallet lying,
Listen, and undo the door.
Lads that waste the light in sighing
In the dark should sigh no more;
Night should ease a lover's sorrow, 5
Therefore, since I go tomorrow,
Pity me before.

In the land to which I travel,
The far dwelling, let me say —
Once, if here the couch is gravel, 10
In a kinder bed I lay,
And the breast the darnel smothers
Rested once upon another's
When it was not clay.

12

When I watch the living meet,
And the moving pageant file
Warm and breathing through the street
Where I lodge a little while,

If the heats of hate and lust 5
In the house of flesh are strong,
Let me mind the house of dust
Where my sojourn shall be long.

In the nation that is not
Nothing stands that stood before; 10
There revenges are forgot,
And the hater hates no more;

Lovers lying two and two
Ask not whom they sleep beside,
And the bridegroom all night through 15
Never turns him to the bride.

13

When I was one-and-twenty
I heard a wise man say,
"Give crowns and pounds and guineas,
But not your heart, away;
Give pearls away and rubies, 5
But keep your fancy free."
But I was one-and-twenty—
No use to talk to me.

When I was one-and-twenty
I heard him say again, 10
"The heart out of the bosom
Was never given in vain;
'Tis paid with sighs a plenty
And sold for endless rue"
And I am two-and-twenty, 15
And oh, 'tis true, 'tis true

14

There pass the careless people
That call their souls their own;
Here by the road I loiter,
How idle and alone

Ah, past the plunge of plummet,
In seas I cannot sound,
My heart and soul and senses,
World without end, are drowned

His folly has not fellow
Beneath the blue of day
That gives to man or woman
His heart and soul away

There flowers no balm to sain him
From east of earth to west
That's lost for everlasting
The heart out of his breast.

Here by the laboring highway
With empty hands I stroll;
Sea-deep, till doomsday morning,
Lie lost my heart and soul.

15

Look not in my eyes, for fear
They mirror true the sight I see,
And there you find your face too clear
And love it and be lost like me
One the long nights through must lie
Spent in star-defeated sighs,
But why should you as well as I Perish?—gaze not in my eyes.

A Grecian lad, as I hear tell,
One that many loved in vain,
Looked into a forest well
And never looked away again.
There, when the turf in springtime flowers,
With downward eye and gazes sad,
Stands amid the glancing showers
A jonquil, not a Grecian lad.

16

It nods and curtsies and recovers
When the wind blows above,
The nettle on the graves of lovers
That hanged themselves for love

The nettle nods, the wind blows over,
The man, he does not move,
The lover of the grave, the lover
That hanged himself for love.

Lyric 14 13 sain, heal

Lyric 15 9 Grecian lad, Narcissus, who repulsed all who sought his love and was, in retribution, fated to fall in love with his own image in a spring, in hopeless longing he pined away, and was changed into the flower that bears his name.

17

Twice a week the winter thorough
Here stood I to keep the goal;
Football then was fighting sorrow
For the young man's soul

Now in Maytime to the wicket
Out I march with bat and pad;
See the son of grief at cricket
Trying to be glad

Try I will—no harm in trying;
Wonder 'tis how little mirth
Keeps the bones of man from lying
On the bed of earth.

18

Oh, when I was in love with you,
Then I was clean and brave,
And miles around the wonder grew
How well did I behave

And now the fancy passes by,
And nothing will remain,
And miles around they'll say that I Am quite myself again.

19 TO AN ATHLETE DYING YOUNG

The time you won your town the race
We chaired you through the market-place,
Man and boy stood cheering by,
And home we brought you shoulder-high

Today, the road all runners come,
Shoulder-high we bring you home,
And set you at your threshold down,
Townsmen of a stiller town

Smart lad, to slip betimes away
From fields where glory does not stay
And early though the laurel grows
It withers quicker than the rose.

Eyes the shady night has shut
Cannot see the record cut,
And silence sounds no worse than cheers
After earth has stopped the ears.

Now you will not swell the rout
Of lads that wore their honors out,
Runners whom renown outran
And the name died before the man

So set, before its echoes fade,
The fleet foot on the sill of shade,
And hold to the low lintel up
The still-defended challenge-cup

Lyric 19 To an Athlete Dying Young 11 laurel, used as a symbol of triumph

And round that early-laureled head
Will flock to gaze the strengthless dead,
And find unwithered on its curls
The garland briefer than a girl's 20

Oh, fair enough are sky and plain,
But I know fairer far:
Those are as beautiful again
That in the water are;

The pools and rivers wash so clean
The trees and clouds and air,
The like on earth was never seen,
And, oh, that I were there.

These are the thoughts I often think
As I stand gazing down
In act upon the cressy brink
To strip and dive and drown;

But in the golden-sanded brooks
And azure meres I spy
A silly lad that longs and looks
And wishes he were I.

21. BREDON HILL

In summertime on Bredon
The bells they sound so clear;
Round both the shires they ring them
In steeples far and near,
A happy noise to hear

Here of a Sunday morning
My love and I would lie,
And see the colored counties,
And hear the larks so high
About us in the sky

The bells would ring to call her
In valleys miles away:
"Come all to church, good people;
Good people, come and pray"
But here my love would stay.

And I would turn and answer
Among the springing thyme,
"Oh, peal upon our wedding,
And we will hear the chime,
And come to church in time"

But when the snows at Christmas
On Bredon top were strown,
My love rose up so early
And stole out unbeknown
And went to church alone.

25

They tolled the one bell only,
Groom there was none to see,
The mourners followed after,
And so to church went she,
And would not wait for me

30

The bells they sound on Bredon,
And still the steeples hum,
"Come all to church, good people"—
Oh, noisy bells, be dumb;
I hear you, I will come 35

22

The street sounds to the soldiers' tread,
And out we troop to see;
A single redcoat turns his head,
He turns and looks at me

My man, from sky to sky's so far,
We never crossed before,
Such leagues apart the world's ends are,
We're like to meet no more,

5

What thoughts at heart have you and I
We cannot stop to tell;
But dead or living, drunk or dry,
Soldier, I wish you well

23

The lads in their hundreds to Ludlow come in for the fair,
There's men from the barn and the forge
and the mill and the fold,
The lads for the girls and the lads for the liquor are there,
And there with the rest are the lads that will never be old.

5

There's chaps from the town and the field and the till and the cart,
And many to count are the stalwart, and
many the brave,
And many the handsome of face and the handsome of heart,
And few that will carry their looks or their truth to the grave.

5

I wish one could know them, I wish there were tokens to tell
The fortunate fellows that now you can never discern;
And then one could talk with them friendly and wish them farewell
And watch them depart on the way that they will not return.

10

But now you may stare as you like and there's nothing to scan,
And brushing your elbow unguessed-at and not to be told

Say, lad, have you things to do?
Quick, then, while your day's at prime!
Quick, and if 'tis work for two,
Here am I, man; now's your time

Send me now, and I shall go; 5
Call me, I shall hear you call;
Use me ere they lay me low
Where a man's no use at all;

Ere the wholesome flesh decay, 10
And the willing nerve be numb,
And the lips lack breath to say,
"No, my lad, I cannot come"

25

This time of year a twelvemonth past,
When Fred and I would meet,
We needs must jangle, till at last
We fought and I was beat.

So then the summer fields about, 5
Till rainy days began,
Rose Harland on her Sundays out
Walked with the better man

The better man she walks with still, 10
Though now 'tis not with Fred,
A lad that lives and has his will
Is worth a dozen dead.

Fred keeps the house all kinds of weather,
And clay's the house he keeps;
When Rose and I walk out together 15
Stock-still lies Fred and sleeps.

26

Along the field as we came by
A year ago, my love and I,
The aspen over stile and stone
Was talking to itself alone.
"Oh, who are these that kiss and pass?" 5
A country lover and his lass;
Two lovers looking to be wed;
And time shall put them both to bed,
But she shall lie with earth above,
And he beside another love." 10

And sure enough beneath the tree
There walks another love with me,
And overhead the aspen heaves
Its rainy-sounding silver leaves;
And I spell nothing in their stir, 15
But now perhaps they speak to her,

And plain for her to understand
They talk about a time at hand
When I shall sleep with clover clad,
And she beside another lad. 20

27

"Is my team plowing,
That I was used to drive
And hear the harness jingle
When I was man alive?"

Aye, the horses trample, 5
The harness jingles now;
No change though you lie under
The land you used to plow.

"Is football playing 10
Along the river shore,
With lads to chase the leather,
Now I stand up no more?"

Aye, the ball is flying,
The lads play heart and soul,
The goal stands up, the keeper 15
Stands up to keep the goal

"Is my girl happy, 5
That I thought hard to leave,
And has she tired of weeping
As she lies down at eve?" 20

Aye, she lies down lightly,
She lies not down to weep,
Your girl is well contented
Be still, my lad, and sleep.

"Is my friend hearty, 25
Now I am thin and pine,
And has he found to sleep in
A better bed than mine?"

Yes, lad, I lie easy,
I lie as lads would choose;
I cheer a dead man's sweetheart — 30
Never ask me whose.

28. THE WELSH MARCHES

High the vanes of Shrewsbury gleam
Islanded in Severn stream;
The bridges from the steeped crest
Cross the water east and west

The flag of morn in conqueror's state 5
Enters at the English gate;
The vanquished eve, as night prevails,
Bleeds upon the road to Wales.

Lyric 28 The Welsh Marches The border land, or Marches, between Wales and England was from the 5th to the 13th century, the scene of bloody conflict between the native
Celts and the Saxon and Norman invaders
1 Shrewsbury, the county town of Shropshire, located on the Severn River.

Ages since the vanquished bled
Round my mother's marriage-bed;
There the ravens feasted far
About the open house of war. 10

When Severn down to Buildwas ran,
Colored with the death of man,
Couched upon her brother's grave
The Saxon got me on the slave. 15

The sound of fight is silent long
That began the ancient wrong;
Long the voice of tears is still
That wept of old the endless ill. 20

In my heart it has not died,
The war that sleeps on Severn side;
They cease not fighting, east and west,
On the marches of my breast.

Here the truceless armies yet
Trample, rolled in blood and sweat,
They kill and kill and never die;
And I think that each is I. 25

None will part us, none undo
The knot that makes one flesh of two,
Sick with hatred, sick with pain,
Strangling — When shall we be slain? 30

When shall I be dead and rid
Of the wrong my father did?
How long, how long, till spade and hearse
Put to sleep my mother's curse? 35

29 THE LENT LILY

'Tis spring, come out to ramble
The hilly brakes around,
For under thorn and bramble
About the hollow ground
The primroses are found 5

And there's the windflower chilly
With all the winds at play,
And there's the Lenten lily
That has not long to stay
And dies on Easter day. 10

And since till girls go maying
You find the primrose still,
And find the windflower playing
With every wind at will,
But not the daffodil, 15

Bring baskets now, and sally
Upon the spring's array,

13 Buildwas, a town on the Severn, twelve miles below Shrewsbury

Lyric 29 6 windflower, the anemone,

And bear from hill and valley
The daffodil away
That dies on Easter day. 20

30

Others, I am not the first,
Have willed more mischief than they durst,
If in the breathless night I too
Shiver now, 'tis nothing new

More than I, if truth were told, 5
Have stood and sweated hot and cold,
And through their reins in ice and fire
Fear contended with desire

Agued once like me were they,
But I like them shall win my way 10
Lastly to the bed of mold
Where there's neither heat nor cold.

But from my grave across my brow
Plays no wind of healing now,
And fire and ice within me fight
Beneath the suffocating night. 15

31

On Wenlock Edge the wood's in trouble,
His forest fleece the Wrekin heaves;
The gale, it plies the saplings double,
And thick on Severn snow the leaves.

'Twould blow like this through holt and hanger 5

When Uricon the city stood;
'Tis the old wind in the old anger,
But then it threshed another wood.

Then, 'twas before my time, the Roman
At yonder heaving hill would stare; 10
The blood that warms an English yeoman,
The thoughts that hurt him, they were there.

There, like the wind through woods in riot,
Through him the gale of life blew high,
The tree of man was never quiet — 15
Then 'twas the Roman, now 'tis I.

The gale, it plies the saplings double,
It blows so hard, 'twill soon be gone
Today the Roman and his trouble
Are ashes under Uricon 20

Lyric 31 1 Wenlock Edge, a range of hills in southern Shropshire, southeast of Shrewsbury 2 the Wrekin, an isolated extinct volcano southeast of Shrewsbury 5 holt, wood 6 hanger, a thicket on a steep hillside 6 Uricon, Uriconum, an ancient Roman city near the modern Wroxeter, southeast of Shrewsbury, during the Roman occupation (1st to 5th centuries A.D.) it was the capital of Britannia Secunda, one of the four provinces of Britain, it was burned by the Saxons in 584 and is now in ruins

32

From far, from eve and morning
And yon twelve-winded sky,
The stuff of life to knit me
Blew hither; here am I

Now — for a breath I tarry
Nor yet disperse apart —
Take my hand quick and tell me,
What have you in your heart

Speak now, and I will answer,
How shall I help you, say;
Ere to the wind's twelve quarters
I take my endless way

33

If truth in hearts that perish
Could move the powers on high,
I think the love I bear you
Should make you not to die

Sure, sure, if steadfast meaning,
If single thought could save,
The world might end tomorrow,
You should not see the grave

This long and sure-set liking,
This boundless will to please,
— Oh, you should live forever
If there were help in these.

But now, since all is idle,
To this lost heart be kind,
Ere to a town you journey
Where friends are ill to find

34 THE NEW MISTRESS

"Oh, sick I am to see you, will you never let me be?"

You may be good for something, but you are not good for me.

Oh, go where you are wanted, for you are not wanted here.

And that was all the farewell when I parted
from my dear.

"I will go where I am wanted, to a lady born and bred,

Who will dress me free for nothing in a uniform of red;

She will not be sick to see me if I only keep it clean;

I will go where I am wanted for a soldier of the Queen.

"I will go where I am wanted, for the sergeant does not mind;

*Lyric 32 2 twelve-winded, having all the winds of
heaven*

He may be sick to see me, but he treats me very kind;
He gives me beer and breakfast and a ribbon
for my cap,
And I never knew a sweetheart spend her money on a chap.

"I will go where I am wanted, where there's room for one or two,
And the men are none too many for the work
there is to do;
Where the standing line wears thinner and the dropping dead lie thick;
And the enemies of England they shall see me and be sick "

35

On the idle hill of summer,
Sleepy with the flow of streams,
Far I hear the steady drummer
Drumming like a noise in dreams.

Far and near and low and louder
On the roads of earth go by,
Dear to friends and food for powder
Soldiers marching, all to die

East and west on fields forgotten
Bleach the bones of comrades slain,
Lovely lads and dead and rotten;
None that go return again

Far the calling bugles hollo,
High the screaming fife replies,
Gay the files of scarlet follow;
Woman bore me, I will rise.

36

White in the moon the long road lies,
The moon stands blank above;
White in the moon the long road lies
That leads me from my love.

Still hangs the hedge without a gust,
Still, still the shadows stay,
My feet upon the moonlit dust
Pursue the ceaseless way

The world is round, so travelers tell,
And straight though reach the track,
Trudge on, trudge on, 'twill all be well,
The way will guide one back.

But ere the circle homeward hies Far, far must it remove,
White in the moon the long road lies
That leads me from my love

37

As through the wild green hills of Wyre
 The train ran, changing sky and shire,
 And far behind, a fading crest,
 Low in the forsaken west
 Sank the high-reared head of Clee,
 My hand lay empty on my knee.
 Aching on my knee it lay;
 That morning half a shire away
 So many an honest fellow's fist
 Had wellnigh wrung it from the wrist.
 Hand, said I, since now we part
 From fields and men we know by heart,
 For strangers' faces, strangers' lands—
 Hand, you have held true fellows' hands.
 Be clean, then; rot before you do
 A thing they'd not believe of you.
 You and I must keep from shame
 In London streets the Shropshire name;
 On banks of Thames they must not say
 Severn breeds worse men than they;
 And friends abroad must bear in mind
 Friends at home they leave behind.
 Oh, I shall be stiff and cold
 When I forget you, hearts of gold,
 The land where I shall mind you not
 Is the land where all's forgot.
 And if my foot returns no more
 To Teme nor Corve nor Severn shore,
 Luck, my lads, be with you still
 By falling stream and standing hill,
 By chiming tower and whispering tree,
 Men that made a man of me.
 About your work in town and farm
 Still you'll keep my head from harm,
 Still you'll help me, hands that gave
 A grasp to friend me to the grave.

38

The winds out of the west land blow,
 My friends have breathed them there;
 Warm with the blood of lads I know
 Comes east the sighing air.
 It fanned their temples, filled their lungs,
 Scattered their forelocks free,
 My friends made words of it with tongues
 That talk no more to me.
 Their voices, dying as they fly,
 Loose on the wind are sown,
 The names of men blow soundless by,
 My fellows and my own.

Lyric 37 1 Wyre, a forest on the boundary between Shropshire and Worcestershire, near the Severn River
 5 Clee, Clee Hill, in Shropshire, about ten miles north-west of the forest of Wyre 28 Teme . . . Corve . . .
 Severn, rivers in southwestern Shropshire

Oh, lads, at home I heard you plain,
 But here your speech is still,
 And down the sighing wind in vain
 You hollo from the hill.

The wind and I, we both were there,
 But neither long abode;
 Now through the friendless world we fare
 And sigh upon the road.

39

'Tis time, I think, by Wenlock town
 The golden broom should blow,
 The hawthorn sprinkled up and down
 Should charge the land with snow.

Spring will not wait the loiterer's time
 Who keeps so long away,
 So others wear the broom and climb
 The hedgerows heaped with may.

Oh, tarnish late on Wenlock Edge,
 Gold that I never see;
 Lie long, high snowdrifts in the hedge
 That will not shower on me

40

Into my heart an air that kills
 From yon far country blows;
 What are those blue remembered hills,
 What spires, what farms are those?

That is the land of lost content,
 I see it shining plain,
 The happy highways where I went
 And cannot come again

41

In my own shire, if I was sad,
 Homely comforters I had:
 The earth, because my heart was sore,
 Sorrowed for the son she bore,
 And standing hills, long to remain,
 Shared their short-lived comrade's pain.
 And bound for the same bourn as I,
 On every road I wandered by,
 Trod beside me, close and dear,
 The beautiful and death-struck year:
 Whether in the woodland brown
 I heard the beechnut rustle down,
 And saw the purple crocus pale
 Flower about the autumn dale;
 Or littering far the fields of May
 Lady-smocks a-bleaching lay,
 And like a skylit water stood
 The bluebells in the azure wood

Lyric 39 1 Wenlock town Wenlock is a small town southeast of Shrewsbury 2 broom, a stiff shrub with yellow blossoms blow, bloom 8 may, hawthorn

Yonder, lightening other loads,
 The seasons range the country roads,
 But here in London streets I ken
 No such helpmates, only men;
 And these are not in plight to bear,
 If they would, another's care.
 They have enough as 'tis; I see
 In many an eye that measures me
 The mortal sickness of a mind
 Too unhappy to be kind.
 Undone with misery, all they can
 Is to hate their fellow man,
 And till they drop they needs must still
 Look at you and wish you ill.

42. THE MERRY GUIDE

Once in the wind of morning
 I ranged the thymy wold;
 The world-wide air was azure,
 And all the brooks ran gold.

There through the dews beside me,
 Behold a youth that trod,
 With feathered cap on forehead,
 And poised a golden rod.

With mien to match the morning
 And gay delightful guise
 And friendly brows and laughter,
 He looked me in the eyes.

Oh, whence, I asked, and whither?
 He smiled and would not say,
 And looked at me and beckoned,
 And laughed and led the way.

And with kind looks and laughter
 And naught to say beside,
 We two went on together,
 I and my happy guide.

Across the glittering pastures
 And empty upland still
 And solitude of shepherds
 High in the folded hill,

By hanging woods and hamlets
 That gaze through orchards down
 On many a windmill turning
 And far-discovered town,

With gay regards of promise
 And sure unslackened stride
 And smiles and nothing spoken,
 Led on my merry guide.

Lyric 42 The Merry Guide 2 wold, a low hill 6 youth, Mercury, the messenger of the gods, wearing a winged cap and sandals and bearing the caduceus, a staff twined with serpents (line 60), as the symbol of the office. 24. folded hill, a hill pastured with sheep

By blowing realms of woodland
 With sunstruck vanes afield
 And cloud-led shadows sailing
 About the windy weald,

By valley-guarded granges
 And silver waters wide,
 Content at heart I followed
 With my delightful guide.

And like the cloudy shadows
 Across the country blown,
 We two fare on forever,
 But not we two alone.

With the great gale we journey
 That breathes from gardens thinned,
 Borne in the drift of blossoms
 Whose petals throng the wind,

Buoyed on the heaven-heard whisper
 Of dancing leaflets whirled
 From all the woods that autumn
 Bereaves in all the world

And midst the fluttering legion
 Of all that ever died
 I follow, and before us
 Goes the delightful guide,

With lips that brim with laughter
 But never once respond,
 And feet that fly on feathers,
 And serpent-circled wand

43. THE IMMORTAL PART

When I meet the morning beam,
 Or lay me down at night to dream,
 I hear my bones within me say,
 "Another night, another day

"When shall this slough of sense be cast,
 This dust of thoughts be laid at last,
 The man of flesh and soul be slain
 And the man of bone remain?"

"This tongue that talks, these lungs that
 shout,
 These thews that hustle us about,
 This brain that fills the skull with schemes,
 And its humming hive of dreams —

"These today are proud in power
 And lord it in their little hour,
 The immortal bones obey control
 Of dying flesh and dying soul

36 weald, open country 37 granges, country houses with surrounding farm lands

"Tis long till eve and morn are gone,
Slow the endless night comes on,
And late to fullness grows the birth
That shall last as long as earth. 20

"Wanderers eastward, wanderers west,
Know you why you cannot rest?
'Tis that every mother's son
Travails with a skeleton.

"Lie down in the bed of dust 25
Bear the fruit that bear you must;
Bring the eternal seed to light,
And morn is all the same as night.

"Rest you so from trouble sore,
Fear the heat o' the sun no more,
Nor the snowing winter wild, 30
Now you labor not with child.

"Empty vessel, garment cast,
We that wore you long shall last
— Another night, another day." 35
So my bones within me say.

Therefore they shall do my will Today while I am master still,
And flesh and soul, now both are strong, 40
Shall hale the sullen slaves along,

Before this fire of sense decay,
This smoke of thought blow clean away,
And leave with ancient night alone
The steadfast and enduring bone.

44

Shot? so quick, so clean an ending?
Oh, that was right, lad, that was brave
Yours was not an ill for mending,
'Twas best to take it to the grave

Oh, you had forethought, you could reason, 5
And saw your road and where it led,
And early wise and brave in season
Put the pistol to your head.

Oh, soon, and better so than later
After long disgrace and scorn, 10
You shot dead the household traitor,
The soul that should not have been born

Right you guessed the rising morrow
And scorned to tread the mire you must,
Dust's your wages, son of sorrow, 15
But men may come to worse than dust

Souls undone, undoing others —
Long time since the tale began
You would not live to wrong your brothers;
Oh, lad, you died as fits a man 20

Now to your grave shall friend and stranger
With ruth and some with envy come,
Undishonored, clear of danger,
Clean of guilt, pass hence and home.

Turn safe to rest, no dreams, no waking, 25
And here, man, here's the wreath I've made
'Tis not a gift that's worth the taking,
But wear it and it will not fade.

45

If it chance your eye offend you,
Pluck it out, lad, and be sound;
'Twill hurt, but here are salves to friend you,
And many a balsam grows on ground

And if your hand or foot offend you, 5
Cut it off, lad, and be whole;
But play the man, stand up and end you,
When your sickness is your soul

46

Bring, in this timeless grave to throw,
No cypress, somber on the snow;
Snap not from the bitter yew
His leaves that live December through,
Break no rosemary, bright with rume 5
And sparkling to the cruel clime;
Nor plod the winter land to look
For willows in the icy brook
To cast them leafless round him, bring
No spray that ever buds in spring 10

But if the Christmas field has kept
Awns the last gleaner overstept,
Or shriveled flax, whose flower is blue
A single season, never two,
Or if one haulm whose year is o'er 15
Shivers on the upland frore
— Oh, bring from hill and stream and plain
Whatever will not flower again,
To give him comfort. He and those Shall bide eternal bedfellows 20
Where low upon the couch he lies
Whence he never shall arise.

47 THE CARPENTER'S SON

"Here the hangman stops his cart;
Now the best of friends must part
Fare you well, for ill fare I,
Live, lads, and I will die

Lyric 45 1-2 eye . . . sound From Mark, 9 47 — "If thine eye offend thee, pluck it out, it is better for thee to enter into the kingdom of God with one eye, than having two eyes to be cast into hell fire" 5-6 hand . off From Mark, 9 43-45 — "If thy hand offend thee, cut it off . . . And if thy foot offend thee cut it off . . ."

Lyric 46 2-8 cypress . yew rosemary willows, symbols of sorrow and mourning 12 Awns, beards of wheat or rye 15 haulm, straw 16 frore, frozen

"Oh, at home had I but stayed
'Prenticed to my father's trade,
Had I stuck to plane and adze,
I had not been lost, my lads.

"Then I might have built perhaps Gallows-trees for other chaps,
Never dangled on my own,
Had I but left ill alone.

"Now, you see, they hang me high,
And the people passing by
Stop to shake their fists and curse,
So 'tis come from ill to worse

"Here hang I, and right and left
Two poor fellows hang for theft,
All the same's the luck we prove,
Though the midmost hangs for love

"Comrades all, that stand and gaze,
Walk henceforth in other ways —
See my neck and save your own;
Comrades all, leave ill alone.

"Make some day a 'decent end,
Shrewder fellows than your friend.
Fare you well, for ill fare I;
Live, lads, and I will die."

48

Be still, my soul, be still, the arms you bear
are brittle,
Earth and high heaven are fixed of old and founded strong
Think rather — call to thought, if now you grieve a little,
The days when we had rest, O soul, for they were long

Men loved unkindness then, but lightless in the quarry
I slept and saw not, tears fell down, I did not mourn;
Sweat ran and blood sprang out and I was never sorry.
Then it was well with me, in days ere I was born.

Now, and I muse for why and never find the reason,
I pace the earth, and drink the air, and feel
the sun
Be still, be still, my soul; it is but for a season;
Let us endure an hour and see injustice
done.

Aye, look — high heaven and earth ail from the prime foundation;
All thoughts to rive the heart are here, and
all are vain:

Horror and scorn and hate and fear and indignation —
Oh, why did I awake? when shall I sleep
again?

49

Think no more, lad; laugh, be jolly.
Why should men make haste to die?
Empty heads and tongues a-talking
Make the rough road easy walking,
And the feather pate of folly
Bears the falling sky.

Oh, 'tis jesting, dancing, drinking
Spins the heavy world around.
If young hearts were not so clever,
Oh, they would be young forever
Think no more; 'tis only thinking
Lays lads underground.

50

*Clunton and Clunbury, Clungunford and Clun,
Are the quietest places
Under the sun.*

In valleys of springs of rivers,
By Ony and Teme and Clun,
The country for easy livers,
The quietest under the sun,

We still had sorrows to lighten,
One could not be always glad,
And lads knew trouble at Knighton
When I was a Knighton lad

By bridges that Thames runs under,
In London, the town built ill,
'Tis sure small matter for wonder
If sorrow is with one still.

And if as a lad grows older
The troubles he bears are more,
He carries his griefs on a shoulder
That handseled them long before.

Where shall one halt to deliver
This luggage I'd lief set down?
Not Thames, not Teme is the river,
Nor London nor Knighton the town,

Lyric 50 Clunton . . Clun, villages in southwestern handseled, experienced for the first time

'Tis a long way further than Knighton,
A quieter place than Clun,
Where doomsday may thunder and lighten
And little 'twill matter to one.

51

Loitering with a vacant eye
Along the Grecian gallery,
And brooding on my heavy ill,
I met a statue standing still.
Still in marble stone stood he, 5
And steadfastly he looked at me.
"Well met," I thought the look would say,
"We both were fashioned far away,
We neither knew, when we were young,
These Londoners we live among," 10

Still he stood and eyed me hard,
An earnest and a grave regard:
"What, lad, drooping with your lot?
I, too, would be where I am not 15
I, too, survey that endless line
Of men whose thoughts are not as mine.
Years, ere you stood up from rest,
On my neck the collar prest;
Years, when you lay down your ill,
I shall stand and bear it still. 20
Courage, lad, 'tis not for long;
Stand, quit you like stone, be strong."
So I thought his look would say;
And light on me my trouble lay,
And I slept out in flesh and bone 25
Manful like the man of stone.

52

Far in a western brookland
That bred me long ago
The poplars stand and tremble
By pools I used to know.

There, in the windless night-time,
The wanderer, marveling why,
Halts on the bridge to hearken
How soft the poplars sigh.

He hears, no more remembered
In fields where I was known,
Here I lie down in London
And turn to rest alone.

There, by the starlit fences,
The wanderer halts and hears 15
My soul that lingers sighing
About the glimmering weirs.

53. THE TRUE LOVER

The lad came to the door at night,
When lovers crown their vows,
And whistled soft and out of sight
In shadow of the boughs

"I shall not vex you with my face 5
Henceforth, my love, for aye,
So take me in your arms a space
Before the east is gray.

"When I from hence away am past 10
I shall not find a bride,
And you shall be the first and last
I ever lay beside "

She heard and went and knew not why;
Her heart to his she laid,
Light was the air beneath the sky 15
But dark under the shade

"Oh, do you breathe, lad, that your breast 20
Seems not to rise and fall,
And here upon my bosom prest
There beats no heart at all?" 25

"Oh, loud, my girl, it once would knock —
You should have felt it then,
But since for you I stopped the clock
It never goes again "

"Oh, lad, what is it, lad, that drips 25
Wet from your neck on mine?
What is it falling on my lips,
My lad, that tastes of brine?"

"Oh, like enough 'tis blood, my dear, 30
For when the knife has slit
The throat across from ear to ear
'Twill bleed because of it."

Under the stars the air was light 5
But dark below the boughs,
The still air of the speechless night, 35
When lovers crown their vows.

54

With rue my heart is laden
For golden friends I had, 10
For many a rose-lipt maiden
And many a lightfoot lad.

By brooks too broad for leaping 5
The lightfoot boys are laid;
The rose-lipt girls are sleeping
In fields where roses fade

55

Westward on the high-hilled plains
Where for me the world began,

Lyric 51. 2 Grecian gallery, in the British Museum,
London

Lyric 52 16 weirs, pools of water above a dam

Still, I think, in newer veins
Frets the changeless blood of man

Now that other lads than I
Strip to bathe on Severn shore,
They, no help, for all they try,
Tread the mill I trod before

There, when hueless is the west
And the darkness hushes wide,
Where the lad lies down to rest
Stands the troubled dream beside.

There, on thoughts that once were mine,
Day looks down the eastern steep,
And the youth at morning shine
Makes the vow he will not keep.

56. THE DAY OF BATTLE

"Far I hear the bugle blow
To call me where I would not go,
And the guns begin the song,
'Soldier, fly or stay for long.'

"Comrade, if to turn and fly
Made a soldier never die,
Fly I would, for who would not?
'Tis sure no pleasure to be shot.

"But since the man that runs away
Lives to die another day,
And cowards' funerals, when they come,
Are not wept so well at home,

"Therefore, though the best is bad,
Stand and do the best, my lad,
Stand and fight and see your slain,
And take the bullet in your brain."

57

You smile upon your friend today,
Today his ills are over;
You hearken to the lover's say,
And happy is the lover.

'Tis late to hearken, late to smile,
But better late than never;
I shall have lived a little while Before I die forever.

58

When I came last to Ludlow
Amidst the moonlight pale,
Two friends kept step beside me,
Two honest lads and hale.

Lyric 56 The Day of Battle 9-10 man day, an ancient proverb of which Menander, Tertullian, Erasmus, Butler (Hudibras, 3 243), and Goldsmith (Art of Poetry on a New Plan) have given versions

Now Dick lies long in the churchyard,
And Ned lies long in jail,
And I come home to Ludlow
Amidst the moonlight pale.

59. THE ISLE OF PORTLAND

The star-filled seas are smooth tonight
From France to England strown;
Black towers above the Portland light
The felon-quarried stone

On yonder island, not to rise,
Never to stir forth free,
Far from his folk a dead lad lies
That once was friends with me.

Lie you easy, dream you light,
And sleep you fast for aye,
And luckier may you find the night
Than ever you found the day.

60

Now hollow fires burn out to black,
And lights are guttering low;
Square your shoulders, lift your pack,
And leave your friends and go

Oh, never fear, man, naught's to dread,
Look not left nor right;
In all the endless road you tread
There's nothing but the night.

61. HUGHLEY STEEPLE

The vane on Hughley steeple
Veers bright, a far-known sign,
And there lie Hughley people,
And there lie friends of mine.
Tall in their midst the tower
Divides the shade and sun,
And the clock strikes the hour
And tells the time to none

To south the headstones cluster,
The sunny mounds lie thick,
The dead are more in muster
At Hughley than the quick.
North, for a soon-told number,
Chill graves the sexton delves,
And steeple-shadowed slumber
The slayers of themselves.

To north, to south, he parted,
With Hughley tower above,

Lyric 61 Hughley Steeple Hughley is a village near Shrewsbury.

The kind, the single-hearted,
 The lads I used to love. 20
 And, south or north, 'tis only
 A choice of friends one knows,
 And I shall ne'er be lonely
 Asleep with these or those.

(52)

"Terence, this is stupid stuff:
 You eat your victuals fast enough;
 There can't be much amiss, 'tis clear,
 To see the rate you drink your beer.
 But, oh, good Lord, the verse you make, 5
 It gives a chap the bellyache
 The cow, the old cow, she is dead,
 It sleeps well, the horned head.
 We poor lads, 'tis our turn now
 To hear such tunes as killed the cow. 10
 Pretty friendship 'tis to rime
 Your friends to death before their time
 Moping melancholy mad.
 Come, pipe a tune to dance to, lad."

Why, if 'tis dancing you would be, 15
 There's brisker pipes than poetry.
 Say, for what were hop-yards meant,
 Or why was Burton built on Trent?
 Oh, many a peer of England brews
 Livelier liquor than the Muse, 20
 And malt does more than Milton can
 To justify God's ways to man
 Ale, man, ale's the stuff to drink
 For fellows whom it hurts to think;
 Look into the pewter pot 25
 To see the world as the world's not
 And faith, 'tis pleasant till 'tis past,
 The mischief is that 'twill not last.
 Oh, I have been to Ludlow fair
 And left my necktie God knows where, 30
 And carried half way home, or near,
 Pints and quarts of Ludlow beer.
 Then the world seemed none so bad,
 And I myself a sterling lad;
 And down in lovely muck I've lain, 35
 Happy till I woke again
 Then I saw the morning sky —
 Heigho, the tale was all a lie;
 The world, it was the old world yet,
 I was I, my things were wet, 40
 And nothing now remained to do
 But begin the game anew.

Therefore, since the world has still Much good, but much less good than ill,

And while the sun and moon endure 45
 Luck's a chance, but trouble's sure,
 I'd face it as a wise man would,
 And train for ill and not for good.
 'Tis true, the stuff I bring for sale
 Is not so brisk a brew as ale; 50
 Out of a stem that scored the hand
 I wrung it in a weary land
 But take it — if the smack is sour,
 The better for the embittered hour;
 It should do good to heart and head 55
 When your soul is in my soul's stead;
 And I will friend you, if I may,
 In the dark and cloudy day.

There was a king reigned in the East;
 There, when kings will sit to feast, 60
 They get their fill before they think
 With poisoned meat and poisoned drink.
 He gathered all that springs to birth
 From the many-venomed earth;
 First a little, thence to more, 65
 He sampled all her killing store;
 And easy, smiling, seasoned sound,
 Sate the king when healths went round.
 They put arsenic in his meat
 And stared aghast to watch him eat; 70
 They poured strychnine in his cup
 And shook to see him drink it up
 They shook, they stared as white's their shirt,
 Them it was their poison hurt
 — I tell the tale that I heard told. 75
 Mithridates, he died old.

63

I hoed and trenched and weeded,
 And took the flowers to fair
 I brought them home unheeded;
 The hue was not the wear.

So up and down I sow them 5
 For lads like me to find,
 When I shall lie below them,
 A dead man out of mind.

Some seed the birds devour,
 And some the season mars, 10
 But here and there will flower
 The solitary stars,

And fields will yearly bear them
 As light-leaved spring comes on,
 And luckless lads will wear them 15
 When I am dead and gone. (1896)

Lyric 62 18 Burton . Trent In the sixteen breweries of Burton-upon-Trent, a city in Derbyshire, three million barrels of beer are annually produced. More than one peer of England owes his nobility to a fortune made in brewing. 22 justify man, given by Milton as his purpose in writing Paradise Lost (Book I, line 26)

51 stem . . hand. Experience is a raw material more painful to handle than the grain from which ale is brewed. 59 a king, etc. Realizing that his enemies were conspiring to poison him, Mithridates VI, king of Pontus (120-63 B.C.), inured himself to poison by taking it in gradually increased doses until it no longer had any effect upon him, so, at least, Pliny affirms in his Natural History, 25.2

GEORGE WILLIAM RUSSELL*
 ("A. E.") (1867-)

BY THE MARGIN OF THE GREAT DEEP

When the breath of twilight blows to flame
 the misty skies,
 All its vaporous sapphire, violet glow and silver gleam
 With their magic flood me through the gateway of the eyes;
 I am one with the twilight's dream.

When the trees and skies and fields are one in dusky mood, 5
 Every heart of man is rapt within the mother's
 breast,
 Full of peace and sleep and dreams in the
 vasty quietude,
 I am one with their hearts at rest.

From our immemorial joys of hearth and home and love
 Strayed away along the margin of the unknown tide, 10
 All its reach of soundless calm can thrill me far above
 Word or touch from the lips beside

Aye, and deep and deep and deeper let me drink and draw
 From the olden fountain more than light or peace or dream,
 Such primeval being as o'erfills the heart with awe, 15
 Growing one with its silent stream (1894)

THE HERMIT

Now the quietude of earth
 Nestles deep my heart within;
 Friendships new and strange have birth
 Since I left the city's din.

Here the tempest stays its guile, 5
 Like a big kind brother plays,
 Romps and pauses here awhile
 From its immemorial ways.

Now the silver light of dawn
 Slipping through the leaves that fleck 10
 My one window, hurries on,
 Throws its arms around my neck.

Darkness to my doorway hies,
 Lays her chin upon the roof,
 And her burning seraph eyes 15
 Now no longer keep aloof.

And the ancient mystery
 Holds its hands out day by day,
 Takes a chair and croons with me
 By my cabin built of clay. 20

When the dusky shadow flits,
 By the chimney nook I see
 Where the old enchanter sits,
 Smiles and waves and beckons me. (1894)

OVERSOUL

I am Beauty itself among beautiful things.
 — Bhagavad-Gita.

The East was crowned with snow-cold bloom
 And hung with veils of pearly fleece;
 They died away into the gloom,
 Vistas of peace — and deeper peace.

And earth and air and wave and fire 5
 In awe and breathless silence stood;
 For One who passed into their choir
 Linked them in mystic brotherhood.

Twilight of amethyst, amid
 Thy few strange stars that lit the heights, 10
 Where was the secret spirit hid?
 Where was Thy place, O Light of Lights?

The flame of Beauty far in space —
 Where rose the fire in Thee? in Me?
 Which bowed the elemental race 15
 To adoration silently? (1894)

INHERITANCE

As flow the rivers to the sea
 Adown from rocky hill or plain,
 A thousand ages toiled for thee

15 seraph A seraph is one of an order of heavenly beings regarded as fiery and purifying ministers of Jehovah
Oversoul The oversoul is the divine personality, perfect Goodness, Truth, and Beauty According to the pan-theistic or transcendental philosophy, the oversoul is the whole of which individual souls are parts, hence all created things partake of the divine nature A man may therefore come to understand from observation of his own mind and of external nature something of what constitutes perfect Beauty and perfect Truth, since God is in the dawn and twilight as well as in the mind of man This conception is to be found in Platonic and in Oriental philosophy, as well as in the poetry of Wordsworth, Shelley, and Emerson Cf Unity and Reconciliation, pages 923, 924, and Browning's
"Transcendentalism," page 255 See also Emerson's essay

5 earth . . . fire, the four elements of which the universe is composed 7 One, the divine spirit which makes harmony out of naturally discordant elements

And gave thee harvest of their gain,
And weary myriads of yore
Dug out for thee earth's buried ore.

The shadowy toilers for thee fought
In chaos of primeval day
Blind battles with they knew not what,
And each before he passed away
Gave clear articulate cries of woe —
Your pain is theirs of long ago.

And all the old heart sweetness sung,
The joyous life of man and maid
In forests when the earth was young,
In rumors round your childhood strayed,
The careless sweetness of your mind
Comes from the buried years behind.

And not alone unto your birth
Their gifts the weeping ages bore,
The old descents of God on earth
Have dowered thee with celestial lore;
So, wise, and filled with sad and gay
You pass into the further day.

(1894)

UNITY

One thing in all things have I seen;
One thought has haunted earth and air;
Clangor and silence both have been
Its palace chambers. Everywhere

I saw the mystic vision flow
And live in men and woods and streams,
Until I could no longer know
The dream of life from my own dreams.

Sometimes it rose like fire in me
Within the depths of my own mind,
And spreading to infinity,
It took the voices of the wind;

It scrawled the human mystery —
Dim heraldry — on light and air;
Wavering along the starry sea
I saw the flying vision there

Each fire that in God's temple lit
Burns fierce before the inner shrine,
Dimmed as my fire grew near to it
And darkened at the light of mine.

At last, at last, the meaning caught —
The Spirit wears its diadem;
It shakes its wondrous plumes of thought
And trails the stars along with them

(1894)

THE MEMORY OF EARTH

In the wet dusk silver-sweet,
Down the violet-scented ways,
As I moved with quiet feet
I was met by mighty days.

On the hedge the hanging dew
Glassed the eve and stars and skies;
While I gazed a madness grew
Into thundered battle cries.

Where the hawthorn glimmered white,
Flashed the spear and fell the stroke —
Ah, what faces pale and bright
Where the dazzling battle broke!

There a hero-hearted queen
With young beauty lit the van;
Gone! the darkness flowed between
All the ancient wars of man.

While I paced the valley's gloom
Where the rabbits pattered near,
Shone a temple and a tomb
With a legend carven clear:

*"Time put by a myriad fates
That her day might dawn in glory;
Death made wide a million gates
So to close her tragic story."*

(1897)

PARTING

As from our dream we died away
Far off I felt the outer things;
Your wind-blown tresses round me play,
Your bosom's gentle murmurings.

And far away our faces met
As on the verge of the vast spheres,
And in the night our cheeks were wet,
I could not say with dew or tears.

O gate by which I entered in!
O face and hair! O lips and eyes!
Through you again the world I win,
How far away from Paradise!

(1897)

CONTINUITY

No sign is made while empires pass.
The flowers and stars are still His care,
The constellations hid in grass,
The golden miracles in air.

Life in an instant will be rent
Where death is glittering blind and wild —
The Heavenly Brooding is intent
To that last instant on Its child.

5

It breathes the glow in brain and heart,
Life is made magical. Until 10
Body and spirit are apart
The Everlasting works Its will.

In that wild orchid that your feet
In their next falling shall destroy,
Minute and passionate and sweet 15
The Mighty Master holds His joy.

Though the crushed jewels droop and fade
The Artist's labors will not cease,
And of the ruins shall be made
Some yet more lovely masterpiece. (1897)

RECONCILIATION

I begin through the grass once again to be bound to the Lord,
I can see, through a face that has faded, the face full of rest
Of the earth, of the mother, my heart with her heart in accord,
As I lie 'mid the cool green tresses that mantle her breast.
I begin with the grass once again to be bound to the Lord. 5

By the hand of a child I am led to the throne
of the King,
For a touch that now fevers me not is forgotten and far,
And His infinite sceptered hands that sway us can bring Me in dreams from the laugh of a child to the song of a star.
On the laugh of a child I am borne to the joy
of the King. (1904)

DRAKE'S DRUM

Drake's Drum "A State drum, painted with the arms of Sir Francis Drake, is preserved among other relics at Buckland Abbey, the seat of the Drake family in Devon" (Newbolt's note). Sir Francis Drake (c. 1545-1596) was born near Tavistock in Devonshire, he made several daring voyages into the new world, sailed around the globe, and was second in command of the English fleet that defeated the Spanish Armada in 1588. The legend here related corresponds to those told of King Arthur, Frederick Barbarossa, and other national heroes, each, it is said, will return to aid his country in the hour of peril. The poem is written in Devonshire dialect. 1-3 hammock . . . round shot A sailor who dies at sea is tied in his hammock with shot at his head and feet and so buried. Drake was buried in Nombro Dios Bay, in the West Indies, but according to the record a lead coffin was used.

An' dreamin' arl the time o' Plymouth Hoe

Wi' sailor lads a-dancin' heel-an'-toe,
An' the shore-lights flashin', an' the night-
tide dashin',

Drake he was a Devon man, an' ruled the Devon seas

(Capten, art tha sleepin' there below?), 10
Rovin' tho' his death fell, he went wi' heart
at ease,

An' dreamin' arl the time o' Plymouth Hoe
"Take my drum to England, hang et by the Strike et when your powder's runnin' low,

If the Dons sight Devon, I'll quit the port o'
Heaven, 15

An' drum them up the Channel as we drummed them long ago "

(Capten, art tha sleepin' there below?),
Slung atween the round shot, listenin' for the

An' dreamin' arl the time o' Plymouth Hoe

Call him when ye sail to meet the foe,
Where the old trade's plyin' an' the old flag

they found him long ago¹

VITAI LAMPADA

There's a breathless hush in the Close to-
night —

Ten to make and the match to win —
A bumping pitch and a blinding light,
An hour to play and the last man in
And it's not for the sake of a ribboned coat,
Or the selfish hope of a season's fame, 6

⁴ Plymouth Hoe, the elevation above the harbor of Plymouth, principal seaport on the east coast of Devon, here Drake was playing at bowls when word was brought to him that the Armada had been sighted ⁵ the Island, a small island off Plymouth, known today as Drake's Island ¹⁵ Dons, Spaniards ¹⁷ Armadas, the war-fleets of alien nations bent on invading England ²³ old trade, fighting England's enemies

Vitai Lampada The title means The Torch of Life, it is taken from Lucretius, De Rerum Natura, 2.77 — "Some nations increase, others diminish, and in a short time the generations of living creatures are changed and like runners [in a relay race] pass on the torch of life "

¹ Close, the athletic field of Clifton College near Bristol, where Newbolt was educated ³ bumping pitch, uneven ground between the wickets in the game of cricket

But his Captain's hand on his shoulder smote —

"Play up! play up! and play the game!"

The sand of the desert is sodden red — 9
Red with the wreck of a square that broke,
The Gatling's jammed and the Colonel dead,
And the regiment blind with dust and smoke

The river of death has brimmed his banks,
And England's far, and Honor a name, 14
But the voice of a schoolboy rallies the ranks.
"Play up! play up! and play the game!"

This is the word that year by year,
While in her place the School is set,
Every one of her sons must hear,
And none that hears it dare forget. 20
This they all with a joyful mind
Bear through life like a torch in flame,
And falling fling to the host behind —
"Play up! play up! and play the game!"
(1897)

HE FELL AMONG THIEVES

"Ye have robbed," said he, "ye have slaughtered and made an end,
Take your ill-got plunder, and bury the
dead

What will ye more of your guest and sometime friend?"

"Blood for our blood," they said.

He laughed. "If one may settle the score for five, 5

I am ready, but let the reckoning stand till day —

I have loved the sunlight as dearly as any alive."

"You shall die at dawn," said they.

He flung his empty revolver down the slope,
He climbed alone to the eastward edge of the trees; 10

All night long in a dream untroubled of hope
He brooded, clasping his knees.

He did not hear the monotonous roar that fills

The ravine where the Yassin River sullenly flows,

He Fell among Thieves See the parable of the Good Samaritan, Luke, 10-30-37 — "A certain man went down from Jerusalem to Jericho, and fell among thieves, which stripped him of his raiment, and wounded him." The thieves in this ballad are the savage tribesmen of the Gilgit district on the Kashmir borderland in northern India, until recent years but few Europeans have safely entered this rugged and inhospitable country

14 Yassin River, a principal river in the Gilgit district

He did not see the starlight on the Laspur hills, 15

Or the far Afghan snows.

He saw the April noon on his books aglow,
The wistaria trailing in at the window wide,
He heard his father's voice from the terrace
below

Calling him down to ride. 20

He saw the gray little church across the park,
The mounds that hid the loved and honored
dead;

The Norman arch, the chancel softly dark,
The brasses black and red

He saw the school close, sunny and green, 25
The runner beside him, the stand by the parapet wall,
The distant tape, and the crowd roaring
between,
His own name over all.

He saw the dark wainscot and timbered roof,
The long tables, and the faces merry and keen, 30

The college eight and their trainer dining aloof,
The dons on the dais serene

He watched the liner's stem plowing the foam,
He felt her trembling speed and the thrash
of her screw;

He heard the passengers' voices talking of
home, 35
He saw the flag she flew.

And now it was dawn He rose strong on his
feet,

And strode to his ruined camp below the woods.

He drank the breath of the morning cool and
sweet;

His murderers round him stood 40

Light on the Laspur hills was broadening fast,
The blood-red snow-peaks chilled to a dazzling white,

He turned and saw the golden circle at last,
Cut by the eastern height

"O glorious Life, Who dwellest in earth and
sun, 45
I have lived, I praise and adore thee." A sword swept.

Over the pass the voices one by one
Faded, and the hill slept. (1897)

CLIFTON CHAPEL

This is the Chapel here, my son,
Your father thought the thoughts of youth,
And heard the words that one by one
The touch of Life has turned to truth
Here in a day that is not far, 5
You too may speak with noble ghosts
Of manhood and the vows of war
You made before the Lord of Hosts.

To set the Cause above renown,
To love the game beyond the prize, 10
To honor, while you strike him down,
The foe that comes with fearless eyes,
To count the life of battle good,
And dear the land that gave you birth,
And dearer yet the brotherhood 15
That binds the brave of all the earth —

My son, the oath is yours; the end
Is His who built the world of strife,
Who gave His children Pain for friend,
And Death for surest hope of life. 20
Today and here the fight's begun,
Of the great fellowship you're free,
Henceforth the School and you are one,
And what You are, the race shall be

God send you fortune, yet be sure, 25
Among the lights that gleam and pass,
You'll live to follow none more pure
Than that which glows on yonder brass.
"Oui procul hinc," the legend's writ —
The frontier-grave is far away — 30
"Oui ante diem perit."

THE VIGIL

England! where the sacred flame
Burns before the inmost shrine,
Where lips that love thy name
Consecrate their hopes and thine,
Where the banners of thy dead 5
Weave their shadows overhead,
Watch beside thine arms tonight,
Pray that God defend the Right.

Clifton Chapel, the chapel of Clifton College, a "public" (preparatory) school with about 650 students near Bristol, Gloucestershire, England, the school, founded in 1862, is noteworthy for having graduated the late Earl Haig and a number of other high officers of the British army. "Thirty-five Old Cliftonian officers served in the campaign of 1897 on the Indian Frontier, of whom twenty-two were mentioned in dispatches, and six recommended for the Distinguished Service Order. Of the three hundred Cliftonians who served in the war in South Africa, thirty were killed in action and fourteen died of wounds or fever" (Newbolt's note).

29-32 Oui . . . hinc . . . Oui . . . patria "He is far from hence, who perished before his day, but he was a soldier, he died for his country." The inscription as Newbolt gives it is a kind of epitome of two or three brasses in the chapel which express something of the same sort
The Vigil Cf Kipling's Recessional, page 893

Think that when tomorrow comes
War shall claim command of all, 10
Thou must hear the roll of drums,
Thou must hear the trumpet's call.
Now before they silence ruth,
Commune with the voice of truth;
England! on thy knees tonight 15
Pray that God defend the Right.

Hast thou counted up the cost,
What to foeman, what to friend?
Glory sought is Honor lost,
How should this be knighthood's end? 20
Know'st thou what is Hatred's need?
What the surest gain of Greed?
England! wilt thou dare tonight
Pray that God defend the Right?

Single-hearted, unafraid, 25
Hither all thy heroes came,
On this altar's steps were laid Gordon's life and Outram's fame.
England! If thou wilt be yet
By their great example set, 30
Here beside thine arms tonight
Pray that God defend the Right.

So shalt thou when morning comes Rise to conquer or to fall,
Joyful hear the rolling drums, 35
Joyful hear the trumpet's call.
Then let Memory tell thy heart,
"England! what thou wert, thou art!"
Gird thee with thine ancient might,
Forth! and God defend the Right! 40

COMMEMORATION

I sat by the granite pillar, and sunlight fell
Where the sunlight fell of old,
And the hour was the hour my heart remembered well,
And the sermon rolled and rolled
As it used to roll when the place was still unhaunted, 5
And the strangest tale in the world was still untold.

And I knew that of all this rushing of urgent
sound
That I so clearly heard,
The green young forest of saplings clustered
round
Was heeding not one word; 10

28 Gordon General Charles Gordon was killed at Khartum, 1885, in warfare with the Soudanese, see Kipling's "Fuzzy-Wuzzy," page 881. Outram General James Outram, called "the Bayard of India," performed brilliant exploits in Persia and in India during the Sepoy Rebellion, 1857, shattered in health, he returned to England and died in 1863

Their heads were bowed in a still serried
patience
Such as an angel's breath could never have stirred

For some were already away to the hazardous pitch,
Or lining the parapet wall,
And some were in glorious battle, or great and rich, 15
Or throned in a college hall;
And among the rest was one like my own
young phantom,
Dreaming forever beyond my utmost call.

"O Youth," the preacher was crying, "deem not thou
Thy life is thine alone; 20
Thou bearest the will of the ages, seeing how
They built thee bone by bone,
And within thy blood the Great Age sleeps sepulchered
Till thou and thine shall roll away the stone

"Therefore the days are coming when thou shalt burn 25
With passion whitely hot;
Rest shall be rest no more, thy feet shall spurn
All that thy hand hath got;
And One that is stronger shall gird thee, and lead thee swiftly
Whither, O heart of Youth, thou wouldest
not " 30

And the School passed; and I saw the living
and dead
Set in their seats again,
And I longed to hear them speak of the word
that was said,
But I knew that I longed in vain
And they stretched forth their hands, and the wind of the spirit took them 35
Lightly as drifted leaves on an endless plain

THE ADVENTURERS

Over the downs in sunlight clear
Forth we went in the spring of the year;
Plunder of April's gold we sought,
Little of April's anger thought.

Caught in a copse without defense, 5
Low we crouched to the rain-squall dense;
Sure, if misery man can vex,
There it beat on our bended necks

The Adventurers 1. downs, tracts of open upland

Yet when again we wander on Suddenly all that gloom is gone; 10
Under and over through the wood,
Life is astir, and life is good.

Violets purple, violets white,
Delicate windflowers dancing light,
Primrose, mercury, moscatel, 15
Shimmer in diamonds round the dell.

Squirrel is clumping swift and lithe,
Chuff-chaff whetting his airy scythe,
Woodpecker whurrs his rattling rap,
Ringdove flies with a sudden clap 20

Rook is summoning rook to build,
Dunnock his beak with moss has filled,
Robin is bowing in coat-tails brown,
Tomtit chattering upside down

Well is it seen that everyone 25
Laughs at the rain and loves the sun;
We too laughed with the wildwood crew,
Laughed till the sky once more was blue

Homeward over the downs we went
Soaked to the heart with sweet content, 30
April's anger is swift to fall,
April's wonder is worth it all (1909)

FOR A. W. BLOMFIELD

She sought the Studios, beckoning to her side
An arch-designer, for she planned to build.
He was of wise contrivance, deeply skilled
In every intervolve of high and wide —
Well fit to be her guide. 5

"Whatever it be,"
Responded he,
With cold, clear voice, and cold, clear view,
"In true accord with prudent fashionings
For such vicissitudes as living brings, 10
And thwarting not the law of stable things,
That will I do."

"Shape me," she said, "high halls with tracery

"O maid misled!" 30

He sternly said

Whose facile foresight pierced her dire,
"Where shall abide the soul when, sick of glee,
It shrinks, and hides, and prays no eye may
see?
Those house them best who house for secrecy,
For you will tire." 36

"A little chamber, then, with swan and dove Ranged thickly, and engrailed with rare device

Of reds and purples, for a Paradise
Wherein my Love greets me, I my Love, 40
When he shall know thereof?"

"This, too, is ill,"

He answered still,

The man who swayed her like a shade.
"An hour will come when sight of such sweet nook 45
Would bring a bitterness too sharp to brook,
When brighter eyes have won away his look,
For you will fade."

Then said she faintly: "Oh, contrive some
way —

Some narrow winding turret, quite mine
own, 50

To reach a loft where I may grieve alone!
It is a slight thing; hence do not, I pray,
This last dear fancy slay!"

"Such winding ways

Fit not your days," 55

"WHEN I SET OUT FOR LYONNESSE"

When I set out for Lyonesse,
A hundred miles away,
The rime was on the spray,
And starlight lit my lonesomeness
When I set out for Lyonesse 5
A hundred miles away.

What would bechance at Lyonesse
While I should sojourn there
No prophet durst declare,
Nor did the wisest wizard guess 10
What would bechance at Lyonesse
While I should sojourn there.

When I came back from Lyonesse
With magic in my eyes,
All marked with mute surmise 15
My radiance rare and fathomless,
When I came back from Lyonesse
With magic in my eyes!

SHELLEY'S SKYLARK

(The neighbourhood of Leghorn· March, 1887)

Somewhere afield here something lies
In Earth's oblivious eyeless trust
That moved a poet to prophecies —
A pinch of unseen, unguarded dust;

The dust of the lark that Shelley heard, 5
And made immortal through times to be —
Though it only lived like another bird,
And knew not its immortality;

Lived its meek life, then, one day, fell —
A little ball of feather and bone, 10

Shelley's ode To a Skylark was written in Leghorn, on the northwest coast of Italy, in 1820

3 prophecies The last stanza of To a Skylark is "Teach me half the gladness

That thy brain must know,
Such harmonious madness
From my lips would flow

The world should listen then—as I am listening now "

And how it perished, when piped farewell,
And where it wastes, are alike unknown.

Maybe it rests in the loam I view,
Maybe it throbs in a myrtle's green,
Maybe it sleeps in the coming hue 15
Of a grape on the slopes of yon inland scene.

Go find it, faeries, go and find
That tiny pinch of priceless dust,
And bring a casket silver-lined,
And framed of gold that gems encrust; 20

And we will lay it safe therein,
And consecrate it to endless time;
For it inspired a bard to win
Ecstatic heights in thought and rime.

A BEAUTY'S SOLILOQUY DURING HER HONEYMOON

Too late, too late! I did not know my fairness
Would catch the world's keen eyes so!
How the men look at me! My radiant rareness
I deemed not they would prize so!

That I was a peach for any man's possession s
Why did not some one say
Before I leased myself in an hour's obsession
To this dull mate for aye!

His days are mine. I am one who cannot steal her
Ahead of his plodding pace — 10
As he is, so am I One doomed to feel her
A wasted form and face!

I was so blind! It did sometimes just strike
me
All girls were not as I,
But, dwelling much alone, how few were like
me 15
I could not well descry;

Till, at this Grand Hotel, all looks bend on me
In homage as I pass
To take my seat at breakfast, dinner — con
me
As poorly spoused, alas! 20

I was too young. I dwelt too much on duty;
If I had guessed my powers
Where might have sailed this cargo of choice
beauty
In its unanchored hours!

Well, husband, poor plain man; I've lost life's battle! — 25

Come — let them look at me.
O damn, don't show in your looks that I'm your chattel
Quite so emphatically!

HER DEATH AND AFTER

The summons was urgent; and forth I went —
By the way of the Western Wall, so drear
On that winter night, and sought a gate,
Where one, by Fate,
Lay dying that I held dear. 5

And there, as I paused by her tenement,
And the trees shed on me their rime and hoar,
I thought of the man who had left her lone —
Him who made her his own
When I loved her, long before. 10

The rooms within had the piteous shine
That home-things wear when there's aught
amiss;
From the stairway floated the rise and fall
Of an infant's call,
Whose birth had brought her to this 15

Her life was the price she would pay for that whine —
For a child by the man she did not love.
"But let that rest forever," I said,
And bent my tread
To the bedchamber above. 20

She took my hand in her thin white own,
And smiled her thanks — though nigh too
weak —
And made them a sign to leave us there,
Then faltered, ere
She could bring herself to speak. 25

"Just to see you — before I go — he'll condone
Such a natural thing now my time's not much —
When Death is so near it hustles hence
All passionate sense
Between woman and man as such! 30

"My husband is absent. As heretofore
The City detains him But, in truth,
He has not been kind. . . . I will speak no blame,

But — the child is lame;
 Oh, I pray she may reach his ruth! 35

"Forgive past days — I can say no more — Maybe had we wed you would now repine! . . .
 But I treated you ill. I was punished
 Farewell!
 — Truth shall I tell?
 Would the child were yours and mine! 40

"As a wife I was true. But, such my un-
 ease
 That, could I insert a deed back in Time,
 I'd make her yours, to secure your care,
 And the scandal bear,
 And the penalty for the crime!" 45

— When I had left, and the swinging trees
 Rang above me, as lauding her candid say,
 Another was I. Her words were enough—
 Came smooth, came rough,
 I felt I could live my day 50

Next night she died, and her obsequies
 In the Field of Tombs where the earthworks frowned
 Had her husband's heed His tendance spent,
 I often went
 And pondered by her mound 55

All that year and the next year whiled,
 And I still went thitherward in the gloam,
 But the Town forgot her and her nook,
 And her husband took Another Love to his home. 60

And the rumor flew that the lame lone child
 Whom she wished for its safety child of mine,
 Was treated ill when offspring came
 Of the new-made dame,
 And marked a more vigorous line. 65

A smarter grief within me wrought
 Than even at loss of her so dear
 That the being whose soul my soul suffused
 Had a child ill-used,
 While I dared not interfere! 70

One eve as I stood at my spot of thought
 In the white-stoned Garth, brooding thus her
 wrong,
 Her husband neared, and to shun his nod
 By her hallowed sod
 I went from the tombs among 75

To the Cirque of the Gladiators which faced —
 That haggard mark of Imperial Rome,
 Whose Pagan echoes mock the chime
 Of our Christian time
 From its hollows of chalk and loam. 80

The sun's gold touch was scarce displaced
 From the vast Arena where men once bled,
 When her husband followed, bowed, half-
 passed
 With lip upcast;
 Then halting sullenly said: 85

"It is noised that you visit my first wife's
 tomb.
 Now, I gave her an honored name to bear While living, when dead. So I've claim to ask
 By what right you task
 My patience by vigiling there? 90

"There's decency even in death, I assume,
 Preserve it, sir, and keep away,
 For the mother of my first-born you Show mind undue!
 — Sir, I've nothing more to say." 95

A desperate stroke discerned I then —
 God pardon — or pardon not — the lie,
 She had sighed that she wished (lest the child should pine
 Of slights) 'twere mine,
 So I said: "But the father I. 100

"That you thought it yours is the way of men,
 But I won her troth long ere your day
 You learned how, in dying, she summoned
 me?
 'Twas in fealty.
 — Sir, I've nothing more to say, 105

"Save that, if you'll hand me my little maid,
 I'll take her, and rear her, and spare you toil
 Think it more than a friendly act none can,
 I'm a lonely man,
 While you've a large pot to boil 110

"If not, and you'll put it to ball or blade —
 Tonight, tomorrow night, anywhen —
 I'll meet you here . . . But think of it,
 And in season fit
 Let me hear from you again " 115

— Well, I went away, hoping, but naught I
 heard

52 Field of Tombs, a cemetery on the southern outskirts of Dorchester 72 Garth, a piece of enclosed ground, here, the cemetery

76 Cirque . . . Gladiators, Maumbury Ring, the remains of an ancient Roman amphitheater, near the cemetery in Dorchester 111. put . . . blade, fight a duel with pistol or sword.

Of my stroke for the child, till there greeted
me

A little voice that one day came
To my window-frame
And babbled innocently: 120

"My father who's not my own, sends word
I'm to stay here, sir, where I belong!" Next a writing came: "Since the child was the fruit

Of your lawless suit,
Pray take her, to right a wrong " 125

And I did. And I gave the child my love,
And the child loved me, and estranged us
none

But compunctions loomed, for I'd harmed
the dead

By what I said
For the good of the living one. 130

— Yet though, God wot, I am sinner enough,
And unworthy the woman who drew me so,
Perhaps this wrong for her darling's good

She forgives, or would,
If only she could know! 135

And at midnight when the noon-heat breathes
it back from walls and leads,

They've a way of whispering to me — fellow-

THE SOULS OF THE SLAIN

The thick lids of Night closed upon me
Alone at the Bill
Of the Isle by the Race —
Many-caverned, bald, wrinkled of face
And with darkness and silence the spirit 5 was on me
To brood and be still.

No wind fanned the flats of the ocean,
Or promontory sides,
Or the ooze by the strand, 10
Or the bent-bearded slope of the land,
Whose base took its rest mid everlong
motion
Of criss-crossing tides

Soon from out of the southward seemed nearing
A whirr, as of wings
Waved by mighty-vanned flies, 15
Or by night-moths of measureless size,
And in softness and smoothness wellnigh beyond hearing
Of corporal things.

And they bore to the bluff, and alighted —
A dim-discerned train 20
Of sprites without mold,
Frameless souls none might touch or might
hold —

Then, it seemed, there approached from the northward
A senior soul-flame
Of the like filmy hue,
And he met them and spake: "Is it you,
O my men?" Said they, "Aye! We bear homeward and hearthward 35
To feast on our fame!"

"I've flown there before you," he said then
"Your households are well,
But — your kin linger less

"Of what do they tell?"

But the rest: "Fame we prized till today;
Yet that hearts keep us green for old kindness

Thus speaking, the trooped apparitions
Began to disband 80

Those whose record was lovely and true
Bore to northward for home, those of bitter traditions
Again left the land,

And, towering to seaward in legions, 85
They paused at a spot

That engulfing, ghast, sinister place —
Whither headlong they plunged, to the

Passed on, rushingly,

And the whirr of their wayfaring thinned
And surceased on the sky, and but left in the

THE DARKLING THRUSH

I leant upon a coppice gate
When Frost was specter-gray,
And Winter's dregs made desolate
The weakening eye of day. 5
The tangled bine-stems scored the sky
Like strings of broken lyres,
And all mankind that haunted nigh
Had sought their household fires

The land's sharp features seemed to be
The Century's corpse outleant, 10
His crypt the cloudy canopy,
The wind his death-lament.
The ancient pulse of germ and birth
Was shrunken hard and dry,
And every spirit upon earth
Seemed fervorless as I. 15

At once a voice arose among
The bleak twigs overhead
In a full-hearted evensong
Of joy illimited; 20
An aged thrush, frail, gaunt, and small,
In blast-beruffled plume,
Had chosen thus to fling his soul
Upon the growing gloom.

So little cause for carolings
Of such ecstatic sound
Was written on terrestrial things
Afar or nigh around,
That I could think there trembled through
His happy good-night air 30
Some blessed Hope, whereof he knew
And I was unaware. (1900; 1900)

AUTUMN IN KING'S HINTOCK PARK

Here by the baring bough
Raking up leaves,
Often I ponder how Springtime deceives —
I, an old woman now, 5
Raking up leaves.

Here in the avenue
Raking up leaves,
Lords' ladies pass in view,
Until one heaves 10
Sighs at life's russet hue,
Raking up leaves!

Just as my shape you see
Raking up leaves,
I saw, when fresh and free, 15
Those memory weaves
Into gray ghosts by me,
Raking up leaves.

Yet, Dear, though one may sigh,
Raking up leaves, 20
New leaves will dance on high —
Earth never grieves! —
Will not, when missed am I
Raking up leaves (1901; 1909)

GOD-FORGOTTEN

I towered far, and lo! I stood within
The presence of the Lord Most High,
Sent thither by the sons of earth, to win
Some answer to their cry.

— "The Earth, sayest thou? The Human race? 5
By Me created? Sad its lot?
Nay, I have no remembrance of such place—
Such world I fashioned not " —

— "O Lord, forgive me when I say Thou spakest the word that made it all " —
"The Earth of men — let me bethink me . . .
Yea! 11
I dimly do recall

"Some tiny sphere I built long back
(Mid millions of such shapes of mine)
So named . . . It perished, surely — not a wrack 15
Remaining, or a sign?

"It lost my interest from the first,
My aims therefor succeeding ill;
Haply it dies of doing as it durst?" —
"Lord, it existeth still " — 20

"Dark, then, its life! For not a cry
Of aught it bears do I now hear,
Of its own act the threads were snapt whereby
Its plaints had reached mine ear.

"It used to ask for gifts of good, 25
Till came its severance, self-entailed,
When sudden silence on that side ensued,
And has till now prevailed.

"All other orbs have kept in touch,
Their voicings reach me speedily. 30
Thy people took upon them overmuch
In sundering them from me!

"And it is strange — though sad enough — Earth's race should think that one whose
call
Frames, daily, shining spheres of flawless
stuff 35
Must heed their tainted ball! . . .

"But sayest it is by pangs distraught,
And strife, and silent suffering? —
Sore grieved am I that injury should be wrought
Even on so poor a thing! 40

"Thou should'st have learnt that Not to Mend
For Me could mean but Not to Know
Hence, Messengers! and straightway put an
end
To what men undergo " . . .

Homing at dawn, I thought to see 45
One of the Messengers standing by.
— Oh, childish thought! . . . Yet often it comes to me
When trouble hovers nigh.

THE LAST CHRYSANTHEMUM

Why should this flower delay so long
To show its tremulous plumes?
Now is the time of plaintive robin-song,
When flowers are in their tombs.

Through the slow summer, when the sun 5
Called to each frond and whorl
That all he could for flowers was being done,
Why did it not uncurl?

It must have felt that fervid call
Although it took no heed, 10
Waking but now, when leaves like corpses
fall,
And saps all retrocede

Too late its beauty, lonely thing,
The season's shine is spent,
Nothing remains for it but shivering 15
In tempests turbulent

Had it a reason for delay,
Dreaming in witlessness
That for a bloom so delicately gay
Winter would stay its stress? 20

— I talk as if the thing were born
With sense to work its mind,
Yet it is but one mask of many worn
By the Great Face behind.

THE TO-BE-FORGOTTEN

I heard a small sad sound,
And stood awhile among the tombs around
"Wherefore, old friends," said I, "are you

Now, screened from life's unrest?"

— "Oh, not at being here, 5
But that our future second death is near,
When, with the living, memory of us numbs,
And blank oblivion comes!

"These, our sped ancestry,
Lie here embraced by deeper death than we; 10
Nor shape nor thought of theirs can you descry
With keenest backward eye.

"They count as quite forgot,
They are as men who have existed not;
Theirs is a loss past loss of fitful breath, 15
It is the second death.

"We here, as yet, each day
Are blest with dear recall, as yet, can say
We hold in some soul loved continuance
Of shape and voice and glance. 20

"But what has been will be —
First memory, then oblivion's swallowing sea,
Like men foregone, shall we merge into those Whose story no one knows.

"For which of us could hope 25
To show in life that world-awakening scope
Granted the few whose memory none lets die,
But all men magnify?

"We were but Fortune's sport;
Things true, things lovely, things of good report 30
We neither shunned nor sought . . . We see our bourne,
And seeing it we mourn."

AT CASTERBRIDGE FAIR

1. THE BALLAD-SINGER

Sing, Ballad-singer, raise a hearty tune;
Make me forget that there was ever a one
I walked with in the meek light of the moon
When the day's work was done.

Rime, Ballad-rimer, start a country song; 5
Make me forget that she whom I loved well

Swore she would love me dearly, love me
long,
Then — what I cannot tell!

Sing, Ballad-singer, from your little book,
Make me forget those heart-breaks, achings.
fears, 10
Make me forget her name, her sweet sweet look —
Make me forget her tears.

2. FORMER BEAUTIES

These market-dames, mid-aged, with lips thin-drawn,
And tissues sere,
Are they the ones we loved in years ago,
And courted here?

Are these the muslined pink young things to whom 5
We vowed and swore
In nooks on summer Sundays by the From, Or Budmouth shore?

Do they remember those gay tunes we trod
Clasped on the green; 10
Aye, trod till moonlight set on the beaten sod
A satin sheen?

They must forget, forget! They cannot
know
What once they were,
Or memory would transfigure them, and
show 15
Them always fair.

3. AFTER THE CLUB-DANCE

Black'on frowns east on Maidon,
And westward to the sea,
But on neither is his frown laden
With scorn, as his frown on me!

At dawn my heart grew heavy, 5
I could not sip the wine,
I left the jocund bevy
And that young man o' mine.

The roadside elms pass by me —
Why do I sink with shame 10

At Casterbridge Fair Reprinted from Hardy's Collected Poems by permission of The Macmillan Company, publishers

Casterbridge is Hardy's name for Dorchester, the county seat of Dorsetshire, in southern England. To its weekly fair, or market, came the country people to sell their produce, and ballad-singers to furnish entertainment.

When the birds a-perch there eye me?
They, too, have done the same!

4. THE MARKET-GIRL

Nobody took any notice of her as she stood on the causey curb,
All eager to sell her honey and apples and bunches of garden herb;
And if she had offered to give her wares and herself with them too that day,
I doubt if a soul would have cared to take a bargain so choice away.
But chancing to trace her sunburnt grace that morning as I passed nigh, 5
I went and I said, "Poor maiddy dear! — and will none of the people buy?"
And so it began; and soon we knew what the end of it all must be,
And I found that though no others had bid,
a prize had been won by me.

5. THE INQUIRY

And are ye one of Hermitage —
Of Hermitage, by Ivel Road,
And do ye know, in Hermitage
A thatch-roofed house where sengreens grow?
And does John Waywood live there still — 5
He of the name that there abode
When father hurdled on the hill
Some fifteen years ago?

Does he now speak o' Patty Beech,
The Patty Beech he used to — sec, 10
Or ask at all if Patty Beech
Is known or heard of out this way?
— Ask if ever she's living yet,
And where her present home may be,
And how she bears life's fag and fret 15
After so long a day?

In years ago at Hermitage
This faded face was counted fair,
None fairer; and at Hermitage
We swore to wed when he should thrive. 20
But never a chance had he or I,
And waiting made his wish outwear,
And Time, that dooms man's love to die,
Preserves a maid's alive.

Said he loved no one but me;

Said he would let his old pleasures all go
Ever to live with his Dear. 10

Shivering I wait for him here.

7. AFTER THE FAIR

The singers are gone from the Cornmarket-
place
With their broadsheets of rimes,
The street rings no longer in treble and bass
With their skits on the times,
And the Cross, lately thronged, is a dim naked space 5
That but echoes the stammering chimes.

From Clock-corner steps, as each quarter ding-dongs,
Away the folk roam
By the "Hart" and Grey's Bridge into byways and "dongs,"
Or across the ridged loam; 10
The younger ones shrilling the lately heard songs,
The old saying, "Would we were home"

The shy-seeming maiden so mute in the fair
Now rattles and talks,
And that one who looked the most swaggering
there 15
Grows sad as she walks,
And she who seemed eaten by cankering care
In statuesque sturdiness stalks.

And midnight clears High Street of all but the ghosts
Of its buried burghees, 20
From the latest far back to those old Roman hosts

SONGS from THE DYNASTS

THE NIGHT OF TRAFALGÁR

In the wild October night-time, when the wind raved round the land,
And the Back-sea met the Front-sea, and our doors were blocked with sand,
And we heard the drub of Dead-man's Bay,
where bones of thousands are,
We knew not what the day had done for us
at Trafalgár

(All) Had done, 5
Had done,
For us at Trafalgár!

"Pull hard, and make the Nothe, or down we go!" one says, says he.
We pulled; and bedtime brought the storm,
but snug at home slept we.
Yet all the while our gallants after fighting through the day, 10
Were beating up and down the dark, sou'- west of Cadiz Bay.

The dark,
The dark,
Sou'-west of Cadiz Bay!

The victors and the vanquished then the storm it tossed and tore, 15
As hard they strove, those worn-out men,
upon that surly shore;
Dead Nelson and his half-dead crew, his foes
from near and far,
Were rolled together on the deep that night
at Trafalgár!

The deep,
The deep, 20
That night at Trafalgár! (1903)

Songs from The Dynasts Reprinted from Hardy's The Dynasts by permission of The Macmillan Company, publishers. The Dynasts is a long epic-drama, "intended simply for mental performance, and not for the stage," dealing with the wars with Napoleon, 1796-1815.

The Night of Trafalgár. The speakers in the poem are Weymouth boatmen who are awaiting news of the naval battle of Trafalgár, October 21, 1805. Lord Nelson, who was killed in the battle, led the English ships victoriously against the combined French and Spanish fleets in the waters between the harbor of Cadiz and Cape Trafalgár, northwest of Gibraltar on the Spanish coast. The men sing a "new ballet that they've lately had printed here, and were hawking about town last market-day."

2 Back-sea . . . Front-sea. With a storm at high-tide, the waves from the English Channel (Front-sea) swept over the barriers and into the harbor of Weymouth (Back-sea). 3 Dead-man's Bay. West Bay, dangerous because of its rocks and currents, west of Weymouth on the Dorset coast. 8 Nothe, a promontory which forms, on one side, the harbor of Weymouth.

BUDMOUTH DEARS

When we lay where Budmouth Beach is,
Oh, the girls were fresh as peaches,
With their tall and tossing figures and their eyes of blue and brown!
And our hearts would ache with longing
As we paced from our sing-singing, 5
With a smart Clunk! Clunk! up to the Esplanade and down.

They distracted and delayed us
By the pleasant pranks they played us,
And what marvel, then, if troopers, even of regiments of renown,
On whom flashed those eyes divine, O, 10
Should forget the countersign, O,
As we tore Clunk! Clunk! back to camp above the town.

Do they miss us much, I wonder,
Now that war has swept us sunder,
And we roam from where the faces smile to where the faces frown? 15
And no more behold the features
Of the fair fantastic creatures,
And no more Clunk! Clunk! past the parlors of the town?

Shall we once again there meet them?
Falter fond attempts to greet them? 20
Will the gay sling-jacket glow again beside the muslin gown? —

Will they archly quiz and con us
With a sideways glance upon us,
While our spurs Clunk! Clunk! up the Esplanade and down?

BEFORE WATERLOO

Chorus of the Years (aerial music)

The eyelids of eve fall together at last,
And the forms so foreign to field and tree
Lie down as though native, and slumber fast!

Budmouth Dears Budmouth is Weymouth, a town on the Dorset coast, frequented by soldiers and sailors from the neighboring Portland Roads, a naval anchorage. The song is sung on the eve of the Battle of Vitoria. The English Army in the Peninsula and the Spanish and Portuguese allies are bivouacking on the western side of the plain, about six miles from town. The Hussar, who sings the song, recalls a previous visit to Budmouth-Regis.

6 Esplanade, a terraced walk following the course of Weymouth Bay. 21 sling-jacket, a jacket worn by Hussars, it hung loosely over the shoulder and made a picturesque effect.

Before Waterloo. The English and their allies defeated Napoleon and the French in the Battle of Waterloo, fought, June 18, 1815, on a plain south of Brussels in Belgium.

Chorus of the years. The Years and the Pities (page 938) are impersonated abstractions among the characters of the drama. Hardy explains that the Years stand for "the passionless Insight of the Ages," and the Pities for "the Universal Sympathy of human nature—the spectator idealized."

Chorus of the Pities

Sore are the thrills of misgiving we see
In the artless campaign at this harlequinade,
Distracting a vigil where calm should be! 6

The green seems oppressed, and the Plain afraid
Of a Something to come, whereof these are the proofs —
Neither earthquake, nor storm, nor eclipse's
shade!

Chorus of the Years

Yea, the coney's are scared by the thud of hoofs, 10
And their white scuts flash at their vanishing heels,
And swallows abandon the hamlet-roofs.

The mole's tunneled chambers are crushed
by wheels,
The larks' eggs scattered, their owners fled;
And the hedgehog's household the sapper
unseals. 15

The snail draws in at the terrible tread,
But in vain, he is crushed by the fellow-rim;
The worm asks what can be overhead,

And wriggles deep from a scene so grim,
And guesses him safe, for he does not know 20
What a foul red flood will be soaking him!

Beaten about by the heel and toe
Are butterflies, sick of the day's long rheum,
To die of a worse than the weather-foe.

Trodden and bruised to a miry tomb 25
Are ears that have greened but will never be
gold,
And flowers in the bud that will never bloom.

Chorus of the Pities

So the season's intent, ere its fruit unfold,
Is frustrate, and mangled, and made succumb,
Like a youth of promise struck stark and
cold! . . . 30

And what of these who tonight have come?

Chorus of the Years

The young sleep sound, but the weather
awakes

In the veterans, pains from the past that numb,

Old stabs of Ind, old Peninsular aches, Old Friedland chills, haunt their moist mud
bed, 35
Cramps from Austerlitz, till their slumber breaks

Chorus of Sinister Spirits

And each soul shivers as sinks his head
On the loam he's to lease with the other dead
From tomorrow's mist-fall till Time be sped!

THE CURATE'S KINDNESS

A WORKHOUSE IRONY

I thought they'd be strangers aroun' me,
But she's to be there!
Let me jump out o' wagon and go back and drown me
At Pummery or Ten-Hatches Weir.

I thought: "Well, I've come to the Union — s
The workhouse at last —
After honest hard work all the week, and Communion
O' Zundays, these fifty years past.

"'Tis hard, but," I thought, "never mind
it —
There's gain in the end; 10
And when I get used to the place I shall find it
A home, and may find there a friend.

"Life there will be better than t'other,
For peace is assured.
The men in one wing and their wives in another
Is strictly the rule of the Board." 15

Just then one young Pa'son arriving Steps up out of breath
To the side o' the wagon wherein we were driving
To Union, and calls out and saith: 20

34-36 Ind . . . Austerlitz, earlier battles and campaigns in which the armies had engaged. The Indian campaign, 1798-99, included battles in Egypt and Asia Minor, the Peninsular campaign took place in Portugal and Spain from 1804 to 1814, at Friedland, in East Prussia, Napoleon defeated the Russians and Prussians in 1807, at Austerlitz, in Austria, he defeated an army of Russians and Austrians in 1805.

"Old folks, that harsh order is altered,
Be not sick of heart!
The Guardians they poohed and they pished
and they paltered
When urged not to keep you apart.

"'It is wrong,' I maintained, 'to divide them,
Near forty years wed' 25
'Very well, sir. We promise, then, they shall abide them
In one wing together,' they said."

Then I sank — knew 'twas quite a foredone
thing
That misery should be 30
To the end! . . . To get freed of her there was the one thing
Had made the change welcome to me.

To go there was ending but badly;
'Twas shame and 'twas pain,
"But anyhow," thought I, "thereby I shall gladly 35
Get free of this forty years' chain."

LET ME ENJOY

(MINOR KEY)

Let me enjoy the earth no less
Because the all-enacting Might
That fashioned forth its loveliness
Had other aims than my delight.

About my path there flits a Fair, 5
Who throws me not a word or sign;
I'll charm me with her ignoring air,
And laud the lips not meant for mine.

From manuscripts of moving song
Inspired by scenes and dreams unknown, 10
I'll pour out raptures that belong
To others, as they were my own

And some day hence, towards Paradise
And all its blest — if such should be —
I will lift glad, afar-off eyes, 15
Though it contain no place for me.

I AT TEA

The kettle descants in a cozy drone,
And the young wife looks in her husband's
face,
And then at her guest's, and shows in her own
Her sense that she fills an envied place,
And the visiting lady is all abloom, 5
And says there was never so sweet a room.

And the happy young housewife does not
know
That the woman beside her was first his choice,
Till the fates ordained it could not be so . . .
Betraying nothing in look or voice 10
The guest sits smiling and sips her tea,
And he throws her a stray glance yearningly

3. BY HER AUNT'S GRAVE

"Sixpence a week," says the girl to her lover,
"Aunt used to bring me, for she could confide
In me alone, she vowed. 'Twas to cover
The cost of her headstone when she died.
And that was a year ago last June; 5
I've not yet fixed it. But I must soon "

"And where is the money now, my dear?"
"Oh, snug in my purse . . . Aunt was so slow
In saving it — eighty weeks, or near." . . .
"Let's spend it," he hints. "For she won't
know. 10
There's a dance tonight at the Load of Hay."
She passively nods. And they go that way.

9. AT THE ALTAR-RAIL

"My bride is not coming, alas!" says the groom,
And the telegram shakes in his hand. "I own
It was hurried! We met at a dancing-room
When I went to the Cattle-Show alone,
And then, next night, where the Fountain leaps, 5
And the Street of the Quarter-Circle sweeps.

"Aye, she won me to ask her to be my wife —
'Twas foolish perhaps! — to forsake the ways
Of the flaring town for a farmer's life.
She agreed. And we fixed it. Now she says:

BEENY CLIFF

Oh, the opal and the sapphire of that wandering western sea,
And the woman riding high above with bright hair flapping free —
The woman whom I loved so, and who loyally loved me.

The pale mews plained below us, and the waves seemed far away
In a nether sky, engrossed in saying their ceaseless babbling say, 5
As we laughed light-heartedly aloft on that clear-sunned March day.

A little cloud then cloaked us, and there flew an irised rain,
And the Atlantic dyed its levels with a dull
misfeatured stain,
And then the sun burst out again, and purples pinked the main.

— Still in all its chasmal beauty bulks old
Beeny to the sky, 10
And shall she and I not go there once again
now March is nigh,
And the sweet things said in that March say anew there by and by?

What if still in chasmal beauty looms that wild weird western shore,
The woman now is — elsewhere — whom the ambling pony bore,
And nor knows nor cares for Beeny, and will laugh there nevermore. 15

Tooting Common, a park on the southern outskirts of London. Hardy lived near, in Upper Tooting, 1878-80.

Walking slowly, whispering sadly,
Two linked loiterers, wan, downcast 5
Some heavy thought constrained each face,
And blinded them to time and place.

The pair seemed lovers, yet absorbed
In mental scenes no longer orb'd
By love's young rays. Each countenance 10
As it slowly, as it sadly
Caught the lamplight's yellow glance,
Held in suspense a misery
At things which had been or might be.

When I retrod that watery way 15
Some hours beyond the droop of day,
Still I found pacing there the twain
Just as slowly, just as sadly,
Heedless of the night and rain.
One could but wonder who they were, 20
And what wild woe detained them there.

Though thirty years of blur and blot
Have slid since I beheld that spot,
And saw in curious converse there
Moving slowly, moving sadly 25
That mysterious tragic pair,
Its olden look may linger on —
All but the couple; they have gone.

Whither? Who knows, indeed . . . And yet
To me, when nights are weird and wet, 30
Without those comrades there at tryst
Creeping slowly, creeping sadly,
That lone lane does not exist
There they seem brooding on their pain,
And will, while such a lane remain 35

UNDER THE WATERFALL

"Whenever I plunge my arm, like this,
In a basin of water, I never miss
The sweet sharp sense of a fugitive day Fetched back from its thickening shroud of gray.

Hence the only prime 5
And real love-rime
That I know by heart,
And that leaves no smart,

Is the purl of a little valley fall
About three spans wide and two spans tall 10
Over a table of solid rock,
And into a scoop of the self-same block,
The purl of a runlet that never ceases
In stir of kingdoms, in wars, in peaces;
With a hollow boiling voice it speaks 15
And has spoken since hills were turfless peaks."

"And why gives this the only prime
Idea to you of a real love-rime?
And why does plunging your arm in a bowl
Full of spring water, bring throbs to your soul?" 20

"Well, under the fall, in a crease of the stone,
Though where precisely none ever has known,

Jammed darkly, nothing to show how prized,
And by now with its smoothness opalized,
Is a drinking-glass, 25
For, down that pass
My lover and I Walked under a sky

Of blue with a leaf-wove awning of green,
In the burn of August, to paint the scene, 30
And we placed our basket of fruit and
wine

By the runlet's rim, where we sat to dine;
And when we had drunk from the glass
together,

Arched by the oak-copse from the weather,
I held the vessel to rinse in the fall, 35
Where it slipped, and sank, and was past
recall,

Though we stooped and plumbed the little abyss
With long bared arms. There the glass still
is.

And, as said, if I thrust my arm below
Cold water in basin or bowl, a throe 40
From the past awakens a sense of that time,
And the glass we used, and the cascade's
rime.

The basin seems the pool, and its edge
The hard smooth face of the brook-side ledge,
And the leafy pattern of china-ware 45
The hanging plants that were bathing there

"By night, by day, when it shines or lours,
There lies intact that chalice of ours,
And its presence adds to the rime of love
Persistently sung by the fall above. 50
No lip has touched it since his and mine
In turns therefrom sipped lovers' wine." (1914)

THE OXEN

Christmas Eve, and twelve of the clock.

"Now they are all on their knees,"
An elder said as we sat in a flock
By the embers in hearthside ease.

We pictured the meek mild creatures where s
They dwelt in their strawy pen,
Nor did it occur to one of us there
To doubt they were kneeling then.

So fair a fancy few would weave
In these years! Yet, I feel, 10
If someone said on Christmas Eve,
"Come, see the oxen kneel,

The Oxen Reprinted from Hardy's Collected Poems by permission of The Macmillan Company, publishers
A widespread folk-belief is that cattle fall on their knees at midnight of Christmas Eve, as did the ox in the stable at Bethlehem when Christ was born.

"In the lonely barton by yonder coomb
Our childhood used to know,"
I should go with him in the gloom, 15
Hoping it might be so. (1915; 1917)

THE CLOCK-WINDER

It is dark as a cave,
Or a vault in the nave
When the iron door
Is closed, and the floor
Of the church relaid 5
With trowel and spade.

But the parish-clerk
Cares not for the dark
As he winds in the tower
At a regular hour 10
The rheumatic clock
Whose dilatory knock
You can hear when praying
At the day's decaying,
Or at any lone while 15
From a pew in the aisle.

Up, up from the ground,
Around and around
In the turret stair
He clammers, to where 20
The wheelwork is,
With its tick, click, whizz,
Reposefully measuring
Each day to its end
That mortal men spend 25
In sorrowing and pleasuring.
Nightly thus does he climb
To the trackway of Time.

Him I followed one night
To this place without light, 30
And, ere I spoke, heard
Him say, word by word,
At the end of his winding,
The darkness unmining:

"So I wipe out one more, 35
My Dear, of the sore
Sad days that still be,
Like a drying Dead Sea,
Between you and me!"

Who she was no man knew 40
He had long borne him blind
To all womankind,
And was ever one who Kept his past out of view (1917)

"FOR LIFE I HAD NEVER CARED GREATLY"

For life I had never cared greatly,
As worth a man's while,
Peradventures unsought,
Peradventures that finished in naught,
Had kept me from youth and through manhood till lately 5
Unwon by its style.

In earliest years — why I know not —
I viewed it askance;
Conditions of doubt,
Conditions that leaked slowly out, 10
May haply have bent me to stand and to show not
Much zest for its dance.

With symphonies soft and sweet color
It courted me then,
Till evasions seemed wrong, 15
Till evasions gave in to its song,
And I warmed, until living aloofly loomed duller
Than life among men.

Anew I found naught to set eyes on,
When, lifting its hand, 20
It uncloaked a star,
Uncloaked it from fog-damps afar,
And showed its beams burning from pole to horizon
As bright as a brand.

And so, the rough highway forgetting, 25
I pace hill and dale
Regarding the sky,
Regarding the vision on high,
And thus re-illumed have no humor for letting
My pilgrimage fail. (1917)

AN ANCIENT TO ANCIENTS

Where once we danced, where once we sang,
Gentlemen,
The floors are sunken, cobwebs hang,
And cracks creep, worms have fed upon
The doors. Yea, sprightlier times were then 5
Than now, with harps and tabrets gone,
Gentlemen!

Where once we rowed, where once we sailed,
Gentlemen,
And damsels took the tiller, veiled 10

Against too strong a stare (God wot
Their fancy, then or anywhen!)
Upon that shore we are clean forgot,
Gentlemen!

We have lost somewhat, afar and near, 15
Gentlemen,
The thinning of our ranks each year
Affords a hint we are nigh undone,
That we shall not be ever again
The marked of many, loved of one, 20
Gentlemen.

In dance the polka hit our wish,
Gentlemen,
The paced quadrille the spry schottische,
"Sir Roger." — And in opera spheres 25
The "Girl" (the famed "Bohemian"),
And "Trovatore," held the ears,
Gentlemen.

This season's paintings do not please,
Gentlemen, 30
Like Etty, Mulready, Maclise;
Throbbing romance has waned and wanned;
No wizard wields the witching pen
Of Bulwer, Scott, Dumas, and Sand,

Sagged seats, the creeper-nails are rust,
The spider is sole denizen, 40

We who met sunrise sanguine-souled,

That evening shades are stretching out,
Gentlemen!

BIBLIOGRAPHIES, BRIEF BIOGRAPHIES, CRITICISMS, LISTS OF WORKS, AND CRITICAL NOTES

The following bibliographies are meant to serve as convenient reference lists for a study of the literature of the Victorian Period. Books containing discussions of the period in general or of special phases of the literature of the period rather than of individual authors are listed in the General Bibliography.

The biographical sketch of each poet gives only essential facts of his life, with especial reference to his literary work. Following each sketch is a list of the chief publications of each poet with date of first appearance.

The standard editions of each author's works include the more important editions of complete works, complete poetical works, and selected writings; they also include critical editions of significant single poems. Unless otherwise specified, editions are in one volume.

The biographies and criticisms are arranged alphabetically by authors.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Macaulay was born in Leicestershire, the eldest son of a wealthy merchant and leader in the movement to abolish the slave-trade. Reading eagerly at the age of three, beginning at seven a compendium of universal history, and at eight learning Scott's Lay of the Last Minstrel and Marmion by rote, Macaulay showed during his childhood the ability to read everything and to forget nothing that was to make him one of the best-informed men of his age. His career at Cambridge, despite a failure in mathematics, was brilliant, he began soon after taking his degree to write articles for the periodicals. His first great success came with an essay on Milton sent in 1825 to Francis Jeffrey, editor of the Edinburgh Review. Jeffrey wrote in praise: "The more I think, the less I can conceive where you picked up that style." The rolling sentences, the clarity and rhetorical power of subsequent articles soon established Macaulay's reputation among a wide body of readers. He created the historical essay as a literary type. After 1830, when he was elected to the House of Commons, Macaulay's energies were divided between literature and parliamentary duties. His short, stout figure and gorgeous waistcoat became familiar on the floor of the Commons, he took a leading part in governmental reform and in the administration of India, but he rose at five o'clock each day to write articles, on a variety of literary and historical topics, for the Edinburgh Review. At the end of a four-year residence in India as a member of the supreme council, Macaulay made in 1838 a tour of Italy to supplement his reading in Roman history and literature with first-hand impressions. This material he used in writing his Lays of Ancient Rome, which appeared in 1842, and became so popular that in thirty years a hundred thousand copies had been sold. The last part of Macaulay's life was devoted, in the gradually increasing intervals of public business, to his History of England, two volumes of which appeared in 1848 and two in 1855, the work had an extraordinary success. Although he never married, Macaulay found happiness in the home of his sister and her husband, Charles Trevelyan, for whose children he had great affection. In 1857 he was made a baron, in 1858 he wrote five excellent biographies for the Encyclopedia Britannica; in 1859 he died seated in an easy chair in his library, with a book on his knees.

Macaulay's principal publications were: Lays of Ancient Rome, 1842; Critical and Historical Essays Contributed to the Edinburgh Review, 1843; History of England, 1849-61; Speeches, 1854; Miscellaneous Writings (ed. by Ellis), 1860.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISMS

"Fire, directness, energy of handling—these are the main necessities of the martial ballad, rather than any poetic subtlety, and all these were at Macaulay's command. 'Remember thy swashing blow' is the Shakespearean advice which might be given to the writer of the ballad warlike. And Macaulay always remembers his swashing blow. He has none of the deep poetic quality which informs the best work of Mr. Kipling. But he does not aim at it. He keeps within a limit and a kind, and in that kind does very excellent pieces of work, quite honest, healthy work, which may well be allowed to stand, even though a stronger than he [Kipling] be come upon him"—F. Thompson, Academy, Jan. 23, 1897, p. 122.

"It may be objected—was Macaulay a poet at all? Matthew Arnold says expressly that to appreciate the Lays of Ancient Rome is a sure test of poetic incapacity; they are 'pinchbeck ballads' . . . The truth is that Macaulay in the Lays sounds only a few notes, but he sounds them very true. The joy of action, the joy of devotion, the love of home and liberty, are very commonplace topics, they do not require deep thought, they appeal to the heart, not the head, but the man who can express them in lines that stick in other men's minds is something of a poet. And it may be frankly claimed that in doing this simple thing, and doing it well, Macaulay ranks next to Scott among our poets—Scott whom also Matthew Arnold characteristically undervalues."—J. Wells, Fortnightly Review, Oct., 1928, pp. 444-45.

CRITICAL NOTES

HORATIUS (p. 3)

This is one of the ballads in The Lays of Ancient Rome. Macaulay says that he speaks in them, not in his own person, "but in the person of ancient minstrels who knew only what a Roman citizen, born three or four years before the Christian era, may be supposed to have known, and who are in no wise above the passions and prejudices of their age and nation."

There are several versions of the legend of Horatius Cocles, the hero of the ballad. According to the Greek historian Polybius, Horatius defended the bridge alone and was drowned. According to the Roman historian Livy, there were three defenders, all of whom swam safely to shore and received great honors and awards. Macaulay says of the ballad

"The following ballad is supposed to have been made about a hundred and twenty years after the war which it celebrates, and just before the taking of Rome by the Gauls¹. The author seems to have been an honest citizen, proud of the military glory of his country, sick of the disputes of factions, and much given to pining after good old times which had never really existed. The allusion, however, to the partial manner in which the public lands were allotted could proceed only from a plebeian, and the allusion to the fraudulent sale of spoils marks the date of the poem and shows that the poet shared in the general discontent with which the proceedings of Camillus,² after the taking of Veii, were regarded."

In 750 B.C. Rome fell into the hands of the Tarquins, powerful Etruscan princes from across the Tiber. They eventually proved to be tyrannical rulers, and the family was banished from the city in 510 B.C. The immediate cause of the expulsion was the rape of Lucretia, wife of T. Collatinus, by Sextus Tarquinius (line 200). King Tarquin attempted to recover the throne after making an alliance with Porsena, the ruler of Etruria, an Italian state north of Rome. The ballad relates the exploit of Horatius when the city was resisting an attack of the Etruscans and their allies. The various places mentioned in the poem are in Italy or on neighboring shores. The names of some of the heroes are invented.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

The writing of John Henry, Cardinal Newman (1801-90), was the by-product of a life intensely devoted to a quest for a satisfactory personal religion and to a warfare against what he deemed irreligious tendencies in society. From early childhood his mind was set on the unseen. Through Scott's novels he lived imaginatively in the Middle Ages, from the Bible he peopled his world with angels, and he felt with great vividness the presence of God. In 1816 came the mystic experience which he described in his Apologia as an "inward conversion," a dedication to a religious purpose from which he never deviated. After taking his degree at Oxford, he was ordained a clergyman in the Church of England, and in 1828 he was made vicar of the Church of St. Mary's at Oxford, where his sermons were to be of much influence in coming years. With a group of Oxford friends, including Harrell Froude, John Keble, and Edward Pusey, he began to feel intense dissatisfaction with the emotional coldness and the dependence on rationalism of the English Church, and sought to make it more spiritual and at the same time more socially powerful. Before any public movement was launched, however, Newman's health failed, and he was persuaded in the winter of 1832 to make a tour of southern Europe.

In Rome he began, in what has been called "a lyrical interlude between the prose chapters of a working life," his Lyra Apostolica, in which he voiced his religious turmoil and his hatred of English Liberalism. He hurried home to take up the battle in behalf of a conservative sacramental form of piety and theology. A great movement in the Church of England, known as the Oxford Movement, was the result. The Movement was launched by a sermon of Keble's in 1833, by a series of ninety Tracts for the Times (published at Oxford) of which Newman wrote twenty-nine, and by Newman's sermons at St. Mary's. These sermons, which Matthew Arnold called "religious music," together with Newman's clear and compelling style in his Tracts and the magic force of his personality, won sympathy for the cause and deeply affected religious and social ideas in England. Newman came more and more to feel that his ideal in religion, with its emphasis on tradition and on an imagination that transcends reason, could never be satisfied in the English Church. He retired, therefore, from St. Mary's in 1842, and in 1845 he became a Roman Catholic. The last half of Newman's life was less public than the first. He continued to write: from lectures delivered at the shortlived Catholic University in Dublin came, in 1852, his humanistic Idea of a University; in answer to an attack made by Charles Kingsley on Catholic ethics came, in 1864, his autobiographic Apologia pro Vita Sua. He was made a cardinal in 1879. He lived for the most part in somewhat lonely retirement, at his oratory in Edgbaston, where he died in 1890.

Newman's principal writings were: The Ariens of the Fourth Century, 1833; Lyra Apostolica, 1834; Tracts for the Times (contributions), 1834-41; The Prophetic Office of the Church, 1837; Parochial Sermons, 1837-42; Sermons on Subjects of the Day, 1842; The Idea of a University, 1852, Verses on Religious Subjects, 1853; Calista, 1856, Apologia pro Vita Sua, 1864, The Dream of Gerontius, 1865; Verses on Various Occasions, 1868; Grammar of Assent, 1870

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"Newman was a writer almost by accident. He was essentially a leader of men, an ecclesiastical prince, who used literature as an instrument of his rule. But he was also a mystic and a poet, gifted with literary power of the most winning and magnetic kind. His influence upon pure literature has therefore been great. His medieval cast of mind, his passionate perception of the beauty of the symbolism embodied in the medieval church, united with Ruskin's devotion to medieval art to influence a remarkable group of young painters and poets known as the 'Pre-Raphaelites'."—Moody and Lovett, A History of English Literature (1913), p. 342.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Francis Sylvester Mahony (1805-66) was an Irish priest, a humorist, and a facile writer of verse in many languages. Because he returned drunk from a hunting expedition, he resigned his post in an Irish Jesuit college, and soon after settled in the Bohemian quarter of London, where he became the friend of Dickens and Thackeray, and wrote humorous papers under the pen-name of Father Prout. Never content to live long in one country, he traveled in Hungary and Asia Minor, his black clothes, never too clean, his blue eyes and spectacles, his odd combination of wit and sentiment, became well known in Rome and in Paris, where he lived his later years and died. He described himself as "an Irish potato seasoned with Attic salt."

Mahony's principal publications were: Reliques of Father Prout, 1836, Facts and Figures from Italy, 1847; Final Reliques (ed by Jerrold), 1876

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"But of all Prout's songs, English, French, Latin, or Italian, there is none that will be so great a favorite as that queerest but most plaintive of lyrics, the well-known 'Bells of Shandon' In the whole repertory of Irish songs there is nothing that more fully bears out Mr. Thackeray's theory about melancholy being a leading characteristic of everything Irish. Written though it is in distinct imitation of the absurd doggerel ballads of the 'Groves of Blarney' school, and full of reckless extravagances, there is a strange wild melody and a vague pathos in the lines that act like the rambling music of an Æolian harp. It suggests a picture of the good old man, whom we cannot afford to treat as a fictitious personage, strolling in his youthful days by the side of some French stream, lonely and homesick, pining for the 'pleasant waters of the river Lee.'"—Saturday Review, March 17, 1860, p. 344.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

James Clarence Mangan (1808-49) spent his whole life in Dublin. Desperately poor, he found his chief pleasure in browsing among German, Old Irish, and Oriental books in the Dublin University library, where he was employed, and in supporting the various Irish nationalist movements of the time. He became an opium-eater, suffered from strange hallucinations, and looked, in his tight-fitting blue coat and fantastic hat, "rather like a specter from some German romance than a living creature." In 1849 he was found in miserable lodgings dying of starvation and cholera. His poetry, never collected in his lifetime, consists of "translations" from Oriental poets that had no existence, revolutionary ballads, and a few poems, based on the older literature of Ireland, that anticipate the Irish revival of a later day.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"In many respects, both in life and genius, Mangan bears a resemblance to Edgar A. Poe, and, if he did not achieve a single marked success like 'The Raven,' his poetical faculty was of the same somber sort, and his command of original and musical rhythm almost equally great"—A. M. Williams, The Poets and the Poetry of Ireland (1881), p. 325

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

The first period of Tennyson's life, from his birth in 1809 in the quiet rectory of Somersby, in Lincolnshire, to the death of his father in 1831, was happy and sheltered. His natural taste for poetry developed early in the cultured environment of his home. He wrote lyrics at five, and at eight, blank verse in the manner of Thomson's Seasons; he imitated Scott and Moore, and at the death of Byron in 1824 he "thought everything was over and finished for everyone—that nothing else mattered." With his brother Charles he published a volume entitled Poems by Two Brothers in 1827 that clearly shows the influence of his first poetic masters. After entering Cambridge in 1828, he shifted his allegiance to Wordsworth, Coleridge, Shelley, and Keats and wrote poems that were extravagantly admired by his circle of college friends. Most of these friends, including Arthur Henry Hallam, belonged to a club called "The Apostles," which met periodically to discuss, conservatively but eagerly, the problems of religion, ethics, and science that were then beginning to trouble society. The members of the club looked up to the handsome and romantic Tennyson as their natural leader.

He was hence somewhat spoiled by praise when, after 1831, his life became less easy. His father's death brought new responsibilities. The public reception of Poems, Chiefly Lyrical (1830) and of the 1832 volume of Poems, despite the inclusion of The Palace of Art, A Dream of Fair Women, and The Lady of Shalott, was cool, and Tennyson, always unusually sensitive to adverse criticism, was hurt by sarcastic articles that appeared in Blackwood's Magazine and the Quarterly Review. Another blow came in 1833 with the death of Hallam in Vienna, a sudden end to an unusually intimate friendship. Tennyson suffered also from the want of money, and was forced to postpone indefinitely his marriage with Emily Sellwood, to whom he became engaged in 1836.

In meeting these reverses Tennyson showed what Carlyle later called "a right valiant, true-fighting, victorious heart, strong as a lion's, yet gentle, loving, and full of music." He consoled himself for Hallam's death by beginning the long series of elegies that were brought together in 1850 as In Memoriam A.H.H. He resolutely set about perfecting himself in the art of poetry, for ten years he wrote almost continuously, revising again and again both his new work and that which had already been published, until he made himself an expert craftsman in verse. Finally, in 1842, he published his popular Poems and at once had his reward, the volume was everywhere enthusiastically received. Eased of his financial burden in 1845 by a government pension of £200 a year and heartened by the great success of In Memoriam, he married in 1850 Miss Sellwood, to whom he had been engaged for fourteen years. In the same year he was appointed to succeed Wordsworth as poet laureate, and from that date until his death he remained the official poetic voice of Victorian England.

In order to indulge his love for retirement, for being alone with his moods, he purchased in 1853 the estate of Farringford, on the Isle of Wight, there he lived quietly, working in his garden, tramping across the moors, writing poetry, or talking with a few intimates amid clouds of tobacco smoke in a tiny room at the top of the house. He kept up also his Latin and Greek, and his early habit of reading by which he continued to inform himself on new discoveries in the physical sciences; his wide reading during his life included not only English poetry but French, German, and Italian poetry as well. Meanwhile he had written the great Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington (1852), the popular The Charge of the Light Brigade (1854), and a series of dramatic monologues and lyrics entitled Maud (1855). A journey to Wales, where he visited the spots associated with the Arthurian legends, reawakened his interest in the theme that had fascinated him from boyhood and which had furnished material for The Lady of Shalott (1832), Morte d'Arthur (1842), and other early poems. This enthusiasm resulted in 1859 in the publication of the first group of the Idylls of the King, to be followed by others in 1869 and 1872, with the entire group rearranged and published as a complete series in 1888. In 1864 appeared the Enoch Arden volume containing the Northern Farmer, the first of his humorous pieces in dialect. In 1868 Tennyson built Aldworth, a Gothic structure in Surrey, near the Sussex border, which thereafter served as an alternate home with Farringford. In 1875 he began a series of poetic dramas, the most important of which were Queen Mary (1875), Harold (1876), and Becket (1884), constituting a "trilogy of English history."

More honors, which did little to disturb the essential simplicity of his character, came with advancing years. His elevation to the peerage, which he was prevailed upon to accept in 1884, only "for the sake of literature," was a tribute not only from the Queen but also from all English-speaking peoples to a poet whom they regarded also as a prophet, a great ethical teacher. His writing continued, almost undiminished in excellence. After Tiresias and Other Poems (1885) came the vigorous Locksley Hall Sixty Years After (1886), his literary autobiography, Merlin and the Gleam (1889), and Crossing the Bar, which always stands last in any edition of his collected works. In 1892 he died peacefully at Farringford and was buried in Westminster Abbey beside Robert Browning.

Tennyson's principal publications were: Poems by Two Brothers, 1827; Poems, Chiefly Lytical, 1830, Poems, 1832; Poems, 1842, The Princess, 1847; In Memoriam, 1850, Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington, 1852, Maud, and Other Poems, 1855; Idylls of the King (Enid, Vivien, Elaine, Gannevere), 1859, Idylls of the Hearth (Enoch Arden), 1864, The Holy Grail, and Other Poems (Coming of Arthur, The Holy Grail, Pelleas and Ettarre, Passing of Arthur), 1869, Gareth and Lynette, etc., 1872, Queen Mary, 1875, Harold, 1876; Ballads, and Other Poems, 1880, Becket, 1884; Tiresias, and Other Poems, 1885; Locksley Hall Sixty Years After, 1886; Demeter, and Other Poems, 1889; The Death of Ænone, Akbar's Dream, and Other Poems, 1892.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISMS

"Tennyson more than any other writer of his day interpreted the Victorian Age to itself. It was an age of rapid change and palpable transition. Political revolutions, social upheavals, moral rebellions, intellectual insurrections, religious revolts, were transforming the old and stable world into a chaos whence a new order could not, by many anxious watchers, be seen to emerge. Tennyson was keenly sensitive to the movements of the time. He took an absorbed interest in current politics; he sympathized with social reform; he kept in close touch with the new science, and, in particular, seized with quick comprehension and eager welcome the novel and (at first appearance) disquieting doctrine of evolution; he was profoundly religious, and he recognized the necessity, both for himself and for his generation, of reconciling if possible the new knowledge with the old faith. He first convinced himself and then he showed his fellows—in poems such as In Memoriam, The Ancient Sage, Silent Voices, and Crossing the Bar—how the perplexities of the moment could be resolved, and how the essentials of the ancient creeds could be restated in terms of the most modern science. He made it clear to many doubtful and troubled minds that, in spite of the triumphs of naturalism, it was still possible, and indeed necessary, to hold fast to faith in human freedom, in Divine immanence, and in personal immortality. He based his convictions . . . not on external evidences which criticism can question or skepticism assail, but on intuitions and revelations peculiar to the patient and expectant soul . . . It was because he felt so accurately the perplexities of the age, and because he wrestled with them faithfully and resolved them hopefully, that he made so strong an appeal to the conservative culture of his generation."—F. J. C. Hearnshaw, Spectator, Oct. 6, 1917, p. 352.

"It is the perfection of his artistry which is, for our age even more than for his own, the enduring grandeur of Tennyson. No modern poet has labored more truly on his work or believed more sincerely in the greatness of his art or has striven more nobly for perfection than did Tennyson. The writing of poetry was to him not a mere exercise, nor, on the other hand, the result of a fine fervor, it was a vocation in which he toiled as laboriously as any worker in metals or precious gems. The whirligig of time has brought in its revenges so far as his position as the voice of the English people is concerned; but if we have lost the old worship of the prophet, we have gained a new understanding and admiration of the artist. 'The labor of the file' was Tennyson's labor. At his worst, we can bring no charge against him more serious than sentimentality, a comfortable conservatism, a too-easy faith, at his best he is one of the greatest glories of the English tongue"—Marjorie H. Nicholson, Introduction to Selected Poems of Alfred, Lord Tennyson, pp. 20-21.

CRITICAL NOTES

THE POET (p. 16)

This poem expresses Tennyson's early ideas concerning his life mission. Later he would not have desired rites and forms to melt "before his eyes," because he came to regard them as necessary and felt that they should be modified or superseded very slowly. Cf. You Ask Me, Why, p. 35; Of Old Sat Freedom, p. 35; Love Thou Thy Land, p. 36, In Memoriam, 33, p. 65, and Freedom, p. 155.

THE LADY OF SHALOTT (p. 18)

This is Tennyson's first published poem on an Arthurian subject. The source of the poem is an Italian romance, Donna di Scalotta (Lady of Scalott). Tennyson says that he substituted Shalott for Scalott because of the softer sound. The word is the same as Astolat, the name of the heroine's home in Malory's version of the story in Morte Darthur, which was Tennyson's source for the idyll Lancelot and Elaine (p. 120). Tennyson stated that the key to the symbolical meaning of The Lady of Shalott is found in the closing lines of Part 2: "The new-born love for something, for someone in the wide world from which she has been so long excluded, takes her out of the region of shadows into that of realities." The poem was first published in 1832, it was virtually rewritten in 1842 with many modifications and improvements and with great gain in poetic dignity. The wealth of sensuous beauty in the poem suggests Keats

MARIANA IN THE SOUTH (p. 20)

This poem is a variation of the theme of Mariana, p. 14. The scenery, however, is different, that of the second poem suggesting Egypt, Italy, the Pyrenees, and France. In the precision with which details are introduced, both poems anticipate the Pre-Raphaelite movement. (See Critical Notes on Rossetti, page 1008)

ÆNONE (p. 20)

This is one of Tennyson's poems on classical themes. Others are The Lotos-Eaters (p. 28), Ulysses (p. 43), and Tithonus (p. 44). In these poems Tennyson exhibits greater creative power than in his intended realistic English idylls Dora (p. 41), The Gardener's Daughter, etc. The story of Ænone is found in Ovid, Euripides, and other classical writers. Although the poem is classical in theme and outline, it is modern in sentiment, the speech of Pallas (lines 142 ff.) expresses Tennyson's own philosophy of life. The descriptions of scenery in the poem belong to the Pyrenees Mountains, visited by Tennyson in 1830, rather than to Mt. Ida. Part of Ænone was written in the valley of Caunteretz, in the Pyrenees.

THE PALACE OF ART (p. 24)

This poem is consciously didactic. It is an allegory embodying the poet's belief that "the Godlike life is with man and for man." Tennyson had high ethical impulses and was always concerned with questions involving the conduct of life. Like Wordsworth he wished "to be regarded as a teacher or as nothing." The poem teaches that qualities of mind and heart, noble in themselves, become ignoble unless they are shared with others.

The poem contains a series of notable descriptions, each one conceived as a finished picture—clear and distinct, and yet rich and suggestive.

LADY CLARA VERE DE VERE (p. 27)

This poem illustrates a curious obsession of Tennyson—a sentimental interest in a poor youth who loves above his station and fortune. The vigorous expression of current democratic sympathies won instant popularity for the poem, although at heart Tennyson was a conservative. Cf. You Ask Me, Why, p. 35.

THE LOTOS-EATERS (p. 28)

The Lotos-Eaters were a people who lived on the flowery fruit of the lotos tree, which produced forgetfulness of home. The poem is based upon a brief passage in Book 9 of Homer's Odyssey, which tells how Ulysses and his mariners came to the land of the lotos-eaters and how Ulysses escaped by binding his men to the boats. The underlying theme of the poem is similar to that of The Palace of Art, p. 24.

YOU ASK ME, WHY, THOUGH ILL AT EASE (p. 35)

This poem and the two following poems show Tennyson's interest in contemporary political and social questions. Being a conservative, the poet had little sympathy with current reforms, at home or abroad, especially those which were promoted by over-zealous factions and which involved haste.

Aubrey de Vere states that the first two poems were probably suggested by some popular demonstration connected with the rejection of the Reform Bill of 1832 by the House of Lords. (See Memor., I, 506).

MORTE D'ARTHUR (p. 38)

This poem was written and published before Tennyson had conceived the plan for The Idylls of the King. It is pure narrative, without allegorical intent. It was later incorporated, with additions, in The Passing of Arthur, the last of the Idylls. The source of the poem is Sir Thomas Malory's Morte Darthur, Book 21.

W. S. Landor, who saw the poem in 1837, said, "It is more Homeric than any poem of our time, and rivals some of the noblest parts of the Odyssey."

For a full statement regarding The Idylls of the King, see pp. 962-964.

DORA (p. 41)

This poem is one of Tennyson's English idylls, a group of poems concerning simple country or village life. It was suggested by the pastoral "Dora Creswell" in Miss Mitford's Our Village, a series of sketches published 1824-32. Tennyson made Dora a woman instead of a girl, and modified the ending and other features of the original. He states that since the poem is a tale of a nobly simple country girl, it "had to be told in the simplest possible poetic language, and therefore was one of the poems which gave most trouble" (Memoir, I, 196). The poem should be compared with Wordsworth's Michael and the story of Margaret in The Excursion, Bk. I.

ULYSSES (p. 43)

Ulysses is the hero of Homer's Odyssey, but Tennyson's poem is based upon a passage in Canto 26 of Dante's Inferno, in which Ulysses tells Dante and Virgil how he had set out from Circe's island, driven by an ardor to gain experience of the world, with one vessel only and a small group of loyal companions. They were old and slow when they came to the Straits of Gibraltar, in ancient imaginings the strait that marked the limit of the world, beyond which none might go. "O brothers," said Ulysses to his mariners, "who through a thousand perils have reached the West, to this so little vigil of your senses that remains be ye unwilling to deny the experience, following the sun, of the world that hath no people. Consider ye your origin, ye were not made to live as brutes, but for pursuit of virtue and knowledge." Unlike Dante, however, Tennyson has Ulysses start from his home in Ithaca.

Tennyson says that the poem was written soon after the death of his friend Arthur Hallam, and gave expression to the poet's need of "going forward and braving the struggle of life perhaps more simply than anything in In Memoriam" (Memor, I, 196)

Critics have been generous in their praise of this poem, emphasis being placed especially upon its dignity and nobility of conception, its beauty and power of expression, and its imaginative fervor. The reading of this poem and of Locksley Hall is said to have led Sir Robert Peel to give Tennyson a pension in 1845.

Cf. Hotspur's famous lines in Shakespeare's Henry IV, Part One, V, 2, 82 ff.—

"O gentlemen, the time of life is short!
To spend that shortness basely were too long,
If life did ride upon a dial's point,
Still ending at the arrival of an hour."

LOCKSLEY HALL (p. 45)

The speaker in this poem is a young man whose love had been denied by a woman of superior fortune. The theme is an obsession with Tennyson. The poem is full of allusions to recent discoveries in astronomy and electricity and to current social problems. Cf. the sequel, Locksley Hall Sixty Years After, p. 157, in which the same character appears as an old man whose experience has mellowed his outlook upon life, which with him concerns the actual and present—with all its defects—rather than a vague dream of future progress.

"The second Locksley Hall is, despite a certain falling off in technical skill, still substantially the fulfillment of the first. Whatever unhealthiness exists in the latest poem, is in germ in the original one, and, on the whole, the new poem, notwithstanding a number of frantic opinions and of unpleasant lines, is healthier, more manly, more devout, and even more cheerful, in a deeper sense of the word cheerful, than was the first poem. Neither poem is truly sound. Both suffer from the same disease. Both illustrate Tennyson's characteristic weakness [romantic idealism]. But of the two the old man's poem, if artistically inferior, is ethically higher, and for this reason is far more satisfying"—J. Royce, Studies of Good and Evil, p. 77.

SIR GALAHAD (p. 50)

Galahad, the son of Lancelot and Elaine (the daughter of King Pellias, not the maid of Astolat), takes the place of Percivale in the later legends of the quest for the Holy Grail. The Grail, originally a magic vessel of Celtic mythology, became, under the influence of the church, the cup from which Christ drank at the Last Supper, and in which Christ's blood was caught by Joseph of Arimathea at the Crucifixion. The cup was supposed to have been brought to Glastonbury, England, by Joseph. It was visible only to the pure in heart, and vanished when approached by any other. In medieval romances the finding of the Grail was the great aim of many knights, but Sir Galahad was the only one who achieved the quest. For various accounts of the quest, see Tennyson's The Holy Grail, p. 137. Sir Galahad is here portrayed as a mystic—a religious knight.

He is the counterpart of the nun in St. Agnes' Eve, p. 35.

Page 51, lines 69-72. This passage describes an experience familiar to Tennyson himself, one which he calls "a kind of waking trance, I have frequently had, quite up from boyhood, when I have been all alone" (Memor, I, 320). In The Holy Grail, 907-915 (p. 147), the experience is transferred to King Arthur. Cf. In Memoriam, 95, p. 80.

THE VISION OF SIN (p. 51)

This poem presents two contrasted revels: the first, a drunken orgy in a palace, the second, a senile debauch in a ruined inn. The youth has wasted his life in pleasure, and the end is sorrow and despair, but Tennyson represents God as holding out the promise of something better. It was the sins of youth that filled the second great circle of Dante's Inferno with countless multitudes.

THE PRINCESS (p. 54)

The Princess, first published in 1847, is a half-serious, half-burlesque narrative poem. It tells the story of a princess who founded a college for the purpose of emancipating woman by educating her in complete isolation from man. The prince and two of his companions disguise themselves as girls and gain admission to the college, but are finally discovered and ejected. The father of the prince prepares to attack the college with an army, and warriors rush to the defense of the princess and her maidens. A combat is arranged between fifty followers of each side, and the prince is defeated. Finally the princess is overcome with sympathy for the wounded prince and gives up her purpose, and marries him.

The central idea of the poem asserts the supremacy of normal human affections over any arbitrary or mechanical scheme to suppress them. This idea is emphasized by the presence of a child in the college, the daughter of one of the chief women. The princess develops a genuine affection for the child, which she holds in her arms during the tournament, and which links her with true womanhood. It was to bring the child still more into prominence that additional songs were inserted between the parts of the poem in the edition of 1850. Of this latter group Tennyson wrote to S. E. Dawson in 1882: "I may tell you that the songs were not an afterthought. Before the first edition came out, I deliberated with myself whether I should put songs in between the separate divisions of the poem, again I thought the poem will explain itself, but the public did not see that the child, as you say, was the heroine of the piece, and at last I conquered my laziness and inserted them." In the poem the songs appear without titles.

The following songs appeared in the original edition: Tears, Idle Tears; O Swallow, Swallow; Now Sleeps the Crimson Petal; and Come Down, O Maid.

TEARS, IDLE TEARS (p. 55)

Tennyson stated to James Knowles that this song was written at Tintern Abbey "when the woods were all yellowing with autumn seen through the ruined windows. It is what I have always felt even from a boy, and what as a boy I called the 'passion of the past.' And so it is always with me now, it is the distance that charms me in the landscape, the picture and the past, and not the immediate today in which I move."—Nineteenth Century, Jan., 1893.

IN MEMORIAM (p. 57)

This poem was written in memory of Tennyson's dearest friend, Arthur Henry Hallam, the gifted son of the famous historian Henry Hallam. Arthur Hallam was born in London, Feb. 1, 1811. He became acquainted with Tennyson at Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1828, where they belonged to the same club—The Apostles—and the two promising youths soon became devoted friends. They made summer trips together—to the Pyrenees in 1830, and down the Rhine in 1832. The intimacy increased when Hallam became engaged to Tennyson's sister Emily. After graduation Hallam began the study of law with his father in London. He visited the Continent in August, 1833, and died suddenly in Vienna on Sept. 15. His body was taken to England and buried on Jan. 3, 1834, in the chancel of Clevedon Church, in Somersetshire.

The action of the poem covers less than five years, beginning with the death of Hallam in the fall of 1833 and extending into the spring of 1838. The lyrics, written without any view of weaving them into a whole, were composed over a period of seventeen years and reveal various degrees of sorrow and various attitudes toward life, death, and immortality. The opening section, which stresses Tennyson's final conviction that faith alone can discover the eternal purpose of God and solve the problem of immortality, was written last.

Tennyson said of the poem: "It must be remembered that this is a poem, not an actual biography . . . It was meant to be a kind of Divina Comedia, ending with happiness . . . The different moods of sorrow as in a drama are dramatically given, and my conviction that fear, doubts, and suffering will find answer and relief only through Faith in a God of Love. I is not always the author speaking of himself, but the voice of the human race speaking through him" (Memor, I, 304-305).

Although the ideas concerning philosophy and natural science, as they appear in the poem, are derived from contemporary thought, as Frederic Harrison and others point out, In Memoriam voices universal emotions and so deserves the immense influence it has exerted over the religious world. Henry van Dyke ranks the poem as "the greatest elegy of the nineteenth century, the longest and most important of Tennyson's poems on the problems of doubt and faith, the poem in which he made the strongest and widest impression on contemporary thought."

The stanza form, which Tennyson at first believed was his own invention, was used in the Elizabethan period by Sidney, Jonson, and others, and by a number of later poets. Tennyson had used it before in Love Thou Thy Land, p. 36, and other poems.

The main divisions of the poem are marked by the three Christmas sections—28, 78, and 104

Tennyson suggested nine groups of the sections as follows: 1-8; 9-20, 21-27; 28-49, 50-58, 59-71, 72-98, 99-103; 104-131. The turning-point in the poem, where sorrow gives way to joy, may be placed at section 85.

In Memoriam should be compared with Milton's Lycidas, Shelley's Adonais, and Arnold's Thyrsis, p. 477.

MAUD (p. 96)

Tennyson regarded Maud as one of his masterpieces, it was his favorite poem for reading aloud. He said of it "This poem is a little Hamlet, the history of a morbid poetic soul, under the blighting influence of a recklessly speculative age. He is the heir of madness, an egotist with the makings of a cynic, raised to sanity by a pure and holy love which elevates his whole nature, passing from the height of triumph to the lowest depth of misery, driven into madness by the loss of her whom he has loved, and, when he has at length passed through the fiery furnace, and has recovered his reason, giving himself up to work for the good of mankind through the unselfishness born of his great passion . . . The peculiarity of this poem is that different phases of passion in one person take the place of different characters" (Memor, I, 396).

"As a masterpiece of rhythm," writes J. C. Collins, the poem "must rank among the wonders of art," but it was greeted with hostile criticism by many of Tennyson's contemporaries, and some later critics have regarded it as a "splendid failure."

Page 110. Part II, Section IV. Tennyson regarded this lyric as "the most touching of his works," and Swinburne called it "the poem of deepest charm and fullest delight of pathos and melody ever written by Mr Tennyson." A version of this section first appeared as "Stanzas" in a volume entitled The Tribute, published in 1837. It has been stated that Maud grew out of a suggestion of Sir John Simeon regarding this early poem—that to make it fully intelligible a preceding poem was necessary—Memor, I, 379. See note on In the Garden at Swanston, p. 119.

MILTON (p. 114)

Tennyson thought Milton superior to Virgil as a stylist and said that there was nothing in English to equal the splendor of his finest passages. This poem is one of a group which Tennyson called "experiments in quantity." It imitates, as far as can be done in English, a classical form of prosody invented by Alcaeus, a Greek lyric poet of 600 B.C., and used by Horace and other ancient poets. In English prosody, a four-line strophe of one form of alcaics may be scanned thus—

THE HIGHER PANTHEISM (p. 118)

Pantheism identifies the universe, taken as a whole, with God, it asserts that the combined forces and laws manifested in the universe are God. The poem expresses what Tennyson regards as a higher truth than this doctrine, it declares that God lives in the world, but transcends it, that men have their being in him, but that the human spirit is consciously distinct from the Divine Spirit

Hallam Tennyson writes of his father: "He said again to us with deep feeling in January, 1869 'Yes, it is true that there are moments when the flesh is nothing to me, when I feel and know the flesh to be the vision, God and the Spiritual the only real and true Depend upon it, the Spiritual is the real, it belongs to one more than the hand and the foot You may tell me that my hand and my foot are only imaginary symbols of my existence, I could believe you; but you never, never can convince me that the I is not an eternal Reality, and that the Spiritual is not the true and real part of me'" (Memoir, II, 90).

THE IDYLLS OF THE KING (p. 119)

The Idylls of the King consists of twelve narratives that deal with the history of King Arthur and the Knights of the Round Table.

The first important treatment of Arthur appears in Geoffrey of Monmouth's Historia Regum Britanniæ (1147), which purports to tell the story of the British kings from the founding of Britain to the year 689. Arthur there appears as the great chieftain who defended his country against the invading Saxons. Geoffrey's work became a storehouse for other writers, who made the material widely known. Of the medieval poets who treated the Arthur story, Layamon (c 1200) was the first to make Arthur the hero of the English, as distinct from the Welsh, people, he also gave for the first time a full account of the founding of the Round Table and of the death of Arthur. In the fifteenth century Sir Thomas Malory selected material from various earlier sources and produced a complete history of the Knights of the Round Table from the birth of Arthur to his last great battle and death. He made Arthur the great central figure of a unified narrative, and his Morte Darthur became at once the great treasury of Arthurian romance.

When a mere boy Tennyson happened upon Malory's book and he at once became interested in the Arthurian legend. In 1832 he published The Lady of Shalott (p. 18), his first Arthur poem. Other early poems dealing with the material were Morte d'Arthur (p. 38), Sir Lancelot and Queen Guinevere, and Sir Galahad (p. 50).

The material for all but two of the Idylls was gained from Malory's Morte Darthur, published in 1485. For The Marriage of Geraint and Geraint and Enid Tennyson used The Mabinogion, a collection of old Welsh tales translated by Lady Charlotte Guest and published in 1838-49. Tennyson made many changes in his material to suit his allegorical intent and unified it around the rise and fall of the Round Table, besides, he embroidered it at various points, sentimentalized it, and made the characters, incidents, and language more decorous

Although the writing of the Idylls was not completed until 1885, as early as 1835 Tennyson projected a possible allegorical scheme for the story of Arthur. In the final section, To the Queen (p. 147), he states that the poems constitute an "old imperfect tale,

New-old, and shadowing Sense at war with Soul "

The progress of the twelve Idylls (as arranged in their final order in 1888) corresponds to the course of the months and seasons of the year, from the coming of Guinevere in the spring, through the knightly successes of summer, to the Last Tournament in autumn, and to Arthur's last battle in December. Since the composition of the poems extended over so long a period, and since the final order is not the exact order of writing, the symbolism is sometimes faint and incomplete.

Opinion differs as to the merit of the Idylls, the best known and the most read of Tennyson's longer poems. Many persons regard them as the highest achievement of the poet's art and look upon them as "a wonderful monument of sustained and chastened fancy, of noble ideals, and of delicious music." Others with Frederic Harrison think there is "too much pure fancy, too much sentiment, too much of the drawing-room and the lecture-hall." "In choosing as his theme," adds Harrison, "a well-known romance, adapting and developing a very grand old prose-poem, Tennyson obtained the great advantage of incidents living, thrilling, and even familiar," but he ran the risk of "travestying the old romance, so that it became more or less incongruous, unnatural, and impossible. Lovers of exquisite verse and of romantic chivalry, who know nothing either of historic chivalry or of the mediæval romances, do not feel the incongruity; and they form the great majority of the Tennysonian public. But from the point of view of actual history and the real Arthurian myth, the filling of the old bottle of Malory with the new wine of Alfred Tennyson is an inevitable danger. Lancelot of the Lake is transformed into a sort of Sir Charles Grandison in plate armor, King Arthur becomes a courtier's portrait of the late Prince Consort Elaine is a new Virginie without her 'Paul,' and Queen Guinevere is a magnificent 'grande dame' of Versailles with a secret"—Tennyson, Ruskin, Mill, and Other Literary Estimates (1900), p. 17.

SUMMARY OF THE IDYLLS OF THE KING

The Coming of Arthur

The Coming of Arthur relates how Arthur, son of Uther, legendary king of the Britons, wooed the princess Guinevere (daughter of Leodogran, king of Cameliard) and won her as his wife. Indirectly we are also told how Arthur was secretly reared by the wizard Merlin, how at a strategic moment Merlin set him on Uther's throne and proclaimed him king, and how Arthur had dedicated himself to the high purpose of making chaotic Britain a coherent and law-abiding nation. For this end he had gathered about him his Round Table, a body of knights exemplifying the finest qualities of chivalry. Chief among them was the great Lancelot, Arthur's friend, it was he whom Arthur sent to escort Guinevere from her home in Cameliard to Camelot for the marriage. At the close of the idyll, the reign of law in Britain has well begun; yet in the background lurks the figure of Modred, Arthur's traitorous nephew, from the beginning intent on working harm.

In the four subsequent tales, the Round Table is at the peak of its achievement.

Gareth and Lynette

Gareth and Lynette tells how young Gareth, nephew of King Arthur, longed to leave his home and prove himself at Arthur's court. His mother, loving and fearful, strove to keep him with her; yet his persistence persuaded her at last to let him go, on condition that he, disguised, serve a year in Arthur's kitchen before asking for knight-hood. With his identity at Camelot concealed from all but Arthur, Gareth endured his position and by his industry and cheerfulness won the respect of Arthur, who promised him an early opportunity to show his true worth. That opportunity came with the arrival of the fair but sharp-tongued Lynette, with the request that Arthur send a knight to liberate her sister from captivity. When Gareth, still in his kitchen-clothes, was given the quest, she was indignant, and her indignation continued for many a long mile on the journey to her sister's castle. Finally, however, Gareth's good-natured humility under her scornful sarcasm, and his prowess in overcoming successive foes, symbolizing the terrors of life and death, won her gradual admiration and at length her love.

The Marriage of Geraint

The Marriage of Geraint describes another sort of courtship—how the polished and handsome Geraint met and loved humble Enid. Riding on a quest to chastise a discourteous knight, Geraint asked lodging for the night at a ruined castle. Signs of poverty were everywhere, but what little the inmates of the castle had they offered to Geraint with a cheeriness and graciousness that won his heart. Especially was he pleased with Enid, the daughter of his host. Her faded gown and the menial tasks that she performed could not obscure her charm. In the course of an evening during which Geraint followed Enid everywhere with his eyes, he learned that the discourteous knight whom he had come to chastise was the one who had reduced his host to his present poverty, that a tournament was to be held the next day in which he would have an opportunity to meet his foe, but that he must be accompanied by a lady in order to enter the tournament. Impulsively Geraint proposed that he satisfy this requirement by taking Enid with him as his destined bride. The parents were overjoyed at so high an alliance for Enid, she, shrinking at first from the suddenness of the proposal, saw it also as an honor, and obeyed. In the tournament, Geraint was victor, the title and lands of Enid's father were restored, and Enid prepared for the journey to Camelot and her marriage by exchanging her old garments for more new and splendid ones. But Geraint insisted that she ride with him in her ancient gown, and she, obedient, complied.

Geraint and Enid

Geraint and Enid portrays Enid as the ideal wife and Geraint as a very human husband. Alarmed by the influence which the growing intimacy between Lancelot and Guinevere might have on Enid's mind, Geraint took Enid from the Court to his own country. There he lost himself in the pleasures of marriage; giving up his mighty exercises, he lived only for Enid. Far from being joyful at Geraint's exclusive devotion, Enid became increasingly distressed, and felt herself the cause of his inaction. Her distress was at last apparent to Geraint, misinterpreting it as a sign that she loved him no longer, he angrily donned his armor and left the castle, ordering Enid to ride before him and not to speak to him whatever might betide. Enid obeyed, except when Geraint's safety was concerned, twice, much to his ostensible anger, she spoke to warn him against foes in the path. As they rode on, Geraint's impulsive anger began to ebb in spite of his efforts to preserve it, until he almost forgot to berate Enid when she disobeyed his command once more to warn him of a plot against his life. In the next encounter Geraint was seriously wounded, when he woke from his swoon to find Enid weeping over him, he found his anger wholly gone. The tale ends with Enid mounted behind Geraint on his great charger, complete confidence established between them as a result of their adventures together, and Geraint's life again made purposeful. They lived on together, in their own land, united in a resolve to cooperate with Arthur in making England a peaceful and compact society.

Balin and Balan

In Balin and Balan the interest of the story centers in Balin, surnamed "the Savage," who came to Camelot, in the company of his older and more developed brother Balan, to acquire courtesy as a cure for the violent moods that often assailed him. For a time the influence of Lancelot and Guinevere, whom he worshiped as examples of the perfect courtesy that he lacked, succeeded in holding his roughness in check; but when his brother, going on a quest to rid a forest of a demon that haunted it, left him alone, he came to despair of attaining an ideal too high above him. He credited, too, scandalous stories about the relationship of Lancelot and Guinevere which Vivien, the "wily wanton" of the Court and Melhn's mistress, came to Camelot to spread. Discouraged and disillusioned, he rode impetuously out from Camelot, and met, as the first victim of his rage, his own brother, who took him for the demon he had gone out to subdue. Without recognizing each other, they fought, and died tragically at each other's hands.

Merlin and Vivien

The snake in the paradise of Camelot, the enchantress Vivien, found another victim in the crafty Merlin, the magician and the prophet of the Court, as the tale of Merlin and Vivien relates. During his long life Merlin had attained fame and had become invaluable to the state through his supernatural wisdom and foresight. Yet the evil charm of Vivien was more than his wisdom could conquer. Even though he saw through her wiles and understood the consequences of yielding to her desires, his emotions overbore his reason. Thus beguiled, he revealed to Vivien the charm that was the secret of his power, and she immediately used it upon him,

And in the hollow oak he lay as dead,
And lost to life and use and name and fame

Lancelot and Elaine

Two tragedies are related in the Idyll of Lancelot and Elaine. In the one, the lovable Elaine, who had been brought up in seclusion, saw the great Lancelot, adored him, guarded his shield as he rode away to fight in disguise at Camelot, nursed him after he had been wounded, offered her love to him, found her love hopeless, and died like a wilting flower. The other tragedy is that of Lancelot, whom, had it not been for his unfortunate vows exchanged with Guinevere, Elaine could have made happy

The Holy Grail

The disintegration of the Table Round, foreshadowed in previous tales, proceeds in The Holy Grail. Here the force that undermines the stability of the society which Arthur has established is religious fervor. Carried away by their desire for an unearthly holiness that only a few unusual men could attain, the knights of Arthur let the kingdom shift for itself while they rode away to seek the Grail. Galahad, the pure, sought and attained. Percival and Bors caught glimpses of the splendor. Lancelot was kept by his sinful love of Guinevere from realizing a holiness that, in his great sincerity of heart, he much desired. Gawain and the other knights merely wasted their efforts in a quest beyond their scope, meanwhile Camelot crumbled into ruins, and the kingdom of God on earth suffered from the absence of those who should have maintained it.

Pelleas and Ettarre

The story of Pelleas and Ettarre gives further indication that the ideals of faithfulness and purity on which the stability of the Table Round depended were losing their strength. The young Pelleas, inexperienced and idealistic, believed that all men, like Lancelot, were loyal, and all women, like Guinevere, were pure. His first disillusionment came from loving the self-centered Ettarre, who accepted his devotion only until he had won for her in a tournament the title of "Queen of Beauty," and then scorned him utterly. Trusting Gawain to plead his cause before Ettarre, Pelleas suffered another disillusionment in discovering that Gawain used the mission as a pretext for winning Ettarre's love for himself; and the later discovery that Lancelot and Guinevere were also guilty effectually destroyed his faith in humanity. Maddened, Pelleas, rushed to Camelot, fought with Lancelot, and, though defeated, made the lovers feel his scorn. "And each foresaw the dolorous day to be"

The Last Tournament

The love of Lancelot for Guinevere is ironically paralleled, in The Last Tournament, by the love of Tristram for Isolt, wife of King Mark of Cornwall. Lancelot and Guinevere, however guilty, were still noble, Tristram loved Isolt, abandoned her to marry in Brittany, and then returned, lured by the memory of Isolt's black eyes. On the way, he stopped at Camelot, where he found Arthur's court changed from its ancient purity into a place of lightness and revelry, observed the unhappiness of Lancelot and Guinevere in having, by their unwitting example, led the world astray, saw Arthur baffled by the failure of his ideals, and won, in a last tournament, a string of rubies for his love. Riding on, he came to Tintagel and Isolt. She reproached him for his treason, hated and yet loved him, he placed the rubies around her neck and sang her a last song before the sword of King Mark struck him down from behind.

Guinevere

In Guinevere the end of the Table Round has come. Before the opening of the tale, Modred had forced upon Arthur the knowledge of Lancelot's love for Guinevere, Lancelot had fled to France, Arthur had pursued him, and Modred had seized the kingdom in Arthur's absence. To escape Modred, Guinevere took refuge in a house of nuns at Almesbury, sorrowing for her part in the disruption of the kingdom, goaded to despair by the innocent prattling of a novice with her tales of the wicked queen. There Arthur came to take a last farewell before his battle with the traitors. As, noble in his sorrow, Arthur stood before her, reproachful but forgiving, Guinevere for the first time realized that she loved him with a higher love than ever she had loved Lancelot. But the discovery came too late.

The Passing of Arthur

The Passing of Arthur records the last great battle between the remnant of the Round Table and the rebels under Modred, the destruction of both armies, the death of Modred at Arthur's hand, the fatal wounding of Arthur, and the last scene of his life when only Bedivere is left with him. Wishing to restore his mystic sword Excalibur to the Lady of the Lake, from whom it had come, Arthur commanded Bedivere to throw it into the waters, twice the beauty of the sword lured Bedivere to disobey; the third time he flung it to a white arm that appeared to seize it. Remorseful for his delay, Bedivere then carried Arthur to the edge of the sea. There came a barge, and in the barge three queens, who received the king and bore him out of Bedivere's sight to Avalon, the happy island of the blessed. As he went, Arthur gave as a last word the hope that the order of the future might accomplish what the old order had nobly attempted—to subdue the bestial element in man and to make society coherent and high-minded.

LANCELOT AND ELAINE (p. 120)

Lancelot, the son of King Ban of Brittany, was stolen in infancy by Vivien, the Lady of the Lake, who threw him into the water, hence he was called Lancelot of the Lake. His guilty love for Guinevere, wife of King Arthur, was the initial cause of the disruption of the court. Astolat, the home of Elaine, according to Malory was Guildford, in Surrey. The poem is based upon Malory's Morte Darthur, Book 18, ch. 8-20.

This poem should be compared with The Lady of Shalott, p. 18.

Page 136, line 1418. Malory relates that when Lancelot heard of the last great battle, in which Arthur was wounded, he set out to seek forgiveness for the wrong done his king. But he was too late, Arthur was dead. After uttering a devout prayer for Arthur's soul, Lancelot sought Guinevere. He found her in a nunnery at Almesbury, and after taking a last farewell of her he expressed repentance in a lonely chapel and thereafter led a life of prayer and fasting. When Guinevere died, Lancelot burned her by the side of King Arthur in Glastonbury Abbey. Thereafter he refused food and drink, and within a few weeks he died.

THE HOLY GRAIL (p. 137)

For a statement regarding the origin and the significance of the Grail see Critical Note on Sir Galahad, p. 960.

Tennyson represents the quest for the Holy Grail by the multitude as mistaken zeal. The quest is properly reserved for a select few. The source of the poem is Malory's Morte Darthur, Books 11-17.

Page 142, lines 489-539. Stopford Brooke says of this passage. "In conception, in invention, in description of invented landscape, and in artistic word, this passing of Galahad is splendidly written . . . This great and lofty vision of the glory of the pure spiritual life, refined and thrilled by heavenly holiness into full union with the world beyond the sense, and needing no death to enter into the perfect life, is done as no one has done this kind of work since Dante."—Tennyson, His Art and Relation to Modern Life, p. 327.

Tennyson regarded this passage and lines 763-849 as among the best blank verse he ever wrote.

THE REVENGE (p. 151)

The main source of this poem was a report of the famous battle written in 1591 by Sir Walter Raleigh, a cousin of Grenville, the hero of the incident. Stevenson calls the poem "one of the noblest ballads in the English language." Cf. Browning's Heré Riel, p. 343.

Sir Richard Grenville was a British naval hero of the 16th century. In 1585 he had charge of a fleet that set out to colonize Virginia. In 1591 he was put in command of The Revenge, one of the best ships in the small fleet under Lord Thomas Howard sent to the Azores, islands west of Portugal, to intercept the Spanish treasure-ships returning from the West Indies. The king of Spain sent a powerful fleet of 53 warships against the English. The Earl of Cumberland, coasting along Portugal, sent a warning to Howard as he lay at anchor off Flores, the most westerly island of the Azores. Howard escaped with five of the six ships, but Grenville delayed to take his sick men aboard. He then tried to pass through the entire Spanish fleet, and the fight occurred. It lasted fifteen hours, and Grenville surrendered only after all but twenty of his men were killed. He was mortally wounded in the fight and died a few days later.

RIZPAH (p. 153)

This poem was suggested by a story, found in a current magazine, of a young man who had been hanged in chains in the 18th century for robbing the mail (Memoir, II, 250). The date 17—, prefixed to the poem, places the poem as of the 18th century, when it was the custom for bodies of criminals to be left hanging until they became skeletons.

The title of the poem is biblical, being taken from 2 Samuel, 21.8-10—"The king took the two sons of Rizpah, . . . and he delivered them into the hands of the Gibeonites, and they hanged them in the hill before the Lord . . . And Rizpah, the daughter of Aiah, took sackcloth and spread it for her upon the rock, from the beginning of harvest until water dropped upon them out of heaven, and suffered neither the birds of the air to rest on them by day, nor the beasts of the field by night."

The poem is a dramatic monologue spoken by a mad mother, on her deathbed in the hospital, to a visiting lady.

VASTNESS (p. 156)

No conviction was so constantly forced upon Tennyson as that expressed in the theme of this poem. He said: "What matters anything in this world without full faith in the Immortality of the Soul and of Love?"—Memoir, II, 343. Cf. In Memoriam, Section 34, p. 65, and Locksley Hall Sixty Years After, 60-72, p. 158.

The style of this poem and of To Virgil, which resembles that of Whitman, is unusual in Tennyson.

AKBAR'S DREAM (p. 166)

Akbar was the great Mogul ruler of India from 1565 to 1605. He invented a religion that aimed to incorporate the best of all beliefs. In the poem he relates a dream about building a temple where all people of all creeds might worship and in which might dwell "Truth, and Peace, and Love, and Justice." He saw himself killed and the temple destroyed, he saw also some people come from the west who restored toleration and abolished objectionable practices The "Hymn," addressed to the sun, stands at the end of the poem.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Robert Browning (1812-89) was descended on his father's side from English-Creole stock, his grandfather having married Margaret Tittle, a Creole from the West Indies. His mother was the daughter of a Hamburg German who married a Scottish woman and settled in Dundee, Scotland. Until the age of twenty-one Browning lived in Camberwell, on the outskirts of London. Except for two unimportant years in the University of London, his principal education came from private tutors and from his father, a well-to-do official of the Bank of England, who dabbled pleasantly in arts and letters, and who had gathered about him a library of six thousand volumes, most of which Browning soon mastered. His taste for painting and music, as well as for poetry and the theater, was developed in early years, then, as always, he lived vigorously. Byron was the first model for Browning's attempts at verse; when he was fourteen, he discovered Shelley's Queen Mab in a bookshop; with his mother's help he acquired Shelley's complete works, and under this influence wrote his Pauline (1833). While on a visit to St Petersburg, Russia, in the winter of 1833, he wrote Porphyria's Lover and Johannes Agricola, the earliest of his dramatic lyrics.

During the next two years Browning's tendencies in thought and art underwent a considerable change. He was too independent and original of mind to be imitative long. His next poem, Paracelsus (1835), was abstruse in theme and manner, dramatic rather than lyric in its method, a psychological study and a defense of an ethical principle, it marked, therefore, the direction that Browning's later poetry was to take. At the suggestion of the actor Macready, Browning now tried his hand at drama and wrote Strafford (1837), a tragedy that proved poorly adapted to the stage. Meanwhile, he had spent two years in Italy, where he acquired local color and background for his long poem Sordello (1840) and became enamored of the country and interested in her struggle for liberty from Austria. Sordello, the most difficult of Browning's poems to read because of its intricacies of style and phrasing, gave the author an unfortunate reputation for obscurity and lost him for nearly twenty years the sympathy of English readers. During the next six years Browning published a series entitled Bells and Pomegranates (1841-46), in which in drama, lyric, and romance, he struck the note that was to dominate the rest of his poetry. The dramas in the series, including Pippa Passes (1841), A Blot in the 'Scutcheon (1843), Colombe's Birthday (1844), and A Soul's Tragedy (1846), were hardly more successful as plays than Strafford; but in the short dramatic monologues, including such poems as In a Gondola, Pactor Ignotus, The Tomb at St. Praxed's, and the first part of Saul (which combined the psychological acuteness of Sordello with the objective directness of his plays), Browning had at last found his proper field.

Browning was not yet a popular poet when he was prompted, by reading a volume of poems published in 1844, to write its author, Miss Elizabeth Barrett, a letter of praise. She replied, other letters, a meeting, and an engagement followed. In spite of the obstacles due to her physical weakness and the opposition of her father, they were married in 1846 and went to Italy. The experience returned Mrs. Browning to at least partial health, a son was born, and she lived for fifteen years to give Browning happiness and encouragement. Their home, with the exception of visits in England and France, was the villa of Casa Gudi in Florence. Care for Mrs. Browning's health, the entertainment of interesting visitors from England and America, excursions into art and music, kept Browning from writing extended poems; but the series of shorter dramatic monologues published in 1850 and 1855 marked in many ways the summit of his achievement.

The death of Mrs. Browning in 1861 changed the current of Browning's life. With great difficulty he overcame an impulse to live in unproductive solitude, returning to England, he assumed the responsibility of educating his son, and began by degrees to find pleasure in his friendships, especially those with women. The Ring and the Book, which had been conceived before Mrs. Browning's death, as the result of finding the record of a 17th century murder-trial for sale in the Florentine market-place, occupied his time for some years and was at last published in 1868 and 1869. The interest in Greek literature which had been encouraged by Mrs. Browning's devotion to Euripides resulted in a series of poems on classical subjects from 1871 to 1877. In the last years of his life, his long-deferred popularity enlarged his contacts with the social and artistic life of his time. He regarded with somewhat amused tolerance the formation of Browning Clubs in England and America dedicated to his adulation. His later poetry consisted of realistic dramas in verse, such as The Red Cotton Night-Cap Country (1873) and The Inn Album (1875), or poems in which his political and ethical opinions were conveyed, with great indirectness and subtlety, through the self-confession of a protagonist, as in Prince Hohenstiel-Schwangau (1871) and Fifine at the Fair (1872). The difficulty of these poems staggered his admirers but could not wholly discourage them. His friendship with Miss Egerton-Smith was the Indian summer of his life, ended by her sudden death in 1877. His last two years he spent at Asolo, where he had written Pippa Passes during his first visit to Italy, and at Venice, where his son, now married, had a villa and studio. There he died in 1889. His last poems, collected under the title of Asolando (1890), showed that his vigor of mind and his great courage were unabated to the end.

Browning's principal publications were: Pauline, 1833; Paracelsus, 1836; Strafford, 1837; Sordello, 1840; Bells and Pomegranates, 1841-46, Christmas-Eve and Easter-Day, 1850, In a Balcony, 1855; Men and Women, 1855, Dramatis Personae, 1864; The Ring and the Book, 1868-69, Balaustion's Adventure, 1871; Prince Hohenstiel-Schwangau, 1871, Fifine at the Fair, 1872, The Red Cotton Night-Cap Country, 1873; Aristophanes' Apology, 1875, The Inn Album, 1875; Paccharatto and How He Worked in Distemper, with Other Poems, 1876, La Saisiaz, 1878; Dramatic Idyls, 1879-80, Jocoseria, 1883, Perishtah's Fancies, 1884; Parleyings with Certain People of Importance, 1887, Asolando, 1890.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISMS

"The first and perhaps the final impression we receive from the work of Robert Browning is that of a great nature, an immense personality. The poet in him is made up of many men. He is dramatist, humorist, lyricist, painter, musician, philosopher, and scholar, each in full measure, and he includes and dominates them all. In richness of nature, in scope and penetration of mind and vision, in energy of passion and emotion, he is probably second among English poets to Shakespeare alone. In art, in the power or the patience of working his native ore, he is surpassed by many, but few have ever held so rich a mine in fee. So large, indeed, appear to be his natural endowments, that we cannot feel as if the whole vast extent of his work has come near to exhausting them"—Arthur Symonds, An Introduction to the Study of Browning, p. 1.

The characters in Browning's dramas "are impervious to outward influence, except in so far as it serves to discharge what is already within. Within the inner realm of passions, emotions, volitions, ambitions, and the world which these catch up in their career, there is no lack of movement. A plenitude of powers, all active, are revealed by him: they cooperate, sever, mingle, collide, combine, and are all astrain—but they are all psychical. Browning places us in the parliament of the mind. It is the powers of the mind to which we listen in high debate. The tendency towards dwelling upon ideal issues rather than upon outer deeds, on the significance of facts for souls, and the insignificance of all things save in the soul's context, was always present in Browning, so, also, was the tendency towards monologue, with its deliberate, ordered persistency. And both of these tendencies grew. External circumstance became, more and more, the mere garb of the inner mood, deeds, more and more, the creatures of thoughts, and all real values were, more and more, undisguisedly ideal ministrants to man's need of beauty, or goodness, or love and happiness"—Sir Henry Jones, Cambridge History of English Literature, Vol. 13, pp. 67-68.

"Browning's chief influence, other than what is purely artistic, upon a reader is towards establishing a connection between the known order of things in which we live and move and that larger order of which it is a part. He plays upon the will, summoning it from lethargy to activity. He spiritualizes the passions by showing that they tend through what is human towards what is divine. He assigns to the intellect a sufficient field for exercise, but attaches more value to its efforts than its attainments. His faith in an unseen order of things creates a hope which persists through the apparent failures of earth. In a true sense he may be named the successor of Wordsworth, not indeed as an artist but as a teacher"—Edward Dowden, The Life of Robert Browning, p. 396.

"It will be well, too, while dealing with the question of Browning's alleged obscurity, to remind ourselves that often a piece of verse may obey all the laws of good poetry, and convey the peculiar pleasure that pertains to good poetry, yet not offer a definite, easily-stated proposition to the reasoning faculties. We must realize the value of the vague; the imagination must be sympathetic to the mood of Sir Thomas Browne when he declared he loved 'to lose himself in a mystery.' Many a poem of Browning—Childe Roland to the Dark Tower Came may be named as a type—piques us with a poignant sense of delight, although, when we have ransacked all the handbooks, we still puzzle over the meaning. There is such a thing as poetry for poetry's sake, and if a poet like Browning, whose message in general is so clear and high, chooses to write poetry of this sort, it is the part of wisdom to receive it in the same spirit, and not make the philistine mistake of setting it down as an opaque failure. And in any consideration of faulty technique, it is necessary to bear in mind that, in a sense, Life is more than art that a great personality, a great force in the world of thought, remains such whatever the aesthetic shortcomings. Whitman is one of the few significant persons yet produced in America, in spite of the fact that we may deplore his art creed, or lack of it. In like manner, while Robert Browning's position as a Victorian poet is likely to be affected eventually by the fact that his literary artistry is imperfect compared to his contemporary, Tennyson, the other fact that he is one of the most original, resourceful, and influential song-seers of the nineteenth century remains unshaken. Such indeed is his verbal magic at times, his might of music, his magnificently imaginative interpretation of humanity, the soar and fire of his message, that it seems as if all his peculiarities were but the necessary background to such a display of genius. He called himself in comparison with his wife 'only a painstaking fellow,' and such he was in uninspired moments, but at others he was so truly uplifted and elect to great utterance that we hold our breath and 'hush and bless ourselves with silence'"—Richard Burton, Introduction to Select Poems of Browning, p. xxxviii.

CRITICAL NOTES

PARACELSUS (p. 166)

Paracelsus, named after the hero, is a poem of five scenes, each representing a critical moment in the life of a famous Swiss physician (1493-1541) who, in spite of his charlatanism, has been termed "the father of modern chemistry." In the poem, Paracelsus, at twenty, aspires to attain knowledge, which he regards as the highest good, and contrary to the advice of two friends—Festus and his wife Michal—he decides to gain his end through untried methods and in unfamiliar places, he will give up love and pleasures of life in order to succeed. After nine years of study Paracelsus admits defeat, and as he reflects upon his sad condition, he hears the poet Aprile reveal his passion for love and beauty and the life of art. But Aprile admits failure in life because he has not knowledge, Paracelsus realizes that his plans could not succeed because he lacked the quality of love. Five years later, outwardly successful as a teacher and a physician, Paracelsus confides to Festus that his life is a failure because he has contented himself with low aims, he has lost the human qualities of love, hope, fear, and faith. His students desert him, and he is denounced as a quack, but he still aspires—he will combine pleasure with knowledge; he will try all experiences of life, no matter how evil. Festus warns him in vain against this course of action; in the last scene Paracelsus lies dying in a hospital, conscious of all his mistakes, but he expresses his confidence in these words:

"If I stoop
Into a dark tremendous sea of cloud,
It is but for a time; I press God's lamp
Close to my breast, its splendor, soon or late,
Will pierce the gloom. I shall emerge one day.
You understand me? I have said enough!"

In spite of its abstruseness of subject and manner, this poem is interesting and valuable in that it foreshadows much of Browning—his thought, his style, his high moral purpose, his lyrical power, and his ability to present critical moments of life poignantly in a form that anticipated his distinctive dramatic monologue

HEAP CASSIA, SANDAL-BUDS, AND STRIPES (p. 166)

This song is sung by Paracelsus to his friend Festus in Scene 4. Deserted and despised, Paracelsus sets out again in quest of knowledge, with all the enthusiasm of his youth—with the old aims, but not the same means. He speaks of the beauty of these aims, he calls them dreams and has them pass in song

OVER THE SEA OUR GALLEYS WENT (p. 166)

This song, a parable of "the men who proudly clung to their first fault, and withered in their pride," is also sung by Paracelsus in Scene 4. It explains his attitude toward "airy projects" that urged him to give over his wild courses of pleasure and hold to a "noble purpose."

THUS THE MAYNE GLIDETH (p. 167)

This song, in Scene 5, is sung by Festus as he tries to comfort the dying and half-delirious Paracelsus. The song of the river they both knew so well restored the heart and mind of the listener as David's music restored the mind of Saul. (See Saul, p. 213.)

PIPPA PASSES (p. 169)

Mrs. Orr reports (Handbook, p. 55) that "Mr. Browning was walking alone, in a wood near Dulwich, when the image flashed upon him of someone walking thus alone through life, one apparently too obscure to leave a trace of his or her passage, yet exercising a lasting though unconscious influence at every step of it, and the image shaped itself into the little silk-winder of Asolo, Felippa, or Pippa."

"The dramas of Browning," says Arlo Bates, "are inward. His temperament led him to select as the motif of a play a theme so spiritual that its completeness could not be visible even to those of fairly acute perception in that swift first view which is all the stage allows. When he had worked out this theme, moreover, he took no trouble to complete the outward story. The result in representation was sure to be disconcerting and episodic. Striking examples of this are Pippa Passes and In a Balcony, where as far as outward events are concerned nothing is finished, and an audience must inevitably feel that it has seen only part of the play. Yet each is complete in the spiritually dramatic sense. The theme of the first, for instance, is the influence of Pippa upon other lives, unseen and unseeing, and this is fully shown. What happens as a consequence of the influence is not part of the spiritual theme. The drama, however, demands the completeness of the visible, whereas Browning was content with the working out of the spiritual"—Introduction to A Blot in the 'Scutcheon, p. xvi.

RUDEL TO THE LADY OF TRIPOLI (p. 191)

Geoffrey de Rudel was a Provençal troubadour of the 12th century. Although he had never seen the Countess of Tripoli, he had heard of her great beauty, and in the true spirit of chivalric love of the Middle Ages he set out to visit her in her home in Northern Africa. When he arrived at Tripoli, he was deathly sick, and when the Countess went on board the ship to see him, he died in her arms. In the poem the Mount is the Lady, the Sun is Love, and the Flower is Rudel.

IN A GONDOLA (p. 194)

When Browning heard of a picture by Daniel Machse (1806-70) entitled The Serenade, he wrote the first stanza of this poem to stand as the description of the picture in an art catalog. Later, when he saw the picture, he thought it merited better treatment and wrote the rest of the poem

THE LABORATORY (p. 201)

The first water-color painting of Dante Gabriel Rossetti was an illustration of this poem and had as its title line 4—"Which is the poison to poison her, prithee?" Arthur Symonds refers to the poem as "one of the very finest examples of Browning's unique power of compressing and concentrating intense emotion into a few pregnant words, each of which has its own visible gesture and audible intonation"—An Introduction to the Study of Browning, p. 86

"HOW THEY BROUGHT THE GOOD NEWS FROM GHENT TO AIX" (p. 203)

Browning said that there was no historical foundation for this poem. "I wrote it," he states, "under the bulwark of a vessel, off the African coast, after I had been at sea long enough to appreciate even the fancy of a gallop on the back of a certain good horse 'York,' then in my stable at home."

THE LOST LEADER (p. 204)

The following letter was written by Browning in reply to a question whether this poem refers to

Wordsworth after he abandoned the liberal views of his youth

19 Warwick-Crescent, W, Feb 24, '75

DEAR MR GROSART I have been asked the question you now address me with, and as duly answered it, I can't remember how many times, there is no sort of objection to one more assurance or rather confession, on my part, that I did in my hasty youth presume to use the great and venerated personality of Wordsworth as a sort of painter's model, one from which this or the other particular feature may be selected and turned to account, had I intended more, above all, such a boldness as portraying the entire man, I should not have talked about "handfuls of silver and bits of ribbon." These never influenced the change of politics in the great poet, whose defection, nevertheless, accompanied as it was by a regular face-about of his special party, was to my juvenile apprehension, and even mature consideration, an event to deplore. But just as in the tapestry on my wall I can recognize figures which have struck out a fancy, on occasion, that though truly enough thus derived, yet would be preposterous as a copy, so, though I dare not deny the original of my little poem, I altogether refuse to have it considered as the "very effigies" of such a moral and intellectual superiority.

Faithfully yours,

ROBERT BROWNING.

THE BISHOP ORDERS HIS TOMB AT SAINT PRAXED'S CHURCH (p. 212)

This poem has won high praise for the way in which it re-creates the temper of the Renaissance period. Ruskin says of the poem "Robert Browning is unerring in every sentence he writes of the Middle Ages; always vital, right, and profound, so that in the matter of art, with which we have been specially concerned, there is hardly a principle connected with the medieval temper that he has not struck upon in those seemingly careless and too rugged rhymes of his . . . I know no other piece of modern English prose or poetry in which there is so much told, as in these lines, of the Renaissance spirit—its worldliness, inconsistency, pride, hypocrisy, ignorance of itself, love of art, of luxury, and of good Latin. It is nearly all that I said of the central Renaissance in thirty pages of the Stones of Venice, put into as many lines, Browning's being also the antecedent work. The worst of it is that this kind of concentrated writing needs so much solution before the reader can fairly get the good of it, that people's patience fails them, and they give the thing up as insoluble, though, truly, it ought to be to the current of common thought like Saladin's talisman, dipped in clear water, not soluble altogether, but making the element medicinal"—Modern Painters, Vol IV, ch 20, sec 32, 34

SAUL (p 213)

Saul is generally regarded as one of Browning's greatest achievements and as the noblest of his religious poems. Arthur Symonds says of it "It seems to unite almost the whole of his qualities as a poet in perfect fusion. Music, song, the beauty of nature, the joy of life, the glory and greatness of man, the might of Love, human and divine—all these are set to an orchestral accompaniment of continuous harmony, now hushed as the wind among the woods at evening, now strong and sonorous as the storm-wind battling with the mountain pine. Saul is a vision of life, of time and of eternity, told in song as sublime as the vision is steadfast"—An Introduction to the Study of Browning, p 89

The first nine stanzas of the poem were published in 1845, the rest were written in Rome in 1853-54, after his marriage. The advance in religious fervor noticeable in the second part has been said to be due to the influence of Mrs Browning.

A GRAMMARIAN'S FUNERAL (p 237)

Dr. Richard Burton says of this poem: "I know of no lyric of the poet's more representative of his peculiar and virile strength than this, in that it makes vibrant and thoroughly emotional an apparently unpromising theme. In relation to the Renaissance, to the age of the revival of learning, the moral is the higher inspiration derived from the new wine of the classics, so that what in later times has cooled down too often to a dry-as-dust study of the husks of knowledge, is shown to be, at the start, a veritable reveling in the delights of the fruit"—Literary Likings, p. 162

Stopford Brooke says: "This is the artist at work, and I doubt whether all the laborious prose written, in history and criticism, on the revival of learning, will ever express better than this short poem the inexhaustible thirst of the Renaissance in its pursuit of knowledge, or the enthusiasm of the pupils of a New Scholar for his desperate strife to know in a short life the very center of the universe"—The Poetry of Robert Browning, p 155

THE STATUE AND THE BUST (p 239)

The characters and the places mentioned in this poem are historical. The statue is that of Ferdinand I (1549-1609), Grand Duke of Florence. It stands in the Piazza della Santa Annunziata, a famous square in Florence named after the church on one side of it. The statue looks toward the palace once owned by a noble family named Riccardi and now called the Palazzo Antinori. The bust, which existed only in fancy, was that of the wife of the head of the Riccardi family, it is represented as having been placed beneath the window of the palace which the statue faces.

The Duke's palace, situated in the Via Larga (line 34) was built by Cosimo dei Medici in 1430. In 1659 it was sold by the Medici family to Marchese Riccardi, and has since been known as the Palazzo Riccardi. It should not be confused with the original Riccardi palace, in which the lady was kept prisoner.

A correspondent of an American paper once asked the following questions regarding this poem.

1. When, how, and where did it happen? Browning's divine vagueness lets one gather only that the lady's husband was a Riccardi. 2. Who was the lady? who the duke? 3. The magnificent house wherein Florence lodges her prîet is known to all Florentine ball-goers as the Palazzo Riccardi. It was bought by the Riccardi from the Medici in 1659. From none of its windows did the lady gaze at her more than royal lover From what window, then, if from any? Are the statue and the bust still in their original positions?

The letter fell into the hands of Thomas J Wise, he sent it to Browning, and received the following answer:

Jan 8, 1887

DEAR MR WISE I have seldom met with such a strange inability to understand what seems the plainest matter possible "ball-goers" are probably not history-readers, but any guide-book would confirm what is sufficiently stated in the poem I will append a note or two, however 1 "This story the townsmen tell"; "when, how, and where," constitutes the subject of the poem. 2 The lady was the wife of Riccardi; and the duke, Ferdinand, just as the poem says 3 As it was built by, and inhabited by, the Medici till sold, long after, to the Riccardi, it was not from the duke's palace, but a window in that of the Riccardi, that the lady gazed at her lover riding by The statue is still in its place, looking at the window under which "now is the empty shrine" Can anything be clearer? My "vagueness" leaves what to be, "gathered" when all these things are put down in black and white? Oh, "ball-goers"!

Page 242, lines 214-250. "Mr. Santayana in his most interesting book Interpretations of Poetry and Religion . . . describes the poetry of Browning most truly as the poetry of barbarism, by which he means the poetry which utters the primeval and indivisible emotions 'For the barbarian is the man who regards his passions as their own excuse for being, who does not domesticate them either by understanding their cause, or by conceiving their ideal goal.' Whether this be or be not a good definition of the barbarian, it is an excellent and perfect definition of the poet. It might, perhaps, be suggested that barbarians, as a matter of fact, are generally highly traditional and respectable persons who would not put a feather wrong in their head-gear, and who generally have very few feelings and think very little about those they have It is when we have grown to a greater and more civilized stature that we begin to realize and put to ourselves intellectually the great feelings that sleep in the depths of us. Thus it is that the literature of our day has steadily advanced toward a passionate simplicity, and we become more primeval as the world grows older until Whitman writes huge and chaotic psalms to express the sensations of a schoolboy out fishing, and Maeterlinck embodies in symbolic dramas the feelings of a child in the dark."—Chesterton, Robert Browning, pp. 183-84.

"CHILDE ROLAND TO THE DARK TOWER CAME" (p 242)

This poem is based upon Edgar's mad song in King Lear, III, 4, 171-73.—

"Child Rowland to the dark tower came,
His word was still—Fie, foh, and fum,
I smell the blood of a British man"

Mrs. Orr (Handbook, p 274, note) ventures to state that the picturesque materials in the poem "included a tower which Mr Browning once saw in the Carrara Mountains, a painting which caught his eye years later in Paris, and the figure of a horse in the tapestry in his own drawing-room—welded together in the remembrance of the line from King Lear"

In an article describing a visit to Browning, J W Chadwick speaks of the tapestry and writes as follows

"Upon the lengthwise wall of the room, above the Italian furniture, somber and richly carved, there was a long, wide band of tapestry, on which I thought I recognized the miserable horse of Childe Roland's pilgrimage —

'One stiff blind horse, his every bone a-stare, Stood stupefied, however he came there
Thrust out past service from the devil's stud'

I asked Mr Browning if the beast of the tapestry was the beast of the poem; and he said yes, and descanted somewhat on his lean monstrosity. But only a Browning could have evolved the stanzas of the poem from the woven image. I further asked him if he had ever said that he only wrote Childe Roland for its realistic imagery, without any moral purpose—a notion to which Mrs. Sutherland Orr has given currency, and he protested that he never had. When I asked him if constancy to an ideal—'He that endureth to the end shall be saved'—was not a sufficient understanding of the central purpose of the poem, he said, 'Yes, just about that.'—"An Eagle-Feather," The Christian Register, Jan. 19, 1888 (67:37).

Chesterton writes of the poem "It is the hint of an entirely new and curious type of poetry, the poetry of the shabby and hungry aspect of the earth itself. Daring poets who wished to escape from conventional gardens and orchards had long been in the habit of celebrating the poetry of rugged and gloomy landscapes, but Browning is not content with this He insists upon celebrating the poetry of mean landscapes That sense of scrubbiness in nature, as of a man unshaved, had never been conveyed with this enthusiasm and primeval gusto before

'If there pushed any ragged thistle-stalk

Above its mates, the head was chopped; the bents
Were jealous else What made those holes and rents
In the dock's harsh swarth leaves, bruised as to balk
All hope of greenness? 'tis a brute must walk
Pashing their life out, with a brute's intents'

"This is a perfect realization of that eerie sentiment which comes upon us, not so often among mountains and waterfalls, as it does on some half-starved common at twilight, or in walking down some gray mean street. It is the song of the beauty of refuse, and Browning was the first to sing it Oddly enough it has been one of the poems about which most of those pedantic and trivial questions have been asked, which are asked by those who treat Browning as a science instead of a poet 'What does the poem of Childe Roland mean?' The only genuine answer to this is 'What does anything mean?' Does the earth mean nothing? Do gray skies and wastes covered with thistles mean nothing? Does an old horse turned out to graze mean nothing? If it does, there is but one further truth to be added—that everything means nothing."—Robert Browning, p 159

IN A BALCONY (p. 245)

"The real core of the play is this development of the love of Constance. She allows herself to be loved, she delights in the pretty play of intrigue, she is proud of the devotion of this man who is shaping the destinies of the kingdom, she is even great enough to be ready to make to the Queen the highest sacrifice of which her nature as it then is can be capable: but she is not touched by the flame of that passion which makes the very soul of Norbert incandescent. The great motif of In a Balcony is the awakening of the inmost consciousness of Constance to the greatness of the love of Norbert and her quick response to that call which this perception makes to her highest and most feminine nature. . . . To call the drama incomplete—'equivalent to the third or fourth act of what might prove a tragedy or a drama,' is Mrs. Sutherland Orr's way of putting it—or to consider of importance what comes after the closing words of Constance, is to ignore the fact that the aim is to picture the regeneration of the soul of Constance from intellectual love to supreme passion, her rise from intellectual self-sacrifice to that complete self-surrender which is the highest phase of human love, and to fail to consider how this aim is completely accomplished before the curtain falls"—Arlo Bates, Introduction, A Blot in the 'Scutcheon, and Other Plays, pp. xxix, xxxi.

A contrasting view of this drama is given in the following quotation from Stopford Brooke

"I do not believe that Browning meant to make self-sacrifice the root of Constance's doings. If he did he has made a terrible mess of the whole thing. He was much too clear-headed a moralist to link self-sacrifice to systematic lying. Self-sacrifice is not self-sacrifice at all when it sacrifices truth. It may wear the clothes of Love, but, in injuring righteousness, it injures the essence of love. It has a surface beauty, for it imitates love, but if mankind is allured by this beauty, mankind is injured. It is the false Florniel of self-sacrifice. Browning, who had studied self-sacrifice, did not exhibit it in Constance. There is something else at the root of her actions, and I believe it to be jealousy. The very first he she urges her lover to tell (that is, to let the Queen imagine he loves her) is just the thing a jealous woman would invent to try her lover and the Queen, if she suspected the Queen of loving him, and him of being seduced from her by the worldly advantage of marrying the Queen."—Stopford Brooke, The Poetry of Robert Browning, pp. 341-342

FRA LIPPO LIPPI (p. 261)

"This picture of the harum-scarum monk painter of the fifteenth century, historical in its framework but with Browning's usual freedom of psychologic interpretation, is instinct with the pagan joy of life which is in dramatic contrast with the conventual medieval conception. Aside from its pictorial and human values—and these suffice to place it high among the monologues—it has much interest as an expression of the so-called realistic philosophy of art, put into the mouth of Lippo, one of the strongest of arguments for those who find the reproduction of God's world in art an all-sufficient object. The fellow monks who believed that deity was best served by bad drawing and untruth to human nature, stand for the pseudo-idealists."—Richard Burton, Select Poems of Robert Browning, p. 319

ANDREA DEL SARTO (p. 266)

This poem was written as an interpretation of a picture by Andrea del Sarto representing the painter and his wife, in the Pitti Palace, Florence. John Kenyon, a cousin of Mrs. Browning, had asked Browning to secure for him a copy of the picture, being unable to find a satisfactory copy, Browning sent him the poem instead.

The early paintings of Andrea del Sarto are regarded as his best work. A C Swinburne says of them "These are the first fruits of his flowering manhood, when the bright and buoyant genius in him had free play and large delight in its handiwork, when the fresh interest of invention was still his, and the dramatic sense, the pleasure in the play of life, the power of motion and variety, before the old strength of sight and of flight had passed from weary wing and clouding eye, the old pride and energy of enjoyment had gone out of hand and heart."

"How the change fell upon him, and how it wrought, anyone may see who compares his later with his earlier work. . . . The time came when another than Salome [referring to Andrea del Sarto's picture of Salome dancing before Herod] was to dance before the eyes of the painter, and she required of him the head of no man, but his own soul, and he paid the forfeit into her hands."

. . . In Mr. Browning's noblest poem—his noblest, it seems to me—the whole tragedy is distilled into the right words, the whole man raised up and reclothed with flesh. One point only is but lightly touched upon—missed it could not be by an eye so sharp and skillful—the effect upon his art of the poisonous solvent of love. How his life was corroded by it, and his soul burnt into dead ashes we are shown in full, but we are not shown in full what as a painter he was before, what as a painter he might have been without it—"Notes on Designs of the Old Masters at Florence," Complete Works, Vol. 15, pp. 190-193

PROSPICE (p. 295)

This poem is a triumphant statement of Browning's faith in personal immortality. In 1876 he said in a letter to a friend "Dante wrote what I will transcribe from my wife's Testament wherein I recorded it fourteen years ago, 'Thus I believe, thus I affirm, thus I am certain it is, that from this life I shall pass to another, there where that lady lives of whom my soul was enamored'" (Griffin, The Life of Robert Browning, p. 297). To another correspondent he wrote "Why, amico mio, you know as well as I that death is life, just as our daily, our momentarily, dying body is none the less alive and ever recruiting new forces of existence. Without death, which is our crapelike churchyard word for change, for growth, there could be no prolongation of that which we call life. . . . Never say of me that I am dead."

THE RING AND THE BOOK (p. 298)

This is Browning's longest if not his greatest work, the triumph of the dramatic monologue. It consists of twelve books totaling over 20,000 lines, which present from different points of view the story of a famous murder that occurred in Italy in 1698.

As recorded in The Old Yellow Book, the source of Browning's poem, the story is as follows: Guido Franceschini (born 1658), a Florentine nobleman of depleted fortune, was married at Rome in 1693 to Pompilia (born July 17, 1680), brought up as the daughter and heir of Pietro and Violante Comparini, who were thought to possess considerable property. All three went to live with Guido in his home at Arezzo. Unable to endure the bitter feeling shortly aroused, the Comparini returned to Rome (Mar-Apr., 1694) and gave out the report that Pompilia was not their child, Violante having purchased her as a baby from a disreputable mother. On this ground Pietro brought suit against Guido to recover the marriage dowry. The case, first decided in favor of Guido, was appealed and never settled, much to Guido's mortification.

Because of domestic unhappiness, partly due to Guido's jealousy aroused by the friendship between Pompilia and Giuseppe Caponsacchi (born 1673), a young Canon in the church, Pompilia fled with the Canon for Rome—on April 29, 1697. They arrived on the following evening at Castelnuovo, a hamlet about fifteen miles from Rome, and stayed all night at the inn, where they were overtaken by Guido next morning. On his complaint they were arrested and taken to prison. They were tried before the Tribunal of the Governor, and in September a decision was announced. Pompilia was sent to a convent, and Caponsacchi was suspended for three years and banished to Civita Vecchia, a seaport near Rome. Expecting the birth of a child, Pompilia was allowed to go to the house of the Comparini in Rome. Both Guido and Pompilia had entered suit for divorce, but before either case could be considered, Pompilia gave birth to a son, on December 18, 1697. On the night of January 2, 1698, Guido and four of his confederates gained entrance to the house, murdered the aged Comparini, and left Pompilia for dead; she lived four days. The murderers were caught, tried before the Court, and sentenced to be executed. Guido's appeal to the Pope for clemency was denied, and the execution took place on February 22, 1698.

Browning became interested in the story in 1860, when by chance he came upon a parchment-bound book in Florence containing a collection of documents—some printed and some written—bearing upon the case, he bought the volume for eightpence. This collection is now known as The Old Yellow Book, it was Browning's chief source of material, and furnished the "Book" part of the title of his poem. The other part of the title was derived from a ring worn by Mrs. Browning, and after her death by Browning himself on his watch-chain.

Book I, called The Ring and the Book, explains the title of the poem by pointing out the analogy between the process of manufacturing a ring and the process of transforming the collection of crude facts into a finished poem. As the jeweler adds an alloy to permit the desired workmanship on the ring, so Browning mixes his poetic fancy with the simple legal evidence contained in the Yellow Book to make possible an artistic whole. A summary of the story is given as Browning imagines it after his fancy has vitalized the characters into living personalities. In the end, however, as with the ring, the alloy must be removed, leaving only the refashioned product. To accomplish this result, the characters will appear in the poem and tell their own stories.

Book II, Half Rome, presents the view of persons who take Guido's side—that of a husband deceived and imposed upon from the beginning. The scene is in the church where the dead bodies of the Comparini lie exposed to the view of the curious multitude. The story, up to the point of the murder, is told by a partisan who suggests that as Violante had deceived her husband regarding the child, it was natural for her to deceive Guido since she desired a noble husband for the girl. After the foster-parents left Guido's home and announced that Pompilia was not their child, Guido took the view that all this was done to defraud him. Naturally he was resentful, especially when the Court gave such slight punishment to Pompilia and the priest. What Guido did, therefore, he did in defense of his honor.

Book III, The Other Half Rome, presents the view of the other half of the public, in favor of Pompilia, dying in the hospital from her wounds. The action of the Comparini is excused, and it is Guido who is charged with treachery and deceit and cruelty. It is pointed out that guilty persons would not flee, much less stop before they reached their destination. This half of the public denies the husband the right to act as judge and executioner of his own case.

Book IV, Tertium Quid, presents the opinion of a disinterested critic, the spokesman of the superior class, who cleverly tried to avoid offending the prejudices of his distinguished listeners. Both parties in the action are blamed, both excused. Which sinned more was hard to tell.

Book V, Count Guido Franceschini, gives Guido's defense. Tortured into confessing the murder, Guido seeks to justify his whole course of action. He tells the Court of his ancient and honored family, of its service to the state and to the church. In seeking a wife with a dowry he followed a laudable course, advised by loyal friends. He had dealt fairly, but had been cheated. Besides, Pompilia and her foster-parents had maligned his character and had made him the laughing-stock of the town. His resentment was natural when his wife was referred to as the bastard of a nameless strumpet, and when he found Caponsacchi loitering about her windows. Then one morning he found the servants drugged, his money stolen, and his wife gone with the priest. When he overtook the fugitives, he did not, as was his right, exact immediate vengeance by killing them, but called upon the law for help, and all he got was mild punishment for the offenders.

When he heard of the release of Pompilia, of the birth of her son, and of the theft of the child he had longed for, he could not endure the shame longer. With four loyal servants he went to Rome. They arrived on Christmas Eve, and for nine days he prayed against temptation to avenge the wrongs. He confessed the murder, but after it was committed he slept soundly, he had done God's bidding—what the Court should have done before—and as the law's defender he demands thanks and his freedom.

Book VI, Giuseppe Caponsacchi, gives the story of the priest, the facts that he had related at his own trial six months before. Then the Court laughed at him, now it listens soberly. He stresses the sanctity of his priestly vows and tells how he first saw Pompilia, the "sad, strange lady," at the theater, how letters were brought to him, purported to have been written by her, imploring sympathy and aid. Though conscious of the trick being played by Guido, the priest talked with Pompilia and learned that the letters were forgeries since she could neither read nor write; and together they planned the escape, and rode continuously until they reached Castelnuovo, near Rome. All night he kept guard over Pompilia, but early in the morning they were overtaken by Guido and his band, and later tried and punished. He reminds the Court of the forged letters and points out that if he and Pompilia were guilty they would not have taken flight as they did. He reasserts his innocence, and with all the sincerity and pathos of his nature begs the Court to be just.

Book VII, Pompilia, gives the life story of Pompilia as she told it on her death-bed in the presence of the nuns and of her confessor. Conscious of her impending death from Guido's twenty-two dagger wounds, she rejoices that she has been a mother if only for two weeks. She tells of her happy child-life with the Compagni, of the mysteriousness of her marriage with Guido, of the unfortunate deceit practiced upon him by Violante, and of his cruel treatment and false charges. When she was told that the priest had written her letters, she begged that he be entreated to write no more. Unable to endure the torture in Guido's home, she had appealed first to the Archbishop, then to the Governor of the city, and when aid was denied, she asked Caponsacchi to take her to her foster-parents at Rome. She tells of the flight, of being overtaken by Guido, and of the horrors of the fatal night of the murder. Though she could not love her husband, she forgives him. At the last she blesses Caponsacchi and commits her soul to God.

Book VIII, Dominus Hyacinthus de Archangelis, gives the plans of Guido's lawyer, who sees in the case a great opportunity for self-exploitation. He is in his study preparing for the defense. He plans to astonish the Pope with his eloquence, and to ridicule the Latin of his opponent, whose argument he endeavors to anticipate. He will object to the method used to force a confession from Guido on the ground that a nobleman is exempt from torture. If Guido had not confessed, it would have been easy to charge the murder to Caponsacchi. In his speech to the court he plans to quote authorities who say that a man's honor is inviolable, and he will insist that Guido acted within his rights. He also plans to speak for the four accomplices. His account is interspersed with remarks regarding family matters, especially his liking for rich foods.

Book IX, Juris Doctor Johannes-Baptista Bothinus, introduces Pompilia's lawyer as he prepares the case of the state against Guido and his confederates. He plans to make light of the charges against Pompilia and Caponsacchi and to admit the possibility of many of them being true. He will praise the priest for defending Pompilia after the Archbishop and the Governor had refused to aid her. He will adorn his speech with learned literary allusions and will take pains to criticize his opponent's method of living.

Book X, The Pope, presents the final judgment, made by the Pope, to whom the decision of the Court had been appealed. After a detailed study of the evidence in the case the Pope finds nothing good in Guido, and denounces him for his dastardly acts, especially since he had had every opportunity for right living and had not shown any signs of repentance for what he had done to Pompilia and Caponsacchi, both champions of truth, are found worthy of praise. In full consciousness of performing his duty to God he signs the order for the execution of Guido and his accomplices.

The Pope called Pompilia "perfect in whiteness . . . my flower, my rose, I gather for the breast of God." Of Caponsacchi he said—

"And surely not so very much apart,
Need I place thee, my warnor priest."

Book XI, Guido, presents the final plea by the condemned man in his prison cell awaiting execution. He protests his innocence and implores the aid of the Cardinal and the Abate who have come to be with him to the end. He denounces the Pope for his lack of mercy, and refuses to repent. He seeks to justify all his acts, and regrets that Pompilia lived long enough to tell her story, otherwise he would have been free. He makes a final frantic appeal for his life as he hears approaching the Brothers of Mercy, who have come to chant the Office of the Dying at his cell-door and to attend his death on the scaffold.

Book XII, The Book and the Ring, gives the report of the execution and comments of persons regarding it. The first is contained in a letter from a Venetian who had visited Rome and witnessed the public execution; he describes the events of the day and states that before his death Guido asked forgiveness of God. One letter is from Guido's lawyer to friends of the Court telling them of the fine quality of his client and stating that he does not care how soon the old Pope dies. The third letter is from Pompilia's lawyer who regrets that he had not been on the other side, since the case was so easy that he had had no opportunity to show his skill. He objects to public statements made by Pompilia's confessor and vows to even things up when he defends the nuns in their suit for Pom-pila's property. A decision of the Pope, however, restores the character of Pompilia and dismisses the suit of the nuns. No record was found of Pompila's son.

"The Ring and the Book is full of exquisite beauty, amazing felicity of expression, fluent rhythm and melody, full also of crudities, jolts, harshness, pedantry, wretched witticisms, and coarseness. Why these contrasts? Because it is a study of human testimony. The lawyers in this work speak no radiant or spiritual poetry, they talk like tiresome, conceited pedants because they were tiresome, conceited pedants, Pompilia's dying speech of adoring passion for Caponsacchi is sublime music, because she was a spiritual woman in a glow of exaltation. Guido speaks at first with calm, smiling irony, and later rages like a wild beast caught in a spring-trap, in both cases the verse fits his mood. If Pompilia's tribute to Caponsacchi had been expressed in language as dull and flat as the pleas of the lawyers, then we should be quite sure that Browning, whatever he was, was no poet. For it would indicate that he could not create the right diction for the right situation and character"—W. L. Phelps, Browning, How to Know Him, pp. 45-46.

MUCKLE-MOUTH MEG (p. 355)

This poem is related to the folklore theme of the "loathly lady" who is frequently a bespelled mortal waiting for some courageous hero to kiss her and break the charm that keeps her ugly. See Morris's The Lady of the Land, p. 633. It was once the practice in England to allow criminals their freedom if they would marry disreputable women. See Feste's statement in Twelfth Night, I, 5, 20: "Many a good hanging prevents a bad marriage." The story told in this poem is to be found in Sir Thomas Dick Lauder's Scottish Rivers. It is based upon a feud that had existed for a long time between the Murrays and the Scotts. William Scott, son of the head of the family of Harden, was caught, with his followers, stealing cattle from Sir Gideon Murray, and was given the choice, as stated in the poem, of either marrying Sir Gideon's daughter, muckle-mouthed Meg, or hanging. He chose the daughter. Sir Walter Scott, who was always proud of his Border ancestry, was descended from this marriage.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Elizabeth Barrett Browning (1806-61) was from her girlhood devoted to literature. Without any regular education, she yet contrived to pick up from her brother's tutor a knowledge of Greek, Latin, and the modern languages; Homer and Pope were her earliest passions. Her father, who combined a despotic desire to rule unconditionally in his family with a pride in the achievements of his children, had Elizabeth's premature epic on the Battle of Marathon privately printed in 1819. Her exercises in verses became her chief amusement when, in 1821, she fell in saddling her pony, and suffered an injury to her spine, this injury and the later shock of her brother's death by drowning confined her for many years to a darkened room. A volume of poems in 1828 made her known to the world, in 1844 she published a volume which not only established her poetic reputation, but also moved Robert Browning, then rising to fame, to write her a letter of praise. A correspondence followed, and a meeting in 1845. Under the stimulus of Browning's companionship, Miss Barrett found new life. The record of the experience is in her Sonnets from the Portuguese (1847). Her health so improved that marriage seemed possible, it met an obstacle in the fanatical opposition of her father; yet she showed a strength of purpose as great as his, married Browning secretly, and soon after left with him for France and Italy. During the next fifteen years, Mrs. Browning's home, except for occasional visits to France and England, was the villa of Casa Guidi at Florence, where her son was born in 1849, her books written, and artists and writers from England and America hospitably entertained. Among these guests was Hawthorne, who has left a description of Mrs. Browning's delicacy, her slender hands, black ringlets, and pale, eager face. Her impulsive sympathy made her an ardent champion of the Italian struggle for independence from Austria, a strain of mysticism in her nature made her a convert to spiritualism. Yet her life was largely centered in a passionate love for her home, her husband, and her boy. Her health, always precarious, at length failed in 1861.

Mrs Browning's principal works were: An Essay on Mind, with Other Poems, 1826, Prometheus Bound, and Miscellaneous Poems, 1833, The Seraphim, and Other Poems, 1838, Poems, 1844; Sonnets from the Portuguese, 1847; Casa Guidi Windows, 1851, Aurora Leigh, 1857, Poems before Congress, 1860; Last Poems, 1862.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISMS

"Elizabeth Barrett had a strength really rare among women poets—the strength of phrase. She excelled in her sex, in epigram, almost as much as Voltaire in his. Pointed phrases like 'Martyrs by the pang without the palm'—or 'Incense to sweeten a crime and myrrh to embitter a curse,' these expressions, which are witty after the old fashion of the conceit, came quite freshly and spontaneously to her quite modern mind. But the first fact is this, that these epigrams of hers were never so true as when they turned on one of the two or three pivots on which contemporary Europe was really turning. She is by far the most European of all the English poets of that age, all of them, even her own much greater husband, look local beside her. Tennyson and the rest are nowhere"—Gilbert Chesterton, The Victorian Age in Literature, pp. 177-78.

"In spite of all deduction that can be made—deductions, be it remembered, which are sometimes to be counted against the reader, and only sometimes against the poetess—she remains an attractive and delightful personage, and she has stamped enough of herself upon her poetry to give it an enduring charm. Her deep tenderness and genuineness of feeling, showing themselves in such poems as the Cry of the Children or Cowper's Grave, will never fail of their rightful power. She has touched all the chief human relationships, that of friend and friend, that of husband and wife, that of mother and child, with an exquisite insight and sensitiveness and delicacy, and her style, when she touches them, attains almost always that noble and severe simplicity which is so greatly to be preferred to her most luscious and copious versification"—W. T. Arnold, The English Poets (ed. by T. H. Ward), Vol. IV, p. 567.

CRITICAL NOTES

SONNETS FROM THE PORTUGUESE (p. 365)

This is a sonnet sequence (not a translation as the name implies) celebrating the love and courtship of Robert Browning and Elizabeth

Barrett. The collection was first shown to Browning after the marriage. The incident is thus related by Edmund Gosse in Critical Kitt-Kats, p. 2: "Their custom was, Mr. Browning said, to write alone, and not to show each other what they had written. This was a rule which he sometimes broke through, but she never. He had the habit of working in a downstairs room, where their meals were spread, while Mrs. Browning studied in a room on the floor above. One day, early in 1847, their breakfast being over, Mrs. Browning went upstairs, while her husband stood at the window watching the street till the table should be cleared. He was presently aware of someone behind him, although the servant was gone. It was Mrs. Browning, who held him by the shoulder to prevent his turning to look at her, and at the same time pushed a packet of papers into the pocket of his coat. She told him to read that, and to tear it up if he did not like it, and then she fled again to her own room."

The sonnets were meant to be private, but were published at the urgent suggestion of Browning, who once said, "I dared not reserve to myself the finest sonnets written in any language since Shakespeare." For some unexplained reason Mrs. Browning selected the title Sonnets Translated from the Bosman, but Browning suggested Sonnets from the Portuguese because of his admiration of an earlier love poem by Mrs. Browning—Calamita to Camoens. Camoens (1524-80) was a famous Portuguese poet.

CASA GUIDI WINDOWS (p. 373)

The home of the Brownings overlooked a portion of the city of Florence that was the scene of many stirring events associated with the cause of Italian freedom, with which Mrs. Browning was in profound sympathy. She wrote the first part of Casa Guidi Windows during the heroic year of 1848, which marked a popular but vain uprising against Austria, the second part was completed in 1851. The poem deals especially with the earlier phases of the movement.

Although Casa Guidi Windows and Mrs. Browning's other political poems have, what Chesterton terms, "an impatient air, as if they were written, and even published, rather prematurely," he thinks that they are too little read today, since "they are amongst the most sincere documents of the history of the times."—The Victorian Age in Literature, p. 177.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Emily Brontë (1818-48) was born and brought up in a church parsonage at Haworth, among the bleak Yorkshire moors, which she loved with fervent and almost hysterical passion. She attended school for short unhappy intervals, first at Cowan's Bridge, immortalized as Lowood School by her sister Charlotte in Jane Eyre, later at Roe Head, where Charlotte also studied. In 1842 Emily went with Charlotte to Brussels to study, but returned before the end of the year. She had brief and bitter experiences as a governess before finally relapsing definitely into secluded home life at Haworth. She died in 1848 of the family scourge, tuberculosis. Her life was probably sadder and more aloof than that of any other English woman of letters.

Miss Bronte wrote under a pseudonym—Ellis Bell. Her poems were first published in 1846 with those of her sisters, who also used pseudonyms, in Poems by Currer, Ellis, and Acton Bell, her only other book was Wuthering Heights, a novel, published in 1847.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISMS

"When we turn to Emily's poetry, the genius of it becomes instantly apparent. She was speaking her own natural language. Her verse is often obscured by its plainness and directness, its apparent indifference to all artistic charm. It is full of weak and conventional rhymes, careless assonances, vague and broken rhythms. Very few of her poems are accurately constructed. But there is an immense feeling of reality and observation. The power of the Brontes lay in their capacity for multiplying the significance of what would seem the small and trivial incidents and emotions, and Emily seems to have turned upon nature and life an unflinching vision, and to have really seen for herself the things which familiarity is apt to blur"—A. C. Benson, Introduction to Brontë Poems, pp. xi-xii.

Matthew Arnold, in Haworth Churchyard, speaks thus of Emily Brontë and her last poem, No Coward Soul Is Mine (p. 378).

(How shall I sing her?) whose soul
Knew no fellow for might,
Passion, vehemence, grief,
Daring, since Byron died,
That world-famed son of fire—she, who sank
Baffled, unknown, self-consumed,
Whose too bold dying song
Stirred, like a clarion-blast, my soul

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Francis Hastings Charles Doyle (1810-88), the son of a noble family with military traditions, was educated at Eton and Oxford, where he was the special friend of Gladstone. After graduation he prepared himself for the practice of law. This profession, however, he soon abandoned for financial reasons, and entered government service, in which he gradually rose to the position of commissioner of customs. In 1867 he succeeded Matthew Arnold as professor of poetry at Oxford, an appointment which he held for ten years. He counted among his friends some of the most distinguished men of his time.

Doyle's principal publications were Miscellaneous Verses, 1834, The Return of the Guards and Other Poems, 1866, Lectures Delivered before the University of Oxford, 1868, Lectures on Poetry, Second Series, 1877.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"Sir Francis could write verse of various kinds which was never contemptible, but his strong point was the very difficult and dangerous kind of war poetry, in which, putting The Charge of the Light Brigade aside, he surpassed every other writer between Campbell and a living poet [Kipling]. Whenever he came near this great and too often mishandled subject, his genius seemed to catch fire, and, in two almost famous pieces—The Red Thread of Honor and A Private of the Buffs—in the first especially, that curious inspiring and exciting quality which all songs of what Dante calls salus (war and patriotism) should have, and which they too often lack, is present in almost the highest degree"—George Saintsbury, Cambridge History of English Literature, Vol. XIII, p. 186.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Sir Samuel Ferguson (1810-86) was educated in Belfast, his native city. After he was graduated from Trinity College, Dublin, he was called to the Irish bar, but in 1867 he retired from politics and became the first Deputy Keeper of the Records of Ireland. His first important poem, The Forging of the Anchor, was published in Blackwood's Magazine in his 21st year. A little later he published a series of tales which mingled prose with verse, and several political satires touching prominent Irish educational schemes. After his marriage in 1848 his home in Dublin became a center of generous and delightful hospitality for persons interested in literature, music, or art. The appearance of Lays of the Western Gael (1864) won him the degree of LL.D. from Dublin University. In addition to his many literary contributions, Ferguson made extensive researches in several parts of Ireland and published a number of essays on Irish antiquities. He was deeply interested in everything Irish, and in his effort to create modern poetry from old Irish stories and heroes he vitally influenced the literary history of his country.

Ferguson's principal publications were Lays of the Western Gael, 1864, Congal, an epic poem, 1872, Poems, 1880.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"The author of these poems is the greatest poet Ireland has produced, because the most central and most Celtic. Whatever the future may bring forth in the way of a truly great and national literature—and now that the race is so large, so widely spread, and so conscious of its unity, the years are ripe—will find its morning in these three volumes of one who was made by the purifying flame of national sentiment the one man of his time who wrote heroic poetry—one who, among the somewhat sybaritic singers of his day, was like some aged sea-king sitting among the inland wheat and poppies—the savour of the sea about him and its strength"—William Butler Yeats, 1886, quoted from Introduction to Poems, pp. xxxv-xxxvi, ed. by A. P. Graves.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

William Edmondstone Aytoun (1813-65), the son of a Writer to the Signet, was early imbued with literary tastes by his mother, and developed especially a fondness for ballad poetry. After being educated at Edinburgh University, he entered his father's profession (1835), and soon was called to the regular Scottish bar (1840). Already Aytoun's literary interests had manifested themselves, and from 1849 on, he published a number of books in both poetry and prose. In 1844 he joined the staff of Blackwood's Magazine; in 1845 he was appointed professor of rhetoric and belles lettres at the University of Edinburgh, where he proved extraordinarily popular as a teacher. In 1852, when the Tories returned to power, Aytoun was rewarded with the sheriffship of Orkney. For several years thereafter his official, professional, and literary careers ran equally parallel. Firmilian, 1854, was a brilliant satire, in imitation of the so-called "spasmodic school" of poetry, the racy Bon Gaultier's Ballads was the joint work of Aytoun and Theodore Martin. In addition to other literary work, he collected the ballads of Scotland, which he published in 1858. Aytoun's work, even in satire and parody, is dominated by a genial, kindly, and playful nature.

Aytoun's principal publications were The Book of Ballads, edited by Bon Gaultier, 1845, Lays of the Scottish Cavaliers and Other Poems, 1848; Firmilian, 1854, Bothwell, 1856, Ballads of Scotland, 1858.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"The undeniable animation of his [Aytoun's] verse, and his frequent flashes of descriptive power, cause him to be credited with more imaginative fire than in reality he possesses. But none can deny its presence. . . . Undoubtedly he possessed, also, the enviable faculty, rare even among men of genius, of knowing where his real strength lay. Hence he avoided fruitless waste of energy, and did the best work of which he was capable. The chief quality of his poetry is its picturesqueness; it reproduces very vividly one aspect of the Scottish sentiment which belonged to a by-gone age."—Mackenzie Bell, in The Poets and the Poetry of the Century (ed. by Alfred H. Miles), Vol. 4, p. 395.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

William Makepeace Thackeray (1811-1863) was born in India, but was sent to England for his education. Indifferent to studies, he early amused his fellows with his skill in caricature and parody. After a year at Cambridge, he visited Germany and then went to Paris to study art, and having squandered a small inheritance, he began in 1837 to write miscellaneous reviews and stories for newspapers and magazines. His touch of university and studio life and his travels proved useful for his later novels, foreshadowed by his Yellowplush Correspondence (1837-1838) and the remarkable satiric narrative Luck of Barry Lyndon (1844). Under various nom-de-plumes—Théophile Wagstaff, Major Gohah Gahagan, Michael Angelo Titmarsh, George Savage, Fitz-Boodle, Mr Snob, etc.—Thackeray wrote incessantly, largely to support his two daughters, upon whom his affections centered after his wife's insanity in 1840 removed her from the home. Numerous contributions to Fraser's Magazine and to Punch included ballads and other humorous poems. Much of his best verse, however, appeared in connection with his prose writings, in which it served as ornament or interlude. Vanity Fair, the famous "novel without a hero," appeared in 1848 and brought Thackeray renown, other novels followed—Pendennis (1850), Henry Esmond (1852), and The Newcomes (1855). Contemporary with his great productive period as a novelist came Thackeray's career as a lecturer. A series of lectures, The English Humorists of the Eighteenth Century, was successfully delivered in England in 1851 and in the United States in 1852 and 1853. Another series, The Four Georges, followed in 1855. His editorship of the Cornhill Magazine (1850-62) proved unsuccessful because of his dilatory habits and his compassion toward mediocrity. In 1862 he retired to a luxuriously appointed house intending to devote himself to what should be his greatest work, a history of the reign of Queen Anne, but before the work was begun, he died suddenly on the day before Christmas, 1863.

The fame of Thackeray rests primarily upon his novels, which reveal not only his historic faculty in re-creating the manners of a past age but also his faithful observation of contemporary society. His poems, which fill a volume of his collected works, possess qualities of humor, satire, and reflective seriousness that give him a high place among Victorian writers of light verse.

In personal appearance Thackeray was very striking, being six feet three inches in height, with a massive head and abundant hair that turned gray early. Carlyle referred to him as "a half-monstrous Cornish giant." In spite of his penchant for satire, his nature was essentially kindly, nothing gave him more pleasure than the gift of a sovereign to a schoolboy or a compliment to a lady.

The principal publications of Thackeray were The Luck of Barry Lyndon, 1844, Vanity Fair, 1848, Pendennis, 1850, Henry Esmond, 1852, The English Humorists of the Eighteenth Century, 1853, The Newcomes, 1855; Miscellanies, Prose and Verse, 1855-57, Ballads, 1856, The Virginians, 1859; The Four Georges, 1860.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"He [Thackeray] possessed the wit and fancy, the humor and tenderness, the refinement, without all of which qualities 'the real thing' cannot be produced. Nor was the lyrical strain absent from his composition. His verse is easy and possesses the essential merit of apparent spontaneity. He was almost invariably humorous, yet there is something more than mere fun. Frequently he was satirical, occasionally he was indignant, sometimes . . . he was didactic, usually he was tender and pathetic. He could be gay, he could sprinkle his verses with playful or ironic humor, and upon all his best work his personality is impressed, the man's great heart is there for all to see who care to look. Most of his ballads are good, all are readable, and many are possessed of distinction. As has been said, his rhymes were often appalling, and his meter not always perfect; but his language was as simple and direct as in his prose writing. If he was not underrating his talent when he spoke of it as small beer, he certainly was not guilty of an error of judgment when he declared it was the right tap."—L. Benjamin, Some Aspects of Thackeray, p. 68.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Aubrey Thomas de Vere (1814-1902), the son of an Irish baronet and poet of the same name, was born at Curragh Chase, in County Limerick, Ireland, and educated at Trinity College, Dublin. Upon visits in England, he became the fast friend of Tennyson, Henry Taylor, and other English men of letters. His early interest in poetry was dominated first by Byron, then by Wordsworth, but The Search after Proserpine, published in 1843, shows influence of Shelley and the Greeks. De Vere was interested in Irish political and economic problems of his time, and after witnessing the horrors of the Irish famine of 1846, inclined toward Catholicism, he was finally received into the Catholic church in 1851. From that time on, as he tells us, his poems were almost exclusively "intended to illustrate religious philosophy or early Irish history." For a few years he taught under Cardinal Newman in the new Catholic University at Dublin, but resigned in 1858 and sought permanent retirement at Curragh Chase.

The principal publications of De Vere were: The Waldenses, 1842; The Search after Proserpine, 1843; May Carols, 1857, The Sisters, Inisfail, and Other Poems, 1861, The Legends of St. Patrick, 1872; Poetical Works, 1884, Critical Essays, 3 vols., 1887-89.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"The qualities of Aubrey de Vere's poetry are not far to seek. Lyrical in verse, strong in style, mainly historical in theme, heroic or spiritual in substance, above all placid, it stirs and tranquillizes the soul in the presence of lovely scenes, high actions, and those 'great ideas that man was born to learn', and its outlook is upon the field of the soul regenerate, where suffering is remembered only through its purification, blessed in issues of sweetness, dignity, and peace. It takes wide range, but is predominantly either Bardic or Christian. The sympathy of the poet with the ancient Irish spirit must have been fed with patriotic fervor, akin to renewed inspiration, to permit him to render the old lays of his country with such fidelity to their native genius"—G. E. Woodberry, Studies of a Littérateur, p. 159.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

William Barnes (1801-86) was born and lived practically the whole of his life in Dorsetshire, the southern county of England, in which his ancestors had for centuries been farmers. Far from seeking to free himself from his local environment, he cultivated it and interpreted it to the world. In spite of poverty, he made the most of Dorsetshire schools and of opportunities for self-education, gained after ten years of work in absentia a degree from Cambridge, and became a scholar with a wide reputation especially in mathematics, archæology, and philology. In the intervals of his employment as teacher and country parson, he wrote verse, pried into the Celtic and Roman runs about Dorchester, and wrote on the Dorset dialect and on the relations between English and other Teutonic tongues; his most remarkable crotchet was his defense of "purity" in English against the use of Latin derivatives and his employment of such terms as "wheelsaddle" and "sunprint" in place of "bicycle" and "photograph." Well-read in many literatures, admiring Petrarch and the Persian poet Saadi above all other writers, he yet confined the materials of his poetry to the limits of Dorchester. His first descriptions of his neighbors appeared in 1833 in local newspapers; his Poems in the Dorset Dialect, published in 1844, was followed by three other groups of "hand-writs," the last "in common English." The praise of Patmore, Tennyson, and Allingham did nothing to alter his essential homeliness and serenity; as much a part of the Dorset countryside as the thatched houses, he worked vigorously in school and parish and study until well over eighty. Hardy, his successor as the laureate poet of Dorsetshire, has described him as an old man, plodding into Dorchester on a market-day "attired in a caped cloak, knee-breeches, and buckled shoes, with a leather satchel slung over his shoulders, and a stout staff in his hand," keeping the middle of the road, and pausing before the town-clock to set his ancient watch to London time.

Barnes's principal publications were Poems of Rural Life, in the Dorset Dialect, 1844, A Philological Grammar, 1854; Homely Rhymes, 1858, Notes on Ancient Britain and the Britons, 1858, Tiw a View of the Roots and Stems of the English as a Teutonic Tongue, 1862; A Grammar and Glossary of the Dorset Dialect, 1863, Poems of Rural Life in the Dorset Dialect: Third Collection, 1863; Poems of Rural Life in Common English, 1868, An Outline of English Speechcraft, 1878, An Outline of Redecraft or Logic, 1878.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"Readers will observe that Barnes is no untutored minstrel, that he is, indeed, a highly skilled technician, weaving all sorts of structural fancies into his verse. Barnes had a lyric heart, but he was a grave gentleman, a scholar, and in the most agreeable sense a precisian, and he delighted to exercise his singing gift in the terms of a very agile and conscious art. It will be noted, too, that this poet, who as a parish priest had more than an amateur knowledge of the seamy side of life, chose to be unashamedly on the side of the angels in his poetry."—John Drinkwater, Introduction to Barnes's Twenty Poems in Modern English, p. 9

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

The life of Charles Kingsley (1819-75) is well described by his own phrase "muscular Christianity." The son of a clergyman, he was at first attracted more by physical sports than by the church. At Clovelly, on the western coast of Devon, he learned to swim and row, and acquired an almost scientific knowledge of coastal plants and rocks, at the University of Cambridge, which he entered in 1838, he boxed, rowed on his college crew, and tramped on long geological and botanical excursions. His generous if somewhat excitable sympathies becoming concerned with the hardships of the poor, he was prompted, after his graduation, to enter the church as a means to alleviating social distress; he took parishes where there was the most work to do in the least congenial surroundings. With the same end, he espoused the cause of "Christian Socialism," which aimed to combine the teachings of Christ with the teachings of socialism in their application to life, he delivered lectures and wrote pamphlets designed to promote a better understanding between landlords and tenants, employers and laborers; and in 1848-51 published his novels Yeast and Alton Locke, which further promulgated his views. Another novel, Hypatia, in 1853, reflected his interest not only in the intellectual crises of his time, but also in historical studies, his Westward Ho!, written in 1855, during a vacation near his boyhood home in Clovelly, combined a romantic love of the past with a delight in vigorous adventure. The life of animals and plants about the seashore gave him his material for Glaucus in 1855 and The Water Babies in 1863. His poems, which he began writing early in his boyhood and published in 1858-75, embodied all his varied and energetic interests. Advancing years brought no abatement in his zest for living, even though ill-health and a constitutional restlessness kept him from working long in any one direction. From 1860 to 1863 he delivered lectures on history at Cambridge, more remarkable for their interest than their accuracy. In later life he held important positions in the church. He became involved, in 1864, in an unfortunate religious controversy with Cardinal Newman, and was signally defeated. For the sake of his health, he traveled in 1874 through the western states of America, returning to England, he sank rapidly, and died in 1875 at the country parish of which he had long been rector. Villagers and local huntsmen mingled with great soldiers and statesmen at his funeral.

Kingsley's principal publications were: Alton Locke, 1850, Yeast, 1851, Hypatia, 1853, Alexandria and Her Schools, 1854, Sermons for the Times, 1855; Westward Ho!, 1855, Glaucus, or the Wonders of the Shore, 1855, The Heroes, or Greek Fairy Tales, 1856, Two Years Ago, 1857, Andromeda, and Other Poems, 1858; The Water Babies, 1863, Hereward the Wake, 1866, Madam How and Lady Why? 1869, At Last, 1869, Prose Idylls, 1873, Plays and Purilans, 1873, Health and Education, 1874, Lectures Delivered in America, 1875.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"Kingsley's true poetic faculty is best expressed in various sounding lyrics for which he was popularly and justly esteemed. These are new, brimful of music, and national to the core. The Sands of Dee, The Three Fishers, and The Last Buccaneer are very beautiful, not studies, but a true expression of the strong and tender English heart."—E. C. Stedman, Victorian Poets, p. 251.

CRITICAL NOTES

THE SANDS OF DEE (p 397)

Page 397, lines 20-21. In discussing the pathetic fallacy, Ruskin cites lines 20 and 21 of this poem as an example of "fallacy caused by an excited state of the feelings, making us, for the time, more or less irrational." He says, "The foam is not cruel, neither does it crawl. The state of mind which attributes to it these characters of a living creature is one in which the reason is unhinged by grief. All violent feelings have the same effect. They produce in us a falseness in all our impressions of external things, which I would generally characterize as 'the pathetic fallacy'—Modern Painters, Vol. III, pt. 4, ch. 12, sec. 5.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Arthur Hugh Clough (1819-61), born in Liverpool of Welsh and Yorkshire stock, was a natural student from childhood, the early days of which he spent in Charleston, South Carolina, where he read Pope's Homer and many of Scott's novels, at the age of seven he is said to have mastered the lives of Columbus and Cortez. Returned to England he attended Rugby (1829-37) where he became the "ideal pupil" of Dr. Thomas Arnold. He entered Oxford during the stormy days of the Oxford Movement and soon came under the influence of Newman. A fellowship in Oriel College, accepted after his graduation, was resigned in 1848 because of his inability to subscribe any longer to the tenets of the Church of England, and, as his friend Matthew Arnold wrote, "Thyrsis of his own will went away." Brief travels in France and Italy brought no respite to his troubled spirit. Meantime he had been appointed Head of University Hall, London, had published with his friend Burbridge, a small volume of verses entitled Ambarvalia, and The Bothie of Tober-na-Vuolich (1848), a "long-vacation pastoral," which like his Amours de Voyage (1849) was written in English hexameters, a form of meter that provoked much discussion. Wearying of the restriction of thought imposed by his new position in London, Clough in 1852 accepted a proposal of Emerson to visit America, and crossed the Atlantic with Lowell and Thackeray for traveling companions. Despite the welcome accorded him in Boston and Cambridge, where he won the friendship of Emerson, Lowell, Charles Eliot Norton, and Longfellow, his efforts to support himself at tutoring and writing proved a failure, and he returned a year later to become an examiner in the Education Office, London. Married in 1854 to a cousin of Florence Nightingale, the famous English war-nurse, he thereafter took a lively interest in Miss Nightingale's work during and after the Crimean War. His health, never at any time very strong, took him to Florence, where he died in 1861. Clough is immortalized in Arnold's The Scholar-Gypsy (p. 471) and Thyrsis (p. 477), based upon a friendship formed at Rugby and Oxford.

The principal publications of Clough were: The Bothie of Tober-na-Vuolich, 1848; Ambarvalia (poems), 1849; Amours de Voyage, 1862, Dipsychus, 1862, Songs in Absence, 1862, Mari Magno, 1862.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISMS

"He [Clough] was not a great poet, because upmost in him was the spirit of criticism. He suppressed his evident talent of observation that he might discuss in meter the vexed questions of the moment. And though he was ever intent to criticize life, he was no stern critic of his own poetry. Even though he kept some of his own poems long enough to satisfy Horace, he spared the use of the file. . . . The need of expression was too active in him. His thoughts clamored so loudly for utterance that he could not control them, and instead of a great poet, he became, so to say, the mouthpiece of his own doubting age. In other words, he was so faithful to the 'movements' of his time that he appears already somewhat antiquated and out of fashion. But if his shorter poems are not written with the exact care which art demands, they set forth with a loyal accuracy the experiences of his mind and soul. . . . Clough was in trouble always concerning his waning faith. . . . He hankered after the solution of the problems of life, and was driven back upon doubt. It was this frame of mind, which many have borne with equanimity, that Clough attempted to express in verse 'Eat, drink, and die,' he wrote in his Easter Day, which most clearly reflects the sad candor of his skepticism. And even though, when he wrote these lines, in 1849, he had exchanged the human atmosphere of Oxford for the dismal solitude of University Hall, he could still take comfort in the security of Truth. So he turned back, with a kind of comfort, to a poetic exposition of his skepticism."—C Whibley, Introduction to Poems of Arthur Hugh Clough, pp. xxii-xxiii.

"His poetry is the poetry of moods—moods of comparative hopefulness, moods of weariness and despair, moods of mere inquiry and deliberative reserve. To the superficial reader, . . . there might even seem to be the strangest inconsistencies in the utterances of some of his shorter poems; for his sensitive nature catches up and repeats, though always in tempered tones, now the sad wail of some who mourn over the rapid dissolution of the world's great heritage of belief, and now again the glad shout of others who, boldly and trustfully, press forward to meet the coming day. But the wail and the shout—the song of sorrow and the song of promise—alike belong to the man himself, and, far from being discordant or incompatible, are in their own ways equally expressive of his relation to the great issues of the time."—W. H. Hudson, Studies in Interpretation, p. 117.

DIPSYCHUS (p. 406)

This poem is generally ranked as Clough's most ambitious work. Miss Shackford says of it "Dipsychus . . . is the most satiric of all of Clough's poems. It is the reverse side of his own life, the negative aspect of his positive action. It presents in loosely dramatic scenes the spiritual irresolution of the typical young Oxford man who, visiting Venice and delighting in all the shimmering beauty of the city, fascinated by the gay life, is, however, continually debating whether the appeal of the easy and conventional is the appeal of materialism or of good, honest common sense. The higher and the lower natures are in constant interplay, the remonstrant voice of the aspiring, mystical mood of Dipsychus is answered by the satiric spirit of conformity, the spirit of laissez-faire in the world of moral duty, until Dipsychus gives himself over to the care of the Mephisto within himself."—Sewanee Review, Oct., 1919, pp. 405-06.

The scene of Part I is Venice, that of Part II, London. The poem, left unfinished, was not published during Clough's lifetime.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Edwald FitzGerald (1809-83), born Edward Purcell, came into the name by which he is known when upon the death of his maternal grandfather in 1818 the family assumed the name FitzGerald. After graduation from Trinity College, Cambridge, where he became intimate with Thackeray, and a brief visit to Paris, where he had lived a short time as a boy, FitzGerald settled down to the easy pleasant life of a country gentleman and something of a recluse, devoted to flowers, the ocean, literature, and the friendship of men like Carlyle and Tennyson. His placid seclusion was diversified only by various changes of residence and a very brief, unsatisfactory marriage. Many free adaptations from the Persian, Spanish, and Greek are the record of FitzGerald's more than dilettante fondness for exotic literature, and his delicacy in re-dressing it for English readers. Most of his work appeared anonymously.

FitzGerald's principal publications were Euphranor, 1851; Polonius, 1852; Six Dramas of Calderon (freely translated), 1853; Salaman and Absal, 1856; The Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám, 1859; The Mighty Magician and Such Stuff as Dreams Are Made of (freely translated from the Spanish), 1865; The Downfall and Death of King Cædricus, 1880.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"As a translator he [FitzGerald] stands almost alone, his peculiar virtue, noticeable alike in his versions from the Spanish and Greek, being so capitally and once for all illustrated in that of Omar Khayyám that in narrow space it is not necessary to go beyond this. From the purist and pedantic point of view FitzGerald, no doubt, is wildly unfaithful. He scarcely ever renders word for word, and will insert, omit, alter, with perfect freedom; yet the total effect is reproduced as perhaps no other translator has ever reproduced it. Whether his version of the Rubáiyát, with its sensuous fatalism, its ridicule of asceticism and renunciation, and its bewildering kaleidoscope of mysticism that becomes materialist, and materialism that becomes mystical, has not indirectly had influences, practical and literary, the results of which would have been more abhorrent to FitzGerald than to almost anyone else, may be suggested. But the beauty of the poem as a poem is unmistakable and altogether astounding. The melancholy richness of the rolling quatrain with its unicorn rhymes, the quaint mixture of farce and solemnity, passion and playfulness, the abundance of the imagery, the power of the thought, the seduction of the rhetoric, make the poem actually, though not original or English, one of the greatest of English poems"—G. Saintsbury, A History of Nineteenth Century Literature, p. 209.

CRITICAL NOTES

THE RUBÁYÁT OF OMAR KHAYYÁM (p. 416)

FitzGerald became interested in Persian poetry as early as 1854, he read Omar in 1857, and was at once fascinated by the form and thought of his verse. The result was an English poem of 75 quatrains founded upon Omar and arranged to produce a continuous train of thought. Published as a pamphlet in 1859, the poem attracted no attention until it was accidentally discovered in 1860 in a London book-stall by Dante Gabriel Rossetti. Upon his suggestion FitzGerald published in 1868 a completely revised edition, which consisted of 110 stanzas, later editions of 1872 and 1879 rearranged the stanzas and reduced the number to 101.

Most of the changes made in the second and third editions of the poem were obvious improvements, but it is generally thought that the first stanza was best in its original form:

Awake! for Morning in the Bowl of Night
 Has flung the Stone that puts the Stars to Flight;
 And Lo! the Hunter of the East has caught
 The Sultan's Turret in a Noose of Light

FitzGerald thus describes Omar's verses and his own: "The original Rubáiyát are independent Stanzas, consisting each of four Lines of equal, though varied, Prosody; sometimes all rhyming, but oftener (as here imitated) the third line a blank, sometimes as in the Greek Alcaic, where the penultimate line seems to lift and suspend the Wave that falls over in the last. As usual with such kind of Oriental Verse, the Rubáiyát follow one another according to Alphabetic Rhyme—a strange succession of Grave and Gay. Those here selected are strung into something of an Eclogue, with perhaps a less than equal proportion of the 'Drink and make-merry,' which (genuine or not) occurs over frequently in the Original. Either way, the Result is sad enough: saddest perhaps when most ostentatiously merry, more apt to move Sorrow than Anger toward the old Tent-maker, who, after vainly endeavoring to unshackle his Steps from Destiny, and to catch some authentic Glimpse of Tomorrow, fell back upon Today (which has outlasted so many Tomorrows!) as the only Ground he got to stand upon, however momentarily slipping from under his Feet."

In the text, FitzGerald's capital letters have been preserved.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Matthew Arnold (1822-88), austere poet and brilliant essayist and critic, was the eldest son of Dr. Thomas Arnold, famous headmaster of Rugby, from whom he inherited his high sense of duty and rigid intellectual honesty. Arnold continued the family tradition by attending Rugby and Oxford and then being elected Fellow of Oriel College. At Oxford he formed a friendship with Arthur Hugh Clough and came under the spell of the personal charm of Newman, though not of his intellectual and spiritual influence. Arnold soon abandoned his fellowship and from 1847 to 1851 was secretary to Lord Lansdowne, who then appointed him to an inspectorship of schools, a position Arnold retained until within two years of his death. Always fond of children and genuinely interested in the welfare of teachers, Arnold made a rich contribution to England through his arduous labors in the field of education, particularly by his reports and studies on foreign school systems, which he investigated, as foreign assistant commissioner on education, in France, Holland, Belgium, Switzerland, and Piedmont.

Arnold had already published two volumes of poetry—The Strayed Reveller, and Other Poems (1849) and Empedocles on Etna, and Other Poems (1852)—the fruits of Greek inspiration both in matter and in style. Two other volumes of verse (1853, 1855) were followed in 1858 by Arnold's appointment as professor of poetry at Oxford. Save for the volume of New Poems, which appeared in 1867, the rest of Arnold's published work consisted of prose essays, some delivered as lectures at Oxford, on literature, criticism, education, religion, etc. His important editorial work included Six Chief Lives from Johnson's Lives of the Poets in 1878, Poems of Wordsworth in 1879, and Poetry of Byron in 1881. A lecturing tour in America in 1883 yielded Discourses in America, the book of all his writings, Arnold told a friend, by which he "most desired to be remembered." He died suddenly in Liverpool in 1888, after a strenuous life which involved some uncongenial tasks and domestic trials, yet notably happy because of his serene temper and an unflinching interest in life about him.

In his lectures and prose writings Arnold, like Carlyle and Ruskin, was an apostle of the higher life. Permeated with classical culture, he sought to impress upon his generation ideals which should save society from "Philistinism," defined as narrow-mindedness, self-complacency, and vulgarity. His creed called for a vigorous "pursuit of our total perfection by means of getting to know . . . the best that has been thought and said in the world." He found the most stimulation among the Greeks, and he possessed the rare ability of assimilating the Greek spirit—its simplicity, its lucidity, its chasteness. He was deeply influenced by the Bible, by St. Augustine, by Shakespeare and Wordsworth and Byron, but more significantly by Goethe, whom he read and absorbed as he did the Greek classics in his youth. Sweeping aside the old personal school of literary criticism, Arnold announced "disinterestedness" as the first requisite of a critic, and set up "high seriousness" as a touchstone of great literature. With this ethical rather than æsthetic standard of judgment, he looked upon poetry as "a criticism of life," and regarded himself as an exponent of the classical temper in poetry as opposed to the excesses of romanticism, which then seemed to him to be dominant in England.

Arnold's principal publications were: The Strayed Reveller, and Other Poems, 1849; Empedocles on Etna, and Other Poems, 1852; Poems, 1853; Poems, Second Series, 1855; Merope, a tragedy, 1858; On Translating Homer, 1861; Essays in Criticism, 1865-81; On the Study of Celtic Literature, 1867; New Poems, 1867; Schools and Universities on the Continent, 1868; Culture and Anarchy, 1869; St. Paul and Protestantism, 1870; Literature and Dogma, 1873 ff.; Mixed Essays, 1879; Irish Essays and Others, 1882; Discourses in America, 1885.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISMS

"There is no Victorian poet, perhaps there is no Victorian thinker, more significant in position than Matthew Arnold. Agnosticism of thought and feeling, with all its vagueness, finds in him an exquisitely accurate exponent. No other poet has been so clear in his understanding of confusion, so positive in an unstable equilibrium. In the union of definiteness of technique with vagueness of theme the charm of his work resides. Unsatisfied desire, evasive regret, indecision, doubt, all that has not yet translated itself from the dim twilight of the feeling to the daylight world of the deed—this Arnold gives us with delicate precision of touch. His poems are like gray shadows cast along some temple-floor, shadowy alike in clean purity of outline, and in dim uncertainty of content"—Vida D. Scudder, The Life of the Spirit in the Modern English Poets, p. 247.

"No poet in the roll of our literature, unless it be Milton, has been so essentially saturated to the very bone with the classical genius [as has Arnold]. His poetry, however, is 'classical' only in a general sense, not that all of it is imitative of ancient models, or has any affectation of archaism. It is essentially modern in thought, and has all that fetishistic worship of natural objects which is the true note of our Wordsworthian school. But Arnold is 'classical' in the serene self-command, the harmony of tone, the measured fitness, the sweet reasonableness of his verse. This balance, this lucidity, this Virgilian dignity and grace, may be said to be unailing. Whatever be its shortcomings and its limitations, Arnold's poetry maintains this unerring urbanity of form. There is no thunder, no rant, no discord, no honey, no intoxication of mysticism or crash of battle in him. Our poet's eye doth glance from heaven to earth, from earth to heaven, but it is never caught 'in a fine frenzy rolling'. It is in this sense that Arnold is classical, that he has, and has uniformly and by instinct, some touch of that 'liquid clearness of an Ionian sky' which he felt in Homer. Not but what he is, in thought and by suggestion, one of the most truly modern, the most frankly contemporary, of all our poets"—F. Harrison, Tennyson, Ruskin, Mill and Other Literary Estimates, p. 106.

"He is not great as a poet of the personal life, in spite of the charm of some of the poems of Faded Leaves and Switzerland. Nor is he great as a poet of ideas, in spite of the satisfaction that many who look sadly or impatiently on life take in thinking his thoughts. And if we compare him with Tennyson or Browning, we recognize at once that he has not the breadth and the sense of beauty of one, nor the depth and the sense of life of the other. We cannot measure him with either on their own ground any more than we can measure either of them with the other. Nor can we compare him with Swinburne because he wrote The New Sirens, nor with Mrs. Browning because he wrote A Modern Sappho. No! Matthew Arnold's greatness as a poet is not seen from such standpoints. He is a great poet because he is the author of Dover Beach and Bacchanalia, of The Scholar-Gypsy and Rugby Chapel, of The Forsaken Merchant and Sohrab and Rustum. The author of these poems stands alone among English poets, because there is no one who so feels and so expresses the question as to the meaning of life, the recreating charm of nature, and the power of classic beauty"—E. E. Hale, Introduction to Select Poems of Matthew Arnold, p. xlii

SOHRAB AND RUSTUM, p. 459

Arnold quotes in a note the following story of Sohrab and Rustum as told in Sir John Malcolm's History of Persia (2 vols., Murray, London, 1825):

"The young Sohrab was the fruit of one of Rustum's early amours. He had left his mother, and sought fame under the banners of Afrasiab, whose armies he commanded, and soon obtained a renown beyond that of all contemporary heroes but his father. He had carried death and dismay into the ranks of the Persians, and had terrified the boldest warriors of that country, before Rustum encountered him, which at last that hero resolved to do, under a feigned name. They met three times. The first time they parted by mutual consent, though Sohrab had the advantage; the second, the youth obtained a victory, but granted life to his unknown father; the third was fatal to Sohrab, who, when writhing in the pangs of death, warned his conqueror to shun the vengeance that is inspired by parental woes, and bade him dread the rage of the mighty Rustum, who must soon learn that he had slain his son Sohrab. These words, we are told, were as death to the aged hero, and when he recovered from a trance, he called in despair for proofs of what Sohrab had said. The afflicted and dying youth tore open his mail, and showed his father a seal which his mother had placed on his arm when she discovered to him the secret of his birth, and bade him seek his father. The sight of his own signet rendered Rustum quite frantic; he cursed himself, attempting to put an end to his existence, and was only prevented by the efforts of his expiring son. After Sohrab's death, he burnt his tents and all his goods, and carried the corpse to Seistan, where it was interred, the army of Turan was, agreeably to the last request of Sohrab, permitted to cross the Oxus unmolested. To reconcile us to the improbability of this tale, we are informed that Rustum could have no idea his son was in existence. The mother of Sohrab had written to him her child was a daughter, fearing to lose her darling infant if she revealed the truth, and Rustum, as before stated, fought under a feigned name, an usage not uncommon in the chivalrous combats of those days" Malcolm summarizes the story (Vol. 1, p. 37, note) as told by Firdausi.

THE SCHOLAR-GYPSY, p. 471

Arnold quotes in a note the following account from Joseph Glanvil's Vanity of Dogmatizing, ch. 20 (1661):

"There was very lately a lad in the University of Oxford, who was by his poverty forced to leave his studies there, and at last to join himself to a company of vagabond gypsies. Among these extravagant people, by the insinuating subtlety of his carnage, he quickly got so much of their love and esteem as that they discovered to him their mystery. After he had been a pretty while exercised in the trade, there chanced to ride by a couple of scholars, who had formerly been of his acquaintance. They quickly spied out their old friend among the gypsies, and he gave them an account of the necessity which drove him to that kind of life, and told them that the people he went with were not such impostors as they were taken for, but that they had a traditional kind of learning among them, and could do wonders by the power of imagination, their fancy binding that of others: that himself had learned much of their art, and when he had compassed the whole secret, he intended, he said, to leave their company, and give the world an account of what he had learned." The quotation omits some phrases and sentences.

THYRSIS, p. 477

Arnold was deeply attached to Oxford and its environs, where his enduring friendship for Clough was formed. In 1885 he said in a letter to his daughter: "I think Oxford is still, on the whole, the place in the world to which I am most attached." In a letter to his sister (Oct. 18, 1885), he said: "On Friday I got out to Hinksey and up the hill to within sight of the Cumnor firs. I cannot describe the effect which this landscape always has on me—the hillside with its valleys, and Oxford in the great Thames valley below."

In a letter to his mother, April 7, 1866, he states that the diction of the poem was modeled on that of Theocritus, whom he had much read during the two years in which the poem was forming itself. He says: "The images are all from actual observation . . . The cuckoo on the wet June morning I heard in the garden at Woodford, and all those three stanzas you like are reminiscences of Woodford. Edward [his brother] has, I think, fixed on the two stanzas I like best myself in 'O easy access' and 'And long the way appears' I also like 'Where is the girl?' and the stanza before it, but it is because they bring certain places and moments before me . . . It is probably too quiet a poem for the general taste, but I think it will stand wear."

Swinburne says of this poem: "The Thyrsis of Mr. Arnold makes a third with Lycidas and Adonais. It is not so easy as those may think who think by rote and praise by prescription to strike the balance between them. The first, however, remains first, and must remain; its five opening lines are to me the most musical in all known realms of verse; there is nothing like them; and it is more various, more simple, more large and sublime than the others . . . The least pathetic of the three is Adonais, which indeed is hardly pathetic at all; it is passionate, subtle, splendid; but Thyrsis, like Lycidas, has a quiet and tender undertone which gives it something of sacred. Shelley brings fire from heaven, but these bring also 'the meed of some melodious tear' There is a grace ineffable, a sweet sound and sweet savor of things past, in the old beautiful use of the language of shepherds, of flocks and pipes: the spirit is none the less sad and sincere because the body of the poem has put on this dear familiar raiment of romance, because the crude and naked sorrow is veiled and chastened with soft shadows and sounds of a 'land that is very far off', because the verse remembers and retains a perfume and an echo of Grecian flutes and flowers"—Essays and Studies (Complete Works, Vol. 15, p. 92)

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

William Allingham (1824-89) was born in Ballyshannon, a seaport town in the County of Donegal, Ireland, where his mind was early filled with quaint legends and fancies. Receiving only a meager education, he worked in his father's bank, until in 1845 he received an appointment in the Customs service. As a young man he paid almost annual visits to England, in the course of which he became acquainted with many famous literary men, especially Rossetti. His first volume of Poems (1850) was followed, in 1854, by an enlarged edition of Day and Night Songs illustrated by Rossetti, Millais, and A. Hughes. Retiring from the Customs service in 1870, Allingham went to London as sub-editor (under Froude) of Fraser's Magazine. He succeeded to the editorship in 1874 and held the position five years. Thereafter he lived in retirement at Witley, in Surrey, and at Hampstead. His wife was Helen Paterson, a water-color artist of some distinction.

Allingham's principal publications were: Poems, 1850; Day and Night Songs, 1854; Lawrence Bloomfield in Ireland, 1864; Fifty Modern Poems, 1865; Songs, Ballads, and Stories, 1877; Irish Songs and Poems, 1887

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"He [Allingham] had a pretty light lyrical gift and considerable command of rhythm, succeeding best in the lilting strain, and under the inspiration of the scenes of nature amidst which he was brought up. 'He sang,' says his countryman, Mr. W. B. Yeats, 'Ballyshannon not Ireland,' and it may well be that the same critic is right in the opinion that to 'feel the entire fascination of his poetry, it is perhaps necessary to have spent one's childhood in one of those little seaboard Connaught towns.' There is a charming unsought naturalness in his little lays, as if he had, in his own words, 'found' them floating there"—H. Walker, Literature of the Victorian Era, pp. 569-70.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

William Cory (1823-92) was originally William Johnson. He was educated at Eton and later at Cambridge, where he was distinguished as a classical scholar. In 1845 he was made assistant master at Eton, and became "the most brilliant Eton tutor of his day." Ionica, his small collection of poems, written under the name of Johnson, was published in 1858. His prose work includes several textbooks on Latin and Greek subjects. After he inherited an estate in 1872 he gave up his work at Eton, and changed his name to Cory.

He married late in life, spent four years in Madeira, and finally settled at Hampstead.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"The little book Ionica—perhaps the smallest book of poems in Victorian literature which has an established place—is a perfect delight to fine judges of poetry. It is the work of a scholar as well as a man of feeling, and its chief defect, if defect it can be called, is that it happens to be too scholarly. The classical allusions compel the ordinary reader to study classical dictionaries in order to get at the meaning, and the meaning is sometimes so learned that even classical dictionaries do not help. . . . This delicate poet, though a great classical scholar, was a supreme romantic in feeling."—L. Hearn, A History of English Literature, Vol. 2, p. 701.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Frederick Locker (1821-95), who took the name of Lampson after his second marriage in 1874, has been described by his son-in-law, Augustine Birrell, as "essentially a man of the world." After twelve years of employment in government clerkships, where he eased the tedium of office by riving the events of the day, he married a daughter of the Earl of Elgin, and retired to dignified leisure. His hobby was the collection of rare books, his avocation was poetry, his business, in the intervals of dyspeptic attacks, was making friends among the most distinguished men and women of his time. His social graces, his wit, his unaffected refinement, were mirrored in his poetry, his only volume of verse, London Lyrics, was published in 1857 and had an immense success. His other literary work consisted in making collections of poetry which he admired, the Lyra Elegantiarum in 1867 and Patchwork in 1879. His autobiography, My Confidences, was published in 1896.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"Mr. Locker's verse has charmed so wisely and so long that it has traveled the full circle of compliment. . . As you turn his pages, you feel as freshly as ever the sweet, old-world elegance, the courtly amiability, the mannerly restraint, the measured and accomplished ease. True, they are colorless, . . but then they are so luminously limpid and serene, they are so sprightly and graceful and gay! In the gallantry they affect there is a something at once exquisite and paternal. If they pun, 'tis with an air even thus might Chesterfield have stooped to folly. And then, how clean the English, how light yet vigorous the touch, the manner how elegant and how staid."—W. E. Henley, Views and Reviews, p. 116.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Tom Taylor (1817-80) filled his life with a diversity of occupations. He followed a brilliant career at the universities of Glasgow and Cambridge by successful work as tutor, professor of literature at the University of London, lawyer, secretary to the Board of Health, and art-critic. His most congenial employment, however, he found as a staff-writer and, after 1874, editor, of the humorous journal Punch, and as an actor and playwright. During his first year in London, 1844, he had four burlesques produced in the Lyceum Theatre; in subsequent years he gave some seventy plays to the stage, most of them domestic comedies. His Masks and Faces, written in collaboration with Charles Reade in 1852, Our American Cousin, and The Ticket-of-leave Man have a place in the history of the nineteenth-century drama. His occasional verses appeared in Punch and other journals.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

To a Friend Lost

[TOM TAYLOR]

When I remember, friend, whom lost I call,
Because a man beloved is taken hence,
The tender humor and the fire of sense
In your good eyes; how full of heart for all,
And chiefly for the weaker by the wall,
You bore that lamp of sane benevolence,
Then see I round you Death his shadows dense
Divide, and at your feet his emblems fall.
For surely are you one with the white host,
Spirits, whose memory is our vital air,
Through the great love of Earth they had lo,
these,

Like beams that throw the path on tossing seas,
Can bid us feel we keep them in the ghost,
Partakers of a strife they joyed to share.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

George Eliot (1819-80) was born Mary Ann Evans; she adopted her famous pen-name for the first time in 1857. She was only seventeen years old when the death of her mother left her the sole companion and the housekeeper of a strict and narrow-minded father, the manager of an old estate in Warwickshire. She found time, however, to follow her natural bent for classical languages and literatures, Italian, German, music, philosophy, and science. She had, too, a strong religious sense, which she early expressed in poetry. In 1841 she moved with her father to Coventry and there became intimate with a Mr and Mrs Bray, who introduced her to liberal books and opinions. She suffered in consequence a reaction, became a freethinker in religious and social matters, and was induced to continue attending church only by the dread of wounding too deeply her father's feelings. Her intellectual standpoint was thereafter unconventional, although it was tempered by a profound sympathy with the attitude of those with whom she could not agree. She began her independent life by doing editorial work and making translations in London. She made the acquaintance of well-known writers, and of the brilliant George Henry Lewes, with whom she entered into a relationship that was marriage in every respect except the name and the approval of society, for Lewes's first wife was not divorced. Under his care, her shy genius matured rapidly, she began the series of sketches called Scenes of Clerical Life (1858), and published in 1859 her remarkable Adam Bede, which at once made her famous. Its unusual sale and profits gave her financial independence, but not self-confidence. The fear of falling below her high standard fretted her into nervousness and drove her to exhausting efforts. For the writing of Romola she made in 1860 and 1861 visits to Florence and devoured a library of books on the Italian Renaissance. Always alert to advanced views in philosophy and social theory, and holding that her mission was to teach by means of art, she wove her opinions into the fabric of later novels and her long poem, The Spanish Gypsy, published in 1868. A volume of poems appeared in 1874. In her last years, she enjoyed the fruits of success and had, with Mr. Lewes, a secure social position and a host of interesting friends. In 1878 Mr. Lewes died, two years later she married J. W. Cross, an old friend. She lived, however, less than a year after her marriage.

George Eliot's principal publications were. Scenes of Clerical Life, 1858; Adam Bede, 1859, The Mill on the Floss, 1860; Silas Marner, 1861, Romola, 1863; Felix Holt, 1866; The Spanish Gypsy, 1868, Agatha, 1869; Middlemarch, 1872, The Legend of Jubal and Other Poems, 1874, Daniel Deronda, 1876, Impressions of Theophrastus Such, 1879.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"Mrs. Lewes, though possessed of great intellect and sensibility, is not, in respect to metrical expression, a poet. Nor has she a full conception of the simple strength and melody of English verse . . . That wealth of thought which atones for all her deficiencies in prose does not seem to be at her command in poetry . . . A little poem in blank verse, entitled O May I Join the Choir Invisible! and setting forth her conception of the 'religion of humanity,' is worth all the rest of her poetry, for it is the outburst of an exalted soul foregoing personal immortality and compensated by a vision of the growth and happiness of the human race"—E. C. Stedman, Victorian Poets, p. 254.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Charles Tennyson Turner (1808-79), the elder brother of Alfred Lord Tennyson, changed his name to Turner in memory of a great-uncle from whom he inherited property. He shared his brother Alfred's tastes in literature and collaborated with him in the production of an early volume of verse, Poems by Two Brothers, in 1827. He married the sister of Emily Sellwood, who became Alfred Tennyson's wife, in 1836, and lived quietly as a clergyman in country parishes until ill health forced his retirement from professional work. Country life, flowers, horses, and dogs appealed greatly to his gentle nature, his life was happy and serene. Poetry was his principal avocation. A collection of sonnets in 1830 was praised by Coleridge; other collections in 1864, 1868, 1873, and 1880 gave him a contemporary reputation as a writer of sonnets almost equal to Wordsworth's. With the sonnets in these various collections were included a few short lyrics in other forms.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"His [Turner's] verse is saturated with the sense of his duties and his position as a parish priest . . . In reading the sonnets we can see him moving about in his parish, succoring the poor, consoling the sick, cheering the aged folk, and speaking kindly to the children; thinking, as he goes, of the news that had that day reached him from the great world, and with an eye ever open to new beauties and new phases of nature . . . The slightest incident, the most ordinary event of his daily life, is enough to stir his retiring muse, the first budding green of the spring, the later yellowing leaves of autumn still clinging to the trees, the harvest-field, the first note of cuckoo or nightingale, the coming of the swallows, the first ice in winter, the beautiful play of light through the lattice, the setting free of a prisoned bird, the impression made on his children by some new book—these are his themes, and he treats them with simplicity, grace, and occasional sustained beauty of phrase."—A. H. Japp, The Poets and the Poetry of the Century, ed. by A. H. Miles, Vol. 4, pp. 47-48.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Dante Gabriel Rossetti (1828-82) was both a poet and a painter, and expressed his romantic and emotional nature similarly in the two arts. His background was Italian, for his father, mystic poet and student of Dante, and an exile from Italy because of his antagonism to Austrian rule, made his London home a gathering-place for Italian artists and musicians. Rossetti's boyhood was rich in cultural associations, but largely undisciplined. "As soon as a thing is imposed on me as an obligation," he later said, "my aptitude for doing it is gone." Becoming an art student at the Royal Academy in 1846, he found the training onerous and reacted violently against classical principles in contemporary painting, which he found conventional and uninspired. Taking as his master the radical painter, Ford Madox Brown, and associating himself with Holman Hunt and John Everett Millais, kindred spirits at the art school, he studied medieval painting and organized in 1848 the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood, which sought to combine a realistic fidelity in detail with a romantic mysticism in the general effect of their paintings. With his flowing brown hair and cynical dark eyes, an almost ascetic devotion to his work, and magnetic personal charm, Rossetti easily dominated the group. Its first paintings were labeled by the critics as "mere eccentricity", but when John Ruskin, then a leader of public taste, defended them in two letters to the Times, 1850, they became generally admired. In 1856 three young Oxford men, Burne-Jones, Swinburne, and William Morris, were drawn into the Brotherhood. Essentially antagonistic to Rossetti in character, Morris yet found Rossetti's personality for a time irresistible; the two read the Morie Dalhuur together and talked in Rossetti's studio, littered with designs and manuscripts, until three o'clock of many mornings.

Meanwhile Rossetti had periodically abandoned painting for poetry, had written at fever heat such poems as The Blessed Damozel, and had returned with equal vigor to his other art. Much of his early poetry, including The Blessed Damozel and My Sister's Sleep, was printed in The Germ, a periodical founded by the Brotherhood in 1850 as an outlet for their writing and art. Rossetti's stimulus at this time came from the writings of Browning and Edgar Allan Poe, from the English folk-ballads, and from the medieval poets of Italy, he published in 1861 a collection of translations from the Early Italian Poets, later called Dante and His Circle. In many ways the decade from 1850 to 1860 was Rossetti's greatest period in both his arts.

In 1850 he became passionately attached to Elizabeth Siddal, a milliner's assistant with abilities in poetry and water-color painting, and a hectic, otherworldly beauty that was an embodiment of the Pre-Raphaelite ideal. She served Rossetti as the model for many of his greatest paintings, inspired many of the sonnets in The House of Life, and became his wife in 1860, although she was already doomed by tuberculosis. Rossetti's impatience and the irregularities of his life made his marriage hardly a placid one, yet, at his wife's death in 1862, he was so profoundly afflicted that he enclosed with her body in the coffin his most valuable possession, a bundle of manuscript poems that existed in no other form. He consented, however, to their disinterment in 1869; they formed the basis of his published collection of poems in 1870 and established his poetic reputation.

As his reputation grew, his income increased, and he was able to indulge his fondness for luxury without counting the notes that slipped through his fingers, yet his only relaxation from work was occasional dissipation. The result was insomnia, and, unable to bear the consequent lowering of his efficiency, he began to take chloral in gradually increasing doses. The drug brought on physical deterioration and distressing hallucinations. He came to feel the spirit of his dead wife near him in the form of birds, he was tormented by persecutory illusions, which were encouraged by a bitter attack on his morality in Buchanan's Fleshy School of Poetry, so that he felt himself insulted by passing strangers and broke with Browning because of a fancied aspersion in Fifine at the Fair. With William Morris at Kelmscott, and in the society of the friends which his charm still assured him, he found passing happiness, his genius still continued active and could inspire, even in his last tragic years, such poems as The White Ship and The King's Tragedy, published in 1881 as Ballads and Sonnets. But his great physical strength wore away until his death came finally as a relief in 1882.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISMS

"Rossetti takes his place in English literature as one of the six major poets of the later Victorian era, and as the oldest of the sub-group of three associated with the artistic revival vaguely known as Pre-Raphaelitism. . . . He possessed in an extraordinary degree both richness of imagination and the power to pack a world of meaning into one pregnant and melodious phrase. But both his pictorial faculty and his intellectual force were tempered by a strain of mysticism, for which he has been charged with obscurity by hard-headed and dull-witted readers. He was at once the most spiritual and the most material of poets, and the accusation of sensuality from which he was made to suffer could only result from inability to see more than one side of the Druid shield of his poetical personality"—W. M. Payne, Warner's Library of the World's Best Literature, Vol. 21, pp. 12411-15.

"Consecrated, from his Italian parentage, to learning, art, and song—reared in a household over which the mediæval spirit has brooded—he [Rossetti] is thoroughly at home among romantic themes and processes, while a feeling like that of Dante exalts the maturer portion of his emblematic verse . . . Throughout his poetry we discern a finesse, a regard for detail, and a knowledge of color and sound, that distinguish this master of the Neo-Romantic school. His end is gained by simplicity and sure precision of touch. He knows exactly what effect he desires, and produces it by a firm stroke of color, a beam of light, a single musical tone. . . . His lyrical faculty is exquisite; not often swift, but chaste, and purely English . . . His verse is compact of tenderness, emotional ecstasy, and poetic fire. The spirit of the master whose name he bears clothes him as with a white garment. And we should expect his associates to be humble lovers of the beautiful, first of all, and through its ministry to rise to the lustrous upper heaven of spiritual art"—E. C. Stedman, Victorian Poets, pp. 360-366.

CRITICAL NOTES

The Pre-Raphaelites

The term Pre-Raphaelites was first applied to a group of young German artists who early in the nineteenth century formed a brotherhood in Rome for the purpose of restoring Christian art to the medieval purity of the masters in the age preceding the great Italian painter Raphael (1483-1520). The organization was short-lived, however, and the term was later used to designate the school in England originated by the following seven young men: Dante Gabriel Rossetti and his brother William Michael Rossetti, John Everett Millais, William Holman Hunt, Frederick George Stephens, Charles Collinson, and Thomas Woolner. They formed the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood in 1848, and for a short time published The Germ, a magazine in which they announced their principles and published some of their poetical work.

The group reacted against the neo-classic imitative tendencies of much of the art of their own day and sought to attain the directness, the simplicity, the serious intention of Italian art before Raphael. Both their paintings and their writings were characterized by ornateness of style, love of sensuous beauty, minuteness of detail, and vaguely indefinite symbolism. These characteristics find their fullest expression in the highly-colored, mystical, imaginative early poems of Rossetti, in much of the work of William Morris, and in some of Swinburne's.

THE BLESSED DAMOZEL, p. 501

There are three versions of this poem, which was written in 1847, when Rossetti was eighteen years of age: one published in The Germ in 1850, one in The Oxford and Cambridge Magazine, 1856, and one in the Poems of 1870. Changes appearing in the second and third versions are regarded as distinct improvements, but Swinburne states that the original readings were often so good that nobody without Rossetti's "insatiable passion for the best" would have been dissatisfied with them.

"Though at first sight," says A. C. Benson, "the delicate archaic handling of language is a great attraction, yet it is the combination of vastness and nearness in the poem which lends it an incomparable charm."—Rossetti, p. 114

MARY MAGDALENE, p. 525

Rossetti gives the following description of the oil painting of 1865, the theme of which was the basis of this sonnet

"The scene represents two houses opposite each other, one of which is that of Simon the Pharisee, where Christ and Simon, with other guests, are seated at table. In the opposite house a great banquet is held, and feasters are trooping to it dressed in cloth of gold and crowned with flowers. The musicians play at the door, and each couple kiss as they enter. Mary Magdalene has been in this procession, but has suddenly turned aside at the sight of Christ, and is pressing forward up the steps of Simon's house, and casting the roses from her hair. Her lover and a woman have followed her out of the procession and are laughingly trying to turn her back. The woman bars the door with her arm. Those nearest the Magdalene in the group of feasters have stopped short in wonder and are looking after her, while a beggar-girl offers them flowers from her basket. A girl near the front of the procession has caught sight of Mary and waves her garland to turn her back. Beyond this, the narrow street abuts on the highroad and river. The young girl seated on the steps is a little beggar who has had food given her from within the house, and is wondering to see Mary go in there, knowing her as a famous woman in the city. Simon looks disdainfully at her, and the servant who is setting a dish on the table smiles, knowing her too. Christ looks toward her from within, waiting till she shall reach him."

THE SONNET, p. 527

In 1880, Rossetti presented his mother on her birthday with a volume of English sonnets in which he had drawn a design illustrating his Sonnet on the Sonnet. He thus explained its symbolism in an accompany letter:

"I have no doubt that your discerning eyes plucked out the heart of the mystery in the little design. In it the Soul is instituting the 'memorial to one dead deathless hour,' a ceremony easily effected by placing a winged hour-glass in a rose-bush, at the same time that she touches the fourteen-stringed harp of the Sonnet, hanging round her neck. On the rose-branches trailing over in the opposite corner is seen hanging the Coin, which is the second symbol used for the Sonnet. Its 'face' bears the Soul, expressed in the butterfly, its 'converse,' the Serpent of Eternity enclosing the Alpha and Omega."

THE KING'S TRAGEDY, p. 544

Lines 316-322 of the poem are adapted from Stanza 34 of The King's Quair as follows:

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Christina Georgina Rossetti (1830-94) was the younger sister of Dante Gabriel Rossetti, and the earlier period of her life was closely intertwined with his. Reared in the same cultured environment as he, and influenced by his artistic principles, she contributed verses to the Pre-Raphaelite organ, The Germ, and published in 1862 her romantic Goblin Market, and Other Poems. Her pale, serious beauty made her a favorite model for her brother in his paintings of the Virgin. Excursions into the country gave her an intimate acquaintance with scenes within a fifty-mile radius of London, she made friends with all animals, even snakes and toads, she symbolized every object that she encountered, and found ethical principles embodied in bits of glass and fragments of stone. After visits to the Continent in 1861 and 1866, her life grew restricted, she cared for her father and mother in prolonged illnesses, and thereafter found other invalid relatives to claim her care. Devout from childhood, she became increasingly preoccupied with religious thoughts. In 1866 she refused a suitor whom she loved, because he was "either not a Christian at all, or else he was a Christian of undefined or heterodox views." Her later poetry was designed almost wholly for religious instruction. Her health was precarious, and in 1871 she acquired a disease that gave her porthness and confined her to her house in Bloomsbury, London. In a small upper back bedroom she did her writing, closing her eyes to evoke mental pictures; she conducted regular household devotions, and prayed a half an hour each night before retiring. Blessed with a quaint humor and great moral courage, she never alluded in conversation to her illness. At length, a cancer sapped her strength and ended her life.

Christina Rossetti's principal publications were: Goblin Market and Other Poems, 1862, The Prince's Progress, 1866, Commonplace, 1870, Sing Song, 1872, Seek and Find, 1879, A Pageant, 1881; Called to Be Saints, 1881; Letter and Spirit, 1882, Time Flies, 1885, The Face of the Deep, 1892, Verses, 1893, New Poems (ed. by W. M. Rossetti), 1896.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISMS

"A power of seeing finely beyond the scope of ordinary vision, that, in a few words, is the note of Miss Rossetti's genius, and it brings with it a subtle . . . power of expressing subtle . . . conceptions, always clearly, always simply, with a singular and often startling homeliness, which is the sincerity of a style that seems to be innocently unaware of its own beauty. This power is shown in every division of her poetry; in the peculiar witchery of the poems dealing with the supernatural, in the exaltation of the poems of devotion, in the lyrical quality of the songs of children birds, and corn, in the special variety and the special excellence of the poems of passion and meditation. The union of homely yet always select literalness of treatment with mystical visionariness, or visionariness which is sometimes mystical, constitutes the peculiar quality of her poetry"—A. Symonds, Studies in Two Literatures, p. 139.

"Miss Rossetti, in her sacred poems, brings together all the elements of art's excellence and of a Christian faith. Their chief note, their unique interest and delight, is a tenderness in them, a tremulous and wistful beauty of adoration, rising and passing, at times, into something like a very joyous adoration of friend by friend. . . . And with this sense of attaining and perceptive faith comes a further sense, of absolute reality. . . . The Paradisal imageries, crowns, palms, flames, all the 'furniture of heaven,' becomes to us in her poetry as real, visible, tangible as altars upon earth, the golden trumpets and harps, the multitudinous music of the Saints and Angels, ring through the triumphing chaunts of her later verse"—Lionel Johnson, Academy, July 25, 1896 (Vol. 50, p. 59).

CRITICAL NOTES

GOBLIN MARKET, p. 559

This poem, says J. A. Noble, "may be read and enjoyed merely as a charming fairy-fantasy, and as such it is delightful and satisfying, but behind the simple story of the two children and the goblin fruit-sellers is a little spiritual drama of love's vicarious redemption, in which the child redeemer goes into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil, that by her painful conquest she may succor and save the sister who has been vanquished and all but slain."—Impressions and Memories, p. 59.

This symbolic interpretation, although in a less distinctive manner, is accepted by other authorities.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Coventry Patmore (1812-96) had a somewhat unfortunate youth which tended to develop in him self-centered eccentricities. By a father who followed literature as a profession but was regarded socially as a cad, and by doting relatives, he was fatuously praised; he early learned to repeat the familiar words: "Coventry is a clever fellow." Beneath his display of arrogance, however, lay a tenderness that was quick to love and to receive love; and beneath his intellectual self-sufficiency was a mysticism that inclined him, as he grew older, toward transcendental philosophy and fervent religious experience. Tall, angular, and shy, he unveiled his attractive soul only to his friends, to the women whom he loved, and to the readers of his poetry. Among his friends, Tennyson was of the most influence; to him was due the gradual improvement of Patmore's technique in verse, the Pre-Raphaelites accepted him as champion and adviser. Among the women whom he idealized, the most important was Emily Andrews, exquisite in person and sympathetic in mind, whom he married in 1847. Their relationship was the embodiment of an almost religious conception of wedded love which became the theme of The Angel in the House. The last part of this poem, The Victories of Love, reflects Mrs. Patmore's lingering illness and his anticipations of her early death. The Angel in the House, printed in parts from 1854 to 1862, won Patmore a gradually increasing popularity with the reading public until it became perhaps more generally loved than any other poem of the age. His wife's death in 1862 turned Patmore's thoughts toward religion even more strongly than before, until, under the influence of a Miss Byles, whom he married in 1864, he became a Roman Catholic. His second wife brought him wealth, with which he retired to an estate in Sussex; there, no longer dependent on his public, he began a vast and mysterious poem, of a more mystical and transcendental order than his previous writings, of this work nine odes printed in 1868 are the fragments. At Hastings, where he removed in 1875, he carried the work still farther, and wrote, under the stimulus of what he called "a flash of spiritual health" and an exaltation of imaginative fervor, the odes which were published as The Unknown Eros in 1877. Edmund Gosse has described him walking by the sea, a gale blowing back his coat from his erect, thin figure, while he meditated on the great mysteries of spiritual love. Somewhat isolated in his last year by the receding of fame, but mellowed by congenial friendships, he lived on with unimpaired mind until 1896.

Patmore's principal publications were: Poems, 1844; Tamerton Church Tower, 1853, The Angel in the House, 1854-62; Odes, 1868, Collected Works (including The Unknown Eros and Other Odes), 1877; Amelia, 1878, Principle in Art, 1889, Religio Poeta, 1893, Rod, Root and Flower, 1895.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISMS

"The trivial realism of the narrative in The Angel in the House attracted a multitude of readers and at the same time obscured the splendor of the essential part of the poem, so that the very popularity of Patmore's great undertaking delayed and falsified his ultimate success. That success consisted, not in the mild adventures of Honoria and her spouse, but in the magnificence of the philosophical episodes, in which the psychology of love is illustrated in language of great originality and with turns of the most felicitous fancy . . . More charming are the odes devoted to sentiments of remorse, of recollection, or of poignant desiderium, the hopeless longing for a vanished face. In these categories The Azalea, The Toys, and Departure rank among the finest examples remaining to us of pure Victorian poetry. . . . But some parts of The Unknown Eros . . . are more abstruse. In the sacramental odes Patmore is often metaphysical, and sometimes dark with excess of ingenuity. His mystical Catholic poetry is inspired by a study of St. Thomas Aquinas among the ancients and of St. John of the Cross among the moderns. As he pursued his lonely meditations, his odes became more and more exclusively occupied with the religious symbolism of sex. . . . Perhaps in the latest of all his poems . . . written in 1880, Patmore carries his mystical ecstasy to its most transcendental height, where few can follow him"—Edmund Gosse, The English Poets, ed. by T. H. Ward, Vol. 5, pp. 231-34.

"The Angel in the House first appeared in 1854 and may be said to be . . . a kind of half-conscious, half-unconscious revolt against both Tennyson and Browning, but especially against the former. Revolt, indeed, may seem too fierce a word for the mild domesticities of Patmore's poem . . . The poem contained, even at the first, much pretty verse, as it went on, it was to contain not a little that is positively beautiful. But its ambling versification—sommiferous to some of those whom it did not merely please, and positively irritating to others—the deliberate banality of the subject, and the equally deliberate adoption of language outgoing even Wordsworth, even Crabbe, in its avoidance of poetic diction, though they conciliated a large part of contemporary taste, produced a by no means conciliatory effect upon another part which, in the long run, has prevailed. When a man writes

Our witnesses the cook and groom,
We signed the lease for seven years more,

it is not unreasonable to think that Apollo, if he thought it worth his while, must have twitched the poet's ear rather sharply and that attention should have been paid to the twitch. The scornful allusion 'idylls of the dining-room and the deanery,' though its author, Swinburne, was courteous enough not to name the idyllist, expressed a good deal of the younger and youngest opinion of the time"—G. Saintsbury, Cambridge History of English Literature, Vol. 13, pp. 190-91.

CRITICAL NOTES

THE TOYS, p. 571

Mrs Patmore died in 1862, and after that date the five children of the family formed Patmore's "principal solicitude" Edmund Gosse says. "He loved them and they seem to have been both intelligent and well-behaved. But he suffered cruelly from the utterly impossible standard of conduct which he placed before them. . . .

"The constant strain of responsibility for these young motherless creatures was very trying to his nerves. He gave the subject a consideration too constant, and he lost, in his lonely excitement, a sense of proportion. All the little wayward errors which a mother deals with so patiently, corrects so gently and says nothing about, took monstrous proportions to this austere idealist, with his impossible expectations. He was driven to an exaggeration which must make us smile. He wrote: 'I have indeed very little respect for children. Their so-called innocence is want of practice rather than inclination, and all bad passions seem to me to be more violent in children than in men and women, and more wicked because in more immediate conjunction with the divine vision' . . .

"It was at this time, and after one of these painful moods, that he wrote the ode called The Toys, which illustrates, with more delicacy and truth of analysis than any biographer can hope to seize, the ceaseless oscillation of his spirit between severity and tenderness. It is a 'document' of the highest possible value to us in forming a just notion of the temperament of Patmore."—E. Gosse, Coventry Patmore, pp. 99-100.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

James Thomson (1834-82) symbolized the romantic quality of his genius by signing his poems "Bysshe Vanolis" or "B V." in honor of Shelley, and of Novalis, the pen name of Friedrich Leopold (1772-1801), German romantic poet and novelist. Thomson's personality was tragically complex. He was at times one of the most attractive of men—friendly, gay-hearted, alert, sensitive, at other times he was mastered by a melancholy that drove him to dissipation and despair. Perhaps an inheritance from his father, this morbidity was encouraged by certain events of his life. He was left an orphan at the age of eight, he was forced by poverty to live in dismal rooms and to make loans which he could not repay; he lost his early religious faith and could find only a gloomy agnosticism to replace it. His early poems, written for liberal journals, often show the gayety and the courage that won him a wide circle of devoted friends, after 1866, however, he sank lower in melancholy and was tormented by insomnia until, at a low ebb of spirits in 1874, he wrote his City of Dreadful Night. For the next seven years he composed practically nothing. In 1880 the first publication of his poems as a volume, and the cordial praise that Meredith and others gave him restored his hope. He began in the next year once more to write poetry in his gayest vein. A visit with friends in Leicestershire, during the winter of 1881-82, was one of the happiest episodes of his life. Yet his melancholy returned, he drank himself into madness, wandered homelessly in London alleys, and died from exhaustion in 1882.

Thomson's principal publications were: The City of Dreadful Night, and Other Poems, 1880, Vane's Story, Weddah and Om-el-Bonain, and Other Poems, 1881, Essays and Phantasies, 1881, A Voice from the Nile and Other Poems, 1884, Sahres and Profanities, 1884, Poems, Essays, and Fragments, 1892.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISMS

"There is no need at this time of day to argue for or against the philosophy of life in which James Thomson took refuge. His despair was inevitable in a man of his temperament, born and circumstanced as he was. . . . The City of Dreadful Night is not a comfortable poem, nor is it addressed to 'the hopeful young,' or those to whom 'the shows of life' suffice, or those who find comfort in a heaven above or a heaven on earth. Such persons are expressly warned off by the poet himself. It is, however, the most faithful and magnificent expression of the spirit of despair in all modern poetry; it is brave, and it is supremely honest. It should be read as Ecclesiastes or Æschylus should be read, not for the sustenance of faith and hope, but for purification through pity and fear"—G. H. Gerould, Introduction to Poems of James Thomson, pp. xvi ff.

"Of lighter strain, written when the poet could still be happy, are Sunday at Hampstead and Sunday up the River, . . . and one or two others . . . such as The Fire That Filled My Heart of Old. . . . Even against these the charge of a monotonous, narrow, and irrational misery has been brought. But what saves Thomson is the perfection with which he expresses the negative and hopeless side of the sense of mystery, of the Unseen, just as Miss Rossetti expresses the positive and hopeful one. No two contemporary poets perhaps ever completed each other in a more curious way than this Bohemian atheist and this devout lady"—G. Saintsbury, A History of Nineteenth Century Literature, p. 298.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

George Meredith (1828-1909) was early in his youth made self-dependent by the extravagance of his father, a rakish tailor of Portsmouth. His formal education was cut short after a year in 1843-44 at a German school, during an apprenticeship with a London lawyer, he lived precariously on a bowl of porridge a day, and continued his education by his own efforts. In 1848 he turned to journalism and began to contribute poetry to periodicals. Handsome, with an athletic build and chestnut-red hair, and gifted with extraordinary brilliance in conversation, he was welcomed in London Bohemian circles. In 1849 he made an unfortunate match with the beautiful but flighty daughter of Thomas Love Peacock, from whom he separated in 1858. Their gradual estrangement is studied in Meredith's poem Modern Love, which he published with other verse in 1862. Meanwhile he had published in 1859 The Ordeal of Richard Feverel, the first of his novels.

His more serious work not proving profitable, Meredith continued to support himself by what he called "the Egyptian bondage" of journalism and reading for publishers. After a journey in the Alps and an unsuccessful attempt to share a London house with Swinburne and Rossetti, he married in 1864 the charming Marie Vulliamy, and established a permanent home at Flint Cottage, near Box Hill in Surrey, where the scenery had a romantic quality rare in England. In the hills behind his house he put up a Norwegian chalet, slung a hammock from the beams, and lived there while he wrote novels and his Poems and Lyrics of the Joyous Earth, published in 1883. Fastidious, an excellent judge of wine and cigars, he combined social graces with a passion for the out-of-doors, and made long tramps over the hills to keep fresh his contact with the primal earth, which he loved as the stern but wholesome mother of mankind.

With the publication of The Egoist in 1879 and Diana of the Crossways in 1885, Meredith was surprised to find himself at last famous and Box Hill invaded by curious visitors. Whatever joy he might have taken in this long-deferred fame was destroyed by his own ill-health and the mortal illness of his wife; he was forced to give up walking; and, as he said: "When I ceased to walk briskly, part of my life was ended." Under these somber circumstances he published his Poems of Tragic Life and A Reading of Earth in 1887 and 1888. In 1894 he closed his work as a novelist with The Amazing Marriage, but continued to write and publish volumes of verse. He served in his last years as literary arbiter to the world, his critical opinions were widely quoted and much respected. Crippled, he yet insisted on being wheeled out of doors in his chair, in sunshine or rain. When he died, he was buried in the quiet cemetery at Dorking instead of at Westminster Abbey, for, as he said, "better the green grass turf than Abbey pavements."

Meredith's principal publications were Poems, 1851, The Shaving of Shagpat, 1856, The Ordeal of Richard Feverel, 1859; Evan Harrington, 1861, Modern Love and Poems of the English Roadside, 1862; Rhoda Fleming, 1865, Vittoria, 1867, Beauchamp's Career, 1876, On the Idea of Comedy, and of the Uses of the Comic Spirit, 1877; The Egoist, 1879, Poems and Lyrics of the Joy of Earth, 1883, Diana of the Crossways, 1885, Ballads and Poems of Tragic Life, 1887; A Reading of the Earth, 1888, One of Our Conquerors, 1891, Poems, 1892; Lord Ormont and His Aminta, 1894; The Amazing Marriage, 1895, Odes in Contribution to the Songs of French History, 1898, A Reading of Life, 1901; Last Poems, 1909, Celt and Saxon, 1910, Up to Midnight, 1913

"To Meredith poetry has come to be a kind of imaginative logic, and almost the whole of his later work is a reasoning in verse. He reasons, not always clearly to the eye, and never satisfyingly to the ear, but with a fiery intelligence which has more passion than most poets put into frankly emotional verse. He reasons in pictures, every line having its imagery, and he uses pictorial words to express abstract ideas. Disdaining the common subjects of poetry, as he disdains common rhythms, common rhymes, and common language, he does much by his enormous vitality to give human warmth to arguments concerning humanity. He does much, though he attempts the impossible."—A. Symons, Figures of Several Centuries, p. 151.

"Though no one speaks less from a chair or pulpit, Mr Meredith stands to be judged as a teacher and prophet. He is not content to be an observer. . . Mr Meredith's ethic is best applied in his prose and best expounded in his verse, though his verse comes, far less often than his prose, to rightness of form. He has his own divinity, pagan by name. Where other writers appeal to God or to Humanity, he speaks, somewhat insistently, of the Earth, and the Earth is not the malign step-mother of pessimistic theory, but a stern genial mother, if at times something of a governess. Earth lends us our bodies, our fund of power, and our capital of instinct, which may be turned to uses fruitful or sterile. Our life is the adjustment and realization of the forces that Earth has given us. It is love, rightly understood, that tasks and rewards our power of directing those forces. Such love helps us, in its better forms, to the vision of 'nobler races'. The creed is not unlike Carlyle's in its courage, but it is more possible, less savage, and less solitary."—Oliver Elton, Modern Studies, p. 241.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

For William Morris (1834-96) poetry was the relaxation of a life seriously devoted to great aims in painting, architecture, craftsmanship, and the improvement of human society. He was born in London, the son of a well-to-do broker. As a child he became familiar with the Waverley novels, and by the time he was fourteen he had developed a taste for architecture and a love for the medieval. He learned as a schoolboy, he said, "most of what was to be known about English Gothic." Influenced by the Oxford Movement¹, he entered Exeter College, Oxford, in 1853 with the intention of taking holy orders, for a time he thought of founding a monastery where he could devote himself to the production of religious art. His Oxford career brought him into intimate contact with Burne-Jones, Rossetti, and other Pre-Raphaelites and greatly enlarged his interests, he learned to appreciate Chaucer and Malory, and made his first acquaintance with northern mythology and epic. In 1855, while on a tour in northern France with Burne-Jones, he became so impressed with the glories of the French cathedrals that he abandoned his plan to enter the church and decided to devote himself to art, he gave himself first to architecture, then to painting. It was while he was employed with Rossetti and Burne-Jones in frescoing the walls of the Oxford Union that he met Jane Burden, whom he married in 1859.

Morris had already attracted attention as a poet. Early in his career at Oxford he had written verse of great originality and had published some of his poems, with several remarkable prose tales, in The Oxford and Cambridge Magazine (1856), an undergraduate publication which he had founded and supported. Then at London, under the stimulation of Rossetti, he published in 1858 his Defence of Guenevere, and Other Poems, a volume that clearly showed Pre-Raphaelite influences.

¹See the Biographical Sketch of Cardinal Newman, second paragraph, p. 950.

He gave up poetry, however, for the following seven years to plunge into a new project designed to elevate the artistic standards of articles manufactured for use in common life. In company with the Pre-Raphaelites and other friends, he built workshops for the production of many articles, from furniture and glassware to cotton goods and wall-paper, with a new beauty in place of the ugliness usual in such manufacture. Among other innovations was the chair, designed to combine simplicity with comfort, that still bears his name.

In 1866, when this business was operating smoothly, Morris again began to write poetry, this time in a manner more simple, more Chaucerian, than his earlier inarticulate style. During four years he produced the successive parts of The Earthly Paradise (1868-70), writing with fluency and pleasure, one portion, growing too large for inclusion with the others, he published separately in 1867 as The Life and Death of Jason, which proved him a master of romantic narrative. When these Greek legends had been retold, Morris became fascinated with the Icelandic sagas, studied the language under a tutor, published his translation of the Volsunga Saga in 1870, made a journey to Iceland in the following year, and returned so much in the mood of the old sculds that he made other translations in 1874 and published his Sigurd the Volsung and the Fall of the Niblungs in 1876.

Morris's literary activities were again interrupted by the pressure of other interests. At his home at Kelmscott Manor House, near London, he set up a press dedicated to artistic printing, the crowning achievement of which was the Kelmscott edition of Chaucer, issued in 1896. During the eighties his chief concern, however, was with industrial organization, which was of such a sort, he felt, that true craftsmanship was impossible. He therefore came to advocate state socialism as a corrective for the dehumanization of industry, worked as an ardent leader in radical workingmen's societies, and delivered addresses in halls and in the streets in an effort to make his views prevail. The finest expression of this attitude is his Dream of John Ball, published in 1888. By 1890 Morris had come to believe that socialism was impracticable, but he did not cease to expound the theory, so clearly involved with his standards of art, until his death.

After 1889 Morris found leisure to withdraw from strenuous actuality for an occasional excursion into prose romance. His News from Nowhere (1890) is a socialistic romance of the future, his series of prose tales, interspersed with lyrics, began with The House of the Wolfings in 1889 and included The Well at the World's End in 1896. In 1895 his health declined under the pressure of his work, and his strenuous, high-minded, and singularly devoted life ended in the following year.

Morris's principal publications were: The Defence of Guenevere and Other Poems, 1858, The Life and Death of Jason, 1867; The Earthly Paradise, 1868-70, Love Is Enough, 1872; Three Northern Love Stories (with E. Magnusson), 1875, The Æneids of Virgil, 1876, The Story of Sigurd

the Volsung and the Fall of the Niblungs, 1876, Hopes and Fears for Art, 1882, The Odyssey of Homer, 1887; A Dream of John Ball, 1888; Signs of Change, 1888; A Tale of the House of the Wolfings, 1889, News from Nowhere, 1890, Poems by the Way, 1891, Gothic Architecture, 1893, The Tale of a Beowulf (with A. INTRODUCTORY CRITICISMS

"One thinks of Morris as a man who wished to make the world as beautiful as an illuminated manuscript. He loved the bright colors, the gold, the little strange insets of landscape, the exquisite craftsmanship of decoration, in which the genius of the medieval illuminators expressed itself. His Utopia meant the restoration, not so much of the soul of man, as of the selected delights of the arts and crafts of the Middle Ages"—R. Lynd, The Art of Letters, p. 150.

"There are two important characteristics that individualize Morris's poetic work, and differentiate it from that of his contemporaries. The most obvious thing about his work as an artist, whether the work be a wall-paper or an epic, is its spaciousness of design. Large effects, ample spaces of beauty, diffusion rather than concentration, were what he aimed at . . . It is this quality of workmanship that makes quotation from Morris unsatisfactory . . . The second characteristic is directness of method . . . Without it his spaciousness of design might have spelt mere prolixity and incoherence. . . it gives lucidity . . . to his work . . . It is a part of the old-world atmosphere he brought into modern literature, and shows how fully he had incorporated into blood and marrow the old legends and sagas"—A. Compton-Rickett, William Morris, pp. 114-19.

"To democratize art and to ennoble and beautify common daily work was the aim of William Morris in his earnest crusade for the cause of art and for the cause of humanity. Morris desired for every human being a fair share of the nobler joys of living and of being. He declared that it is wrong to shut one's eyes to ugliness and to vulgarity wherever found, or to acquiesce in them as either desirable or necessary. Though he approached the social question from the side of art, he was not merely an aesthete. He saw very clearly that economic conditions lie back of the wretchedness, the vulgarity, the narrowness, and the ugliness that too frequently make up the larger part of the life of the masses. He insisted further that the rich, with all of their power and their dominion over the earth, cannot escape from sharing in some degree the degradation of the worker who produces the wares which all must buy, rich and poor alike. The present age, by denying a fair share of the joys and satisfactions of life to the laborer, diminishes the real joys and satisfactions of life for the rich. The vulgarization of the worker lowers the level of life for all"—A. von Helmholtz-Phelan, The Social Philosophy of William Morris, p. 3.

CRITICAL NOTES

Some of the poems in Morris's first volume of verse—The Defence of Guenevere, and Other Poems—show influences of Pre-Raphaelitism (see note on The Pre-Raphaelites, p. 1008). Morris early became associated with Rossetti and Burne-Jones and shared with them an enthusiasm for attempting to identify art with life. Fascinated as he was by medieval life, its illuminated manuscripts, its beauty of architectural design, its mysticism, it was but natural that his early poetry especially should bear the inevitable Pre-Raphaelite characteristics of richness of decorative color, dimness of outline, tangled and obscure utterances, and tantalizing mysteriousness. Poems on pages 608-630, inclusive, of this book appeared in Morris's first volume.

THE DEFENCE OF GUENEVERE, p. 609

Guenevere, the wife of King Arthur, being charged with adultery and twice under sentence of death by fire, speaks in this poem in her own defence. Two important incidents, as related by Malory in Morte Darthur (19-20), lie back of the poem—(1) While Guenevere was enjoying a holiday with her unarmed knights, she was carried off by Sir Meliagrance and his band (lines 168 ff.) to Meliagrance's castle, la Fausse Garde, and held prisoner until she was rescued by Lancelot. In gaining entrance to Guenevere's chamber one night, Lancelot cut his arm on the bars of the window; the blood that Meliagrance discovered the next morning on the bed came from Lancelot's wound, although Meliagrance charged the Queen with having received one of her wounded knights who had been close by in the castle. Lancelot agreed to prove the Queen's innocence later in a combat with Meliagrance. While Lancelot was being shown about the castle, he stepped upon a trap (line 190) and fell into a cave full of straw. He managed to escape in time to keep his appointment at the combat, in which he killed Meliagrance and saved Guenevere from the fire. (2) At a later time, Lancelot was found in Guenevere's chamber by fourteen knights who had previously laid a trap to catch the lovers. Lancelot killed thirteen of the knights, including Gawaine's two sons and brother Agravaine, Modred, a half-brother of Gawaine, escaped. After this episode, Guenevere was again condemned to be burned. It is at this second trial that she speaks in this poem.

Morris follows Malory's account rather closely except in two details—Gawaine was not present at the fight in the Queen's chamber, and he was not an accuser of the Queen, on the contrary, he spoke most vigorously in her defence. For some unexplained reason Morris presents Gawaine as an accuser (See G. H. Maynard's The Arthur of the English Poets, pp. 357-360).

Page 612, line 242. The story of the fight in Guenevere's chamber is thus related by Malory, Book 20, Chapter 4

And therewith Sir Launcelot wrapped his mantle about his arm well and surely; and by then they had gotten a great form out of the hall, and therewithal they rashed at the door. Fair lords, said Sir Launcelot, leave your noise and your rashing, and I shall set open this door, and then may ye do with me what it liketh you. Come off then, said they all, and do it, for it availeth thee not to strive against us all; and therefore let us into this chamber, and we shall save thy life until thou come to King Arthur. Then Launcelot unbarred the door, and with his left hand he held it open a little, so that but one man might come in at once; and so there came striding a good knight, a much man and large, and his name was Colgrevaunce of Gore, and he with a sword struck at Sir Launcelot mightily, and he put aside the stroke and gave him such a buffet upon the helmet, that he fell grovelling dead within the chamber door. And then Sir Launcelot with great might drew that dead knight within the chamber door; and Sir Launcelot with help of the queen and her ladies was lightly armed in Sir Colgrevaunce's armour. And ever stood Sir Agravaine and Sir Modred crying Traitor knight, come out of the queen's chamber. Leave your noise, said Sir Launcelot unto Sir Agravaine, for wit you well, Sir Agravaine, ye shall not prison me this night; and therefore an ye do by my counsel, go ye all from this chamber door, and make not such crying and such manner of slander as ye do; for I promise you by my knighthood, an ye will depart and make no more noise, I shall as to-morn appear afore you all before the king, and then let it be seen which of you all, outhere else ye all, that will accuse me of treason; and there I shall answer you as a knight should, that hither I came to the queen for no manner of mal engine, and that will I prove and make it good upon you with my hands. Fie on thee, traitor, said Sir Agravaine and Sir Modred, we will have thee maugre thy head, and slay thee if we list; for we let thee wit we have the choice of King Arthur to save thee or to slay thee. Ah sirs, said Sir Launcelot, is there none other grace with you? then keep yourself. So then Sir Launcelot set all open the chamber door, and mightily and knightly he strode in amongst them; and anon at the first buffet he slew Sir Agravaine. And twelve of his fellows after, within a little while after, he laid them cold to the earth, for there was none of the twelve that might stand Sir Launcelot one buffet. Also Sir Launcelot wounded Sir Modred, and he fled with all his might. And then Sir Launcelot returned again unto the queen, and said Madam, now wit you well all our true love is brought to an end, for now will King Arthur ever be my foe; and therefore, madam, an it like you that I may have you with me, I shall save you from all manner adventures dangerous. That is not best, said the queen; meseemeth now ye have done so much harm, it will be best ye hold you still with this. And if ye see that as to-morn they will put me unto death, then may ye rescue me as ye think best. I will well, said Sir Launcelot, for have ye no doubt, while I am living I shall rescue you. And then he kissed her, and either gave other a ring; and so there he left the queen, and went until his lodging.

RAPUNZEL, p. 613

Rapunzel was included in Morris's first volume of poetry—The Defence of Guenevere, and Other Poems (1858). Alfred Noyes calls it "the most bewitching of all the poems in this book. Its elaborate metrical scheme is in itself a complete refutation of what has been said about Morris's lack of technique, and it is a most brilliantly successful voyage across the perilous sea that washes fairylands forlorn, full of delicate beauty, and deliciously medieval."—William Morris, by Alfred Noyes, p. 29.

The story of Rapunzel belongs to folk-lore. It is told as follows in the Grimm Brothers' collection of Fairy Tales. A man and his wife, eagerly looking forward to the birth of their long-desired child, lived near the house and garden of a witch. To satisfy his wife's craving the man stole some vegetables from the garden, but was caught by the witch who demanded the unborn child as payment for the theft. The man agreed, and the new-born girl was delivered to the witch, who named her Rapunzel, and at the end of twelve years confined her in a lonely tower with no opening except a small window at the top. Through this, at the command of the witch, Rapunzel daily let down her long golden hair for the witch to use in climbing to the window.

It happened that a prince, passing through the forest surrounding the tower, saw the beautiful girl and loved her. Observing the method used by the witch to gain entrance to the tower, he used it also, and thereafter paid nightly visits to Rapunzel. The witch, soon discovered their secret, cut off the golden hair of Rapunzel, and carried her away to the desert. She awaited in the tower a visit from the prince, who was ignorant of what had happened, and so frightened him that he fell from the window into a thorn bush and was blinded. After wandering about for a time, he finally came to Rapunzel, whose tears of joy fell upon his eyes and restored their sight. They then set out for the prince's dominion, where they lived happily ever after.

THE BLUE CLOSET, p. 625

John Drinkwater characterizes this poem with The Tune of Seven Towers (p. 626) and Two Red Roses Across the Moon (p. 628) as "essays in color without any attempt at concrete significance." "It is wrong," he adds, "to say that these poems have no meaning. They mean exactly the colors that they themselves create. It would be as wise to say that a sunset or a blue distance of mountains is meaningless"—William Morris, by John Drinkwater, pp. 65-66.

Noyes describes these poems as "vague and somewhat chaotic mediæval scraps of wind-music."—William Morris, by Alfred Noyes, p. 21.

THE LIFE AND DEATH OF JASON, p. 630

Because of its romantic nature, the old Greek legend of the Quest of the Golden Fleece was especially interesting to Morris. He originally planned to use it as a theme of one of the narrative poems of The Earthly Paradise (p. 632), but his enthusiasm soon outran his first design, and the poem was published separately in 1867 as The Life and Death of Jason. It won instant popularity. Following is a brief summary of the story.

Jason was the son of Æson and nephew of Pelias, King of Iolcus, in Thessaly. To keep Jason from his rightful throne, Pelias sent him in quest of the Golden Fleece, which had been taken from the ram that bore Phrixus, about to be sacrificed to Zeus, through the air to Colchis, in Asia. Æetis, King of Colchis, had placed the Fleece in a grove where it was guarded by a sleepless dragon. With the aid of the gods, Jason built an enchanted ship, the Argo, and accompanied by fifty of the noblest heroes of Greece—including Castor and Pollux, Orpheus, Hercules, Theseus, and Nestor—set out on the perilous undertaking, and finally arrived at Colchis. The King promised Jason the Fleece if he would harness two fire-breathing, brazen-hoofed bulls to a plow, plow a field sacred to Mars, sow it with dragons' teeth, and kill the crop of armed men that would spring up, and slay the dragon guarding the Fleece. Jason performed all these tasks with the aid of the King's daughter Medea, a powerful sorceress who had fallen in love with him; after the Fleece was secured Jason fled with Medea to the ship and sailed back to Iolcus. With the aid of Medea's wiles, Pelias was slain, and Jason and Medea lived happily in Corinth until Jason fell in love with Glauce, the daughter of Creon, king of Corinth. Medea destroyed her rival with a magic robe of death and fled to Athens. Not long after, Jason fell asleep on the seashore and next morning was found dead.

THE EARTHLY PARADISE, p. 632

The Earthly Paradise is a cycle of twenty-four tales told in verse and bound together, after the manner of Chaucer, by a connecting link that forms the subject of the Prologue. In the Prologue, Morris tells how certain gentlemen and wanderers, driven from their homes in Norway by the great pestilence that spread over Europe in the middle of the fourteenth century, set out to find the fabled Earthly Paradise. After many years they reach a "Western land" inhabited by descendants of the ancient Greeks, who entertain them with semi-monthly feasts for a year. At each feast a tale is told, alternately by one of the inhabitants and by one of the visitors. The inhabitants tell stories of Greek mythology; the visitors, stories of Norse or Romance origin. The prologue, the narrative links connecting the tales, and eight of the tales themselves are written in ten-syllabled couplets; seven tales are in eight-syllabled couplets; the rest, together with the lyrics for the various months, are written in seven-lined stanzas. THE LADY OF THE LAND, p 633

The following account of The Lady of the Land appears in Cap IV of The Voiage and Travaile of Sir John Maundeville

THE STORY OF SIGURD THE VOLSUNG, p. 641

Sigurd the Volsung is a verse rendering of the prose Volsunga Saga, written in Iceland during the twelfth century. Morris had previously translated it in prose. This saga is the oldest form of the Teutonic epic, the story of Siegfried (or Sigurd) and the Nibelungs, best known through the Nibelungenlied and Wagner's opera cycle, Die Ring des Nibelungen.

The general outlines of the Scandinavian and the German forms of the story are the same, but names and details vary. The hero of the Scandinavian version is Sigurd, the son of Sigmund, and the grandson of Volsung, a king of the Huns. Sigmund was slain in battle before the birth of Sigurd, who subsequently became king of the Volsungs. He was reared and trained by Regin, a blacksmith, and, incited by him, Sigurd slew the dragon Fafnir and gained possession of his hoard of gold. After plighting troth to Brynhild, one of the Valkyrie, Sigurd visited the court of the Burgundians, called the Nibelungs, and under the spell of a love-potion married Gudrun, daughter of the Niblung king. Then by a stratagem he aided Gudrun's brother Gunnar to secure Brynhild as his wife. In a jealous rage Brynhild persuaded Gudrun's brother Guttorm to kill Sigurd and then she took her own life. Gudrun later married Atli (Attila), king of the Huns, who slew her brothers when they visited him. She soon avenged their death by setting fire to the hall and killing Atli and his children.

Morris tells the story in four books, entitled Sigmund, Regin, Brynhild, and Gudrun.

Book I. Sigmund

Sigmund tells of the early days of the Volsungs before the birth of Sigurd, the last of the race. Volsung, king of the Huns, gave his daughter Signy in marriage to Sigger, king of the Goths. Jealous of the Volsungs, Sigger invited them to his court, and his band slew all of the visitors except Volsung's son Sigmund, who soon planned vengeance. Assuming the form of another woman Signy went to Sigmund and became the mother of his son Sinfliot, who later was poisoned by Borghild, Sigmund's first wife. For this deed Borghild was driven from home, and Sigmund then married Hiordis, later he was killed in a battle with the chieftain Lyngi, who also had loved Hiordis. Sigurd was born after the death of Sigmund.

Book II—Regin

Sigurd was reared and trained by Regin, the blacksmith, who told him a story of ancient wrongs and incited him to kill Fafnir the dragon in order to secure a great treasure. Regin stated that upon the death of his brother Otter at the hands of Loki (the Norse god of destruction), Regin's father (Reidmar) demanded as recompense the traditional hoard of gold in the possession of the dwarf Andvari, who lived in the sea in the form of a pike. Loki got the treasure, including a magic ring that had the power to produce gold, but Andvari put a curse upon the ring and the treasure and upon anybody who should possess either. In a quarrel between Regin and his brother Fafnir for possession of the gold, Fafnir got it by killing his father. After inducing Sigurd to slay Fafnir, Regin forged for the exploit a magic sword named the Wrath of Sigurd. Armed with this weapon, Sigurd slew both Fafnir and Regin, seized the golden treasure, and rode away on his horse Greyfell. After a time he came to the Hill of Hindfell, where he found Brynhild the Valkyrie in a trance, placed there by Odin for disobedience and destined to fall in love with a mortal. Together Sigurd and Brynhild plighted their troth, and Sigurd gave her the fated ring of Andvari.

Book III—Brynhild

Brynhild tells of the deeds of Sigurd, of his sojourn with the Niblungs, or Burgundians, and of his death. After visiting Brynhild in her palace in the Land of Lyndale, Sigurd came to the Land of the Niblungs and made an alliance with King Giuki, through a magic potion given him by Grimhild, the King's wife, Sigurd forgot Brynhild and wedded Gudrun, the daughter of Giuki and Grimhild. Gunnar, who succeeded his father Giuki as king of the Niblungs, loved Brynhild but could not pass the flames that surrounded her magic house in Lyndale. Thereupon Sigurd took the form of Gunnar and rode on Greyfell through the flames. He plighted troth with Brynhild, but during the night he "laid 'twixt him and the body of Brynhild his bright blue battle-blade." As Sigurd departed the next morning Brynhild placed upon his finger the fated ring of the treasure. Shortly after the marriage of Gunnar and Brynhild, Gudrun and Brynhild engaged in a quarrel, and Gudrun tauntingly revealed the truth of Gunnar's wooing. Overcome with grief and rage, Brynhild listened to the declarations of love by Sigurd, then awakened from the effect of Grimhild's potion, and replied, "I will not wed thee, Sigurd, nor any man alive." At the suggestion of Brynhild, the Niblungs accomplished the death of Sigurd through Guttorm, Gunnar's brother, who had not sworn peace with Sigurd at the time of his arrival. Brynhild took her own life after a last request that she be burned on the funeral pyre of Sigurd. With the death of Sigurd the fated treasure of gold passed into the hands of the Niblung.

Book IV—Gudrun

Gudrun tells of the fateful days of the Niblungs after they slew Sigurd and of their destruction by King Atli and his followers. After the death of Sigurd, Gudrun married King Atli from beyond the sea and incited him to gain the ancient treasure as a means of avenging Sigurd. Atli invited the Niblungs to visit him and after they arrived he captured Gunnar and his brother Hogni and killed all their followers. He then killed Hogni and placed Gunnar in a pit with serpents. For a short time Gunnar charmed them with his playing and singing but finally one of them stung him to death. To avenge her brothers, Gudrun killed Atli and burned the hall, then she leaped into the sea.

A DREAM OF JOHN BALL, p. 650

A Dream of John Ball is a prose socialistic romance that contrasts English society when the feudal system was breaking up with that of Morris's own day and faintly suggests what the future may present. The author dreams that he is in the county of Kent, where he meets a group of ardent reformers including John Ball, the "mad priest," who was a leader in the Peasants' Revolt of 1381. Former experiences are lived through again, and in discussing "the struggle against tyranny for the freedom of life," the two enthusiasts find much in common. The poem in the text was sung early in the story by a young man of the company as a kind of signal for John Ball to appear.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Algernon Charles Swinburne (1837-1909) acquired before his majority practically all the knowledge, abilities, ideas, and tendencies which he utilized during the remainder of his life. By his mother, Lady Jane, and his grandfather, Sir John, he was early introduced to the literatures of France and Italy, at Eton he read everything, especially Elizabethan plays, and, in his impetuous way, adored Landor, Shelley, and Corneille, but loathed Euripides and Racine, at Oxford he became a freethinker in religion, an ardent supporter of Italian and French struggles for political liberty, and a source of anxiety to Benjamin Jowett, the benevolent and learned head of his college, because of the irregularities of his life. With his large head and slender, nervous body, he was no less extraordinary in his physical appearance than in the breadth and vigor of his conversation, consequently, when he came to London after leaving Oxford without a degree in 1861, he attracted a circle of friends, including Dante Gabriel Rossetti and the other Pre-Raphaelites. Under Rossetti's wise guidance his lyrical powers greatly expanded, the influence of FitzGerald's Rubáiyát and of the French poets Hugo and Baudelaire was also important in the development of his poetry. A few of his characteristic lyrics—Faustine (1862), The Triumph of Time (1866), Laus Veneris (1866), Itylus (1866)—some in the Pre-Raphaelite manner, were written in 1862-63; and Atalanta in Calydon, published in 1865, and hailed by Ruskin as "the grandest thing ever done by a youth—though he is a demoniac youth," made him famous.

This fame was soon changed to notoriety. His dissipations became elaborated in popular rumor; and his Poems and Ballads, published in 1866, was denounced by the critics and avidly bought by the public. His picture was displayed in shop-windows, and gossip played havoc with his name. For a time Swinburne appeared eager to live up to his reputation, but the strain on his nervous although wiry constitution brought illness, epileptic attacks, and necessitated long periods of recuperation. His thoughts, too, were directed into new channels by the influence of Mazzini, the Italian liberator, for whom in 1868 Swinburne wrote the Hymn of Man and devoted three years to Songs before Sunrise (1871). Under the care of such friends as Rossetti, Meredith, and Jowett, his health was sufficient to allow him to engage in spirited controversies with political and literary enemies, to make a series of enthusiastic studies in Elizabethan drama, and to write the lyrics which were issued in 1878 as a second series of Poems and Ballads. He was near death in the following year, yet was restored to health and given thirty years more of productivity by the almost paternal care of his friend Theodore Watts-Dunton. To the turmoil of Swinburne's preceding life succeeded a great calm. He lived in ordered routine at Watts-Dunton's suburban home; he walked daily over the same path, pausing to talk with children or to admire babies, because of increasing deafness, he seldom visited the larger world. In spite of the deleterious influence of Watts-Dunton, Swinburne continued to produce some good work and showed his creative vigor and his marvelous lyrical sense through a long list of publications; of this period Tennyson said: "Swinburne is a reed through which all things blow into music." His literary likings he expressed in many appreciative essays. He died of pneumonia in his seventy-first year.

Swinburne's principal publications were The Queen Mother and Rosamund, 1860, Atalanta in Calydon, 1865, Chastelard, 1865, Poems and Ballads, 1866, Notes on Poems and Reviews, 1866, A Song of Italy, 1867, William Blake, 1867; Songs before Sunrise, 1871, Under the Microscope, 1872, Bothwell, 1874, Essays and Studies, 1875, George Chapman, 1875, Erechtheus, 1876, Poems and Ballads Second Series, 1878, A Study of Shakespeare, 1880, Songs of the Springtides, 1880, Studies in Song, 1880, Mary Stuart, 1881, Tristram of Lyonesse, and Other Poems, 1882; A Century of Roundels, 1883; A Midsummer Holiday, and Other Poems, 1884; Marino Faliero, 1885, A Study of Victor Hugo, 1886, Miscellanies, 1886, Lochner, 1887, Poems and Ballads Third Series, 1889, A Study of Ben Jonson, 1889; The Sisters, 1892, Astrophel, and Other Poems, 1894, Studies in Prose and Poetry, 1894, The Tale of Balcan, 1896, Rosamund, Queen of the Lombards, 1899; A Chancel Passage, and Other Poems, 1904; The Duke of Gandia, 1908, The Age of Shakespeare, 1908.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISMS

"He [Swinburne] broke in on that rather agreeably tedious Victorian tea-party with the effect of some pagan creature, at once impish and divine, leaping on to the sleek lawn, to stamp its goat-feet in challenge, to deride with its screech of laughter the admirable decorum of the conversation. The disorder that followed remains indescribable, and, knowing what we do of the real character of many of the startled company, it is not now quite easy to understand. Few of them were really so tame as they seemed, in that August of 1866, when the summer was so suddenly smitten with strange air, and keen, wild scents and hot, artificial odors of the alcove overwhelmed the temperate perfumes of the insular garden. Even their typical poet, Tennyson, if you considered him closely, when he was off duty, had in him, at any rate as a man, something farouche and acrid, a reminder that, if he now wrote Enoch Arden and the like, he had been, not so long ago, in his lucky, unguarded hour, the author of Maud. But, for the time being, he was complacent, and rather somnolent, and a trifle official. There was rather too much suavity in the setting he and they had contrived for themselves, too even a gloss on that cultured society. It had genius and talent in abundance, and was concerned with many high matters, of which, however, it now spoke with the emphasis of habit rather than of constantly renewed conviction; but it had become inhospitable to new ideas, suspicious of all instincts which did not bring with them a certificate from some reputable authority. Admirably, it had decided, with the Laureate, to let the ape and tiger die, at any rate as subjects of discussion, but it had fallen into a certain zoological confusion, whereby many permanent, if you like deplorable, human characteristics have been assumed to be simian or feline, and it was sure they could be eradicated by a conspiracy of silence."—T. E. Welby, A Study of Swinburne, pp. 30-31.

"Swinburne . . . represented, in its most flamboyant shape, revolt against the concessions and the hypocrisies of the Mid-Victorian era . . . An extraordinary exhilaration accompanied his presence, something uplifted, extravagant, and yet unselfish. No one has ever lived who loved poetry more passionately, found in it more inexhaustible sources of pleasure, cultivated it more thoroughly for itself, more sincerely for nothing which it might be persuaded to offer as a side issue. Half Swinburne's literary influence depended upon little, unregarded matters, such as his unflinching attitude of worship towards the great masters, his devotion to unpopular causes, his uncompromising arrogance in the face of conventionality. It is becoming difficult to recapture even the thrill he caused by his magic use of 'unpoetic' monosyllables, such as 'bleat,' 'pinch,' 'rind,' 'fang,' 'wince,' embedded in the very heart of his ornate melody. But his meteoric flight across the literary heavens, followed by the slow and dignified descent of the glimmering shower of sparks, will long excite curiosity, even when the sensation it caused has ceased to be quite intelligible."—E. Gosse, Portraits and Sketches, pp. 57-58.

"The gift of Swinburne is to be capable of passion. Enthusiasm is inseparable from him. Perhaps the simplest aspect of his genius lies in his revolutionary songs . . . his songs for Italy, in the great days of her patriots, the first-fruits of his sympathies with the land and of his personal admiration for Mazzini. He does not state the grounds of his faith, for it is not an intellectual passion that seizes on him, it is a fervor that burns, an exaltation that lifts and heightens, a flood of feeling that pours forth and inundates with light and music and with the confluence of many strengths in one superb moral force—the revolutionary cause. . . . In his own land Swinburne's revolutionary ardor changed and took a new form in an illimitable patriotism, a pride in England, an Elizabethan might of land-love that carried the fate of the Armada in its bosom as its dearest memory and expressed itself in an exuberance of panegyric and delight that makes his verse seem contemporaneous with English liberty and the ocean-rhythm of England's empire"—G. E. Woodberry, Literary Essays, pp. 289-90.

"Reading . . . Swinburne on a high rock around which the sea is washing, one is struck by the way in which these cadences, in their unending, ever-varying flow, seem to harmonize with the rhythm of the sea. . . . The whole essence of Swinburne seems to be made by the rush and soft flowing impetus of the sea. The sea has passed into his blood like a passion, and into his verse like a transfiguring element. It is actually the last word of many of his poems, and it is the first and last word of his poetry."—A. Symons, Figures of Several Centuries, p. 161.

CRITICAL NOTES

A SONG IN TIME OF ORDER, p. 654

The date of 1852, accompanying the title of this poem, marked the period of domination of tyrannical forces in Europe. It is against such power that the three republicans of the poem are revolting.

The contagion of the French Revolution of Feb., 1848, which established the second French Republic, spread throughout the continent of Europe and greatly heartened organized enemies of monarchy and repression. In Germany the forces of democracy clamored for political independence, in Italy and Hungary sporadic uprisings endeavored to throw off the despotic yoke of Austria. A new republic was proclaimed in Florence in Feb., 1849, and on the same day a popular assembly at Rome deposed the Pope from temporal power and proclaimed the Republic of Rome. By his public condemnation of the war for Italian freedom, and by his refusal to sanction certain liberal acts of legislation, Pope Pius IX had earlier lost favor with the people and had fled to the Neapolitan fortress at Gaeta. France, however, had already begun proceedings which resulted in the reinstatement of the Pope on July 14, 1849, and his return to Rome in 1850.

The so-called "Papal Aggression" stirred England in 1850, when the Pope issued a bull setting up a hierarchy of bishops for England with titles to be derived from English sees created by the bull, rather than as formerly from extinct dioceses in Asia Minor. A statement by Cardinal Wiseman that "Catholic England had been restored to its orbit in the ecclesiastical firmament from which its light had been long vanished" added fuel to the excitement, which eventuated in the burning of effigies and the passing of the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill in 1851, which aimed directly at the provisions of the Papal bull.

In Dec., 1851, Lord Palmerston, foreign secretary in England, outraged public opinion by unofficially approving the notorious coup d'état by which Louis Napoleon, who had been elected president of the French Republic, overthrew the government and a year later proclaimed himself Emperor of the French.

FAUSTINE, p. 655

Swinburne gives the following explanation of the origin and the meaning of this poem:

"Faustine is the reverie of a man gazing on the bitter and vicious loveliness of a face as common and as cheap as the morality of reviewers, and dreaming of past lives in which this fair face may have held a nobler or fitter station, the imperial profile may have been Faustina's, the thirsty lips a Mænad's, when first she learnt to drink blood or wine, to waste the loves and ruin the lives of men, through Greece and again through Rome she may have passed with the same face which now comes before us dishonored and dis-crowned. Whatever of merit or demerit there may be in the verses, the idea that gives them such life as they have is simple enough, the transmigration of a single soul, doomed as though by accident from the first to all evil and no good, through many ages and forms, but clad always in the same type of fleshly beauty. The chance which suggested to me this poem was one which may happen any day to any man—the sudden sight of a living face which recalled the well-known likeness of another dead for centuries. In this instance, the noble and faultless type of the elder Faustina, as seen in coin and bust. Out of that casual glimpse and sudden recollection these verses sprang and grew"—Notes on Poems and Reviews, in Vol. 16 of the Complete Works, pp. 364-65.

ATALANTA IN CALYDON, p 657

Atalanta in Calydon is a drama in which Swinburne attempted, as he said, "to do something original in English which might in some degree reproduce for English readers the likeness of a Greek tragedy with something of its true poetic life and charm." Although the play diverges from the exact formulas of a Greek drama, it nevertheless accomplishes what the author intended.

The theme concerns the story of the famous hunt for the wild boar that in ancient legend devastated the country in Calydon, a province in northwestern Greece. The story is as follows: Ceneus, king of Calydon, had offended Artemis, goddess of the moon, by neglecting her in his rituals, and she sought vengeance by inciting war against him and by sending a wild boar that laid waste the country of his people. In the expedition organized to slay the boar was Atalanta, the beautiful Arcadian huntress, daughter of Zeus, and beloved of Artemis. Meleager, a young hero who had taken part in the quest for the Golden Fleece, the son of Ceneus and Althaea, fell in love with Atalanta, and when the boar was killed presented her with the spoils of victory. Toxæus and Plexippus, brothers of Queen Althaea, resented this action and in attempting to deprive Atalanta of her prize were both killed by Meleager. At the time of the birth of Meleager, Althaea had been warned by the Fates that he would live only so long as the brand in the fire before her remained unconsumed, in order to protect his life she snatched the brand from the flames and carefully preserved it. When she heard of the tragic death of her brothers, she became angry at her son and plunged the brand into the fire, as it was consumed the life of Meleager wasted away.

The Invocation, calling upon Artemis and Apollo to aid the enterprise of the hunt, is the opening section of the drama.

LAUS VENERIS, p. 664

Laus Veneris is a rehandling, or rather an extension, of the Tannhauser legend. In the medieval story, the knight, who had been enamored of Venus, went to Rome to secure pardon for his sinful love from Pope Urban, denied his request, he returned to Venus. Swinburne thus explains his purpose:

"Of the poem in which I have attempted once more to embody the legend of Venus and her knight, I need say only that my first aim was to rehandle the old story in a new fashion. To me it seemed that the tragedy began with the knight's return to Venus—began at the point where hitherto it had seemed to leave off. The immortal agony of a man lost after all repentance—cast down from fearful hope into fearless despair—believing in Christ and bound to Venus—desirous of penitential pain, and damned to joyless pleasure—this, in my eyes, was the kernel and nucleus of a myth comparable only to that of the foolish virgins and bearing the same burden. The tragic touch of the story is this: that the knight who has renounced Christ believes in him, the lover who has embraced Venus disbelieves in her. Vainly and in despair would he make the best of that which is the worst—vainly remonstrate with God, and argue on the side he would fain desert. Once accept or admit the least admixture of pagan worship, or of modern thought, and the whole story collapses into froth and smoke"—Notes on Poems and Reviews, in Vol. 16 of the Complete Works, p. 365.

Page 667, lines 181 ff. With these lines compare the following passage from the famous Old French love story of Aucassin and Nicolette. The opposition of the father of Aucassin to his love for the beautiful Saracen captive Nicolette led to her being confined in a high chamber in the castle of the Viscount, her godfather. When told that marriage with Nicolette would lose him Paradise, Aucassin replied "What have I to do in Paradise? I seek not to enter there, but let me have Nicolette, my most sweet friend whom I love so much. Into Paradise none go except the sort of people I will tell you of. There go those old priests and those lame and crippled ones who all day and all night grovel before altars and in old crypts, and those clothed in old, worn cloaks and in old rags, those who are naked and barefoot and full of sores, those who die of hunger and of thirst and of cold, and of miseries. These go to Paradise, with them have I nothing to do, but into hell I wish to go. For into hell go the goodly clerks and the goodly knights, who have died in the tournaments and in the great wars, and the good soldier and the true man. With these do I wish to go. And there go also the fair, courteous ladies who have two loves or three besides their lords. And there go also the gold and the silver and the rich furs, and there go also the harper and minstrel and the Kings of the world. With these I wish to go, only let me have Nicolette, my most sweet friend, with me."

IN MEMORY OF WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR, p 681

Swinburne had the faculty of being both a hard hater and a violent lover, which often led him to express extravagant blame or praise with equal facility. Antagonism engendered by the intensity of his attacks and controversies was paralleled by ridicule when he engaged in what he called "the noble pleasure of praising." Hero-worship became with him, as Nicolson says (Swinburne, p. 69), "a deep and persistent religion, and the most potent of his incantations was ever 'Let us now praise famous men.'" The exaggerations of his critical utterances correlate with such incidents as his kneeling before the aged Landor when they first met in Italy in 1864, or his carrying a footstool to a dinner given in honor of Browning so that he might sit at Browning's feet.

DOLORES, p 682

Swinburne says of this poem:

"I have striven here to express that transient state of spirit through which a man may be supposed to pass, foiled in love and weary of loving, but not yet in sight of rest; seeking refuge in those 'violent delights' which 'have violent ends,' in fierce and frank sensualities which at least profess to be no more than they are. This poem, like Faustine, is so distinctly symbolic and fanciful that it cannot justly be amenable to judgment as a study in the school of realism. The spirit, bowed and discolored by suffering and by passion (which are indeed the same thing and the same word), plays for awhile with its pleasures and its pains, mixes and distorts them with a sense half-humorous and half-mournful, exults in bitter and doubtful emotions.

Moods of fantastic sadness, nothing worth

It sports with sorrow, and jests against itself, cries out for freedom and confesses the chain, decorates with the name of goddess, crowns anew as the mystical Cotytto, some woman, real or ideal, in whom the pride of life with its companion lusts is incarnate. In her lover's half-shut eyes, her fierce unchaste beauty is transfigured, her cruel sensual eyes have a meaning and a message, there are memories and secrets in the kisses of her lips. She is the darker Venus, fed with burnt-offering and blood-sacrifice, the veiled image of that pleasure which men impelled by satiety and perverted by power have sought through ways as strange as Nero's before and since his time, the daughter of lust and death, and holding of both her parents; Our Lady of Pain, antagonist alike of trivial sins and virtues, no Virgin, and unblest of men; no mother of the Gods or God, no Cybele, served by sexless priests or monks, adored or Origen or Atys, no likeness of her in Dindymus or Loreto—"Notes on Poems and Reviews," in Vol. 16 of the Complete Works, pp. 360-61.

Swinburne's poetry lent itself easily to parody, as he himself demonstrated in his own Nepheleidia (p. 725). One of the most famous parodies is the following poem by Arthur Clement Hilton (1851-77):

Ocotopus

BY ALGERNON CHARLES SIN-BURN

Strange beauty, eight-limbed and eight-handed,

Whence camest to dazzle our eyes?

With thy bosom bespangled and banded

With the hues of the seas and the skies;

Is thy home European or Asian,

O mystical monster marine?

Part molluscous and partly crustacean,

Betwixt and between

Wast thou born to the sound of sea trumpets,

Hast thou eaten and drunk to excess

Of the sponges—thy muffins and crumpets,

Of the seaweed—thy mustard and cress?

Wast thou nurtured in caverns of coral,

Remote from reproof or restraint?

Art thou innocent, art thou immoral,

Sinburnian or Saint?

Lithe limbs, curling free, as a creeper

That creeps in a desolate place,

To enroll and envelop the sleeper

In a silent and stealthy embrace,

Cruel beak craning forward to bite us,

Our juices to drain and to drink,

Or to whelm us in waves of Cocytus,
Indelible ink!

O breast, that 'twere rapture to writhe on!

O arms 'twere delicious to feel

Clinging close with the crush of the Python,

When she maketh her murderous meal!

In thy eight-fold embraces enfolden,

Let our empty existence escape;

Give us death that is glorious and golden,

Crushed all out of shape!

Ah! thy red lips, lascivious and luscious,

With death in their amorous kiss,

Cling round us, and clasp us, and crush us,

With bitings of agonized bliss;

We are sick with the poison of pleasure,

Dispense us the potion of pain;

Ope thy mouth to its uttermost measure

And bite us again! (1872)

Page 682, lines 49-52. These four lines are quoted by Muller, the Forest Officer, in Kipling's story "In the Rukh," first printed in Many Inventions (1893) and later included in The Jungle Book. To Muller, the rukhh, or jungle, was older than the gods, and he spent many a long evening smoking and staring into the darkness as he meditated upon his paganism and repeated his favorite quotations. One quiet midnight he was heard to address these words to the rukhh, delivered with deep feeling:

"Dough we shivt and bedeck und bedrape us,

Dou art noble und nude und andeck;

Lubidina dy moder, Briapus

Dy fader, a god und a Greek

Now I know dot Bagan or Christian, I shall nefer know der inwardness of der rukhh"

Page 683, lines 67-68. Of these lines G. K. Chesterton says:

"Swinburne, . . . when he wrote the couplet—

'From the lilies and languors of virtue

To the raptures and roses of vice,'

wrote what is nothing but a bad imitation of himself, an imitation that seems indeed to have the wholly unjust and uncritical object of proving that the Swinburnian melody is a mechanical scheme of initial letters"—Robert Browning, p. 142.

AVE ATQUE VALE, p. 690

The imagery of Ave Atque Vale is largely and fittingly drawn from Baudelaire's Les Fleurs du Mal (The Flowers of Evil), the following lines of which Swinburne quoted as a kind of motto for his poem

Nous devnons pourtant lui porter quelques fleurs,
Les morts, les pauvres morts, ont de grandes douleurs,
Et quand Octobre souffle, émondeur des vieux arbres
Son vent mélancolique à l'entour de leurs marbres,
Certe, ils doivent trouver les vivants bien ingrats

The lines may be translated as follows "Yet we should bear him some flowers; the dead, the unhappy dead, have great sorrows, and when October, pruner of ancient trees, blows its melancholy wind about their tombs, surely they must deem the living very ingrates"

Swinburne was early attracted to the famous French poet and critic and once spoke of him as "one of the most exquisite, most delicate, and most perfect poets of the century—perfect in sound, in color, in taste of meter, and in tone of emotion." A laudatory review of Les Fleurs du Mal, published by Swinburne in 1862, was later retracted as over-praise of Baudelaire's poem.

Ave Atque Vale is generally regarded as Swinburne's greatest achievement in elegy, and as one of his noblest poems. Nicolson says of it.

"Swinburne pictures himself as standing under 'the veiled porches of the Muse funereal,' actually beside the bier of the dead poet. This almost physical contact throws over the lines a bitter breath of the macabre, gives to them the chilling throb of awe. For this is no Christian ritual which he is celebrating, but rather some despairing Pagan libation, and the salt courageous savor of Roman pessimism gives to the lines that astrigent quality which is the secret of their appropriateness and of their strength"—Swinburne, p. 159

HYMN OF MAN, p. 699

Lines 21 ff. With these lines compare the following passage from The Birds of Aristophanes.

"Upon the infinite bosom of Erebus an egg filled with gas was deposited to begin with by black-winged Night. From this in the hour ordained was Love, the longed-for, brought forth. His back was aflash with two wings all golden, that whirled like the breezes. He with winged Chaos mated by night in wide Tartarus and begot our breed and first led them into the light of day. At first there was no race of men until Love mixed all things together."

The same idea is found also in Plato's Symposium and in Spenser's Hymn to Heavenly Love.

TO WALT WHITMAN IN AMERICA, p. 704

When this poem was written, Swinburne regarded Whitman as the inspired poet and prophet of Democracy in the New World. A year later he praised Whitman highly in Under the Microscope, and elsewhere referred to his O Captain, My Captain as "the most sonorous anthem ever chanted in the church of the world." Under the chilling influence of Theodore Watts-Dunton, however, Swinburne later swung to the opposite extreme, and in Whitmania (1887), in discussing Whitman's display of physical emotion in poetry, says: "Mr Whitman's Eve is a drunken apple-woman, indecently sprawling in the slush and garbage of the gutter amid the rotten refuse of her overturned fruit-stall, but Mr Whitman's Venus is a Hottentot wench under the influence of cantharides and adulterated rum. Cotyto herself would repudiate the ministration of such prestresses as these."—Complete Works, Vol. 15, p. 316

TRISTRAM OF LYONESSE, p. 707.

The story of Tristram and Iseult had intrigued Swinburne when he was at Eton (1849-53); and during his Oxford period (1856-60) he began a romance, Queen Yseult, which was intended to consist of ten cantos, only six of which were written. One canto was published in 1858, the others not until 1918. About 1860 he wrote

"Joyeuse Garde," included in A Lay of Lilies and Other Poems, printed by Mr. Wise in 1918. After the publication of Tennyson's Holy Grail in 1869, Swinburne gave serious attention to the subject and wrote the Prelude to Tristram of Lyonesse, this Prelude was published in 1871 with a Dedicatory Epistle in which he said

"My aim was simply to present that story, not diluted and debased as it had been in our own time by other hands, but undefaced by improvement and undeformed by transformation, as it was known to the age of Dante wherever the chronicles of romance found hearing from Erichon to Florence, and not in the epic or romantic form of sustained or continuous narrative, but mainly through a succession of dramatic scenes or pictures with descriptive settings or backgrounds."

Using as his chief source the Middle English version of Sir Tristram, Swinburne worked at his poem intermittently until it was finally completed and published in 1882. "In contrast to the ingenuous encyclopedic manner of the medieval story-tellers," says Chew, "he presents a series of salient episodes, the significant moments in the love story, connected by narrative passages. The fundamental purpose is to sustain the theme of the 'Prelude,' which is Love in the first canto, the dawn of passion, in the second, the fulfillment of love-longing, in the third, the yearning of Iseult for her absent lover, in the fourth, reunion, in the fifth (the marvelous 'Iseult at Tintagel,' which is the climax of the poem), the renewed yearning of Iseult to the choral accompaniment of wind and sea. The sixth canto, like much of the third, is pitched in a lower key. In the seventh a new motif—Fate—is introduced, but here also the theme of Love continues, this time the love of Iseult of the Fair Hands, love changed to jealousy and hate. The eighth canto is devoted to the life of Tristram in absence from Iseult of Ireland, and the last to Love-in-Death. Throughout, the interest is thus centered upon the love theme with a directness and exclusiveness equaled only by Wagner."—Swinburne, pp. 170-71

With Swinburne's poem compare Arnold's Tristram and Iseult, p. 442.

THALASSIUS, p. 716

Thalassius is one of many poems by Swinburne that reveal his deep affection for the sea, which he constantly regarded as the symbol of Liberty. Swinburne's father was an Admiral in the British Navy and from him the poet inherited his love of the sea which was expressed so poignantly as to win for him the title of "laureate of the sea." In a letter written to E. C. Stedman on Feb. 20, 1875, Swinburne says

"As for the sea, its salt must have been in my blood before I was born. I can remember no earlier enjoyment than being held up naked in my father's arms and brandished between his hands, then shot like a stone from a sling through the air, shouting and laughing with delight, head foremost into the coming wave—which could only have been the pleasure of a very little fellow. I remember being afraid of other things, but never of the sea. But this is enough of infancy, only it shows the truth of my endless passionate returns to the sea in all my verse."

BY THE NORTH SEA, p. 723

The locality described in By the North Sea is Dunwich on the coast of Suffolk. In the Dedictory Epistle, prefixed to his collected poems, Swinburne writes of "the dreary beauty, inhuman if not unearthly in its desolation, of the innumerable creeks and inlets, lined and paven with sea-flowers, which make of the salt marshes a fit and funereal setting, a fatal and appropriate foreground, for the supreme desolation of the relics of Dunwich, the beautiful and awful solitude of a wilderness on which the sea has forbidden man to build or live, overtopped and bounded by the tragic and ghastly solitude of a headland on which the sea has forbidden the works of human charity and piety to survive."

ADIEUX À MARIE STUART, p. 726

Mary Queen of Scots captured the boyish imagination of Swinburne, and in spite of the liberal and democratic principles of his mature years, he did not modify his early loyalty to the House of Stuart.

This ill-fated queen has been a favorite theme of novelists and poets—Scott, Schiller, Drinkwater, Bjornson, and others—but none has presented her with the completeness, the historical accuracy, the subtlety and the mastery that mark Swinburne's famous trilogy—Chastelard (1865), Bothwell (1874), and Mary Stuart (1881).

Mary Stuart became queen of Scotland upon the death of her father, James V, in 1542, when she was one week old. At the age of 15 she was married to the Dauphin of France, and became queen of that country when he ascended to the throne as Francis II, in 1559. Left a widow in 1561, she returned to Scotland and in 1565 married James Stuart, Lord Darnley. During her absence in France, the Protestant Reformation, for which John Knox and others had long labored, had become established in Scotland, and being a staunch Roman Catholic, she found herself at odds with her Protestant subjects. Angered by her favoritism toward her low-born Italian secretary—David Rizzio—the Scotch lords and her husband conspired in the murder of Rizzio. After the birth of Mary's son (who became James I, of England), Darnley was murdered and Mary was charged with the deed. Three months later she married the Earl of Bothwell, who had been exposed as one of Darnley's assassins. Forced to abdicate in 1568 in favor of her son, she sought protection of her cousin, Queen Elizabeth, who promptly made her a prisoner. For the next nineteen years Mary's name was involved in plots for escape and for the overthrow of Elizabeth. She was finally tried, convicted, and executed in 1587.

Swinburne had only scorn for those persons who saw no wrong in Mary and who defended her "at the expense of her intelligence and her courage." He believed that her crimes were great, and his purpose in writing his plays, he says, was "to vindicate her from the imputation of her vindicators." For a complete statement regarding his attitude, see his Note on the Character of Mary Queen of Scots, printed in his volume of prose Miscellanies.

THE LAKE OF GAUBE, p. 734

The following passage from Swinburne's Notes of Travel—Alps and Pyrenees (1894) is quoted as a parallel account of the poet's recollections of Lake Gaube.

"Of all great poets that ever lived, with the one possible and doubtful exception of Dante, Victor Hugo is the one who would have seemed most fit to describe and most capable of describing the lake of Gaube, . . . The fiery exuberance of flowers among which the salamanders glide like creeping flames, radiant and vivid, up to the very skirt of the tragic little pine-wood at whose heart the fathomless little lake lies silent, with a dark dull gleam on it as if of half-tarnished steel, the deliciously keen and exquisite shock of a first plunge under its tempting and threatening surface, more icy cold in spring than the sea in winter, the ineffable and breathless purity of the clasping water in which it seems to savor of intrusive and profane daring that a swimmer should take his pleasure till warned back by fear of cramp when but half way across the length of it, and doubtful whether his stock of warmth would hold out for a return from the far edge opposite, to which no favoring magic can be expected to transport the clothes left behind him on the bank off which he dived; the sport of catching and taming a salamander till it became the pleasantest as well as the quaintest of dumb four-footed friends, the beauty of its purple-black coat of scaled armor inlaid with patches of dead-leaf gold, its shining eyes and its flashing tongue—these things, of which a humbler hand could write at greater length than this, would require such a hand as Hugo's to do them any sort of justice."—Complete Works, Vol. 13, pp. 320-21.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Edward Lear (1812-88) traveler, painter, and friend of Tennyson, was gifted with a boisterous sense of humor which overflowed, during his rare idle moments, into his nonsense rimes. Early in his career, a set of his bird-paintings caught the fancy of the Earl of Derby, and led to an invitation to paint the birds and animals on the Earl's estate. While there, Lear amused everyone with his impromptu limericks, especially Edward Stanley, the Earl's grandson, for whom Lear wrote his first Book of Nonsense (1846). Taking up landscape painting, Lear traveled in remote regions—Albania, the desert of Sinai, the Nile Valley—in search of subjects, embodying his experiences in his Illustrated Journal of a Landscape Painter (1869), and making light of his hardships. He retired at length to a villa at San Remo in Italy, and there occupied himself with a set of two hundred drawings to illustrate the poetry of Tennyson.

Lear's principal publications were A Book of Nonsense, 1846, The Illustrated Journal of a Landscape Painter, 1869, Nonsense Drolleries, 1889, The Jumbles and Other Nonsense Verses, 1900

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"The parent of modern nonsense-writers he [Lear] is distinguished from all his followers and imitators by the superior consistency with which he has adhered to his aim—that of amusing his readers by fantastic absurdities, as void of vulgarity or cynicism as they are incapable of being made to harbor any symbolical meaning. . . . He has a genius for coming absurd names and words, which, even when they are suggested by the exigencies of his meter, have a ludicrous appropriateness to the matter in hand. His verse is, with the exception of a certain number of cockney rimes, wonderfully flowing and even melodious—or, as he would say, meloobious—while to all these qualifications for his task must finally be added the happy gift of pictorial expression, enabling him to double, nay often to quadruple, the laughable effect of his text by an inexhaustible profusion of the quaintest designs."—Spectator, Sept 17, 1887, p. 1251.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Charles Stuart Calverley (1831-84), the son of a Worcestershire clergyman, was celebrated during his undergraduate days at Cambridge for his cleverness, his laziness, and his charm. That he succeeded at Cambridge was due to the efforts of his loyal friends, who dragged him from his bed before the morning was over and locked him in his room with his books. But once aroused, Calverley's mind worked with great brilliance, he won many prizes and medals for his facility in the classics, and great social popularity with the grace of his conversation and the aptness of his impromptu parodies and rimes. On leaving Oxford, he began the practice of law on the Northern Circuit. The success of his professional career, in which his social talents well supplemented his imperfect knowledge of the law, was cut short by an unfortunate accident. He fell on his head while skating in the winter of 1866-67, and was never afterwards able to work or read, although he could still compose an occasional set of verses. He lingered on, suffering from pain and depression, until 1884.

Calverley's publications were. Verses and Translations, 1862, Translations into English and Latin, 1866, Theocritus Translated into English Verse, 1869, Fly Leaves, 1872

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"Calverley had . . . the trained sense of form and finish, the dexterity which flings the verse into just the right form for suggesting and aiding the airy effect of the humor, which fledges and tips the line to carry the point of wit like an arrow-shaft, the felicitous turn which brings diction and meter pat on the quick of the jest, and tickles you into instant laughter. Of these qualities all feel the effect, but only a student of technique will realize the cunning art of them. . . . Mastery—mastery of form and technique—is the thing which obviously differentiates him from most before him and many after him . . . Calverley is surely the first of parodists. He may almost be called the founder of a new dynasty in parody. To an extent not previously approached, his parodies are likewise criticisms, and very keen criticisms, of a poet's weaker side. One grudges to call them parodies, so close and refined is the imitation, so inclusively does he catch and reflect all the elements of a writer's style."—The Spectator, July 14, 1901, pp. 28-29.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Charles Lutwidge Dodgson (1832-98) lived, to a certain extent, a dual life; he was known under his own name as a suggestive if somewhat unreliable writer on mathematical problems, and under the name of Lewis Carroll as the author of whimsical nonsense stories and rimes. Shy, stammering, fastidious, eccentric, he lived a solitary life at Oxford, where he held a post as mathematical lecturer and made few friends among his colleagues. Among children, however, he was thoroughly at home. It was his habit to seek the acquaintance, by means of proper introductions to the parents, of every attractive child whom he met, and, after separation, to keep up the friendship with his charming letters. One such little friend, the dainty Alice Liddell, was his favorite, he took her one day for a boat ride on the river

Isis near Oxford and told for her entertainment an imaginative story of her own adventures in a marvelous subterranean world—the story that he expanded into Alice in Wonderland (1865) Alice made Lewis Carroll famous, Dodgson, who dreaded fame, spent the rest of his life in keeping his identity a doubtful secret, writing in addition to a sequel to Alice, other contributions to nursery literature, his letters to his vicarious children, and mathematical works that scholars could not be persuaded to read as seriously as they deserved.

Dodgson's principal publications were. Syllabus of Plane Algebraical Geometry, 1869, Alice's Adventures in Wonderland, 1865, An Elementary Treatise on Determinants, 1867; Through the Looking Glass, 1871; Phantasmagoria and Other Poems, 1876, The Hunting of the Snark, 1876, Euclid and His Modern Rivals, 1879; The Principles of Parliamentary Representation, 1884, A Tangled Tale, 1885, Silvæ and Bruno, 1889-93, Curiosa Mathematica, 1888-93; Symbolic Logic, 1896.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"In the kingdom of inspired nonsense there is none greater than Lewis Carroll. His nonsense is like no other man's. It is not ironic and cynical and elaborated like Mr. Gilbert's, nor is it of grotesque, madcap drollery all compact like Edward Lear's. The strange humor never runs riot. It startles and bewilders and delights; it has a flavor to be tasted nowhere else, and that never grows insipid on the palate, yet it is hardly the humor that bubbles and sparkles and evokes irresistible laughter. Lewis Carroll has not Lear's high spirits. Amid his wildest whimsicalities, his most preposterous inversions of fact and reason, he preserves a singular restraint in his manner. He exhibits a sedateness in absurdity, a precision in inconsequence, which give an exquisite incongruity, a delightful piquancy to the writing. . . . The writer's style is worthy of his humor. Never has nonsense been more neatly turned in prose or rime, more indelibly sealed with the seal of literature"—W. Whyte, The Poets and the Poetry of the Century (ed. by A. H. Miles), Vol. 9, pp. 443-44.

CRITICAL NOTES

FATHER WILLIAM, p. 738

Father William is a parody on the following poem by Robert Southey:

The Old Man's Comforts

And How He Gained Them

"You are old, Father William," the young man cried,
"The few locks which are left you are gray;
You are hale, Father William, a hearty old man,
Now tell me the reason, I pray."

"In the days of my youth," Father William replied,
"I remembered that youth would fly fast,
And abused not my health, and my vigor at first,
That I never might need them at last."

"You are old, Father William," the young man cried,
"And pleasures with youth pass away;
And yet you lament not the days that are gone,
Now tell me the reason, I pray."

"In the days of my youth," Father William replied,
"I remembered that youth could not last,

I thought of the future, whatever I did,
That I never might grieve for the past."

"You are old, Father William," the young man cried,
"And life must be hastening away,
You are cheerful, and love to converse upon death,
Now tell me the reason, I pray."

"I am cheerful, young man," Father William replied,
"Let the cause thy attention engage,
In the days of my youth I remembered my God!
And He hath not forgotten my age" (1799; 1799)

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Sir William Schwenk Gilbert (1836-1911) was born in London and was educated at London University. As an officer in the Gordon Highlanders, a clerk in a government office, and a practicing barrister in London, he found material for later satires on the army, the civil service, and the law, he also prepared for life-work by contributing verses to his college magazine and by training himself in the art of drawing. In 1861 he began writing for the humorous journal Fun, to which, in 1867, he contributed his first illustrated ballad, "General John", his verse and drawing became a weekly feature and bore out his theory that "all humor is based upon a grave and quasi-respectful treatment of the ludicrous." These Bab Ballads, so called from Gilbert's childhood nickname, were issued as volumes in 1869 and 1873. Connected from 1863 with the stage as dramatic critic and the friend of actors, Gilbert wrote in 1866 his first play, a Christmas piece called Dulcamara, or the Little Duck and the Great Quack. Other travesty successes followed with equally fascinating sub-titles, among them was The Princess (1870), a parody of Tennyson's poem, which he later expanded into his opera, Princess Ida (1884). In 1870 he began more serious comedies and dramas, the mingled humor and sentiment of which caught the public taste. Gilbert's most conspicuous successes, however, came with the light operas written for the music provided by Sir Arthur Sullivan, already a noted composer when Gilbert met him in 1871. The first of the series, Trial by Jury, expanded from a "Bab Ballad" which had appeared much earlier in Fun, was produced in 1875. The Sorcerer (1877), H. M. S. Pinafore (1878), and The Pirates of Penzance (1879) quickly followed; English and American audiences went wild with enthusiasm, the Savoy Opera House was built in London expressly for Gilbert and Sullivan productions. The Mikado, produced in 1885, ran two years in London and brought Gilbert thirty thousand pounds. The partnership with Sullivan continued until 1896. In his later years Gilbert lived as a genial country gentleman, kept bees, raised vegetables, and served as Justice of the Peace. He was knighted in 1907.

Gilbert's principal publications and stage productions were Bab Ballads, 1869, The Princess, 1870; Pygmalion and Galatea, 1871, More Bab Ballads, 1873, Charity, 1874, Trial by Jury, 1875, The Sorcerer, 1877; H. M. S. Pinafore, 1878; The Pirates of Penzance, 1879, Patience, 1881; Iolanthe, 1882; Princess Ida, 1884; The Mikado, 1885, Ruddigore, 1887, The Yeoman of the Guard, 1888, The Gondoliers, 1889, Songs of a Savoyard (lyrics from the operas), 1890, Foggett's Fairy and Other Tales, 1890; Utopia Limited, 1893, The Grand Duke, 1896, The Hooligan, 1911

"Gilbert . . . was a born ironist. From beginning to end The Bab Ballads are irony set to a popular tune. Few Englishmen have sustained this dangerous method of satire on a higher level and with fewer lapses into serious instruction. . . . In the operas, Gilbert invented a world of his own, a world of satire and paradox, in which the ordinary standards of morals and experience are reversed. Thus he laughed at all the pompous institutions of the country. . . . In one quality Gilbert differed profoundly from all his rivals: he was a poet. . . . For variety of effect and courage in metrical experiment he is undefeated in his own craft of opera. The lyrics . . . have the true singing quality. Though they may be read with pleasure, yet they are meant to be sung, and Gilbert, juggler with words as he was, has made them fit for musical expression. . . . He was more genuinely inspired with the comic spirit than anyone else of his time, and in the years to come his comedies and operas will interpret the Victorian Age to grave historians."—Blackwood's Magazine, July, 1911, pp. 121 ff.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Arthur William Edgar O'Shaughnessy (1844-81), whose dreamy temperament made romantic poetry his natural expression, was from 1861 until his premature death an assistant, like Gosse and Patmore, in the British Museum, and was forced to study means of preserving fishes rather than the old French literature that he loved. Unsuspected by his associates, to whom he was an aloof figure with bushy whiskers and a frock coat, he practiced his poetic art, and surprised them in 1870 with his limpid Epic of Women and Other Poems which won him Swinburne's praise and Rossetti's friendship. Not unlike Rossetti in his tastes, he married in 1873 a lady whose beauty had the Pre-Raphaelite quality. As he found more leisure, established closer contacts with the literary circles of France and England, and published subsequent volumes of verse, his life seemed to promise much, but the death of his wife in 1879 was a great blow, and two years later a chill caught in leaving a theater caused his death.

O'Shaughnessy's principal publications were Epic of Women and Other Poems, 1870, Lays of France, 1871, Music and Moonlight, 1874, Toyland (with Mrs. O'Shaughnessy), 1875, Songs of a Worker, 1881.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"If we take his [O'Shaughnessy's] poetry at its best and analyze what distinguishes it from the work of other poets, we are struck by its lyrical art—soft, tremulous, and rich, this poet has the voice of the blackbird, not that of the nightingale or the lark. It is a flute-music, not strong in quality, nor wide in range, but of a piercing tenderness. There is never any searching after strange epithets or violent phrases, but the stream of melody flows on without effort and without interruption to its appointed close."—E. Gosse, Silhouettes, p. 178.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Thomas Edward Brown (1830-97), the son of the scholarly vicar of Kirk Braddan, was born on the Isle of Man at a time when the distinctive customs of the island were gradually disappearing, he early dedicated himself to the preservation, in his poems and letters, of the older Manx life. In 1849 he entered Oxford, where he made a brilliant record, ordained as clergyman, he returned in 1858 to serve as vice-principal of King William's College on the island, he left in 1861 to be head-master of the Crypt School at Gloucester, and began in 1864 a thirty-year term as head of the newly-founded Clifton College near Bristol. Although his work thus lay largely at a distance from his native locality, he returned during vacation periods to renew his friendship with the fishermen and sailors of the Manx harbors, and began in 1873 a series of Manx tales in verse, much admired by George Eliot and Browning. Rugged and somewhat cynical to casual view, Brown had the most gentle of hearts, and was able as teacher to win unusual affection and respect from the boys under his charge. The most conspicuous example of his influence is the effect which his teaching at the Crypt School had on W. E. Henley, who said: "What he did for me was to suggest such possibilities in life and character as I had never dreamed."

Brown's principal publications were: Fo'c'sle Yarns, 1881, The Doctor and Other Poems, 1887, The Manx Witch and Other Poems, 1889, Old John, 1893, Letters (ed. Irwin), 1900.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"A strong personality impresses itself strongly on the work it does; and the characteristics of Brown's verse are clear, peculiar, and salient. Foremost among them is an extraordinary power of presentation, of character and incident alike. Two other qualities are almost equally apparent. The first is the immense capacity for feeling revealed in both the poet's treatment of nature and his analysis of human emotion . . . Brown was utterly free from the morbid, pessimistic introspectiveness of so many of our moderns. There is nothing 'fin-de-siècle'¹ about his poetry. He loved flowers—not fungi . . . Take, next, his extraordinary force of expression . . . Here is an admirable raciness, a notable pungency, a peculiar, irresistible flavor . . . Humorous often, often serious, these strong utterances burst into sight like shooting stars, and bring trails of glory . . . They recall the flavor so often found in Biblical allusions, allusions quaint and homely, as becomes a sort of simple folk, whose faith, not unminged with superstition, has felt no shock of doubt, and who have been brought up on the Bible all their lives."—W. E. Henley, New Review, Dec. 1897, pp. 633 ff.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

John Byrne Leicester Warren, third Baron de Tabley (1835-95), suffered during his strangely solitary life from a deep melancholy and hopeless pessimism, which was not due to a lack of devoted friends nor to an absence of congenial work and hobbies. He collected and studied the coins of ancient civilizations, he made himself an authority on bookplates and Greek history, he was an enthusiastic botanist, read the classics with keen pleasure, managed a large estate, and interested himself in politics. Yet he found little permanent satisfaction in any of these pursuits. The death of a close friend by an accident in 1859 encouraged morbid brooding, and the cool reception of his literary work was a factor in the growth of his misanthropy. Gentle and considerate of others, yet sensitive to an unusually high degree, he was cruelly hurt when his Soldier's Fortune failed to sell a single copy in 1876, he avoided his friends, who were sincerely attached to him, and lived alone in the midst of London. When, however, a selection from the best of his poetry was published in 1893, he experienced for the first time the pleasures of public acclaim, and would perhaps have found life more congenial had not his health given way in 1895.

¹Modern, up-to-date

De Tabley's principal publications were Poems (with George Fortescue), 1858, Ballads and Metrical Sketches, 1860; The Threshold of Atrides, 1861; Glimpses of Antiquity, 1862, Præterita, 1863, Eclogues and Monodramas, 1864, Studies in Verse, 1865, Philoctetes, 1866, Orestes, 1868, Rehearsals, 1870, Searching the Net, 1873, The Soldier's Fortune, 1876, Flora of Cheshire, 1899.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"Lord de Tabley's heart, at least his literary heart, is not in the century in which he lives. There he finds little to sing about except disappointment, the falseness of love, the uncertainty of fate, only in the beauty of nature does the present day seem to afford pleasure or solace to his muse. From the 'rabble din' of the present his spirit flies for rest to that 'rich tract' of classical literature where he can still hear the flute of Pan—see heroes 'stride must-like through the Asphodel' . . . In the crowd of the young poets of the day there are many who can excel Lord de Tabley in the nimble dexterities of versification, but he may well be content, for he is one of the very few who still can build the lofty line"—C Monkhouse, Academy, Apr. 6, 1895, pp. 291-92.

CRITICAL NOTES

PHILOCTETES, p. 756

Philoctetes, like Swinburne's Atalanta in Calydon and Arnold's Merope, is a choral drama that retells a Greek myth. The story was common in Greek literature and art, it was the subject of dramas by Æschylus and Euripides, both lost, and of two by Sophocles, one of which is extant. The hero, Philoctetes, on his way to fight with the Greek hosts against Troy, had contracted from a serpent's bite an ugly wound and had been cruelly abandoned by his comrades on the desert island of Lemnos. He had in his possession the bow and arrows of Hercules, his former companion. After some years it was disclosed to the Greeks that only by means of these weapons could they conquer Troy, they sent, therefore, Ulysses and Pyrrhus to persuade Philoctetes to give them up. At first the hero was indignant in his refusal, but Hercules came in a vision to convince him that he should bow to divine will. De Tabley treats the legend freely, he expands greatly the initial scene in which Philoctetes voices his resentment against Zeus and his fellow gods, who, unlike the elder gods, seemingly delight in seeing men tortured. The chorus in the text is the culmination of this scene, just before the arrival of the Greek ambassadors.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Henry Austin Dobson (1840-1921) had the latter part of his elementary education in Strasbourg, then a French city, and was thus brought into direct contact with the literature that he always so much esteemed. Returning to England at the age of sixteen, he began work as a clerk in the Board of Trade, where Edmund Gosse was also employed, this post he held for almost fifty years, but always regarded it as a necessary means to a livelihood rather than his true profession. This profession was increasingly that of a man of letters. As a scholar, he was interested primarily in the eighteenth century, wrote biographies of its principal figures, edited some fifty of its masterpieces, and composed a series of charming studies of its manners and literature. As a poet, he was impressed originally by the style of the Pre-Raphaelites, but, under the influence of Théodore de Banville, whose "Little Treatise" on the older French lyrics attracted his attention in 1875, and of Tennyson, who in 1877 recommended the study of Horace's Odes, he developed a style as polished and graceful as the minuets of the century that he most admired. He said that "Pope taught him rhythm, Prior ease, Præd buoyancy and banter" Until 1884 his work was largely in verse, thereafter in prose. A shy, nervous man, fastidious and even prudish in his tastes, continually concerned lest his devotion to literature should offend his business superiors, he welcomed his retirement in 1901 as a relief from drudgery, lived aloof from the turmoil of London in a congenial, scholarly world, loved old books, old friends, old wine.

Dobson's principal publications were Vignettes in Rhyme, 1873, The Civil Service Handbook of English Literature, 1874; Proverbs in Porcelain, 1877, William Hogarth, 1879, Fielding, 1883, Old World Idylls, 1883, At the Sign of the Lyre, 1885, Richard Steele, 1886; Oliver Goldsmith, 1888, Four Frenchwomen, 1890, Horace Walpole, 1890, Eighteenth Century Vignettes, 1892, 1894, 1896, The Ballad of Beau Brocade, 1892, The Story of Rosina, 1895, Poems on Several Occasions, 1895, Miscellaneous, 1898, 1901, A Palladin of Philanthropy, 1899, Carmina Voiva, 1901, Sûc-II'alk Studies, 1902, Samuel Richardson, 1902, Fanny Burney, 1903, De Libris, 1908, Old Kensington Palace, 1910, At Prior Park, 1912, Poems on the War, 1915, Rosalba's Journal, 1915, A Bookman's Budget, 1917, Later Essays, 1921.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"Austin Dobson's style both in prose and verse was ever beautifully clear, urbane, and prudent . . . He was an excellent craftsman and contriver. His verses are often as bright, smooth, and caressable as precious snuff-boxes, and like them they sometimes contain a little pungent dust which can bring water to the eyes. In knowledge of the social and literary life of the eighteenth century he was without a rival, unless that rival might be Dr Birbeck Hill, and he knew that saner society and the famous characters who composed it as if he had been, not our, but their contemporary. His standards of good sense and good taste were those of his favorite period, tempered by an exceptional kindness, and every book he published was a fastidious model of light learning. He never wooed the Muse of introspection or her of the woeful countenance. His own was a Dresden shepherdess, yet in one respect she was not of the eighteenth century, for there was no malice or license in her. She was demure and she wore, I think, a little flowered bonnet"—A C Squire, New Statesman, Sept. 10, 1921, p. 623.

CRITICAL NOTES

A DIALOGUE, p 767

This poem is full of allusions to the life and writings of Pope and to his contemporaries. The Friend of line 2, eager to exhibit the darker side of Pope (called "the Twitnam Bard" because of his retirement, after 1719, to his villa at Twickenham, up the Thames from London), reviews the acrimony with which Pope attacked his contemporaries (such as the critic, John Dennis, the playwright and actor, Colley Cibber, and the Shakespearean editor, Lewis Theobald) in the Dunciad (1728-43) and other personal satires, the fickleness that led him to profess an exalted friendship for the brilliant Lady Mary Wortley Montagu from 1717 to 1723 and then to attack her bitterly for the rest of his life, and the sorry figure which he cut in a scandalous pamphlet, A Pop upon Pope, 1728, that recounted how he was soundly whipped by his victims as he strolled in Ham Walks near Twickenham. The Poet defends Pope.

The explanations necessary for the understanding of this poem and A Postscript to "Retaliation" are so numerous that they could not easily be included in the footnotes and are grouped here instead.

To help me through this long disease, my life"

An illness in childhood left Pope deformed, seldom without pain, for the rest of his life

23 "crooked . . . Mind!" "Mens curva in corpore curvo", said of Pope by Lord Orrery (Dobson's note)

33-34. Swift . . . Arbuthnot, authors and noblemen of the Tory party, with whom Pope was closely associated. Jonathan Swift and Dr John Arbuthnot joined with Pope in the Scriblerus Club to ridicule false tastes in learning. Henry St John (pronounced Sinjun), Viscount Bolingbroke, was until 1714 a leader of the Tory party and thereafter a writer on history and politics. Allen, Earl of Bathurst, Patrick Hume, Earl of Marchmont, and Charles Mordaunt, Earl of Peterborough, were other literary noblemen who were frequent visitors at Twickenham.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Wilfrid Scawen Blunt (1840-1922), an impulsive and generous advocate of unpopular causes, was the son of an officer who had distinguished himself in the Napoleonic Wars. Educated in the best Roman Catholic schools, he entered the diplomatic service in 1858, and served at Athens, Madrid, Paris, Lisbon, and in South America, because of his handsome presence and romantic bearing, his career was socially brilliant but not wholly satisfactory to his more sedate superiors. He married in 1869 the beautiful granddaughter of Lord Byron, the Lady Anne Noel, left the diplomatic service, and in 1872 succeeded to the family estate of Corabbet Park in Sussex. There he bred and rode Arab horses and wrote his half-dramatic, half-personal Love Sonnets of Proteus (1880) with their frank allusions to his escapades before marriage. Tired of country diversions, he embarked with Lady Anne upon a long series of travels and adventures in Africa, India, and the Near-East, became an ardent sympathizer with native viewpoints and an opponent of the British imperialistic policy in India, Egypt, and the Soudan; and wrote, in his Future of Islam (1882), The Wind and the Whirlwind (1883), and Ideas about India (1885), dire predictions, since partly realized, of native revolts. Returning home for a period in 1885-87, he espoused, with his customary fervor, the nationalist cause in Ireland, ran unsuccessfully for parliament as an advocate of Home Rule, and, for fiery speeches, was arrested and imprisoned two months in Irish jails. Shortly before his death, he published his Diaries (1920), in which he repeated his aversion to the colonial policies that Kipling and Henley had upheld.

Blunt's principal publications were Love Sonnets of Proteus, 1880, The Future of Islam, 1882; The Wind and the Whirlwind, 1883, Ideas about India, 1885, In Vinculis, 1889, A New Pilgrimage, 1889, Esther, 1892; The Stealing of the Mare, 1892; Griselda, 1893, Satan Absolved, 1899, Seven Golden Odes of Pagan Arabia, 1903, The Secret History of the British Occupation of Egypt, 1907; India under Rajon, 1909; Gordon at Khartoum, 1911; The Land War in Ireland, 1912, Poetical Works, 1914, My Diaries, 1919-20.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"The poems of Mr. Blunt are vital because they are an attempt to reveal and revalue the stuff of life . . . We find in many of Mr. Blunt's poems the charm of the English countryside—that peaceful land of color and fragrance, with its green hedges and ploughed fields, its sheep on the hillsides, its myriad wild flowers by the wayside, and its sanctuaries of woodland beauty . . . With a few notes of emotion rendered into melody the poet sings the beauty of rural life. . . It is by his sonnet work that Mr. Blunt will be judged as a poet, and his finest poems in that form alone entitle him to a place among the masters of English verse"—S. J. Looker, Poetry Review, July-Aug., 1921, pp. 198 ff

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Gerard Manley Hopkins (1844-89), romantic in thought and religion, radical in his artistic principles, wrote tense and fervent poems as a child, and received an early education intended to prepare him for the English church. He came, however, in 1866 under the magnetic influence of Cardinal Newman and was filled with a religious enthusiasm that resulted in his becoming a Roman Catholic. For a time he studied at Oxford with Walter Pater as his tutor; but in 1868 he entered the Jesuit order as a novice, burned his early poetry, went to live for several months with Newman in Birmingham, saw much of Coventry Patmore, and then went to serve as a missionary in the slums of Liverpool. By nature extremely sensitive and by training fastidious, he was violently shocked by the vice and dirt of Liverpool; he fled shortly to London, received a church in Oxford, and was later appointed to the staff of the University of Dublin. His poetical work, interrupted for seven years by his religious preoccupation, was his chief pleasure in Ireland, where he was little at home and felt by his associates to be a rather unaccountable fellow; perhaps from Patmore's influence, his later poetic style became increasingly unorthodox, in diction and form. After five years in Dublin, he died suddenly from a contagious fever. He had published nothing, his manuscript poems passed into the keeping of Robert Bridges, who edited them for the press in 1918.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"Some of his [Hopkins's] meters are woven with such tortuous subtlety, with such tremulous ingenuity, that the endurance of most readers will faint and fail before the task of penetrating through them to what lies beyond, one must tear oneself through thorns and briars, as it were, and not many suffer willingly so stern a trial of onset. Sometimes so opulently obscure is his imagery that only the most painstaking lovers of poetry can hope to win their difficult way to his thought . . . Yet from the pen of this poet there also came poems and lyrics as crystal-clear as the globed dew, as musical and unlabored as the song of a thrush among the leaves."—H. A. Lappin, Catholic World, July, 1919, pp. 511-12.

CRITICAL NOTES

The poems of Hopkins become less difficult to read when we understand something of his principle of metrics. Some of his poems are written in what he calls "Sprung Rhythm," which is measured by feet of one to four syllables, with the stress always on the first syllable of the foot. He says too that this rhythm provides greater flexibility in the verse by allowing any one kind of foot to follow any other kind. "It is natural in Sprung Rhythm," he adds, "for the lines to be rove over, that is, for the scanning of each line immediately to take up that of the one before, so that if the first has one or more syllables at its end the other must have so many the less at its beginning, and in fact the scanning runs on without break from the beginning, say, of a stanza to the end and all the stanza is one long strain, though written in lines asunder."—Preface, quoted by Bridges in his edition of Hopkins's Poems, p. 4.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

John Addington Symonds (1840-93) acquired from his father, a physician with wide and varied tastes and a large collection of books and sculpture, an absorbing interest in the arts of Greece and Italy. In his early years his shy charm discovered itself to but a few friends, lacking an interest in sports, he occupied himself in reading and labored hard at Oxford in winning academic distinctions and prizes for a historical poem and an essay. His health breaking down, his nerves and lungs in a precarious state, he journeyed in Italy and Switzerland, although he recovered sufficiently to marry in 1864 and to begin the study of law, he was again threatened with tuberculosis and was forced to spend several years abroad. Not until 1868 could he engage at all regularly in study and writing, and not until 1873, after having published various volumes of travel sketches and Greek studies, did he begin the great work of his life, his research into the history and art of the Italian Renaissance. In 1877 his health once more forced him to go abroad, this time to Davos in the Swiss Alps, where he lived with few intervals until his death. With an enthusiasm for democracy and for comradeship that made him feel Whitman a congenial spirit, he entered into the community life of Davos and made friends of the artisans and peasants; attracted by his presence, other Englishmen, notably Robert Louis Stevenson, came to share his exile. To Stevenson was dedicated his translation from the songs of medieval students, called Wine, Women, and Song (1884). Despite the lack of research facilities and intermittent moods of depression caused by physical weakness, Symonds continued, with amazing energy, his historical and literary writing: biographies of Shelley and Michelangelo, studies of Elizabethan drama, and essays in criticism. Stimulated by his translations from Michelangelo and other Italian poets, he began the composition of poetry in 1878, reflecting his wide interests and his occasional somewhat morbid tendency toward introspection in four closely consecutive volumes. The latter part of his life was saddened by the death of relatives and his own gradual wasting-away from consumption. The end came in 1893.

Symonds's principal publications were. Introduction to the Study of Dante, 1872, Sketches in Italy and Greece, 1874, Studies of the Greek Poets, 1873-76, The Renaissance in Italy, 1875-86, Shelley, 1878, Many Moods, 1878, New and Old, 1880, Animi Figura, 1882, Vagabunduli Libellus, 1884, Shakspeare's Predecessors, 1884; Wine, Women and Song, 1884; The Autobiography of Benvenuto Cellini (trans.), 1887, Essays Speculative and Suggestive, 1890; Life of Michelangelo Buonarroti, 1892, In the Key of Blue, 1893, Walt Whitman, 1893.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"In spite of his [Symonds's] verbal ceremoniousness, and a habit of mind that too often led him from simple and stirring imaginative thought into every deft kind of fancy, he is justly allowed the honor of representation among his country's poets. Not only had he great richness in description, which could be arresting when it was not unbridled, but there were moments when he wrote simply and with his eye on his object. . . There were other times when his very virtuosity reached such a pitch as to force something more than astonishment, as in Le Jeune Homme Caressant sa Chimère, where he achieves a brilhance equalled by very few of his contemporaries. Yet better, he could now and again subject himself to real emotional truth, and express it with sustained if unequal directness, as in Stella Maris. This sonnet sequence . . . as a whole does give real and often beautiful expression to a profound and passionate experience. There is here a spiritual intensity which Symonds generally missed, but by virtue of his having achieved it here and in one or two other places, he claims his place in the company of genuine poets."—John Drinkwater, The English Poets (ed. by T. H. Ward), Vol. 5, pp. 444-45.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

John Todhunter (1839-1916), the oldest and most experienced among the writers who inaugurated the Irish Literary Revival, was born of Quaker parentage in Dublin; he studied medicine, and practiced as a doctor for seven years in Dublin before abandoning his profession and going to live as a writer in London. His first poetry, published in 1876 under the title Laurella and Other Poems, was English in tone and classic in background, his esteem for Greek drama was shown in a series of plays produced from 1879 to 1886. After the latter date, however, he became associated with W. B. Yeats and Lionel Johnson in meetings of the Rhymers' Club held at the Cheshire Cheese in London, became one of the original members of the Irish Literary Society and of the Gaelic League, contributed to Poems and Ballads of Young Ireland in 1888, and thus aided in launching the Celtic movement in literature. His poetry and his personality both underwent a change: like an ancient Irish bard he chanted his poetry to his fellow enthusiasts, and in his Banshee and Other Poems (1888) he gave impassioned expression to the Celtic spirit.

Yet he failed to follow the Irish group in later developments, became once more an Englishman, and in subsequent volumes of verse reverted to his earlier manner.

Todhunter's principal publications were Laurella and Other Poems, 1876, Alkestis, 1879, A Study of Shelley, 1880, Forest Songs, 1881, The True Tragedy of Rienzi, 1882, Helen in Troas, 1885, Poems and Ballads of Young Ireland (with Yeats and others), 1888, The Banshee and Other Poems, 1888, How Dreams Come True, 1890, A Sicilian Idyll, 1891, The Poison Flower, 1891, Three Bardic Tales, 1896, Sounds and Sweet Airs, 1905.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"In the mechanism of meter, Mr. Todhunter is a very skilful artist, and in his first volume [Laurella and Other Poems] especially he seems to have aimed at as great variety as possible. . . . The lyrical pieces . . . are full of melody and color. . . . Mr. Todhunter has learned well . . . how to reproduce that Celtic atmosphere which has no glamour of splendor or color, but is like a Twilight of the Gods wherein loom barbaric heroes and barbaric heroism, vast and misty; and there is a wild, somewhat inconsequent network of witchcraft and giants, of spells and enchantment, mixed with human action. But the strongest poem in the new book [The Banshee and Other Poems] is a savage, fine ballad of later days, Aghadoc."—Irish Monthly, Jan., 1889, pp. 147 ff.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

William Ernest Henley (1849-1903), whose admiration for heroism is one of the dominant motives of his thought and poetry, was himself the hero of a lifelong contest against physical handicaps. After an elementary education at the Crypt Grammar School at Gloucester, where the Manx poet, T. E. Brown, gave his literary ambitions a great impetus, he contracted a tubercular disease which necessitated the amputation of a foot. When his doctors later advised the amputation of the other foot, he journeyed in 1873 to Edinburgh, placed himself under the care of Dr. Joseph Lister, the discoverer of antiseptic surgery, and was restored to at least partial health. During his twenty-month confinement in the Edinburgh Infirmary, he recorded his impressions in his In Hospital (1888), reflected his defiantly courageous mood in his Innchus (1888), and began a long friendship with Robert Louis Stevenson, who came on several occasions to talk at his bedside. Discharged from the hospital, Henley, after a term of hack-writing in Edinburgh, settled in 1877 at London, writing essays and reviews for periodicals and collaborating with Stevenson in a series of plays. He worked his way up to the editorship, successively, of three important journals. As editor, he was on terms of hearty friendship with his contributors, among whom were Kipling, Brown, Lang, Yeats, and, until an unfortunate disagreement, Stevenson; he championed new movements in literature and art, the painting of Whistler, the sculpture of Rodin, and the poetry of Blunt and Hardy, he joined with Kipling in advocating English imperialism in opposition to the pacific policies of Gladstone, and in vehemently supporting the Boer War. In his poetry, composed in the intervals of his editorial work, he departed from traditional principles and wrote independently with a joyous acceptance of life as it is. Powerful in frame, crippled but indomitable, with his leonine head and keen blue eyes, he was not unlike Stevenson's portraits of him as John Silver in Treasure Island and Burly in Talk and Talkers; with his forceful conversation and trenchant criticism, he dominated his group in London, and exerted an influence that is still bearing fruit.

Henley's principal publications were: Deacon Brodie (with R. L. Stevenson), 1880, Beau Austin, Admiral Guinea (with R. L. Stevenson), 1884, Macaire (with R. L. Stevenson), 1885, A Book of Verses, 1888, Vicissitudes and Renewals, 1890, The Song of the Sword and Other Verses, 1892, For England's Sake, 1900, Hawthorne and Lavender, 1901, A Song of Speed, 1903.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"Mr. Henley, of all the poets of the day, is the most strenuously certain that life is worth living, the most eagerly defiant of fate, the most heroically content with death. There is, indeed, something of the spirit of Walt Whitman in his passion for living. . . . His special 'note,' in the earlier work particularly, is a manly Bohemianism, a refreshingly reckless joy in the happy accidents of existence. . . . His outlook on life is joyous, in spite of misfortune; his outlook on destiny and death is grave, collected, welcoming. . . . Revolutionary always, Mr. Henley has had a wholesome but perilous discontent with the conventions of language and of verse. . . . What Mr. Henley has brought into the language of poetry is a certain freshness, a daring straightforwardness and pungency of epithet, very refreshing in contrast with the traditional limpness and timidity of the respectable verse of the day. One feels at times that the touch is a little rough, the voice a trifle loud, the new word just a little unnecessary. But with these unaccustomed words and tones Mr. Henley does certainly succeed in flashing the picture, the impression upon us, in realizing the intangible, in saying new things in a new and fascinating manner."—Arthur Symons, Fortnightly Review, Aug., 1892, pp. 183 ff

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Andrew Lang (1844-1912), like Robert Louis Stevenson, whom he much resembled in physical appearance, grew up in the border country of Scotland. Many of the themes of his prose and verse have their origin in his boyhood interests—in fishing along the Teviot and the Tweed, in the border ballads and folk legends, in the lost cause of the Stuarts, in Sir Walter Scott, who had been his father's friend. From the Edinburgh Academy, where he was converted by Homer to a liking for Greek, he went to Oxford, where he was much influenced by Matthew Arnold, then a lecturer on poetry, as well as by the Pre-Raphaelites. Morris's example guided his reading into early French literature, he published in 1872 his first poetry, Ballads and Lyrics of Old France. His Ballades in Blue China, eight years later, was a further fruit of such studies and much encouraged the revival, inaugurated by Swinburne and De Banville, of the old French lyric forms. Meanwhile, Lang, too restless for the academic life, had traveled abroad, married, and begun in London and Scotland a vigorous literary career. He turned his mind and pen in an astonishing variety of directions. After writing for the Encyclopædia Britannica articles which ranged from "Crystal-gazing" to "Prometheus," he began with his Custom and Myth in 1884 a series of studies in folk-lore, with his translations of Homer and his Homer and the Epic, in 1893, his researches in Greek literature, with his Prince Edward Stuart, in 1900, his books on Scottish history; he wrote also abundant biographies and criticisms, lectured on history at St. Andrews, collected fairy tales for children in "Books, Yellow, Red, and Green, and Blue," expressed himself on all subjects except personal religion and party politics, and yet found time for cricket and fishing. His verse, much of which was written during the intervals of cricket-matches, concerns his favorite places and heroes, Scottish and Greek, and has the broad background natural to a man who has been called "the greatest bookman of his age."

Lang's principal publications were: Ballads and Lyrics of Old France, 1872, Odyssey (trans., with S. H. Butcher), 1879, Ballades in Blue China, 1880-81; Helen of Troy, 1882, Iliad (trans., with W. Leaf and E. Myers), 1883, Rhymes à la Mode, 1884, Custom and Myth, 1884; The Mark of Cain, 1886; Letters to Dead Authors, 1886, Books and Bookmen, 1886, Myth, Ritual, and Religion, 1887, Grass of Parnassus, 1888, Angling Sketches, 1891, Essays in Little, 1891, Letters on Literature, 1893, Homer and the Epic, 1893, Ban and Arrière Ban, 1894; Life of Lockhart, 1896; Modern Mythology, 1897, The Making of Religion, 1898, Prince Charles Edward, 1900, History of Scotland, 1900-07,

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"Mr. Lang's is not the sentiment that may be bawled from the roof-tops: it is the sentiment of old romance, of dim memories, all the more beautiful for their vagueness (as the reflection is often more beautiful than the mirrored object), the sentiment of wet spring woods and birds singing in the early dawn. . . . Somewhat in the vein of Thackeray are his lighter pieces: there is much the same spirit of half-humorous, half-sad, but wholly manly, acceptance of the losses and regrets that must inevitably be the shadow cast by life, much the same tenderness toward youth and laughter"—G. R. Tomson, Academy, June 2, 1894, p. 451.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Edmund William Gosse (1849-1928), who belongs as a poet to the school of Dobson and Lang, has given the story of his boyhood in his autobiographic Father and Son (1907). His father, a scientist who refused to accept the new theories of Darwin and Lyall, guided his son's mind in strict Calvinistic channels until, under the influence of Marlowe's Hero and Leander and other contacts with poetry, Gosse revolted intellectually and became a part of the artistic world which included Rossetti and Swinburne. As an assistant in the British Museum after 1867 and a translator for the Board of Trade beginning in 1875, he made many contacts with the writers of the time, he had a genius for friendship, a ready humor and sympathy, a nervous energy in conversation, that made him a welcome member of many literary coteries. His interest in Elizabethan poetry and the old French lyric forms influenced his Madrigals, Songs, and Sonnets, which he produced with J. A. Blaikie in 1870, and his first independent volume of verse, On Viol and Flute, in 1873. In periodical articles he introduced Ibsen in 1870 to the British public, published other Scandinavian studies, and invented the type of essay that he called the "Kit-Kat," combining criticism with graphic personal impressions of men with whom his wide contacts had made him intimately acquainted. From 1884 to 1890 he was a lecturer on English Literature at Cambridge, from 1904 to 1914 he was librarian of the House of Lords, from that time to his death in 1928 he was an active sympathizer with new literary fashions but a link with the older world. He stated in the preface to his Collected Poems in 1911 "If I am a poet at all, I belong to the age of the Franco-German War, of the introduction of Japanese Art into Europe, of the discoveries of Huxley and Haeckel, and of the Oxford lectures of Matthew Arnold."

Gosse's principal publications were Madrigals, Songs, and Sonnets (with J. A. Blaikie), 1870, On Viol and Flute, 1873, Northern Studies, 1879, New Poems, 1879, Life of Gray, 1882, Seventeenth Century Studies, 1883, Firdausi in Exile, and Other Poems, 1885; History of Eighteenth Century Literature, 1889, Gossip in a Library, 1891, Questions at Issue, 1893, Jacobean Poets, 1894, In Russet and Silver, 1894, Critical Kit-Kats, 1896, Hypolympia, 1901, French Profiles, 1905, Coventry Patmore, 1905, Father and Son, 1907, Henrik Ibsen, 1908, The Autumn Garden, 1908, Portraits and Studies, 1912, Inter Arma, 1916, Life of Swinburne, 1917, Diversions of a Man of Letters, 1919, Malherbe, 1920; Books on the Table, 1921, Aspects and Impressions, 1922, More Books on the Table, 1923; Silhouettes, 1925, Leaves and Fruit, 1927.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"His [Gosse's] graceful, melodious verse, flawless in construction, delicate in form, does not anywhere show signs of passionate conviction or imperious stress, it has none of the 'perilous stuff that weighs upon the heart.' Intensity there is, but it is the intensity of enjoyment; Mr. Gosse's poems are full of the spirit of the sunlit wood, the breezy headland, the fragrant garden-walks at dusk, they are full of the cheerful felicity that plays about the wholesome energies of life . . . There is an equable lucidity about his expression. . . . There is nothing that can jar on the most sensitive reader either in feeling or expression. He is preeminently a lyric poet, the singer of a swift and passing mood, he has none of the sustained energy of the epic poet, nor the penetrating psychology of the dramatist. . . . Delicacy rather than intensity, that is the keynote of his lyrics."—A. C. Benson, Essays, pp. 295 ff.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Alice Christiana Meynell (1850-1922) grew up in a delightfully artistic and untidy household in Italy, where her mother painted sunsets and her father, a dilettante in many fields, devoted himself to his children's education. While still young, Mrs. Meynell became a Roman Catholic, and other members of the family followed her. The example of Christina Rossetti and Mrs. Browning set her to writing poetry in her early girlhood; her Preludes, published in 1875, won the praise of the greatest literary figures of the time: Rossetti, George Eliot, Ruskin, and Browning. Like Elizabeth Barrett, she attracted her future husband first of all by her poems, Wilfrid Meynell, then a promising young writer of reviews in London, read her sonnets and sought an introduction, after a short engagement, they were married in 1877. For many years Mrs. Meynell wrote little poetry. In the intervals of bearing eight children, she attached herself passionately to humanitarian causes: the prevention of cruelty to animals, the amelioration of conditions in London slums, the extension of political suffrage and industrial rights to women. One of her many acts of kindness for which the world loved her was her rescue of Francis Thompson from poverty and the opium habit and her wise care of him in later years. Encouraged by the hearty interest of W. E. Henley, she began writing reviews and essays in prose, she contributed a weekly column to the Pall Mall Gazette, and published in magazines her sensitive essays, the earliest of which she collected and published under the titles of The Rhythm of Life (1893), The Color of Life (1896), and The Spirit of Place (1899). Her life was rounded out by a final poetic period, beginning with the World War, and ending with her Last Poems in 1923. Mrs. Meynell's life was enriched with many interesting friendships, Patmore and Meredith both owed much to her helpful spirit.

Mrs. Meynell's principal publications were: Preludes, 1875, Poems (a reprint, with additions, of Preludes), 1893, The Rhythm of Life, 1893, The Color of Life, 1896, London Impressions, 1898, The Spirit of Place, 1899, John Ruskin, 1900, Ceres' Runaway, 1909, A Father of Women, 1917, Hearts of Controversy, 1917, The Second Person Singular, and Other Essays, 1921, Last Poems, 1923.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"The motives of her [Mrs. Meynell's] poems are neither obvious nor far-fetched, they never quite lack the charm of things familiar, and yet they always possess the charm of things that are new, not with the novelty of inherent strangeness, but with the finer, rarer novelty of strongly individualized apprehension and presentation. In her landscape the poet sees what we ourselves have seen, but sees it with a difference that at once recalls and supplements our own remembrance, in her moods of emotion or reflection she feels and thinks as we may have thought or felt, and yet by the imaginative individuality of the thinking or feeling gives to the utterance of it a certain uniqueness which touches us to delightful surprise"—J. A. Noble, The Poets and the Poetry of the Century (ed. A. H. Miles), Vol. 8, p. 422.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Robert Louis Stevenson (1850-94), born in Edinburgh, was an invalid from his earliest youth to the end of life, and yet contrived to live abundantly. He was kept alive in his boyhood chiefly through the diligence of his nurse, Allison Cunningham, whom he called "Cummy." He could attend school only for short periods, and yet absorbed from various sources a wide knowledge of men and books. From his father and grandfather, both engineers and builders of lighthouses along the rugged Scottish coast, Stevenson learned to love the sea air and the vigorous hardships of an out-of-door life. He at first intended to adopt the family profession, made inspection trips with his father to lighthouses, and studied engineering at the University of Edinburgh, but his interests became gradually centered in literature. He posed as an idler, took pleasure in the Bohemian society of Edinburgh, and acted the gay vagabond, yet he was in reality, in the intervals of illness, continually practicing the art of writing, and making himself the master of a highly individual prose style. He contributed to journals, in the years following 1876, a series of essays later collected as Virginibus Puerisque (1881) and Familiar Studies of Men and Books (1882), and such stories as A Lodging for the Night and The Sire de Maletroit's Door. For health and adventure he went, alone or with friends, on many gypsy wanderings in a sail-boat through the Western Islands, in a canoe along the rivers of Belgium and France, and with a donkey in the mountains of southern France; returning, he wrote his Inland Voyage (1878), Travels with a Donkey (1879), and other travel sketches. In France he met Mrs. Fanny Osbourne, fell in love with her, and in 1879 followed her to California, where a dangerous lung attack would have ended his life had it not been for Mrs. Osbourne's careful nursing. In 1880 they were married, but tuberculosis had taken so strong a hold on Stevenson that he could only defer the end by will-power and by a restless search for a healthful climate. For a time he lived near John Addington Symonds at Davos in the Swiss Alps, and there spun out of an imagination that had always a sympathy with the child-mind, the tale that brought him fame, Treasure Island (1882). In Southern France, at Bournemouth on the English coast, in the Adirondacks of New York, Stevenson successively sought health and continued his writing, at his house of Skerryvore at Westbourne he wrote his Child's Garden of Verses (1885), another volume of poetry, Underwoods (1887), and collaborated with W. E. Henley in the writing of four plays. From California in 1888 he departed on his last quest for health, a leisurely voyage in the schooner Casco among the islands of the Pacific, writing his novels, his tales, and his Ballads (1890) under a tropic sun. At length, delighted by the scenery and the primitive native life, he settled in Samoa, on his mountain-side plantation of Vailima; there he enjoyed a temporary return of health, ruled his natives like a beneficent feudal lord, and wrote with an energy born of a realization that the end must come soon. When it came in 1894, it was sudden and painless, according to his wish, he was buried on a mountain-peak overlooking the sea.

One of the most conspicuous qualities of Stevenson was his versatility. He was the foremost essayist since Lamb, a master of fiction in two fields (romance and the short story), a dramatist, and a poet. He was animated by a genuine enthusiasm for literature as a fine art.

A great ethical purpose underlay most of his work. Regarding romance as a necessary element in life, he revived the romantic novel, in which he exalted fine conduct based upon a thoughtful sense of duty. His was a gospel of the joy of life, and his heroic acceptance of the wholesomeness of human effort without any idea of gain permeated all his thought and action.

Stevenson's principal publications were: An Inland Voyage, 1878; Travels with a Donkey, 1879; Virginibus Puerisque, 1881; Familiar Studies of Men and Books, 1882; New Arabian Nights, 1882; Treasure Island, 1882; Silverado Squallers, 1883; Prince Otto, 1885; A Child's Garden of Verses, 1885; More New Arabian Nights, The Dynamiter, 1885; The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, 1886; Kidnapped, 1886; The Merry Men, 1886; Underwoods, 1887; Memories and Portraits, 1887; The Black Arrow, 1888; The Wrong Box (with L. Osbourne), 1888; The Master of Ballantrae, 1889; Father Damien, 1890; Ballads, 1890; Across the Plains, 1892; The Wrecker (with L. Osbourne), 1892; Island Nights' Entertainments, 1893; Cairiona (David Balfour), 1893; The Ebb Tide, (with L. Osbourne) 1894; Vailima Letters, 1895; Weir of Hermiston, 1896; Songs of Travel, 1896; St. Ives (completed by A. T. Quiller-Couch), 1897.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISMS

"The first thing which struck the reader of A Child's Garden was the extraordinary clearness and precision with which the immature fancies of eager childhood were reproduced in it . . . It gives us a unique thing, a transcript of that child-mind which we have all possessed and enjoyed, but of which no one, except Mr. Stevenson, seems to have carried away a photograph. . . . Many authors have achieved brilliant success in describing children, in verbally caressing them, in amusing, in instructing them, but only two, Mrs. Ewing in prose, and Mr. Stevenson in verse, have sat down with them without disturbing their fancies, and have looked into the world of 'make-believe' with the children's own eyes.

"In . . . a second volume, this time of grown-up verses, Mr. Stevenson has ventured on a bolder experiment. His Underwoods, with its title openly borrowed from Ben Jonson, . . . is plainly the work of the same fancy that described the Country of Counterpane and the Land of Story-books, but it has grown a little sadder and a great deal older. There is the same delicate sincerity, the same candor and simplicity, the same artless dependence on the good faith of the public . . . The book is occupied with friendship, with nature, with the honorable instincts of man's moral machinery. Above all, it enters with great minuteness, and in a very confidential spirit, into the theories and moods of the writer himself. It will be to many readers a revelation of the everyday life of an author whose impersonal writings have given them so much and so varied pleasure . . . The same characteristics are displayed in the poems, the same suspicion of 'the abhorred pedantic sanhedrin,' the same fullness of life, the same bright felicity of epithet as in the essays and romances."—E. Gosse, Questions at Issue, pp. 241 ff.

To R. L. S.

A wandering singer through the realm of dreams,
He tuned his pipe to Life's brief-voiced song,
And danced adown a pathway lit with gleams
Of fortitude and resignation born.

No comrade spirit knew his staunch heart's pain
Nor saw his footsteps lag, nor heard a sigh—
We only knew a sweetness naught could maim,
As hand in hand with Courage he passed by.
He breathed upon life's truths with magic, rare,
Until they took the beauty from his soul,
Or wrought fact into romance—Oh, so fair!
With artistry beyond the common goal.

So with blessed labor, finding Life's face
gray,

He smiled, and charmed the haunting hours
away.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

James Kenneth Stephen (1859-92) was, like his friend Charles Stuart Calverley, a Cambridge man, a social favorite, and a witty composer of parodies and light verse. As an undergraduate, he was locally famous for his strength in football and his dexterity in Union debates, as a fellow of his college, he was the idol of students, his epigrams, and anecdotes of his conversation, passed into Cambridge tradition. His publications, two volumes of verse and a prose defense of compulsory Greek, imperfectly represent his capabilities, in 1866 he suffered an injury to his head which gradually affected his mental vigor and led to his death at the age of thirty-three Stephen's publications were: Lapsus Calami, 1891, Quo Musa Tendis? 1891, Lapsus Calami, and Other Verses (1896).

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"He [Stephen] was an avowed disciple and devoted admirer of Calverley. . . . But though related by education and environment, the two men differed widely in temperament. Calverley was more freakish and irresponsible; he had greater charm, elasticity, and geniality. He was never angry, and Stephen often was, though to excellent purpose, in his diatribes against those who desecrated the river, vulgar Cockney or oversea tourists, and pretentious politicians Stephen was less of the amused onlooker, more of the castigator. But he, too, trod the beaten way he was neither a mystic nor a metaphysician, but a man of robust intelligence who hated cant, pretense, and sentimentality, but was capable of generous emotion and even tenderness. . . . As a parodist he fell little short of his master."—C L Graves, The English Poets (ed by T. H. Ward), Vol. 5, p. 534.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Oscar Fingall O'Flahertie Wills Wilde (1856-1900), wit and aesthete, was born in Dublin of a father who loved many women and a mother who loved clever talk. Precocious and brilliant, he won a gold medal at Dublin for an essay on the Greek comic poets, before he left Oxford in 1878, his wit, his aestheticism, his eccentricities, had already, through rumor and Gilbert's caricature in Paince, made him famous in England and abroad. Preaching loudly the doctrine of "art for art's sake," averring that "all good art is useless," affecting long hair, a velvet coat, a sunflower, and an air of elegant indolence, filling his rooms with peacock plumes and blue china, he exaggerated the tendencies that the Pre-Raphaelites had set going, and drew after him a host of young admirers. After leaving Oxford, still bent on astounding the middle-classes, he curled his hair in imitation of the Emperor Nero, and indulged his passion for effete beauty by wearing delicately tinted gloves and a green carnation. His poetry, of which he published a volume in 1881, he threw off with careless grace. "I have given my genius to my life," he said, "to my work only my talent." After a lecture tour in America, during which he sought to convert his audiences from their vulgar taste for ornamented stoves and scroll-work, he wrote a series of sophisticated tales ostensibly for children, and his Picture of Dorian Gray (1891), which, with its subtle undercurrent of suggestion, has been called "the only French novel written in England." Affirming that "industry is the root of all ugliness," Wilde nevertheless worked harder than he cared to admit from 1892 to 1895, producing a series of "trivial comedies for serious people," with plots then thought shocking and dialogue almost unparalleled for cleverness. Wilde was at the height of his vogue, honored by his wit by dowagers at teas, and idolized by the younger Bohemian set not only for his brilliance but also for an essential kindness that underlay his posing, when his glory suddenly departed. Enraged by aspersions on his character, he sued a nobleman for libel, the suit failed, countercharges were made, and in 1895 Wilde was found guilty of sexual abnormalities and sentenced to two years of hard labor. At the jail in Reading he meditated suicide and composed his confessions in a document of forty-five thousand words, a small portion of which has since been printed under the title of De Profundis (1905). He found few friends left him when he was liberated. Although he wrote in 1898, while recuperating at Berneval in France, his most effective poem, The Ballad of Reading Gaol, his degeneration was rapid. No longer the elegant dandy of his happier days, he slouched about Paris with frayed cuffs and soiled collar, drinking himself into sodden insensibility, sitting at his table all night in futile efforts to compose. A short illness ended his life in 1900.

Wilde's principal publications were: Poems, 1881, The Happy Prince and Other Tales, 1888, The Picture of Dorian Gray, 1891; Intentions, 1891, A House of Pomegranates, 1892; Lady Windermere's Fan, 1892; A Woman of No Importance, 1893, Salome (in French), 1893; The Sphinx, 1894, The Ideal Husband, 1895, The Importance of Being Earnest, 1895, The Ballad of Reading Gaol, 1898, De Profundis, 1905

"There are many who read poetry chiefly for its sensuous qualities, these will always delight in Oscar Wilde. No man ever loved beauty more passionately than he, and few have been more sensitive to its various material forms. . . . He possessed the power of vivid and accurate word-painting . . . and the command of that indefinable word-magic which is the rarest and most wonderful quality of poetry. These things do not redeem Wilde's work from materialism, but they beautify his materialism, make it memorable. . . . The Ballad of Reading Gaol . . . must be pronounced his best poem. . . . It contains few or no rhetorical flourishes; its diction is simple and poignant; . . . it is passionately sincere. In reading most of Wilde's poems we cannot rid ourselves of the impression that the poet has a very delicious sense of his own cleverness and his own imaginative wealth, and that he is thinking about these things quite as much as about the subject he happens to be treating. In The Ballad of Reading Gaol he is desperately in earnest: the bitterness of his own prison experience is still in his mouth, and his pity for the condemned man is passionately genuine. His poem occasionally recalls The Ancient Mariner, with which it is not unworthy to be compared. The Ballad has less imaginative power and a less perfect finish, but a far more poignant and crying sense of reality. The Ancient Mariner, even in its more terrible passages, always suggests a dream, we constantly feel that it is all happening in the magic world of the poet's brain whereas The Ballad, even in its most fantastic stanzas, has somehow the nearness and the fierceness of real life. The whole poem is illumined by the merciless noonday blaze of actuality. . . . For once the barriers of Wilde's eclectic aestheticism are broken down, and he is overcome by a great emotional flood of pity and terror."—H. E. Woodbridge, Poet Lore, Nov., 1908, pp. 440-53.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Eugene Jacob Lee-Hamilton (1845-1907), educated in France and Germany and at Oxford, had only begun a promising diplomatic career when he was seized by a nervous disorder that compelled him to lie on his back in his bed-chamber at Florence for upwards of twenty years. Active pleasures prohibited, he made what he called "the wingless hours" fly faster by talking with visitors, who made his room one of the chief intellectual centers of Italy, and by writing sonnets, several collections of which were issued during his illness. At length he made an astonishing recovery, toured during 1897 in America, and married on his return Miss Holdsworth, a novelist. In 1904 his only daughter, Persis Margaret, suddenly died, Lee-Hamilton recorded his grief in a volume of sonnets, Mimma Bella, and soon after suffered a mortal stroke of paralysis.

Lee-Hamilton's principal publications were: Poems and Transcripts, 1878, Gods, Saints, and Men, 1880; The New Medusa and Other Poems, 1882, Apollo and Marsyas and Other Poems, 1884; Imaginary Sonnets, 1888, The Fountain of Youth, 1891; Sonnets of the Wingless Hours, 1894, Forest Notes (with Annie Lee), 1899, The Lord of the Dark Red Star, 1903, The Romance of the Fountain, 1905, Mimma Bella, 1909.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"Mr Lee-Hamilton's best-known volume, Sonnets of the Wingless Hours, . . . contains some twenty sonnets of exceptional beauty and four or five which rank not far after the greatest in the language. . . . He is indeed distinguished not only for sustained dignity of thought and felicity of image, but for a verbal flexibility which almost always enables him to control the exigencies of the sonnet, instead of being controlled by them. . . . The sonnets . . . picture the successive phases of despair, submission, and triumphant courage through which their author passed in the course of his long illness. . . . He suffered too much, and was too keenly sensitive to all the joy and beauty denied him, not to have his moods of dark relapse; but his verse proves that, as the years passed, he found increasing strength to bear his pain, and increasing consolation in that very sensitiveness to imaginative reactions that had once been the cause of his intensest misery"—Edith Wharton, Bookman, Nov., 1907, pp. 251-52.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Francis William Bourdillon (1852-1921), the son of a clergyman who composed gentle books for children and invalids, was educated at Oxford and lived a retired and scholarly life as a tutor, first to "the two sons of Their R. H.'s Prince and Princess Christian at Cumberland Lodge," and then to boys preparing for the universities. His chief diversions were mountain climbing and reading in old French literature and the ancient classics, he belonged to the best clubs and had a country estate, his marriage in 1882 was congenial and his life uneventful.

Bourdillon's principal publications were Among the Flowers and Other Poems, 1878,

Aucassin and Nicolette (trans.), 1887, Young Maids and Old Chma, 1888; Ailes d'Alouette, 1890; A Lost God, 1891, Sursum Corda, 1893, Nephele, 1896, Minuscula, 1897; Through the Gateway, and Other Poems, 1902, Roman de la Rose (trans.), 1906; Preludes and Romances, 1908, Moth Wings, 1913; Christmas Roses for Nineteen Hundred and Fourteen, 1914, Gerard and Isabel, 1921.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"The specific charm of Mr. Bourdillon's best verse is that it shows this fineness of touch on themes serener and higher and nobler than those which most interest the young poets of the present day. There is an air of purity and restfulness, in short, of spiritual loveliness, about the better of these poems, slight and all but gossamer in fiber as they are, which diffuses itself through the mind of the reader, and makes him, too, live for a few moments in what Milton calls 'empyrean' air." —A. BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

William Sharp (1856-1905), who expressed the more mystic side of his personality under the pseudonym of Fiona Macleod, was born in Paisley at the foot of the Scottish Highlands. Even as William Sharp, before the invention of the extraordinary Fiona, there was little that was commonplace about his career. Restless under discipline, he ran away three times from school, attempted to stow away on an ocean vessel, browsed in the Library of the University of Glasgow in preference to attending classes, and, after his graduation, spent two months with a band of gypsies. Still vagrant, he used a threatened attack of consumption as the excuse for a voyage to Australia, on his return, he lost several positions in London, fell in with Rossetti and his circle, studied art in Rome, made journeys to America, Germany, and North Africa, married his cousin, and learned to earn a livelihood by his pen. His earliest poems, including Earth's Voices (1884), Romantic Ballads (1888), and Sospiri di Roma (1891), dealt with "Mother Nature and her inner mysteries" and earned him a considerable reputation as a poet of the Swinburne school. In 1890, however, he developed a new sort of romanticism. The Celtic ballads and legends which he had learned from his Highland nurse in boyhood and from other Highlanders in later visits, began to haunt his mind until he became at times a seer who saw in trances and in fervent inner vision another world of transcendent beauty, encouraged by an Italian lady who sympathized with these strange moods and put him "in touch with ancestral memories," he began to describe his visions in prose and verse, and signed these new writings with the name of a Highland girl he once had known, Fiona Macleod. Pharais, a Romance of the Isles, in 1894, was the first volume so produced, and was succeeded by a series that created for the mythical Fiona a reputation quite independent of that which William Sharp had previously gained. At the same time he wrote other volumes of verse, fiction, and essays in his old manner over his true name. This amazing duality Sharp continued for the rest of his life, his connection with the Fiona literature was unsuspected, indeed the volume of Who's Who for 1906, the last one that contained Sharp's biography, had also an account of Fiona Macleod's career, in which her diversions were described as "sailing, hill-walks, and listening." In his more ordinary life, at his editorial desk or in his study, he was William Sharp, in the hills, with the sweep of the wind fresh against his face, and in his dreams and trances, he was Fiona. This "continued play of two faces" in his personality, added to the strain of upholding two separate literary reputations, broke down his health, after some years of restless wandering, he died in Italy. He left a letter in which his connection with Fiona Macleod was explained.

William Sharp's principal publications were Life of Rossetti, 1882; The Human Inheritance, 1882; Earth's Voices, 1884; Romantic Ballads and Poems of Phantasy, 1888, Sospiri de Roma, 1891, Vistas, 1894, The Gypsy Christ, 1895, Ecce Puella, 1896; Wives in Exile, 1896; Silence Farm, 1899, The Progress of Art in the Century, 1902, Literary Geography, 1904; Essays (two vols.), 1912.

Fiona Macleod's principal publications were Pharais, 1894, The Mountain Lovers, 1895, The Washer of the Ford, 1896, Green Fire, 1896, From the Halls of Dream, 1896, The Laughter of Peterkin, 1897, The Divine Adventure, and Other Essays, 1900, The House of Usher, 1900, The Immortal Hour, 1900; The Winged Destiny, 1904, Where the Forest Murmurs, 1906.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"The 'Fiona' literature . . . ranges through the domain of pure fantasy, of fable and allegory, of speculation, of æsthetic discussion, of symbolized fiction, and of verse. The voice has spoken many tongues, but always the accent of the mystic has persisted, has persisted and increased in poignancy and aloofness, so that in her later work it is frankly, and without the palliation of pictorial or symbolical setting, the speech and vision of the dreaming mind that is offered us. One will miss the essential note of this writing if one fails to see in it, as its prime possession, the confession and aspirations of a spirit swayed, beyond any other impulse, by a passionate consciousness and a special revelation of all beauty. . . . The sense of it is, for her, a perpetual touchstone for the apperception of . . . that miraculous and super-sensuous world in which the spirit of the mystic has its intensest life . . . One must not neglect to note the authentic presence of Celtic 'magic', . . . it is movingly and persistently present in the writing of Fiona Macleod, where it is touched with the profound and poignant nostalgia, the wistful ecstasy of the 'Eternal Dreamer.' As she herself has said, through each poem 'goes the wind of the Gaelic spirit, which everywhere desires infinitude, but, in the penury of things as they are, turns to the dim enchantment of dreams.'"—L. Gilman, North American Review, Oct., 1906, pp. 674-76

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Lionel Pigot Johnson (1867-1902) had the distinction of being the only important figure in the Irish literary revival who was not an Irishman. Descended from a distinguished family of soldiers, and educated at Winchester and Oxford, he came first in contact with Celtic life through vacation tramps in Wales and Cornwall. Although his principal literary interest was in poetry, he was forced, through the pressure of debts contracted by his expensive tastes in books and prints, to write reviews for journals, and, the habit once formed, he continued a facile and intelligent reviewer for the rest of his career. By 1892, however, he found leisure for poetry. His themes were related to the two dominant interests of his life. Roman Catholicism and Ireland. Swayed by the romantic beauty of the Roman Catholic tradition and ritual, he became a Roman Catholic in 1891. Already susceptible to Celtic influences through contacts with Wales, he became, in consequence of a visit to Ireland in 1893, an ardent champion of Irish nationalism and a contributor to the revival of Irish literature. After 1900 his health failed from intemperance and a too sedulous devotion to writing, and in 1902 he died.

Johnson's principal publications were: Bits of Old Chelsea (with Richard Le Gallienne), 1894; The Art of Thomas Hardy, 1894, Poems, 1895, Ireland, with other Poems, 1897, Post Luminium. Essays and Critical Papers, 1911.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"What differentiates Johnson's verses from those of his Irish contemporaries is a certain classic hardness of outline, and a restraint not usually found in the loose reveries and wistful outpourings of the Irish muse. Johnson's Greek and Latin studies, his admiration for Pater, who was his tutor, could not but influence his own writing. Whether the theme be English or Celtic, there is always an aloofness in the passion of the poet, he does not abandon himself utterly to his mood. It was easier for Johnson to be reserved than it was for most of the Irish poets. Classical education, for instance, has rarely been their lot . . . But more important, as enabling Johnson to exercise the classic virtue of restraint, was the fact that he wrote of Ireland from the head more than from the heart. His conversion to the political tradition of Ireland must necessarily have been largely a matter of intellectual conviction. . . . One might say that Johnson was Yeats with a classical education and the Oxford manner"—Ernest Boyd, Ireland's Literary Renaissance, pp. 190-93

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Ernest Dowson (1867-1900), the profligate author of delicately lovely lyrics, was the son of a dilettante poet whose precarious health compelled him to reside abroad, in Paris and on the Riviera, Dowson's education was therefore Continental and much interrupted, until he came to Oxford. There he read the Latin erotic poets and took hashish for the sake of the vivid dreams that it induced. Leaving Oxford in 1887 without a degree, he went to London; associated with Symons, Yeats, and Lionel Johnson in meetings of the Rhymers' Club at the Cheshire Cheese, made arrangements with a publisher for translations from Baudelaire, Verlaine, and other French poets at a definite weekly stipend, and spent most of his money in stimulants that gave him transient poetic inspiration. Pathetically hungry for love and beauty, he adored from afar the daughter of a French restaurant-keeper in London, followed her with his eyes as he sat at his table until the restaurant closed for the night, and then went home to drink and write lyrics in which she was the central figure. As his resources and health ebbed away, he lurked in dismal quarters about the London docks or the Paris markets, shunning his friends, and writing his poems in low taverns on the backs of smudgy envelopes, yet, in all his dissipation, he retained a certain dilapidated refinement, and his face still had a delicacy like that of Keats. In 1900 he went home from Paris to die. A friend, finding him unconscious, took him to his house, on his last night Dowson read Dickens and talked until five in the morning about the great poems which he was still to write.

Dowson's principal publications were: A Comedy of Masks (with Arthur Moore), 1893, Dilemmas, 1895, Verses, 1896; The Pierrot of the Minute, 1897, Adrian Rome (with Arthur Moore), 1899, Decorations, 1900.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"Dowson . . . was quite Latin in his feeling for youth, and death, and 'the old age of roses,' and the pathos of our little hour in which to live and love, Latin in his elegance, reticence, and simple grace in the treatment of these motives; Latin, finally, in his sense of their sufficiency for the whole of one's mental attitude. He used the commonplaces of poetry frankly, making them his own by his belief in them. the Horatian Cynara or Neobule¹ was still the natural symbol for him when he wished to be most personal. I remember his saying to me that his ideal of a line of verse was the line of Poe. 'The viol, the violet, and the vine', and the gracious, not remote or unreal beauty, which clings about such words and such images as these, was always to him the true poetical beauty. There never was a poet to whom verse came more naturally, for the song's sake, his theories were all æsthetic, almost technical ones, such as a theory, indicated by his preference for the line of Poe, that the letter 'v' was the most beautiful of the letters, and could never be brought into verse too often. For more abstract theories he had neither tolerance nor need. Poetry as a philosophy did not exist for him, it existed solely as the loveliest of the arts. He loved the elegance of Horace, all that was most complex in the simplicity of Poe, most bird-like in the human melodies of Verlaine.² He had the pure lyric gift, unweighted or unbalanced by any other quality of mind or emotion, and a song, for him, was music first, and then whatever you please afterwards, so long as it suggested, never told, some delicate sentiment, a sigh or caress"—Arthur Symons, Studies in Prose and Verse, pp. 274-75

John Davidson (1857-1909), the son of a Scotch evangelical minister, early developed an interest in science, through his employment as chemical analyst in a sugar house. Later he became interested in philosophy, during his career as teacher in several Scotch public and private schools. After writing five plays, he went in 1889 to London with the intention of making his fortune by writing; he made a meager living by journalism and fiction, but gave his talents their freest expression in poetry. His two collections of Fleet Street Eclogues and three series of ballads, published from 1891 to 1899, were the amusements of a man who otherwise had few pastimes and little relief from struggles against poverty. With the turn of the century, Davidson abandoned poetry to preach, in a series of "Testaments," a philosophic gospel not unlike that of Nietzsche, applying the doctrine of evolution to society, and defending imperialism and self-aggrandizement as the means to human progress. Before he could complete a series of plays, to be called God and Mammon, in which his doctrine was the central theme, he was driven by poverty and ill-health into a fit of depression and was prompted, while living at Penzance, to drown himself in Mount's Bay.

Davidson's principal publications were: Bruce, 1886, Scaramouch in Naxos, 1889, Perfervid, 1890, In a Music Hall and Other Poems, 1891; Fleet Street Eclogues, 1893, Sentences and Paragraphs, 1893; Ballads and Songs, 1894; Fleet Street Eclogues: Second Series, 1896, New Ballads, 1897; The Last Ballad, 1899; The Testament of a Vivisection, 1901, The Testament of a Man Forbid, 1901, The Testament of an Empire Builder, 1902, Holiday and Other Poems, 1906; The Triumph of Mammon, 1907; Mammon and His Message, 1908; The Testament of John Davidson, 1908; Fleet Street and Other Poems, 1909.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"The most immediately felt charm of Mr Davidson's verse is its goodly energy and force, its excellent vitality: there is life-blood in the strong and vehement lines. He has not a trace of watership sentiment and prettiness. . . . Each poem has lived in the poet's life, and issues from a living fire of passion, imagination, thought . . . And the defects of its qualities are not lacking: a certain feverishness at times, an unpruned wealth of words, a rapidity which makes the verse pant for want of breath . . . In each poem a situation, an emotion, has been faced and wrestled with and mastered the solutions are triumphant and satisfying. Where Browning would have written psychological studies, with parry and fence, cut and thrust, of encountering emotions, Mr Davidson chooses rather to throw his problem into a romantic ballad, applying, to subtle and spiritual themes, the direct narrative vigor and pictorial charm of the ancient ballad story."—Lionel Johnson, Academy, Jan. 5, 1895, pp. 6, 7.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Francis Thompson (1859-1907), one of the most innocent and child-like of men, with a child's gayety and sensitiveness to religious and social impressions, was the son of a provincial doctor, a Catholic, and was designed to follow in his father's profession. He was, however, by temperament and early inclination, a poet. Sent to the best Catholic colleges, he read poetry instead of science, given money to begin his professional work in London, he "idled" in libraries until his father, uncomprehending and exasperated, cut off his allowance. With no notions of how to earn a living, discharged by a shoemaker, with whom he found chance employment, for unpunctuality, he barely kept alive, the few pennies he earned by selling matches and calling cabs at theater doors, he spent for laudanum to deaden his misery. In the midst of this wretched life, untouched by anything approaching moral degradation, he thought in terms of poetry, on an impulse one day he scribbled verses and an essay on Paganism New and Old on dirty scraps of paper, slipped them through the mail-slot of the Merry England office, and returned to the streets. The editor of Merry England, Wilfrid Meynell, left the verses long untouched, when at length he read them, he was astonished, began a search for the author, found him after great difficulty, and invited him to his home. Thompson's first meeting with Alice Meynell and her two charming children was the turning-point of his life. The Meynells reclaimed him from the opium habit and established him in London lodgings, under their wise care his natural good spirits and the poetic impulse returned, Poems (1893) was the first fruit of his new life. For the Meynell daughters, who laughed at his quaint ways and adored him, he wrote his Sister Songs in 1895, and in 1897 he published a volume entitled New Poems, influenced by close association with Coventry Patmore. This volume closed his brief poetic career, asked why he wrote no more verse, he replied that he had said all that he had to say. For the rest of his life he lived cheerfully and devoutly, filled a hundred notebooks with merry observations on life, contributed essays on literature to the journals, saw much of the Meynells and of Wilfrid Scawen Blunt, played cricket, until at length his frail body gave way under an attack of consumption.

Thompson's principal publication were Poems, 1893, Sister Songs, 1895, New Poems, 1897; Health and Holiness, 1905

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"Francis Thompson was one of the few poets now or lately living in whom there was some trace of that divine essence which we best symbolize by fire. Emptiness he had and extravagances, but he was a poet, and he had made of many influences a new beauty. . . . When he chanted in his chapel of dreams, the airs were often airs which he had learned from Crashaw and Patmore. They came to life again when he used them, and he made for himself a music which was part strangely familiar and part of his own. . . . When he put these dreams and this music into verse, with a craft which he had perfected for his own use, the poetry was for the most part a splendid rhetoric, imaginative and passionless, as if the moods went by, wrapped in purple, in a great procession. . . . The genius of Francis Thompson was Oriental, exuberant in color woven into elaborate patterns, and went draped in old silken robes that had survived many dynasties. The spectacle of him was an enchantment, he passed like a wild vagabond of the mind, dazzling our sight. He had no message, but he dropped sentences by the way, cries of joy or pity, love of children, worship of the Virgin and saints and of those who were patron saints to him on earth, his voice was heard like a wandering music, which no one heeded for what it said, but which came troublingly into the mind, bringing it the solace of its old recaptured melodies. Other poets of his time have had deeper things to say, and a more flawless beauty, others have put more of their hearts into their song, but no one has been a torch waved with so fitful a splendor over the gulfs of our darkness"—Arthur Symons, Dramatis Personæ, pp. 180-84.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Robert Bridges (1844-1930), classical scholar, conscious craftsman in verse, and Poet Laureate of England, was born on the coast of Kent and enjoyed, as his favorite childhood diversion, lying on the cliffs, with his daydreams as his comrades, and watching the restless sea below. Shelley and Keats were his first examples in poetry. After Eton he proceeded to Oxford, where his strength and skill as an oarsman won him the position of stroke on his victorious college crew. He educated himself in medicine and, after a prolonged tour on the Continent and in the East, settled in London as a physician and practiced there for fifteen years. Restive in the hurry and noise of the city, longing for a quiet country life, he retired in 1882 to a suburban residence, after his marriage in 1884, he moved to a Berkshire manor-house with a lovely garden and natural surroundings that provided a setting for many of his poems. As early as 1873 he had begun publishing the shorter lyrics, with an Elizabethan flavor, for which he is chiefly known, and he continued to write them, in the intervals of his larger labors, for the rest of his life. He was, however, chiefly concerned with a series of Greek and Shakespearean masks and plays which he issued from 1883 to 1905, and with experiments in the classic meters. Appointed laureate to succeed Alfred Austin in 1913, he wrote odes of courage during the war and a song of victory at its close, and exerted his influence in favor of phonetic spelling and the purification of English diction and pronunciation. His last utterance in verse was his Testament of Beauty in 1929.

Bridges's principal publications were Poems, 1873; Sonnets, 1876, Poems, 1879, Poems, 1880, Prometheus the Firegiver, 1883, Poems, 1884, Eros and Psyche, 1885, Nero, 1885, Sonnets (The Growth of Love), 1889, The Feast of Bacchus, 1889, Achilles in Scyros, Palacio, The Return of Ulysses, The Christian Captives, 1890, Shorter Poems (collected from earlier publications, with additions), 1890-99, Humors of the Court, and Other Poems, 1893, Nero, Part II, 1894; New Poems, 1899, Milton's Prosody, 1901, Bramble Brae, 1902, Peace, 1903, Now in Wintry Delights, 1903, Demeter, 1905, The Present State of English Pronunciation, 1913, Ibani Obscure, an Experiment in the Classical Hexameter, 1916, The Spirit of Man (an anthology), 1916, The Necessity of Poetry, 1918, Britannia Victrix, 1918; October and Other Poems, 1920, New Verses, 1925, The Influence of the Audience on Shakespeare's Drama, 1927; Collected Essays, 1928; The Testament of Beauty, 1929.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"Mr Bridges's poems are seldom outcries of passion, they do not often explore the heights and depths of thought, they are in general of faultless evolution, but their design is rarely . . . complex and of large dimensions. Elements of many and various kinds enter into his . . . poems—delicate observation, delight in external nature, delight in art, delight in love, gladness and grief, ethical seriousness, pensive meditation, graceful play of fancy. But all are subdued to balance, measure, harmony, and sometimes our infirmity craves for some dominant note, some fine extravagance, even some splendid sins. Mr Bridges's audacities are to be found in occasional phrases—often felicitous and of true descriptive or interpretative power, sometimes not felicitous—and in his metrical experiments. But in his metrical experiments there is nothing revolutionary; they are extensions of a true tradition in English verse, they amount to little more than nicely calculated variations of stress. No writer of verse understands his business better than Mr Bridges; and if finer and subtler harmonies are attained unconsciously or half-unconsciously by greater poets, our ear soon adapts itself to the delicate surprises and delicate satisfactions which he has thought out and felt as a skilled craftsman"—E. Dowden, Fortnightly Review, July 1, 1894, pp. 45-46.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Mary Elizabeth Coleridge (1861-1907) followed her great-granduncle, Samuel Taylor Coleridge, in cultivating a taste for the romantic and the supernatural. Educated at her London home partly under the care of William Johnson Cory, she read and wrote mystically romantic poetry and tales, in 1881 she had her first essays published in periodicals, and in 1893 she issued her first novel, The Seven Sleepers of Ephesus, which Stevenson highly praised. Her verse, some of it dating from her childhood, remained hidden in manuscript until the future laureate, Robert Bridges, became interested in it and persuaded her to publish a volume, Fancy's Following, in 1896, the volume was privately printed in a limited edition, and made her poetic talents known only to the appreciative few to whom she sent copies. In the following year a novel, The King with Two Faces, made her famous among a wider public, she continued to write essays and novels for the rest of her life. She did not write much, but unselfishly devoted most of her time to the working-women of London, she gave lectures on literature in the Working-Women's College, and taught the women in their homes. After her sudden death in 1907, Henry Newbolt published her poems, in 1910 extracts from her interesting letters and diaries were issued under the title of Gathered Leaves.

Miss Coleridge's principal publications were The Seven Sleepers of Ephesus, 1893, Fancy's Following, 1896; The King with Two Faces, 1897, Non Sequitur, 1900, The Fiery Dawn, 1901, The Shadow on the Wall, 1904, The Lady on the Drawing-room Floor, 1906, Life of Holman Hunt, 1907, Poems, 1907; Gathered Leaves, 1910.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"Besides her bold and somewhat capricious imagination, with its natural and simple expression, the qualities which Mary Coleridge brought to her poetry . . . were a great literary appetite, knowledge, and memory—a wide sympathy, tenderness of feeling, and profound spirituality—and a humor without which such seriousness and devotion of life as were hers can hardly be made palpable in literature. . . . She did not write poems because she had learned the grammar of verse, nor because she thought she had valuable moral lessons for well-intentioned people. Her poetry is the irrepressible song of a fancy whose vagaries she would have thought it impertinent to analyze. . . ."—Robert Bridges, Cornhill Magazine Nov. 1907, p. 595.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Lord Alfred Douglas (1870-), the second son of the eighth Marquis of Queensberry, was one of the young Oxford men who attended, in the rôle of admirers and imitators, the meteoric career of Oscar Wilde. Under Wilde's influence, Lord Alfred early experimented in verse of the æsthetic stamp, particularly in the sonnet form, and acquired considerable technical skill. When Oscar Wilde was brought to trial at the instigation of the Marquis of Queensberry, and was sentenced to hard labor at Reading Gaol, Lord Alfred was implicated in the scandal stirred up by the trial, he has since been largely occupied in bringing libel suits against his detractors, attacking them in satiric verse, and defending himself in autobiographical writings remarkable for their lack of reticence. He has been founder and editor of two magazines, Plain Speech and Plain English, dedicated to attacks on public men and the refutation of attacks on himself. Besides the sonnets on which his literary fame largely depends, and his satiric pieces, he has written nonsense poetry, unusual in its polish and sophistication.

Douglas's principal publications are. Tails with a Twist, 1893, The City of the Soul, 1899, The Pongo Papers, 1907; Sonnets, 1909, Oscar Wilde and Myself, 1914, The Rhyme of F. Double E, 1914, The Rosсад, 1916; Eve and the Serpent, 1917, The Devil's Carnival, 1922, In Excelsis, 1924, The Duke of Berwick, and Other Rhymes (1925), Autobiography, 1929.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"His [Douglas's] output is small, but his wares are never shoddy. . . . His language is at times archaic, but it is never forced. He owes much to the old English ballad-writers. He is indebted in a great measure, without being their bondsman, to such poets as Baudelaire. . . . Whatever may be his personal eccentricities, he sublimates them in art. In spite of private quarrels and public scandals, in spite of political feuds and literary vendettas, malice cannot gainsay the vigor of his diction and the loftiness of his lyric vision."—G. S. Viereck, Introduction to Douglas's Perkin Warbeck, and Other Poems, pp. 5-14.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

William Butler Yeats (1865-), the principal leader of the Irish Literary Revival, was born near Dublin of Anglo-Irish stock, his father was a portrait-painter with Pre-Raphaelite leanings and a fervent interest in the Irish Nationalist cause. A mystic from childhood, Yeats absorbed from the Sligo countryside, where he spent holidays with his grandparents, the fairy-lore of Ireland, and in his schooldays gleaned from Synnott's Esoteric Buddhism and other works of transcendental philosophy a sense of the divine mystery in all material things. In these theosophical studies, Yeats was joined by G. W. Russell, whom he met at the Dublin Art School, and by other young men who formed the core of the literary movement, which was both patriotic and mystical. Yeats's first poems had to do with "Arcadia and the India of Romance," but a study of Sir Samuel Ferguson's poetry prompted him to write in 1889 The Wanderings of Oisen, an epic retelling of Celtic hero-tales which his reading in the collections of Irish folk-lorists had made familiar. Meanwhile Yeats had begun in 1887 a residence in London, and had become intimate with Lionel Johnson and Arthur Symonds in meetings of the Rhymers' Club, and learned from them to appreciate the symbolic poetry of William Blake and of the French symbolists such as Paul Verlaine, this new symbolism added to that which Yeats had already evolved from his study of Irish legends, burdened his next poetry with a mystical significance that made it almost unintelligible. "The old tales" he said, "were still alive for me, indeed, but with a new, strange, half-unreal life, as if in a wizard glass." This preoccupation with symbolism and the "Secret Rose" did not prevent Yeats, who has always been practical even when most romantic, from encouraging the growth of the Irish Revival, he helped to organize simultaneously in 1892 the Irish Literary Society in London and the Irish National Literary Society in Dublin, and worked hard to guide the new literature away from merely Nationalist propaganda to a purer art, continuing the tradition established by William Allingham and Sir Samuel Ferguson. "An Irish romantic movement," he said, "should make Ireland, as Ireland and all other lands were in ancient times, a holy land to its own people." This purpose, added to the sane influence of Lady Gregory, gradually brought him out of his elaborately symbolic period into one which was no less romantic but more perspicuous. In 1899 he turned, among other interests, to drama, and established with George Moore and other associates the Irish Literary Theatre, which became the Abbey Theatre in 1894, his plays, however, stood somewhat apart from the main current of the Irish drama, which was realistic rather than romantic and legendary as were his The Land of Heart's Desire (1894) and Shadowy Waters (1900). Since the opening of the century, Yeats's poetry has changed only in an added intellectual quality, but as a practical leader he has guided later developments in Irish literature and politics with great energy. He has been a senator of the Irish Free State since 1922, and in the following year was awarded the Nobel Prize for literature.

Yeats's principal publications are. Mosada, 1886; The Wanderings of Oisín, 1889, John Sherman, 1891; The Countess Kathleen, 1892, The Celtic Twilight, 1893, The Poems of William Blake (ed.), 1893, The Land of Heart's Desire, 1894; Poems, 1895, The Secret Rose, 1897; The Wind among the Reeds, 1899, The Shadowy Waters, 1900; Cathleen ni Hoolahan, 1902; Ideas of Good and Evil, 1903, In the Seven Woods, 1903, Hour Glass and Other Plays, 1904, The King's Threshold, 1904, Deirdre, 1907, The Green Helmet and Other Poems, 1910, J. M. Synge and the Ireland of His Time, 1911, Plays for an Irish Theatre, 1912, Responsibilities, 1914, Reveries, 1916; Per Amica Silenlia Lunae, 1918, The Cutting of an Agate, 1919, The Wild Swans at Coole, 1919; Michael Robartes and the Dancer, 1921, Seven Poems and a Fragment, 1922; The Trembling of the Veil, 1922, Later Poems, 1923, A Vision, 1926, The Tower, 1928, Three Things, 1929.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISMS

"The distinction of Mr. Yeats, as an Irish poet, is his ability to write Celtic poetry, with all the Celtic notes of style and imagination, in a classical manner. . . . When he takes a Celtic theme, some vast and epic legend, or some sad and lyrical fancy, he does not reflect the mere confused vastness of the one, the mere flying vagueness of the other, his art is full of reason. . . . It is not the subjects alone, nor the musical skill alone, nor the dominant mood alone, but all these together that make these poems so satisfying and so haunting. They have that natural felicity which belongs to beautiful things in nature, but a felicity under the control of art."—Lionel Johnson, Academy, Oct. 1, 1892, p. 278.

"It is by means of dramatic symbols . . . that Mr. Yeats weaves about the simplicity of moods that elaborate web of atmosphere in which the illusion of love, and the cruelty of pain, and the gross ecstasy of hope, became changed into beauty. . . . To a poet who is also a mystic there is a great simplicity in things, beauty being really one of the foundations of the world, woman a symbol of beauty, and the visible moment, in which to love or to write love songs is an identical act, really as long or as short as eternity. Never, in these love songs, concrete as they become through the precision of their imagery, does an earthly circumstance divorce ecstasy from the impersonality of vision. This poet cannot see love except as the absolute beauty, cannot distinguish between the mortal person and the eternal idea. Every rapture hurries him beyond the edge of the world and beyond the end of time. The conception of lyric poetry which Mr. Yeats has perfected . . . may be clearly defined. . . . A lyric is an embodied ecstasy, and an ecstasy so profoundly personal that it loses the accidental qualities of personality, and becomes a part of the universal consciousness. Itself, in its first, merely personal stage, a symbol, it can be expressed only by symbol; and Mr. Yeats has chosen his symbolism out of Irish mythology, which gives him the advantage of an elaborate poetic background, new to modern poetry."—Arthur Symonds, Studies in Prose and Verse, pp. 232-34.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Dora Sigerson Shorter (1866-1918) was born in Dublin, in the midst of the group out of which emerged the Irish Literary Revival. Her father, George Sigerson, was a poet and scholar much esteemed in Ireland, and a close friend of John Butler Yeats, also a poet and the father of William Butler Yeats, the leader of the new movement. A stormy Irish beauty, with a mass of shortly cropped hair, gray eyes, and vivid lips, Dora Sigerson found poetry her natural language and turned her dreams into meter from her childhood. A Dublin critic, John O'Leary, a friend of the family, found her early verse too introspective and advised, as an antidote, the ballad style, she read, accordingly, Percy's Reliques, and began writing ballads with Celtic themes. In 1896 she went to live in London as the wife of C. K. Shorter, a prominent essayist and editor, but she still felt Ireland to be her home, in her poetry, published in 1896 and 1897 under the titles The Fairy Changeling and Ballads and Poems, she relieved her homesickness by returning in fancy to Irish scenes. So generous-hearted and impulsive that she carried home every stray dog that she met on the streets, she was deeply stirred by the ill-success of the Irish nationalist movement, and even more by events which followed the outbreak of the World War. The bloody outcome of the Irish Rebellion in 1916 prostrated her, after assisting in preparing for the press her poems of protest, which she called Sixteen Dead Men, she sank into a dangerous illness and soon died.

Mrs. Shorter's principal publications were Verses, 1894; The Fairy Changeling, and Other Poems, 1897; My Lady's Shipper, and Other Poems, 1898, Ballads and Poems, 1899, The Father Confessor, 1900, The Woman Who Went to Hell, 1902; As the Sparks Fly Upward, 1904, The Country House Party, 1905; The Story and Song of Carl Roderick; Through Wintry Terrors, 1907, The Troubadour, 1910, New Poems, 1912, Madge Linsey, and Other Poems, 1913; Do-Well and Do-Little, a Fairy Story, 1914, Love of Ireland Poems and Ballads, 1916, Sixteen Dead Men, 1917.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"Mrs. Clement Shorter's technical accomplishment, her sense of metre and of style, do not, unfortunately, equal her inborn poetic feeling, yet her singing has an individual note which goes far to redeem its manifold imperfections of form. There is race in her work; it smacks of the soil, it is no mere imitative culture-product, but an expression in innate emotion and impulse. Mrs. Shorter has all the fanciful melancholy, the ardent spirituality, and the eerie-pathetic invention of the Celts. The unseen world of semi-malignant elemental beings is quite as real to her as the tangible world of her five senses. Her imagination is nourished upon folklore, and even Christian conceptions of life and death she instinctively translates into terms of that ancient and exquisite paganism which seems like a natural emanation from the green hills and rushing waters of Ireland"—William Archer, Poets of the Younger Generation, p. 396.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Arthur Symons (1865-), poet, critic, and devotee of the arts, was born in Wales of Cornish parents whose conservative ethical and religious principles did not prevent their allowing him liberty to do as he liked. "I wanted to want to be good," he tells us, "but all I really wanted was to be clever." His first verses were religious, but at the age of thirteen he was writing metrical tales in imitation of Byron's Don Juan, which had first attracted him because of its local reputation for appalling wickedness. Hating his middle-class environment, and shrinking from adopting any profession that would offend his acutely developed sensibilities, he began going up to London for prolonged visits, fell in with such congenial spirits as Wilde and Dowson, attended meetings of the Rhymers' Club, contributed to The Yellow Book, the organ of the decadents, haunted the theaters and concert-halls, and was intoxicated with the thronging impressions of city life. His greatest joy, he says, was being alone in the midst of a crowd. An eager student of all that interested him, he acquired a knowledge of Elizabethan drama that qualified him to edit Shakespeare and other dramatists in his early twenties, and an acquaintance with the arts that enabled him to earn his livelihood by critical writing. He was one of the first Englishmen to appreciate the French poets Baudelaire and Verlaine and to introduce them to English readers; their example, along with the precepts of Walter Pater, was paramount in developing Symons's own poetic style. To enlarge his experience with life and his store of colorful impressions, he lived in Paris, Rome, Venice, and Seville as he had lived in London, studying the people and the arts. He married in 1901 a lady who, like himself, "possessed some hardly conscious instinct which turns towards beauty unerringly," and in 1905 rather surprisingly established a permanent home in the quiet environment of Wittersham, where he still lives (1930).

Symons's principal publications are: An Introduction to the Study of Browning, 1886; Days and Nights, 1889; Silhouettes, 1892; London Nights, 1895; Amoris Victima, 1897; Studies in Two Literatures, 1897; The Symbolist Movement in Literature, 1899; Images of Good and Evil, 1900; Plays, Acting, and Music, 1903; Cines, 1903; Studies in Prose and Verse, 1904; Spiritual Adventures, 1905; A Book of Twenty Songs, 1905; The Fool of the World, and Other Poems, 1906; Studies in Seven Arts, 1906; William Blake, 1907; Cities of Italy, 1907; The Romantic Movement in English Poetry, 1909; Knave of Hearts, 1913; Figures of Several Centuries, 1915; Tragedies, 1916; Tristan and Iseult, 1917; Cines and Sea Coasts and Islands, 1918; Color Studies in Paris, 1918; The Toy Cart, 1919; Studies in Elizabethan Drama, 1920; Charles Baudelaire, 1921; Dramatis Personæ, 1923; Translations from Baudelaire, 1925; Studies in Strange Souls, 1929

"If there ever was a religion of the eyes, I have devoutly practised that religion. I noted every face that passed me on the pavement, I looked into the omnibuses, the cabs, always with the same eager hope of seeing some beautiful or interesting person, some gracious movement, a delicate expression, which would be gone if I did not catch it as it went. This search without an aim grew to be almost a torture to me, my eyes ached with the effort, but I could not control them. At every moment, I knew, some spectacle awaited them, I grasped at all these sights as a dog that I once saw standing in an Irish stream and snapping at the bubbles that ran continually past him on the water. Life ran past me continually, and I tried to make all its bubbles my own"—A. Symons, "A Prelude to Life," Spiritual Adventures, p. 32.

"His [Symons's] . . . poems deal very often with works of art, and with the highly artificial . . . beauty of the modern urban landscape . . . He is very largely a poet of the artificial . . . It is not that he objects to nature. He could from the very first appreciate certain aspects of her, and he came in time to have a very individual feeling for her. But nature, in his early poems, stirs him only where it is an intruder among artificial things . . . His is the attitude, it has been often enough said, of a decadent poet . . . His aim was, with the utmost economy, to suggest momentary impressions, transient moods, the impressions to be, of preference, those of one gazing at things themselves artificial or seen under an artificial light, the moods to be not only fleeting but frivolous or perverse . . . Certain effects of color, which might have been brushed off a moth's wings and which the first breath will scatter, certain movements, of a dancer seen perhaps from the wings; certain notes of a just audible music; certain moods which flutter through the mind and are gone, have been seized delicately, firmly, and perpetuated without any of that incongruous mason's art which too often mars the propriety of 'a moment's monument'."—T. E. Welby, Arthur Symons, A Critical Study, pp. 5-6, 21-22.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Rudyard Kipling (1865-) was born in Bombay, where his father, a writer of verse as well as an artist, was professor of Architectural Sculpture in the British School of Art. From his native nurse Kipling learned to speak Hindustani as soon as English; until he was six India was practically the only world that he knew. In 1871, however, his parents took him to England, where, on their return to India, he was left with friends to be educated. In the course of time, he entered the United Service College at Bideford, to be fitted for a governmental position in India, his poor eyesight disqualifying him for such a position, and his tastes turning toward reading and writing, his friends were easily reconciled to his becoming an author. In this ambition he was encouraged by the praise he received for early poems published in London journals and privately printed by his father in Bombay, and also by the interest of his uncle, Sir Edward Burne-Jones, who, as a member of the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood, introduced him to William Morris and other writers. In 1882 he sailed for India and became sub-editor of the Civil and Military Gazette at Lahore, where his family was then living, the gruff editor-in-chief, while exacting hard day labor, called him a "clever pup" and allowed him rather a free hand in his contributions, accordingly he submitted poems and stories, later collected as Departmental Duties (1880) and Plain Tales from the Hills (1887), along with his regular assignments. This discipline in journalism, and this early practice in turning his shrewd observations of English and native life in India into prose and verse "that should take with the English public," was of the highest importance in determining the bent of Kipling's literary career. In 1887 he graduated to the editorial staff of a larger paper, the Pioneer at Allahabad; and, as traveling correspondent, began a series of journeys to all parts of India, he saw the fighting on the Afghanistan border, and in 1889 embarked on a trip around the world, described in From Sea to Sea (1899). Arriving, by way of America, in London, he was somewhat surprised to find himself unknown, a reissue, from English presses, of his works published in India gratified him by an immense success, the English public, it seemed, was hungry for just the graphic impressions of Indian life which he had to offer. A short pause, and he was off once more to South Africa, where he enlarged his acquaintance with the far-flung empire and cultivated the friendship of Cecil Rhodes, to Australia, Ceylon, and back to India, where he wrote his Barrack-Room Ballads (1892). Marrying an American girl in 1892, he embarked with her on new wanderings which led them, by way of Japan, to Brattleboro, Vermont, there Kipling made his first prolonged residence in many years, wrote the Jungle Books (1894-95) and Just So Stories (1902) for his two children, and added a not wholly sympathetic acquaintance with American life to his enormous fund of literary material. After returning to England in 1896, Kipling made one more journey to South Africa and another to America; he then settled down to a comparatively uneventful life in the manor-house of Bateman's Burwash in Sussex, keeping bees and prize-cattle, fishing and tramping over the downs, and drawing from his store of memories the material for his poetry and fiction, the expression of his robust philosophy. The smooth current of his life was broken by the World War, in which he lost his only son; he joined with Newbolt in reporting the events of the war and in heartening his countrymen with his verses. He was often mentioned in connection with the laureateship, but never appointed, his highest reward for his work was the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1907.

Kipling's principal publications are Departmental Duties, 1886, Plain Tales from the Hills, 1887, Soldiers Three, In Black and White, The Story of the Gadsbys, Under the Deodars, The Phantom 'Ricksshaw, Wee Wilhe Winkie, 1888-89; Life's Handicap, 1890; The Light That Failed, 1891, Barrack-Room Ballads, 1892; Many Inventions, 1893, The Jungle Book, 1894; Second Jungle Book, 1895, The Seven Seas, 1896, Captains Courageous, 1897; The Day's Work, 1898, Stalky & Co., 1899, From Sea to Sea, 1899, Kim, 1901, Just So Stories, 1902, The Five Nations, 1903, Traffics and Discoveries, 1904, Puck of Pook's Hill, 1906, Actions and Reactions, 1909; Rewards and Faines, 1910, Songs from Books, 1913, The Harbor Watch, 1913, The New Armies in Training, 1914; France At War, 1915; Fringes of the Fleet, 1915; Sea Warfare, 1916; A Diversity of Creatures, 1917, The Years Between, 1918; Inclusive Verse, 1919, Letters of Travel, 1920, Debits and Credits, 1926, A Book of Words, 1928

"The greatest thing in the world for Kipling is Power at work—whether it is exhibited by a humble man, a huge engine, or an empire. That is why he has made such a strong impression upon strong men everywhere. The age is one of great schemes, industrial, commercial, and political, the achievements of science are marvelous—and yet until Kipling came the people who write were saying that it was an unromantic age, that poetry had been killed the world over by steam, and that romance was dead because republicanism had leveled all men to a common pattern. Kipling had the advantage of living in his impressionable youth where the new civilization was imposing itself upon one that was old and worn out. He saw part of the empire in making. He was looking at the raw edges of the work, and he grasped the full meaning of the new forces behind it. Never has the executive power of man so revealed itself as in the nineteenth century. Instead of looking upon it as prosaic, and turning back to other times and countries for a field of romance, Kipling saw that he and we are truly living in an age of romance. He set to work to reveal the age to itself"—Robert Bridges, Outlook, Feb. 4, 1899, pp. 281-82.

"In some of his finest pieces Mr Kipling is a prey to the grandiose aspect of things. . . . We know that England is great, that Englishmen have done great things, that the fame of her glory has filled the corners of the earth; but we have no occasion to shriek about it, to wax hysterically wroth with those who deny it. Shakspeare's great burst of loyal pride, Milton's solemn utterance, Wordsworth's noble verses, Browning's Home Thoughts from Abroad, Tennyson's stately lyrics, do not brag and bluster and protest. . . . The occasion on which the verses were written may justify some of this agitated declamation, but the tone is habitual with Mr Kipling"—Lionel Johnson, Academy, May 28, 1892, p. 510.

"The passion for the sea, the mastery of its terrors, the confident but distrustful familiarity with it of the English seaman, have never had such expression as Mr Kipling has given to them. . . . His imagination dwells with vivifying emotion on the heroic combats—now victories, now defeats—of his race with the winds and the waves from which they draw their strength. All that belongs to the story of man upon the sea—the line-of-battle ship, the merchantman, the tramp steamer, the derelict, the little cargo-boats, the lighthouse, the bell-buoy—has its part in his verse of human experience. And so vivid are his appreciations of the poetic significance of even the most modern and practical of the conditions and aspects of sea-life that . . . he has sung the song of the marine steam-engine and all its machinery, from furnace-bars to screw, in such wise as to convert their clanging beats and throbs into a sublime symphony in accord with the singing of the morning stars"—Charles Eliot Norton, Atlantic Monthly, Jan., 1897, p. 114.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Sir William Watson (1858-) came of an old Yorkshire family, from which he inherited a staunchness and poise, a reverence for things long established, and a courage in voicing his convictions that are still the essentials of his character. From his mother he learned to love religion and poetry. His first volume of verse, The Prince's Quest (1880), followed the current mode in its imitation of Tennyson; but in his second volume, Wordsworth's Grave (1890), he based his style on Arnold and the classics, to this conservative tradition he has since been true. His self-reliant independence of contemporary modes and passions he has also shown in his political opinions. He fearlessly disagreed with English policy as regards Turkey in 1896, South Africa in 1900, and Ireland in 1920, his utterances in the vigorous sonnets entitled The Purple East (1896) and later volumes probably kept him from appointment as laureate in 1913. With England's part in the World War he was sincerely in sympathy, and in 1917 he received his knighthood. Temperate, self-contained, scholarly, he seldom travels, his principal world is his study at The Cliff, Peacehaven, Sussex.

Watson's principal publications are The Prince's Quest, 1880, Epigrams of Art, Life, and Nature, 1884, Wordsworth's Grave, 1890; Lachrymæ Musarum, 1892, Lyric Love, 1892; The Elopement Angels, 1893, Excursions in Cruicism, 1893, Odes, and Other Poems, 1894, The Father of the Forest, 1895, The Purple East, 1896, The Year of Shame, 1896, The Hope of the World, 1897; Ode on the Coronation, 1902, For England, 1903, New Poems, 1909; Sable and Purple, 1910, The Heralds of the Dawn, 1912; The Muse in Exile, 1913, Pencraft: A Plea for Olden Ways, 1916, Retrospection, and Other Poems, 1916, The Man Who Saw, and Other Poems, 1917; The Superhuman Antagonists, 1919, Ireland Unfreed, 1920, Poems Brief and New, 1925, Selected Poems, 1928.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"The great quality [of Mr. Watson's poems] is their style, as strong as it is flexible, as sure as it is refined, finished in every detail, and yet large and simple in its masses, clear-flowing always. Higher praise can hardly be given to style merely, in its vocabulary and cadences it continues with original touch the traditions of Landor and Arnold, and, in less degree, of Wordsworth's diction in blank verse, it is most admirable in its mastery of pure and often lofty phrase, and relies much upon the phrase as the element of composition, it is excessive in its Latinity, in its polysyllabic preponderance to a degree that seems mannered, and in the glide of the words that results, but . . . it is the style of Mr. Watson in all his verse which lifts it out of comparison with his contemporaries. The appeal to the literary sense made by the style is very much increased by the prevailing tone and treatment. Mr. Watson is primarily a poet of meditation, thought of some kind, critical or political, or more broadly human, is the substance of his verse, sometimes given in the flashing phrase of a single idea, sometimes in the diffused irony of a fable, . . . and at others in a mood, though rarely. But in rendering this thought less reliance is placed on imagination and passion than has been used in the century. The verse cannot be described as romantic, . . . the ideal here found is rather classic purity and elegance than color, passion, that outward audacity or inner intensity which go with romantic temperament . . . Sentiment, pathos, meditative power, melody and phrase, love of the poets, interest in man's spiritual problems, passion for his social happiness, together with the faculty for graceful compliment, for friendship in verse, for light irony and the cameo forms of the art as well as for denunciation and eloquent protest in its noblest forms—all this the volume [Collected Poems] evinces . . . More than all these qualities, which have been indicated so briefly, one other thing stands out shining: the devotion of the poet to the ideal of poetry as he received it from Tennyson, last of the sacred line"—G. E. Woodberry, Century Magazine, Sept., 1902, pp. 802-03.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Alfred Edward Housman (1859-) was born in Shropshire, the western county of England, which is the principal setting for his poems. He was one of three children, all of whom have adopted literary or artistic careers. Educated at an exclusive private school in near-by Worcestershire and at Oxford, he excelled in classical studies; at the age of twenty-two, after taking his master's degree, he went to London as a clerk in the Patent Office and there submitted to a monotonous routine for ten years. The monotony had one extraordinary interruption. In 1885, returning from a vacation in Shropshire, he was seized by an impulse which led him to write, at a fever heat in a few months, the lyrics that compose his Shropshire Lad. The poems still in manuscript, Housman became in 1892 a professor of Latin at University College, London, and began writing papers on Classical subjects for learned journals. At last, in 1896, he sent the Shropshire Lad to a publisher, who accepted it instantly and asked when a second volume could be expected. Housman replied: "As it has taken me twenty-three years to write this volume, maybe after another twenty-three years I'll send you another." It was, in fact, twenty-eight years before the second volume was ready—a volume called, with characteristic finality, Last Poems, published in 1922. "It is not likely," said Housman in his foreword, "that I shall ever be impelled to write much more." Meanwhile, he had, in 1911, been appointed to fill the Chair of Latin at the University of Cambridge and had published, besides numerous learned articles, editions of Manilius and Juvenal. Apparently little interested in the popularity and influence of his volumes, Housman has lived for the most part in seclusion and has been singularly averse to talking about himself or his poetry.

Housman's principal publications are: A Shropshire Lad, 1896; Manilius, Book I, 1912, Juvenal, 1905, Manilius, Book II, 1912, Book III, 1916, Book IV, 1920, Last Poems, 1922, Lucan, 1926

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"Mr Housman has three main topics: a stoical pessimism, a dogged rather than an exultant patriotism, and what I may call a wistful cynicism. . . Mr. Housman's melancholy is inveterate and not to be shaken off, but there is nothing whining about it, rather, it is bracing, invigorating. . . His patriotism is local rather than national or imperial. . . He dwells, not harshly but with compassion, upon the mutability of human feeling, the ease with which the dead are forgot, the anguish of love unrequited, and the danger that long life may mean slow degradation. . . One of Mr. Housman's strongest and rarest qualities is his unerring dramatic instinct. . . It is long since we have caught just this note in English verse—the note of intense feeling uttering itself in language of unadorned precision, uncontorted truth. Mr Housman is a vernacular poet, if ever there was one. He employs scarcely a word that is not understood of the people and current on their lips. For this very reason, some readers who have come to regard decoration, and even contortion, as of the essence of poetry, may need time to acquire the taste for Mr. Housman's simplicity. But if he is vernacular, he is also classical in the best sense of the word. His simplicity is not that of weakness, but of strength and skill. He eschews extrinsic and factitious ornament because he knows how to attain beauty without it. It is good to mirror a thing in figures, but it is at least as good to express the thing itself in its essence. . . Mr. Housman has this talent in a very high degree, and cognate and complementary to it is his remarkable gift of reticence. . . He will often say more by a cunning silence than many another poet by pages of speech. That is how he has contrived to get into this tiny volume so much of the very essence and savor of life"—William Archer, Fortnightly Review, Aug., 1898, pp. 265-71.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

George William Russell (1867-), whose original Theosophist pen-name of "Æon" was abbreviated by a hasty printer into "A. E.," the name by which he has since been known, was born of peasant stock at Lurgan, county Armagh, in Ulster. After acquiring experience with the recalcitrant Irish soil that has been of use to him in his later career, and after a brief education in local schools, he journeyed to Dublin with the intention of becoming an artist and thus giving substance to his vivid imaginative life, nursed on Celtic legends. At the art school he met W. B. Yeats, and through him was introduced to the group of ardent young Irishmen who were dreaming of a national literature separate from that of England. This group formed a club, later called the Hermetic Society, for the reading of Oriental and Transcendental philosophy and Theosophist literature, the mysticism of which, joined with the other-worldly quality of the native Celtic tradition, had much to do with the nature of the Irish Literary Revival. To the Theosophist journals edited by the group Russell contributed his first poems, collected in 1894 under the title Homeward Songs by the Way. Meanwhile he developed a style in painting as mystical as that of his poems. His belief in the divinity of man resulted in a passion for democracy and social uplift, his love of the old Celtic legends, with their reflection of an heroic age, led him to conceive that the salvation of Ireland lay in a return, with scientific modifications, to the social conditions of the older time. These beliefs he preached to crowds on the hillsides above Dublin, towering before his audience, with his wild hair and giant frame, like a demigod returned from the Celtic past. His essays, his poems, his paintings in divers ways all tended to the same purpose, visionary to a remarkable degree, he yet was able to lead his dreams into constructive channels, from expeditions into the country to see faeries, he returned to lecture on cooperation before agricultural societies. As editor of the Irish Homestead he wielded a great influence on Irish economic reform, and as a political leader, he had an important part in the movement which resulted in the formation of the Irish Free State. Refusing office under the new government, he preferred to wield his influence upon Irish life through the editorial pages of The Irish Statesman and through his personal contacts. To Sunday evening gatherings at his home, dominated by his towering figure and personality, came the social and literary masters of Ireland; he writes social and economic works, and for recreation goes to paint his mystic pictures in the wild mountains of Donegal.

Russell's principal publications are: Homeward Songs by the Way, 1894; The Earth Breath, 1897; Literary Ideals in Ireland (with others), 1899; Ideals in Ireland (with others), 1901; The Nuts of Knowledge, 1903; The Divine Vision, 1904; The Mark of Apollo, 1904; New Poems, 1904; By Still Waters, 1906; Irish Essays, 1906; Deirdre, 1907; The Hero in Man, 1909; The Renewal of Youth, 1911; Co-operation and Nationality, 1912; Gods of War, 1915; Imaginations and Reveries,

1915, The National Being, 1917, The Candle of Vision, 1919; The Interpreters, 1922, The Dark Weeping, 1929

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"The mysticism of A. E. is entirely different from the symbolism which has given Yeats the reputation of being a mystic. That which is purely decorative in the poetry of the latter is, in A. E., the expression of fundamental truths. . . . The externals which attracted the instinct for beauty in Yeats were not lost upon A. E., but he was above all concerned for the inner meaning of the phenomena, whose plastic beauty alone captured the imagination of [Yeats]. . . 'I know I am a spirit, and that I went forth in old time from the Self-ancestral to labors yet unaccomplished, but, filled ever and again with homesickness, I made these homeward songs by the way.' These words, with which A. E. introduced his first book of verse, should serve as a superscription to the Collected Poems, so completely do they summarize the whole message and tendency of his poetry. All his life he has sung of this conviction of man's identity with the Divine Power, the Ancestral Self of Eastern philosophy, from whom we are but temporarily divided. The occasion of his poems are those moments of rapture when the seer glimpses some vision reminding him of his immortal destiny, his absorption into Universal Being. The hours of twilight and dawn are those which most usually find the poet rapt in 'divine vision,' and to this circumstance must be attributed numerous landscapes whose beauty is undiminished by their being so frequently seen in the same light. . . . The violet and amethyst, the pearl and silver shades of night are a happy reflection not only of actual nature but also of the celestial cities and starry regions of the soul. . . . A. E.'s verse is not so much the utterance of a poet as the song of a prophet, and its importance is to be measured in other than purely literary terms. He often falls below the standard of technical perfection which was set by Yeats, and is the latter's most valuable gift to Irish poetry. But depth and sincerity, coupled with a general high level of workmanship, enable A. E. to take his place in the first rank. . . . We know that he has aspired to give us a revelation of Divine Beauty, and we are grateful that this should be his unique preoccupation"—Ernest Boyd, Ireland's Literary Renaissance, pp. 222-31.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Sir Henry Newbolt (1862-), an eminent authority on poetry and the British navy, was reared in the cultured and conservative home of an English clergyman, on the edge of the "Black Country," the manufacturing district of England. His elementary education he received at Clifton, a school near Bristol, where he played cricket and gained the affection for public-school life and traditions which underlies much of his verse. After gaining his degree at Oxford, he practiced law as a barrister in Lincoln's Inn from 1887 to 1899, edited the Monthly Review from 1900 to 1904, taught poetry at Oxford from 1911 to 1921, wrote his poems, and collected his favorite verse in anthologies. Already, with Henley and Kipling, an ardent supporter of British military and naval policy, he took an active interest in the World War, wrote stirring ballads, acted as controller of wireless and cables, and was knighted for his services in 1915. After the war he was appointed official naval historian and compiled his monumental Naval History of the War in 1920.

Newbolt's principal publications are: Taken from the Enemy, 1892, Modred, a Tragedy, 1895, Admirals All, 1897; The Island Race, 1898, Stories from Froissart, 1899; The Sailing of the Long Ships, 1902; Songs of the Sea, 1904, The Year of Trafalgar, 1905; The Old Country, 1906, The New June, 1909, Songs of Memory and Hope, 1909, Songs of the Fleet, 1910; The Twymans, 1911, Poems New and Old, 1912; The Book of the Blue Sea, 1914, The Book of the Thin Red Line, 1915, Tales of the Great War, 1916; The Book of the Happy Warrior, 1917; A New Study of English Poetry, 1917; St. George's Day, 1918, Submarine and Anti-Submarine, 1918; The Book of the Long Trail, 1919; The Book of Good Hunting, 1920, A Naval History of the War, 1920, The Book of the Grenvilles, 1921; Studies Green and Gray, 1926, New Paths on Helicon, 1927, The Linnel's Nest, 1927.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISM

"Mr. Newbolt . . . is eminently a hero-worshiper, and eminently a believer in the mission of England. A dangerous faith, some may say, and one which may be easily used as a cloak for a mere lust of empire. Mr. Newbolt, however, is alive to these dangers. . . . There is nothing frothy, nothing blustering or insincere, about Mr. Newbolt's patriotism. It is sad and earnest rather than thoughtlessly exultant. In his fervent loyalty to a great tradition, Mr. Newbolt is almost morbidly mindful of the responsibilities it imposes. . . . The same note recurs frequently in Mr. Newbolt's verse. He is never tired of heartening the Island Race to 'Play up!' but he does not fail to add, 'And play the game!' He is a Clifton boy, as we learn from more than one poem, and the best spirit of the English public-school breathes throughout his work. . . . Mr Newbolt's lyre may not be of the widest range, but his touch on it is peculiarly his own—clean, and crisp, and ringing"—William Archer, Poets of the Younger Generation, pp. 290-304.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Thomas Hardy (1840-1928) was born in Dorsetshire, a southern county of England that became the principal background of his fiction and poetry. His father was a building-constructor, his mother was intellectually ambitious, and so developed his mind that he became, even in childhood, an analytical although sympathetic observer of life around him. From Dorchester schools he learned little, but when in 1856 he was apprenticed to John Hicks, a local architect, he began the study of Latin and Greek with a fellow-apprentice, and wrote poems (later destroyed) under the influence of William Barnes, the bard of Dorsetshire, his friend and adviser. His architectural training under Hicks he supplemented in 1862 by study and work in London under Sir Arthur Blomfield, although he perfected himself in architecture to a degree that won him a prize offered by the Royal Institute in 1863, and that gave him a feeling for structure which strongly influenced his literary craftsmanship, he was more interested in the evening classes that he attended at the University of London, in music, plays, and painting, in theological and philosophic discussions with his few friends, and in his poetry. Poetry he wrote in abundance, and all of it, including much that he published in 1898 under the title of Wessex Poems, came promptly back from the publishers to whom he submitted it. In 1870, as a consequence of his engagement to Emma Gifford, whom he had met while repairing a church in Cornwall, he felt the need of money and, despairing of selling his poems, began the composition of novels. Working under the helpful advice of George Meredith, he wrote Desperate Remedies (1870), Under the Greenwood Tree (1872), and Far from the Madding Crowd (1874), each novel the work of a year and each showing a rapid advance in technique. By one of life's ironies, it was through these novels, in which Hardy had an interest slight in comparison with his devotion to his poetry, that he achieved fame. For almost thirty years he wrote his verse in private, and for the public wrote a long series of novels which reached a climax of favor with the publication of Tess of the D'Urbervilles in 1891. During this time his philosophic conception of chance as a malignant force ruling the universe, already developed in 1865 when he wrote the first of his Wessex Poems, had deepened under the influence of Schopenhauer and other German thinkers, his later novels, notably Jude the Obscure (1895), somewhat estranged the general public by their insistent embodiment of this theme. In 1898, settled for some time in a house of his own designing near Dorchester, and financially independent, Hardy was at last enabled to give over his writing of novels and to devote himself to his favorite means of literary expression. In that year he published Wessex Poems, and Other Verses; in 1902, Poems of the Past and the Present; and other collections followed. The work which he regarded as his masterpiece, the culmination to which all his work and thought had been leading, was his vast Napoleonic epic-drama, The Dynasts, published in three parts from 1903 to 1908. The remainder of Hardy's life was not antichismatic. In his later poems and also in the quiet influence that radiated from his Dorset homestead, he continued to impress his personality upon the art and life of the modern world.

Hardy's principal publications were. Desperate Remedies, 1871, Under the Greenwood Tree, 1872; A Pair of Blue Eyes, 1872-73, Far from the Madding Crowd, 1874; The Hand of Eiselberta, 1876, The Return of the Native, 1878, The Trumpet-Major, 1879, A Laodicean, 1880-81, Two on a Tower, 1882, The Mayor of Casterbridge, 1884-85, The Woodlanders, 1886-87; Wessex Tales, 1888, A Group of Noble Dames, 1891, Tess of the D'Urbervilles, 1891; Life's Little Ironies, 1894, Jude the Obscure, 1895; The Well-Beloved, 1897; Wessex Poems, and Other Verses, 1898; Poems of the Past and the Present, 1902, The Dynasts, 1903-08, Poems of William Barnes (ed.), 1908, Time's Laughingstocks and Other Verses, 1909, Satires of Circumstance, 1911-14, A Changed Man and Other Stories, 1913, Moments of Vision, 1917, Late Lyrics, 1922, The Queen of Cornwall, 1923, Human Shows, 1925, Yuletide in a Younger World, 1927, Winter Words, 1928.

INTRODUCTORY CRITICISMS

"When we resume the effect which the poetry of Mr Hardy makes upon the careful reader, we note . . . a sense of unity throughout. Mr Hardy has expressed himself in a thousand ways, but has never altered his vision. From 1867 to 1917, through half a century of imaginative creation, he has not modified the large outlines of his art in the smallest degree. To early readers of his poems, before the full meaning of them became evident, his voice sounded inharmonious, because it did not fit in with the exquisite melodies of the later Victorian Age. But Mr. Hardy, with characteristic pertinacity, did not attempt to alter his utterance in the least, and now we can all perceive, if we take the trouble to do so, that what seemed harsh in his poetry was his peculiar and personal mode of interpreting his thoughts to the world. As in his novels so in his poems, Mr. Hardy has chosen to remain local, to be the interpreter for present and future times of one rich and neglected province of the British realm. From his standpoint there he contemplates the wide aspect of life, but it seems huge and misty to him, and he broods over the tiny accidents of Wessex idiosyncrasy. His irony is audacious and even sardonic, and few poets have been less solicitous to please their weaker brethren. But no poet of modern times has been more careful to avoid the abstract and to touch upon the real"—Edmund Gosse, Some Diversions of a Man of Letters, pp. 257-58.

"Earth is to Hardy a haunted spot. . . . I know no poetry so pervaded as his with a sense of the continued presence of the dead, nor is there another body of verse in the world, I think, in which that sense is conveyed to us with such intolerable poignancy and beauty. It is a strange paradox. No living poet is, in his sharp breach with tradition, so intensely of his time as Thomas Hardy, and no poet writing today would have been so utterly at home on earth a thousand years ago"—John Livingstone Lowes, Yale Review, Apr. 1926, p. 522.

"People call me a pessimist; and if it is pessimism to think, with Sophocles, that 'not to have been born is best,' then I do not reject the designation. I never could understand why the word 'pessimism' should be such a red rag to many worthy people; and I believe, indeed, that a good deal of the robustious, swaggering optimism of recent literature is at bottom cowardly and insincere. I do not see that we are likely to improve the world by asseverating, however loudly, that black is white. . . . But my pessimism, if pessimism it be, does not involve the assumption that the world is going to the dogs. . . . On the contrary, my practical philosophy is distinctly meliorist. What are my books but one plea against 'man's inhumanity to man'—to woman—and to the lower animals? . . . Whatever may be the inherent good or evil of life, it is certain that men make it much worse than it need be. When we have got rid of a thousand remediable ills, it will be time enough to determine whether the ill that is irremediable outweighs the good"—Hardy's answer to his critics, recorded by William Archer, Pall Mall Magazine, Apr., 1901, p. 533.
